lectures, and extensive practice, devoted much of his time in making observations, which he communicated to those learned societies of which he was a member. His great and immortal work, the Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus, however, must remain a striking monument of his labor and application. It was begun 1751, but was not made public till 1775, that accuracy and truth might be displayed in every page. It is dedicated to the king, and is adorned by 34 beautiful plates, exhibiting those various delicate dissections in which he acknowledges that he had been assisted by his brother. Rich in fame and in fortune, Dr. Hunter formed the plan of retiring to Scotland about 10 years before his death; but his wish to purchase an estate in his native country, was retarded and finally prevented by the defective titles of the proprietor, and he determined never to remove from London. In the last part of life he was afflicted with the gout, but a paralytic stroke came at last to shorten his days. His friends wished to persuade themselves that his apprehensions were frivolous, but the description which he gave of his feelings proved too true, and he expired 30th March, 1783, exhibiting to his friend Dr. Combe the greatest resignation. If I had strength enough, said he, to hold a pen, I would write how easy and pleasant it is to die. His remains were buried in the rector's vault of St. James's church, Westminster. The bulk of his fortune was bequeathed to his nephew Dr. Baillie. His life has been written by Dr. Simmons.

HUNTER, John, younger brother of Dr. Hunter, was born at Long Calderwood, 14th July 1728. When 10 years old, he lost his father, and this tended greatly to retard his advancement in knowledge, so that he was 20 years old before he became sensible of the propriety of applying himself to the study of some profession. The reputation of his brother excited him to surgical pursuits, and he joined him in London, 1758, and the next year he attended Mr. Cheselden at Chelsea hospital. After becoming a pupil at St. Bartholomew's, and visiting Scotland, he entered as gentleman commoner at St. Mary hall, Oxford, but without losing sight of his medical studies. In 1756 he was appointed house surgeon to St. George's hospital, and about that time was admitted by his brother as an assistant in his lectures. With the most zealous application he devoted himself to anatomical studies for ten long years, and was thus enabled not only to understand, but to explain and improve the art of comparative anatomy. The ramification of the olfactory nerves in the nose, the arteries of the gravid uterus, and the lymphatic vessels of birds, were among other important subjects, accurately ascertained and satisfactorily described. The excessive attention which he bestowed on his anatomical studies, had such an effect on his health, that to re-establish it he went abroad, and was surgeon on the staff with the army at Belleisle. At the end of the war in 1763, he returned to London, and devoted himself with increased activity to his favorite pursuits. In 1767 he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and the next year he went to reside in Jermyn street, in the house which his brother quitted to remove to Wind-mill street. In 1776 he was appointed surgeon extraordinary to the king, and began to find that from his experience and knowledge, he derived not only reputation, but honor and opulence. In 1783 he removed to Leicester square, where he had prepared a house for the reception of his valuable museum. Besides the appointment of surgeon to St. George's hospital, he was in 1786 nominated deputy surgeon-general to the army, and in 1790 he succeeded Mr. Adair as inspector-general of hospitals, and as surgeon-general to the army, in which year he resigned to his brother-in-law, Everard Home, his surgical lectures, which he found too laborious and inconvenient for the great avocations of his respectable and extensive practice. He was unfortunately subject to strong spasmodic affections in the heart since 1786, and as irritation generally produced those dangerous symptoms, he unfortunately met, in his visit at St. George's hospital, 16th Oct. 1793, some vexatious circumstance, and eager to check the feelings of his mind, he walked into another room, and while turning round to speak to a physician, he fell down and expired instantly without a groan. As an able experimentalist, John Hunter will long be remembered with respect and gratitude: the dexterity of his operations was equalled only by his patience and perseverance; and while he considered surgery only in its infancy, he directed all the powers of his mind to the investigation, and to the elucidation of truth in this most important science. His contributions to the transactions of the Royal society were numerous and valuable. His works are a treatise on the Natural History of the Human Teeth, 4to. 1771, with a second part 1778, — a Treatise on the Venereal Disease, 4to. — Observations on certain Parts of the Animal Economy, 4to. — a Treatise on the Blood, Inflammation, and Gun-shot Wounds, 4to. published after his death. His collection of comparative anatomy arranged in a clear order to exhibit the corresponding parts of animals, is most valuable, and reflects the highest praise on his labor, his assiduity, his judgment and his ardent zeal in the service of science. He married in 1771 the daughter of Mr. Home, surgeon to Burgoyne's regiment of light horse; by whom he had two sons and two daughters, of whom only one son and one daughter lived to years of maturity. The history of his life, and of his useful labors in the cause of humanity has been published by his brother-in-law and professional successor Mr. Everard Home.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, countess of, second daughter of Washington, earl Ferrers, was born 1707, and married lord Huntingdon, by whom she had four sons and three daughters. From habits of gaiety and scenes of dissipation, she became all at once, after a serious illness, grave, reserved, and melancholy. Her thoughts were wholly absorbed by religion, and she employed the ample resources which she possessed in disseminating her principles by the popular arts of Whitfield, Romaine, and other enthusiastic methodists. Not only her house in Park street was thrown open for the frequent assembling of these pious reformers, but chapels were built in various parts of the kingdom, and a college erected in Wales for the education of young persons in the future labors of the ministry. After many many acts of extensive charity, and with the best intentions, this enthusiastic lady died in 1791.

HUNTINGTON, Robert, an English divine, born at Deorhyrst, Gloucestershire 1636. He was educated at Bristol, and then entered at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He left England 1670, as chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, and during 11 years' residence, he assiduously employed himself in the procuring of MSS. and in exploring the neighbouring countries. He visited Galilee, Jerusalem, Samaria, Cyprus, Palmyra, and Egypt. In 1682 he returned to England, and the following year took the degree of D. D. By the recommendation of bishop Fell, he was appointed to the mastership of Trinity college, Dublin; but the troubles of the revolution drove him back to England, and in 1691 he resigned his office. In 1692 he married, and was made rector of Great Hallingbury, Essex, and refused the bishopric of Kilmore in Ireland. In 1701 he however accepted that of Raphoe, and was consecrated the 20th of August; but he survived his honors but few days, as he died 2d Sept. 1701, and was buried in Trinity college chapel. He sold his fine collection of MSS. to the Bodleian for 700l. He published in the Philosophical Transactions, an Account of the porphyry pillars in Egypt, and it is his only work, besides some Observations in a Collection of Travels by Ray. His life was written by Dr. T. Smith, and 39 of his letters are there preserved.

HUNTORST, Gerard, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht 1592. He painted for some time in the service of Charles I. in England, but resided chiefly in Holland. His night pieces are much admired. The time of his death is unknown.

HURE, Charles, a French divine, born 1639, at Champigny-sur-Yonne, son of a laborer. He applied himself sedulously to letters, and to the Oriental languages, and was member of the Port-royal society, professor of languages in the university of Paris, and at last principal of the college of Bencourt. In his religious opinions he was considered a Jansenist. He died 1717. He wrote a Dictionary of the Bible, 2 vols. folio, inferior to that of Calmet—an edition of the Latin Testament—a French translation of the Testament, with notes—and a Sacred Grammar.

HUSS, John, a famous divine and martyr, born in Bohemia 1376, and educated at Prague, where he took his degrees, and entered into the ministry. The writings of Wickliff converted him from the superstitions of Rome, and with eloquent zeal he began to preach against the power and influence of the pope. His efforts proved successful, the papal authority began to be slighted in Bohemia, but the archbishop of Prague issued two mandates against the heresies of Wickliff, and the labors of Huss and his followers; and this exertion of power was soon seconded by a bull from Rome, for the suppression of all tenets offensive to the holy see. Huss exclaimed against these proceedings, and though summoned to Rome to answer for his conduct, he, supported by the favor of Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, disregarded the pope's authority, and was excommunicated, and soon after his friends and adherents were included in the same interdict. After causing, by his opposition to the the papal decrees, various tumults in Prague and Bohemia, Huss was prevailed upon to appear at the council of Constance, to give an account of his doctrines. The emperor Sigismund granted him his protection, and ensured security to his person; but when soon after he reached Constance 1414, he was seized as a heretic and imprisoned, and after a confinement of severe hardships, for six months, he was condemned without a hearing, and when he refused to recant his errors, he was tumultuously sentenced to be burnt. The emperor indeed complained of the contempt shown to his authority, and of the perfidy used towards the delinquent, but all in vain. Huss was inhumanly dragged to execution, he was stripped of his sacerdotal habit, deprived of his degrees, and with a paper crown on his head, with pictures of devils round, and the inscription of Herefiarch, he was burned alive, July 1415. He endured his torments with uncommon fortitude, and truly christian resignation. His ashes were collected and then sprinkled in the Rhine. His writings, which were numerous but violent, were afterwards, when printing was invented, published at Nuremburg 1558, and read with avidity.

HUTCHESON, Francis, an ingenious writer, born 8th Aug. 1694, in Ireland, son of a dissenting minister. After an excellent education, he removed in 1710 to Glasgow, where for some years he earnestly applied to philosophy, the learned languages, and divinity. On his return to Ireland, he took care of a small dissenting congregation in Dublin, and intended to remove into the north, when he was invited to settle in the capital, and to open an academy. He met here with great success, and the publication of his Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, in which he was assisted by lord Moleworth, and bishop Syngue, soon recommended him to the notice of the great and learned, of lord Granville, the viceroy, of archbishop King, the primate Boulter, and others. In 1729 he left Ireland for Glasgow, where he became professor of philosophy. He died there highly respected in private life, as well as a public teacher, 1747, though his constitution seemed to promise a more extended life than 53 years. His System of Moral Philosophy, in three books, was published by his only son Francis, M. D., 1755, 2 vols. 4to. with an Account of his Life by Dr. Leechman. He wrote also a treatise on the Passions, and some philosophical papers, printed in Hibernicus' Letters.

HUTCHINS, John, author of the history and antiquities of Dorsetshire, was born 1698 at Bradford Peverell in that county. He was of Baliol college, Oxford, and was in 1729 presented to the living of Swyre, to Melcomb Horley 1733, and to Holy Trinity, Wareham 1743. He began in 1737 to collect materials for his history, which after much labor and many difficulties, was put to the press, but received not the author's last correcting hand. It was liberally patronized by the gentlemen of the county, and particularly by Dr. Cumming and Mr. Gough, and made its appearance in 1774, 2 vols. folio, for the benefit of the author's widow and daughter. He died 21st June, June, 1773, and was buried in St. Mary's church, Wareham.

HUTCHINSON, John, the well known founder of a philosophical sect, was born at Spennythorn, Yorkshire, 1674. He received in the village school a plain education which was improved by the friendly communication of a gentleman who lodged in the house of his father, and at the age of 19 he became steward to Mr. Bathurst a Yorkshire gentleman. He afterwards held the same situation in the family of lord Scarborough, and in 1700 he undertook the same office under the duke of Somerset. While in the employment of his noble patron he travelled over various parts of England, and made a valuable collection of fossils, which it is said was afterwards presented to the university of Cambridge under the name of Dr. Woodward, who had been confidentially entrusted with the arrangement and description of them. Displeased with the harshness and treachery of his former friend, Hutchinson determined to commence author; but in relinquishing the service of the duke, he was liberally presented by him as master of the horse to the king, with the sinecure of purveyor to the royal stables, with a good house and a salary of 200*l.* per annum, and he was rewarded by his noble patron besides with the presentation of the living of Sutton, Suffex, which he bestowed on his friend Julius Bate. Thus in possession of independence he began to devote himself laboriously to studious pursuits, and in 1724 he published his first part of Moses' Principia, in which he severely ridiculed Woodward's Natural History of the Earth, and by attacking the doctrine of gravitation he thus attempted to undermine the great fabric on which Newton's fame is built. In 1727 the second part of Moses' Principia appeared, in which he asserted against Newton's doctrines that a plenum and the air are the principles of the scripture philosophy. With a fanciful hypothesis he supported that the mysteries of the trinity may be drawn from the three grand agents in the system of nature, spirit, fire and light; and so fascinating were his arguments, that among others Dr. Samuel Clarke, declared himself a warm admirer of his doctrines. Hutchinson died 28th Aug. 1737, aged 63. In his temper he is described as violent; the mental powers which he derived from nature were great, and had they been early and properly cultivated he might have enriched his works with more judicious observations, and to learning have added the graces of elegant language. In his opinions Hutchinson was singular. He imagined that all knowledge is contained in the Hebrew scriptures, and therefore rejecting the points, he regarded every Hebrew root as containing some important meaning, and conveying the signification of some mental or spiritual thing. Though this fanciful and mysterious system was for a time defended with violence by the author, and supported zealously by his adherents, by the learned bishop Horne, by Jones, Spearman, and other pious divines, it gradually fell into disrepute, and is now no longer dreaded as the source of innovation and scepticism in the theological opinions long accepted and deservedly revered by the general bulk of mankind. All his works were collected in 12 vols. 8vo. 1748. Though distinguished as a writer he was also eminent as a mechanic, and his time-piece for the discovery of the longitude at sea, was seen and approved by Newton, Whiston, and other learned men.

HUTCHINSON, John Hely, an Irishman born 1715. By perseverance and the exertion of moderate abilities he rose to the offices of prime serjeant, of secretary of state, of provost of Trinity college, Dublin, with other lucrative employments. His avidity however was too great to escape the observation of political rivals, and lord North exclaimed in speaking of him, if this man had England and Ireland given him, he would still solicit the Isle of Man for a potatoe garden. He died 1794.

HUTTEN, Ulric de, a singular character, born 1488, of a respectable family at Steckenburg in Franconia. He studied at the abbey of Fulda, and took his master's degree at Frankfort on the Oder; but as his necessities grew upon him he entered the army of the emperor Maximilian, and was at the siege of Padua. His inclination led him to literary pursuits, but his father considered such employment as beneath the character of a gentleman, and therefore to please him he went in 1511 to Pavia to study the law. The siege and plunder of that city by the Swiss disturbed his plans, and he returned to Germany, and contrary to his father's wishes applied again to literature. He travelled through Bohemia and Moravia, often without money or resources except what charity bestowed; but on his introduction to the emperor, 1516, he was received with kindness, and in consequence of the popularity of his compositions he received from his hand the poetical crown. He afterwards entered again into the army where his intrepidity and courage became proverbial; but in 1519 he sighed again for the peaceful retreats of the muses, and after the disorders of a dissipated life, wished for a wife to take care of him, and in whose company he might unbend himself. He was a warm advocate for Luther's doctrines, and he published the pope's bull against that reformer with such sarcastic remarks and well directed railery that the sovereign pontiff commanded the elector of Mentz to send him the satirist bound hand and foot. He escaped however from the storm to the castle of Ebernberg, and implored the protection of the emperor and of the electors of Saxony and Mentz; but though persecuted he did not manifest less zeal against the see of Rome. He was afterwards at Basil, where he was refused an asylum in the house of Erasmus, an affront which he satirically repented. He died at last in an island of the lake of Zurich where he had taken refuge, Aug. 1523; but though he was such an advocate for the reformed religion and inveighed so bitterly against the corruptions and irregularities of the Romish church, he exhibited in his own life the most profligate manners, and fell a victim to a foul disease which his debauchery had brought upon him, and which he in vain attempted to remove. Though admired for his genius and learning, Hutten was violent and passionate in his temper, and what was said of Demosthenes was applied to him by Camerarius, that he would have turned the world upside down, had his power been equal to his will. His works are numerous, but chiefly satirical, so that he has been compared by Thuanus to Lucian. His Latin poems were published 1538, 12mo. and have been since reprinted. He had also a share in the "Epistolæ Virorum Obscurorum," and printed editions of Pliny, Quintilian & Marcellinus, and of Livy, a manuscript copy of which he discovered 1518.

HUTTEN, Jacob, a Silesian in the 16th century; founder of an anabaptist sect, called the Bohemian or Moravian brethren. His tenets recommended equality among men, and therefore he exposed himself to the persecution of magistrates and constituted authorities. The time of his death is not mentioned, though it is said, perhaps falsely, that he was burnt as a heretic at Inspruck. His followers dispersed after his death, though the Moravians who adhered to Zinzendorff considered themselves as the true disciples of his doctrines.

HUTTER, Elias, a protestant divine, born at Ulric 1553. He was an able orientalist, and published a "Hebrew Bible," with the 117th psalm in 17 languages, "two Polyglots," one in four languages 1596, and the other in six, 1599. He died at Nuremberg after 1602.

HUTTER, Leonard, a learned divine, born at Ulm 1563. He studied at Strasburg, Leipsic, Jena, &c. and was theological professor at Wittenberg, and lastly rector of the university. He died of a fever 1616. He wrote Compendium Theologiæ—Libri Christianæ Concordiæ—Collegium Theologicum—and other theological works. He was a strenuous adherent to Luther's principles.

HUTTON, Matthew, an English bishop. He was born of poor parents in Lancashire, but he had the advantage of a tolerable education and was sent to Cambridge where he became fellow of Trinity college, and lady Margaret's professor of divinity. He afterwards obtained a prebend of St. Paul's, was made master of Pembroke hall and in 1567 preferred to the deanery of York. In 1589 he was made bishop of Durham, and five years after translated to York. He died 1605, aged 59.

HUYGENS, Constantine, author of 14 books of Latin poems and miscellanies, called Monumenta Desultoria, was born at the Hague, and became secretary to the prince of Orange, and president of his council. He died 1687, aged 91.

HUYGENS, Christian, a celebrated mathematician, son of the preceding, was born at the Hague 14th April 1629. From his very youth he discovered a strong genius for mathematics, and paid also great attention to music, arithmetic, geography, and mechanics. He for some time studied law at Leyden and Breda, but without relinquishing his favorite sciences, so that in 1651 he gave the world a specimen of his mathematical abilities, by the publication of his Theoremata de Quadraturâ Hyperboles Ellipsis et Circuli ex dato Portionum Gravitatis Centro. In 1649 he went to Holstein, and in 1655 to France where he took the degree of doctor of laws at Angiers. In 1658 he published at the Hague his Horologium with a model of a new invented pendulum, and the following year appeared his system of Saturn in which he discovered a satellite attending that planet, and ascertained the existence of its permanent ring. In 1660 he again went to France, and the next year came to England, where he was made fellow of the Royal society. His improvements in polishing glasses, and in the air pump lately invented increased his fame; but he had a dispute with Wren and Wallis about the priority of discovering the laws of the collision of elastic bodies. In 1666 he went to reside at Paris in consequence of the flattering invitations of Colbert, and the honorable grant of a handsome pension. Here, constantly devoted to mathematical and scientific pursuits, he found his health gradually decline from excessive application, and in 1681 he left France for his native country, where he spent the remainder of life. He died at the Hague, 8th June 1695, in his 67th year, while his Cosmotheoros, a Latin treatise on the plurality of worlds was printing. This work appeared 1698, his Opuscula Posthuma, 1703, 4to. — and the next year his Opera Varia, in 4 vols. 4to. under the care of Gravefande. The same editor in 1728 published his Opera Reliqua, in 2 vols. 4to. — the first of which contains his treatises on Light and Gravity, and the second the Opuscula Posthuma. His works have been collected in 6 vols. 4to. Huygens was a great as well as a learned character, in virtue, in cheerfulness and private worth equalled by few. He was never married.

HUYSUM, Justus Van, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam. He died 1716, aged 57. He was the pupil of N. Berchem and excelled in painting battles, landscapes and flowers.

HUYSUM, John Van, son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam 1682. He became so celebrated as a painter that his pieces sold for a very high price. He was so jealous of his fame that he never admitted any person to see him paint, and therefore his mode of mixing the tints and preserving the lustre of colors remained an impenetrable secret. He died 1749. His brothers Justus and Jacob were also excellent painters. Justus died at the age of 22, and Jacob 1740, aged 60.

HYDE, Edward, earl of Clarendon, and lord chancellor of England was descended from an ancient Cheshire family, and born at Dinton, Wilts, 16th Feb. 1608. In 1622 he entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, and on being disappointed in a fellowship at Exeter college, he removed to the Middle Temple, where he ardently devoted himself to the study of the law. In the parliament of 1640 he sat for Wootton Bassett, and distinguished himself as a speaker. He was elected for Saltsash in the long parliament, and so well established was his reputation as an orator, and a man of influence, that when the commons presented articles of impeachment against the judges Davenport, Weston, and Trevor, he was commissioned to carry them to the lords, and he introduced them in a most excellent and energetic speech. He was not however so fully devoted to party as to forget his duties, the respect he had for the integrity of the church and the honor of the crown, would not permit him to assent to the measures which banished the bishops from parliament, and though one of the committee against the persecuted Strafford, he soon abandoned the office, and opposed the attainder when he perceived the violence and vindictive animosity of his accusers. With an equal spirit of virtue and patriotism he inveighed against the ordinance for raising the militia against the king, and when he saw his moderation suspected, he left the parliament, and in 1642 withdrew to the king at York. His abilities were well known to the unfortunate monarch, who soon after knighted him, and appointed him chancellor of the exchequer, and a privy counsellor. In 1643 he attended the parliament at Oxford, and the next year he was one of the commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge, and afterwards went as secretary and assistant counsellor to the prince of Wales in his excursion into Wales. On the ruin of the royal cause, he passed into the Scilly islands, and in 1645 to Jersey, where he began to write his history of the rebellion. In 1648 on the king's death, he went to join his new master at Paris, and the next year he was sent with lord Cottington as ambassador extraordinary to Spain. He afterwards was made secretary of state, and in 1657 raised to the office of lord chancellor, which he continued to hold at the restoration. On his return to England with the king in 1660, he was made chancellor of Oxford, and created a peer, and the following year raised to the dignity of an earl. These high honors were due to his services, his prudence, and his moderation, and while he wished to restore the prerogatives of the crown, he was zealously employed in establishing the liberties of the people on a solid and permanent basis. Envy, however, is the attendant on greatness and virtue, and the elevation of his daughter, to be the wife of the duke of York, contributed perhaps more to his downfall than the firmness and courage with which he watched over the rights of the church, and the true interests of the kingdom against the intrigues of the catholics, and the machinations of the dissenters. He was first attacked in 1663, by lord Bristol, who exhibited against him 16 charges of high treason, but though the malice of the accusation, and the inconsistency of his adversary were too glaring not to be rejected with indignation, the public odium still was directed against him. His building of a magnificent house was converted in 1664 as an engine of accusation against him, and while his enemies charged him with thus lavishing the sums of money which they pretended he had received for selling Dunkirk, his conduct though virtuous in the extreme, became so suspected, that the king in 1667 dismissed him from the office of chancellor. His dismissal was immediately followed by his impeachment, but he avoided the impending storm, by flying into France, and consequently an act of banishment was passed against him. From Rouen he retired to Evreux in 1668, where one night he was attacked by a body of English seamen, who dragged him from his bed into the yard, and were going to dispatch him, had not in the violent scuffle, their lieutenant opportunely come to disarm them and save his life. He afterwards went to Montpellier, and then returned to Moulins 1672, and the next year settled at Rouen, where he died 9th Dec. His body was brought to England and interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel in Westminster abbey. He was twice married: by his first wife he had no children, and by the second, he had four sons and two daughters, of which Anne, the eldest, married the duke of York, and became mother of Mary and Anne, successively queens of England. Besides his most valuable history of the rebellion, which was completed about 1673, and which was best edited at Oxford both in folio and in 8vo. lord Clarendon wrote animadversions on Mr. Cressy's book, called Fanaticism, fanatically imputed to the catholic church by Dr. Stillingfleet, 8vo. 1672 — A Survey of Hobbes' Leviathan, 4to. — Miscellaneous Tracts, collected and printed in one vol. fol. — an Account of his own Life to his Banishment, printed 1759 — The disgrace and the dismissal of Clarendon from the service of the king are attributed by some to the ridicule of Buckingham and other dissipated favorites, who amused their licentious monarch with mimicking the personal consequence of the chancellor. While with a pair of bellows before him, to represent the purse and a fire-shovel for the mace, Buckingham thus insulted the dignity of Clarendon, Charles unfortunately forgot in the jest the services of his faithful and loyal servant, and listened with greater pleasure to the vile insinuations of his concubines, than he respected the integrity, the wisdom, and the virtues of the friend of his father, and the supporter of his throne.

HYDE, Henry, earl of Clarendon, son of the chancellor, was born 1638. He was early employed in the correspondence carried on by his father, as secrecy was very requisite in the management of the king's affairs. At the restoration he was made M. A. at Oxford, and afterwards appointed chamberlain to the queen. He was so much dissatisfied with the illiberal treatment which his father had met with from the court, that he opposed the measures of ministers in parliament, and distinguished himself among the most eloquent speakers. On his father's death he took his seat in the house of lords, still in the ranks of opposition; but his zealous exertions against the bill of exclusion restored him to favor, and in 1680 he was made a privy counsellor, and on James' accession sent as viceroy to Ireland. His attachment to the protestants however was displeasing to a popish ministry; he was removed from Ireland, to make room for Tyrconnel, but on the abdication of the king, he refused to take the oaths of allegiance to William, and was therefore sent to the tower. After some months' confinement he retired into the country, and spent the remainder of his days in peace and privacy. He died 1709, aged 71. His State Letters, and his Diary for 1687, 1688 and 1690, were published 2 vols. 4to. 1763, at Oxford.

HYDE, Lawrence, second son of the chancellor, was, from the consequence of his family, early engaged about the court. He was made in 1661 master of the robes to the king, and in 1676 he was sent as ambassador to Poland, and was present as plenipotentiary at the congress of Nimeguen. He was made first lord of the treasury in 1679, and warmly opposed the bill which was brought into parliament to exclude the duke of York from the succession, and for his services he was raised to the peerage in 1681, by the title of viscount Hyde, and afterwards earl of Rochester. He was in 1684 appointed president of the council, lord treasurer, and in 1685 made knight of the garter, but though thus favored by the court, he refused to change his religion at the pressing solicitations of his new sovereign, the second James, and thus sacrificed his place to his principles. At the revolution he was one of the ecclesiastical commissioners, and was sent in 1700 to Ireland as lord lieutenant. His abilities recommended him equally to the next reign, as under Anne he was made president of the council. He died 1711, deservedly respected as an able statesman. The dedication of lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion was by him.

HYDE, Thomas, a learned writer, born 29th June 1636, at Billingsley, near Bridgenorth, Salop, where his father was minister. After studying the oriental languages under his father, he went to King's college, Cambridge, and was soon after recommended by Wheelock, an able linguist, to Walton, afterwards bishop of Chester, whom he assisted in the completion of his polyglott bible. His services were such in the transcribing of the characters, in the correction, and also in the setting forth of the Persian pentateuch, that the learned editor acknowledged in the handsomest terms his abilities, and his meritorious assistance. In 1658 he entered at Queen's college, Oxford, and the year after by the direction of Richard Cromwell, the chancellor of the university, he was with every mark of respect, admitted M. A. He was afterwards elected under-librarian, and then head-librarian to the Bodleian, and in 1665 he published a Latin translation of Uleigh Beig's Observations on the Longitude and Latitude of the Stars. In 1666 he was made prebendary of Sarum, in 1678 archdeacon of Gloucester, in 1682 he took the degree of D. D. and in 1691 he was elected Arabic professor on Dr. Pocock's death. In 1697 he was made regius professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christ-church, and in 1701 resigned the Bodleian. He died 18th Feb. 1703 at Christ-church. He was interpreter and secretary for oriental languages to Charles II. and his two successors, and for learning, judgment, and extensive information he was deservedly esteemed. The best known and most valuable of his works is, Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum, eorumque Magorum, &c. published 1700, in 4to. dedicated to lord Somers, and abounding in most interesting and curious particulars concerning the theology, history, and learning of Eastern nations.

HYDER-ALLY-KHAN, an Asiatic prince, born at Dinavelli, in the Myfore. He served under his father, and after his death 1751, he joined his brother, who was in alliance with France. His intrepidity in the field, and a series of successful enterprizes against the Mahrattas, and against the English power in the East, raised him not only to the rank of generalissimo of the king of Myfore's forces, but to the independent power of Suba of Servia. The sovereignty which his valor had acquired, he maintained by wisdom and sound policy, and only regarding the Europeans as intruders in the country, he formed the most artful and formidable plans for the complete expulsion of the English from Asia. The treaty which he had made in 1769 was violated in 1780; but the forces of Hyder were unable, though very numerous, to withstand the bravery of the English troops, and the military skill of sir Eyre Coote. Hyder died in 1782, and was succeeded in his possessions by his son Tippoo Saib, who possessed equal valor, and was animated with the same hatred against the English name.

HYGINUS, Caius Julius, a Spaniard, the freed-man of Augustus, was author of Poeticon Astronomicum, and other Latin works.

HYGINUS, a philosopher of Athens, who succeeded Telephorus as pope of Rome 153, and suffered martyrdom three years after. He was canonized. Two decretals are falsely imputed to him.

HYLL, Albayn, a physician in the 16th century, who studied at Oxford, and afterwards took a doctor's degree abroad. He wrote on Galen, and died in London 1559. Some call him a native of Wales, others of Scotland.

HYPATIA, daughter of Theon, of Alexandria, succeeded her father in his school of philosophy, and maintained a high character for learning, and for female virtues. She was murdered in a tumult by the monks of Alexandria, A. D. 415. Her works are lost.

HYPERIDES, a disciple of Plato, who by accusing Demosthenes of bribery, procured his banishment from Athens. He was put to death by Antipater, 322 B. C.

HYPERIUS, Andrew Gerard, a divine, born at Ypres. He studied in France, which he left upon embracing the reformation. He came to England, and was afterwards divinity professor at Marburg, where he died 1564, having published 7 vols. folio, on divinity subjects, &c.

HYPSICLES, a mathematician of Alexandria under M. Aurelius, and Verus.

HYRCANUS, John, prince and-high priest of the Jews, after his father Simon. He by his firmness restored his countrymen to their independence from the power of Antiochus, king of Syria. He died 106 B. C. and was succeeded by his son, the second Hyrchanus, who died B. C. 30.

HYWELL, ap Owain, a prince of North Wales who in vain endeavoured to succeed his father on the throne in preference to his brothers. When defeated he retired to Ireland, where he died 1171.

HYWELL, ap Morgan, a prince of Glamorgan, who died 1043, aged 130. Longevity seems to have been hereditary in his family, as three of his relations lived to nearly the same age.

HYWELL, Dda, or Good, a legislator of Wales, who died 948.

J.

JAC

JAAPHAN, Ebn Tophail, an Arabian philosopher at the end of the twelfth century, author of a romance, called the History of Hai Ebn Yokdhan, in which he asserts that by the light of nature, a man may acquire a knowledge of things, and of God. It was published with a Latin translation 1671, by E. Pococke, and in 1708 appeared in English by Simon Ockley.

JABLONSKI, Daniel Ernest, a popish divine, born 20th Nov. 1660, at Dantzic. He studied in Germany, and afterwards visited Holland and England. He was afterwards minister of Magdeburg, Lissa, Koningberg, and Berlin, and he zealously opposed infidelity, and endeavoured in his ecclesiastical capacity, but in vain, to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists. He translated into Latin, Bentley's Sermons and Boyle's Lectures, and wrote some Dissertations on the Land of Gessen, and other works highly esteemed. He died May 1741.

JABLONSKI, Theodore, counsellor of the court of Prussia, and secretary to the royal society of sciences at Berlin, was a man of extensive erudition, and highly esteemed for his private virtues. He was so modest that he did not prefix his name to his works. He wrote Dictionnaire Francois et Allemand, & Allemand Francois 1711 — a Course of Morality in German 1713 — Dictionnaire universel des Arts & des Sciences 1721 — and a Translation of Tacitus de Mor. Germ. 1724.

JABLONSKI, Paul Ernest, son of Daniel Ernest, was born 1693, at Berlin, and became theology professor at Frankfort on the Oder. He wrote Disquisitio de Linguâ Lycaonicâ de Memnone Græcorum — Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 2 vols. 8vo. — e, Pantheon Ægyptiorum, a learned work, 3 vols. 8vo. He died 1757.

JABLONSKI, Charles Gustavus, author of a natural history of insects, was member of the society of Halle, and died 1787.

JACETIUS, Francis de Cataneis, an Italian writer, born at Florence 1466. He was the disciple and successor of Marsilius Ficinus, as professor of Platonic philosophy at Florence, and died 1552. He wrote a treatise of beauty, and another of love, according to Plato, and other works, printed together at Basil 1563.

JACHAIA, Ben Joseph, a Portuguese rabbi, born at Lisbon, where he died 1539. He wrote among other things, a paraphrase on Daniel, in which he promised a speedy restoration to his nation.

JACKSON, Thomas, an English divine, born 1579 at Willowing, county of Durham. He entered at Queen's college, Oxford, 1595, and the year after removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was elected fellow in 1606. He became D.D. 1622, and two years after took a living, and also the vicarage of Newcastle, which he resigned in 1630, when elected president of his college. In 1635, he was made prebend of Winchester by the friendship of Neil, bishop of Durham and of Laud, and in 1638 he was raised to the deanery of Peterborough. He died 1640, and was buried in the chapel of his college. He was a man of great learning, singular piety, and of an exemplary character. He was well acquainted with the fathers, and his works, which are numerous, display great knowledge of scripture. They were published in 3 vols. folio, consisting of sermons, besides commentaries on the apostles' creed. They were much admired by bishop Horne, as well as by Mr. Merrick of Trinity college, Oxford.

JAC

JACKSON, John, an English divine, born 4th April 1686, at Leney, Yorkshire, where his father was minister. He was educated at Doncaster school, and afterwards entered at Jesus', Cambridge, where he studied Hebrew under Ockley. In 1710 he was presented to the living of Rossington by the corporation of Doncaster, and married 1712. He was refused the degree of M. A. at Cambridge, in consequence it is said of his heretical opinions; and by embracing tenets opposite to the church, he embroiled himself greatly at Leicester, where he went to reside as confrater of Wigston hospital. As he refused to subscribe to the articles, he lost in 1724 a prebend in Salisbury church, though on the death of his friend Dr. Clarke, in 1729 he succeeded to the mastership of Wigston hospital by the presentation of the duke of Rutland. As he was fond of controversy, his works are numerous on theological subjects, and display labor, judgment and learning. It is to be lamented, that he showed such virulence in his conduct, which drew upon him the resentment of the clergy, so that he was at Bath, refused the sacrament, and in Leicester forcibly denied the use of the pulpit. He opposed the doctrine of the trinity, and attacked Warburton and others, even some of his friends, in his pamphlets. His last, and by far his best work, is "Chronological Antiquities" 3 vols. 4to. 1752. He prepared materials for an edition of the Greek testament, of which however, his infirmities prevented the publication. He died 12th May 1763, leaving four children only, out of the 12 whom his wife bore him. Memoirs of him were published by Dr. Sutton, of Leicester, 1764.

JACKSON, Arthur, a divine, ejected from his living of St. Faith, in London, 1662, for nonconformity. He was afterwards imprisoned, and fined 500l. for refusing to give evidence against Christopher Love. He was chosen at the restoration to present, in the name of the assembly of divines, a bible to Charles II. and was also one, of the ministers who attended the Savoy conference. He wrote a commentary on the bible, 3 vols. 4to. and died 1666.

JACKSON, William, a native of Exeter, eminent as a musical composer, and as a writer. He first studied music at Exeter, and afterwards removed to London under the care of Mr. Travers, and in 1777 was chosen organist of St. Peter's church in his native town, where he died 1803, aged 73. Besides books of songs, hymns, sonatas, canzonets, &c. of merit, he wrote 30 letters on various subjects lately edited, a third time — the four Ages 8vo. — Treatise on the present State of Music, 12mo. — Papers in the essays of the Exeter society, &c. One of his sons was ambassador at the court of Sardinia, afterwards in France, and at Berlin, and another accompanied lord Macartney, as his secretary to China.

JACOB, son of Isaac and Rebecca, obtained from his elder brother, Esau, his birthright, and also by the advice of his mother, his father's blessing. This conduct drew upon him the vengeance of Esau, which he avoided by flying to Padan-aran, where he served his uncle Laban for 14 years, and obtained his two daughters, Leah and Rachael, for wives. He was afterwards reconciled to his brother, and went to Egypt with all his family, in consequence of the elevation of his son Joseph to the supreme power of the country under Pharaoh. He died in Egypt, B. C. 1689, aged 147. The name of Israel, given to him by an angel, descended to his posterity called Israelites.

JACOB, Henry, a native of Kent, educated at Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He afterwards retired to his living, and died 1621, aged 60. He is author of some treatises against the Brownists, and of a work on our Saviour's sufferings.

JACOB, Henry, son of the preceding, became an able Orientalist under Erpenius. He was fellow of Merton college, Oxford, but was ejected during the civil wars, and died at Canterbury 1652, aged 44. He wrote, according to Wood, Delphi Phœnicizantes, edited by Dickenfon — and other works, still in MS.

JACOB, Giles, an able lawyer, author of a Law Dictionary — the Lives and Characters of English Poets — and other valuable works, died 1744, aged 54.

JACOB, a Cistercian monk in Hungary, who assembled a number of peasants in France and Germany, on pretence of going with this fanatical multitude to deliver the Holy Land from the infidels. He pretended also to be commissioned by the Virgin to set Lewis, king of France, at liberty, who had been made prisoner by the Saracens, and for this purpose he preached a crusade; but the government at last refused to countenance the measure; and therefore the enthusiastic zealots were dispersed, and Jacob soon after murdered by a butcher in the beginning of the 13th century.

JACOB AL BARDAI, a disciple of Severus, and an able leader of the Eutychians, who from him were called Jacobites.

JACOB, Ben Naphthali, a rabbi of the 5th century, of the sect of the Masorites, educated at Tiberias in Palestine. The invention of points in the Hebrew letters, instead of vowels, is attributed to him, and to his friend Ben Affer, in the year 476.

JACOB, Ben Hajim, a rabbi of the 16th century, known as the editor of the Masora and Hebrew bible, with the Chaldee paraphrase, &c. Venice, 4 vols. folio, 1525, much esteemed by the Jews.

JACOBÆUS, Oliker, professor of philosophy and physics at Copenhagen, was born July 1650, at Arhusen, Jutland, where his father was bishop. After studying at Copenhagen, he travelled over France, Italy, Germany, Hungary, England, and the Netherlands, and on his return was honorably received by his university, who appointed him professor, and by the Danish king, who gave him the management of his cabinet of curiosities, and made him counsellor of his court of justice. The loss of his wife in 1698 robbed him of all his happiness, and though he attempted to avert his grief by a second marriage, he fell a sacrifice to his melancholy 1701. He left six sons by his first wife. He wrote de Ranis & Lacertis Dissertatio — Oratio in Obitu T. Bartholini, his father-in-law — Gaudia Arctoi Orbis, &c. besides some elegant Latin poems.

JACOBS, Jurian, a painter of Switzerland, the disciple of Francis Snyders. The animals which he introduced in his historical pieces, were finished in a very animated style. He died 1664, aged 54.

JACOMB, Thomas, D. D. a native of Leicestershire, educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Cambridge, to become fellow of Trinity college. In 1647 he obtained the living of St. Martin, Ludgate, from which he was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He died 1687, in the family of lady Exeter, where he had found protection and maintenance. He wrote a treatise of Holy Dedication — Sermons — a Commentary on the eighth of Romans — and contributed also to the continuation of Pool's Annotations.

JACOPONE, da Todi, an Italian poet, contemporary with Dante. On becoming a widower, he distributed his property to the poor, and entered into the order of Minors, and acquired the surname of the Happy, in consequence of his character of sanctity. He wrote several canticles, full of fire and zeal, besides Stabat Mater, a Latin poem. He died very old, 1306. The best edition of his Canticles is that of Venice, 1617, 4to. with notes.

JACQUELOT, Isaac, a protestant minister of Vassy, born 1647. He retired to Heidelberg and the Hague at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and then became chaplain to the king of Prussia, who had accidentally heard him preach. He died at Berlin 1708. He wrote Dissertations on the Messiah — 2 vols. of Sermons — letters to the French Bishops — and some controversial tracts.

JACQUET, Lewis, a native of Lyons, who died 1793, aged 61. It is said that he resembled in his manners, the famous J. J. Rousseau, and therefore he was his warm admirer and imitator. His parallel between Greek and French tragic poets, possessed great merit, and some of his essays were honored with the laurel by the Besançon academy.

JACQUIER, Francis, a native of Vitry, who died at Rome 1788, aged 77. He was eminent as a divine and and mathematician, and wrote, assisted by Le Sueur, Newton's Philos. Natur. Principia Mathem. 4 vols. 4to. — Institutiones Philos. ad Studia Theol. accomm. 5 vols. 12mo. He published besides a treatise of Algebra, and other works in Italian.

JADDUS, was high priest of Judæa when Alexander approached Jerusalem, determined to destroy it, and by meeting the monarch in his pontifical robes, he converted his resentment into reverence, and to the offering of sacrifices to the God of Israel.

JADELOT, Nicholas, a native of Nancy, who died there, 26th June 1793, aged 57. He was eminent as a physician, and was author of the Pictures of Animal Economy, 8vo. — a Complete Course of Anatomy, folio — Physica Hominis Sani, 2 vols. 12mo. — Pharmacopœia for the Poor, 8vo. &c.

JAEGER, John Wolfgang, a Lutheran divine, born at Stutgard, where the duke of Wirtemberg, whose son he had educated, made him his counsellor, and also preacher of the cathedral, and abbot of the monastery of Adelberg. In 1702 he was made divinity professor, chancellor of the university, and provost of Tübingen, and died 1720. He wrote, Ecclesiastical History compared with Profane — a Compendium of Divinity — Observations on Puffendorf and Grotius — a treatise of Laws — Spinoza's Life and Doctrines examined, and other Latin works.

JAGO, Richard, an English poet, born 11th Oct. 1715, at Beaudefert, Henley, Warwickshire, where his father was rector. From Solihul school, where he had among his fellow pupils, Shenstone, he went in 1732 as servitor to University college. In 1737 he took orders, and in 1744 married a clergyman's daughter, by whom he had several children, and who left him a widower in 1751. He obtained the livings of Harbury and Chesterton, 1746, and in 1754 lord Clare obtained for him the vicarage of Snitterfield, and in 1771, his patron, lord Willoughby de Broke, gave him instead of Harbury, Kilmcote in Leicestershire, worth 300l. a-year. His elegy on the Blackbirds appeared in 1752, in Hawkesworth's Adventurer, and as it was anonymous, it was attributed to various authors, and especially to Gilbert West. He died after a short illness, 8th May 1781, aged 66, and was buried in a vault at Snitterfield. Three of his daughters survived him. By his second wife, married 1759, he had no children. His most admired performance is Edgehill, a descriptive poem, in blank verse, 1767. His life has been written by his friend Hylton.

JAILLOT, Alexis Hulert, a French sculptor, who, by marrying the daughter of a map colorer, adopted his father-in-law's profession, and soon excelled in the execution of maps. He engraved in a very neat manner, the designs of the Sanfons, and labored till his death in 1721, in geographical studies. His maps of France are valuable, but that of Lorraine is the best. One of his daughters married Renou, who assumed the name of Jaillot, and became geographer to the king. He died 5th April, 1780. His Recherches Critiques, Historiques, &c. sur Paris, &c. 5 vols. 8vo. 1772, is a correct, interesting, and much admired work.

JAMBLICUS, an Arabian king, deprived by Augustus of his dominions for supporting Antony at the battle of Actium. His son was restored to the throne, B. C. 22.

JAMBLICUS, a Greek author in the age of Marcus Aurelius.

JAMBLICUS, a native of Apamea in the reign of Julian. He wrote the Life of Pythagoras, &c. and was poisoned under Valens, A. D. 363.

JAMBLICUS, a Platonic philosopher, who studied under Porphyry, and was eminent for his eloquence, and the respectability of his pupils. He died under Constantine.

JAMES, St. the great, son of Zebedee and Salome, was a fisherman, and was called with his brother John, while mending their nets, to become apostles, by our Saviour. He was present with his brother and Peter at the transfiguration of his blessed master; and after the crucifixion, he preached the gospel to the Jews who were dispersed in the neighbouring towns of Syria. On his return to Judea, he was seized by Herod Agrippa, and cruelly put to death with the sword, A. D. 44.

JAMES, St. the less, brother of Simon and Jude, was also one of the apostles, and received the surname of Just, on account of the great virtues of his character. He was the first appointed bishop of Jerusalem, and for his firmness he was called by St. Paul, one of the pillars of the church. He was put to death with the blow of a fuller's club, under Ananias the high-priest, A. D. 62, who in vain wished to persuade him to renounce the name and the religion of his Saviour. His epistle to the dispersed Hebrew converts, is preserved among the canonical books of the New Testament.

JAMES, St. a bishop of Nisibis, distinguished by his patriotism, his zeal, and unbounded benevolence, when his country was besieged by the Persians. He died about 350. His works were printed, Rome, 1736, folio.

JAMES I. king of Scotland, after his father Robert III. was taken by the English as he was crossing over to France. After a severe imprisonment of 18 years, he was set at liberty on condition of marrying Jane, daughter of the earl of Somerset, 1424. He severely punished those who had governed his kingdom in his absence; and in consequence of these harsh measures, he was assassinated in his bed by their relations, and died pierced with 36 wounds, 1437.

JAMES II. king of Scotland, succeeded at the age of seven to his father, James I. and ably supported Charles VII. of France in his war against the English. He punished some of his barons, who had revolted against him, and he was killed at the siege of Roxburgh, 3d Aug. 1460, aged 29, by a cannon shot, and after his death, his queen, Mary of Guelders, continued the attack, and took the town.

JAMES III. succeeded his father James II. on the throne of Scotland, and rendered himself odious by his cruelties. He put to death his brother John, but Alexander his other brother escaped the fatal blow aimed against him, and levied war against the tyrant. James, defeated in a battle by his rebellious subjects, fell from his horse, and was at last put to death in a mill by the pursuing enemy, 11th June, 1488.

JAMES IV. succeeded his father James III. at the age of 16, and showed himself religious, active, and patriotic. He defeated some of his rebellious barons, and assisted Lewis XII. of France against the English, but was unfortunately slain in the fatal battle of Flodden field, 1513. He instituted the order of the Thistle, or of St. Andrew.

JAMES V. of Scotland, succeeded at the death of his father, James IV. though only 18 months' old. His minority was governed by his mother, Margaret of England, but at the age of 17 he assumed the reins of government, and assisted Francis I. against Charles V. and in consequence of his services, he received, 1535, Magdalen, the French king's daughter, who died two years after. He afterwards married Mary of Lorraine, the widow of Lewis of Orleans, and died 13th Dec. 1542, leaving his dominions to his only child, Mary Stuart, who was born only eight days before his death. He was a prince admired for his virtues, and the firmness with which he supported the religious establishment of his country.

JAMES, VI. of Scotland, and the first of England, was son of Henry earl of Darnley, and Mary the daughter of James V. and was born 1566. The conduct of his mother had so irritated the nobles that she was obliged by her rebellious subjects to resign the crown to her son in 1566, and James who had displayed great moderation and prudence in Scotland, was called, on the death of Elizabeth to fill the English throne 1603. His accession was attended with dissatisfaction on the part of some of the English nobles, and lords Cobham, and Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh were arrested on pretence of a conspiracy to destroy the king and his son prince Henry. A more dreadful catastrophe awaited him from the catholics whom he had rendered him enemies, by the severity of his treatment toward them; but when the parliament house was doomed to be blown up by gun powder with the king, the lords and commons, the plot was happily discovered by the sagacity of the monarch, and the ringleaders were seized and executed. James was naturally fond of peace, and during 20 years of his reign, his subjects enjoyed perfect tranquillity. The interests and the dignity of the nation perhaps might have required more vigorous measures, especially in supporting the rights of the protestants and of the elector Palatine who had married the king's daughter; but the cultivation of commerce, and a friendly intercourse with the rest of the world were more congenial to the sentiments of the monarch. In the extension of his prerogative James rendered himself not only oppressive, but often ridiculous, and while he argued with his parliament, and enlarged on the divine and absolute rights of kings he taught the factious to dispute his authority, and to prepare that opposition which proved so fatal to his successor. Though learned and intelligent he chose for his favorites the most ignorant and worthless, and the partiality which he showed to Carr, earl of Somerset, and to Villiers, duke of Buckingham, reflect little honor on his judgment or his heart. In his fondness for controversial learning he founded Chelsea college for the support of a number of polemical divines whose abilities and labors might be directed to oppose and refute the Roman catholics. James died at Theobalds, 8th April, 1625, aged 59, after a reign of 22 years, and he was buried in Westminster abbey. By his wife Anne of Denmark, whom he married 1590, he had Henry and Robert who died young, Charles his successor, and Elizabeth who married Frederic V. elector Palatine. His works which consisted of a Commentary on the Revelations, in which he terms the Pope Antichrist — Basilicon Doron, or Advice to his Son — Demonology, or Discourse on Witchcraft — a Counterblast against Tobacco, &c. were published in 1 vol folio, 1619. Though James deserved to be commended for his love of peace, and for his moderation, yet his character must descend to posterity with every mark of detestation for his cruel conduct towards the virtuous and patriotic Raleigh whom he wantonly caused to be beheaded 15 years after his sentence, and after he had granted him his protection, and employed him in the service of his country.

JAMES, II. of England, succeeded his brother the second Charles 1684. He was born at London 14th Oct. 1683, and at his birth proclaimed duke of York. On the death of his father, he escaped to France, and distinguished himself in the French service by his courage and military skill. At the restoration he was declared admiral of England, and obtained in 1665, a celebrated victory over Opdam, the Dutch admiral; but in 1672, he was defeated by Ruyter, though supported by the French fleet. His valor had endeared him to the English, and though his principles, which were strongly attached to the popish religion, were censured by the parliament, he ascended the throne on the death of his brother; but the virtues of the private man unfortunately disappeared in the king. James became arbitrary, cruel, and oppressive, and in his wish to establish the Roman catholic religion in the kingdom, he rudely invaded the rights and privileges of his subjects, and paid no regard to the opinions and prejudices of a people, who had a few years before conducted his father to the scaffold. The murmurs of the English were not uttered in vain. William, prince of Orange, who had married the king's daughter, was persuaded to invade the kingdom, and James, terrified at the success of his enemy, and the ingratitude of his courtiers, fled to France, 1688. He afterwards attacked Ireland, but this effort for the recovery of his lost dominions, and the intrigues of his catholic adherents, were unable to shake the popularity of William. James died at St. Germain's, a pensioner on the bounty of the French king, 16th Sept. 1701, aged 68. By his first wife, Anne, daughter of lord Clarendon, he had two daughters, Mary and Anne, who were successively queens of England; and by his second wife, the princess of Modena, he had a son, called the Pretender, acknowledged by the Roman catholic princes, under the name of James III. This son died at Rome, 2d Jan. 1766, and his son, Charles Edward, the pretender, so well known by his invasion of Scotland in 1745, died at Florence, 31st Jan. 1788, aged 68. Henry Benedict, cardinal of York, brother to Charles Edward, died lately at Rome, and thus that branch of the Stuart family is become extinct.

JAMES I. king of Arragon, surnamed the warrior, succeeded his father, Peter the catholic, 1213. He defeated some of his nobles who had raised an insurrection against him, and afterwards he conquered the kingdoms of Majorca, Minorca, Valentia, and other places from the Moors. He also supported himself against the encroachments of the papal power, and died at Xativa, 27th of July 1276, aged 70. Before he expired, he resigned the crown into the hands of his successor, and put on the habit of a Cistercian monk, with the superstitious hope of thus reconciling heaven, and obtaining forgiveness for the irregularities and the licentiousness of his life.

JAMES II. king of Arragon, son of Peter III. succeeded his brother, Alphonso III. 1291. He conquered Sicily, and waged a long war against the Moors, and the people of Navarre. He had the good fortune to unite Valentia and Catalonia to his crown, and he died at Barcelona, 3d Nov. 1327, aged 66, deservedly respected for his moderation, his courage, benevolence, and magnanimity.

JAMES of Voragine, provincial of the Dominicans, compiled the Golden Legend, a work of fabulous stories, often edited. He died 1298. The best edition of the Golden Legend is that of 1470.

JAMES, Thomas, an English divine, born at Newport, isle of Wight, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1593. He distinguished himself as a collector of curious MSS. and published a catalogue of such as were in the colleges of the university, and was the first librarian appointed by sir Thomas Bodley, in his newly established library. He was made by the bishop sub-dean of Wells, and took his degree of D. D. 1614, and was afterwards presented by the archbishop to Mongeham, in Kent. These and other pieces of preferment, were not undeserved. He showed himself a most active divine against the papists, and proposed various plans for the collating of the MSS. of the fathers, which might not only advance the cause of science, but defeat the forgeries and the views of the catholics, which however failed for want of encouragement. He died at Oxford 1632, aged about 51. His works are all respectable, the best known of which is, a treatise of the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, published 1611, 4to. and re-printed 1688, 8vo. He was the correspondent, among others, of Usher.

JAMES, Richard, nephew of the preceding, was of Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Corpus Christi, of which he was made fellow 1615. In 1619 he travelled through Wales and Scotland, and then passed into Russia, on which he published some observations. He was well skilled in the learned languages, as well as in Italian, French, and Spanish, and so extensive was his information, that he was of great assistance to Selden in the drawing up of his Marmora Arundeliana, and to sir Robert Cotton and his son, in the arrangement of their noble library. His abilities as a scholar and a critic, were said to be superior to those of his uncle. He died 1638. When confined through suspicion, by the House of Lords, 1629, he wrote a copy of English verses, prefixed to his works, afterwards presented to the Bodleian library.

JAMES, Robert, M. D. an English physician, best known by his preparation of a very useful fever powder, was born at Kinverston, Staffordshire, 1703. He took his first degree in arts at St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards practised as a physician at Sheffield, Lichfield, and Birmingham. He then removed to London, and published there, in 1743, his valuable Medicinal Dictionary, 3 vols. fol. in the composition of which he was assisted by his friend Dr. Johnson. He wrote also the Practice of Physic, 1746, 2 vols. 8vo. — on Canine Madness, &c. — and in 1778, a Dissertation on Fevers, &c. He died 23d March 1776. His powder, of which the invention is attributed by some to a German physician of the name of Schawanberg, has acquired great and deserved celebrity, and though at first opposed by some of the faculty, who either through prejudice or rivalry, considered it as a worthless nostrum, it has procured to his family an inexhaustible source of opulence. Dr. James was coarse in his manners as well as person, but he was intelligent, and as a companion, agreeable and cheerful. He left sons and daughters. His eldest son was educated at Merchant Taylors' and St. John's college, Oxford, and took his degree in physic.

JAMES, Thomas, D. D. a native of St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, which he left in 1776 for the headship of Rugby school. He resigned in 1793, and in reward for his honorable services at the head of the school, he obtained a Worcester prebend, and Harrington rectory, Worcesterhire. He wrote a Compendium of Geography for Rugby school — two Sermons — the fifth book of Euclid explained by Algebra. He died at Harrington 1804.

JAMET, Peter Charles, a French writer, born 1701, in the diocese of Sens. He wrote, Metaphysical Essays — Letters on Taste, and the Doctrine of Bayle — Dissertation on the Creation — the Mogul Philosopher, Daneche Menkan, &c. — and also contributed some notes to the dictionary of Trevoux.

JAMYN, Amadis, a French poet, the friend and rival of Ronfard. He travelled in the early part of life in Greece and Asia Minor, and afterwards became secretary and chamber reader to Charles IX. He died 1585. Besides his poetical works in 2 vols. he published seven academical discourses in prose, and finished Homer's Iliad in verse, began by Hugh Salel, to which he added the three first books of the Odyssey.

JANEWAY, James, a native of Hertfordshire educated at Christ-church, Oxford, and ejected for nonconformity 1662. He afterwards opened a meeting house at Rotherhithe, and died there 1674. He is author of Heaven on Earth, 8vo. — a Token for Children, 12mo — often edited — the Saint's Encouragement to Diligence, 8vo. — a Legacy to his Friends, 8vo. a posthumous work.

JANICON, Francis Michael, a French writer, born at Paris, and educated in Holland. He was at first in the army, but became a writer in the gazettes of Amsterdam, Rotterdam and Utrecht, where his political sagacity, and the elegance of his style were much admired. He died of an apoplexy 1730, aged 56. Besides Besides his "gazettes" he wrote Steel's Ladies' Library translated — Gavin's Satire against Monks, 4 vols. 12mo. — the Present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and Dependencies, 2 vols. 1729, a valuable work.

JANSENIUS, Cornelius, a divine who distinguished himself as the envoy of Philip II. of Spain, at the council of Trent, and was rewarded on his return by the bishopric of Ghent where he died 1576, aged 66. He was a native of Hulst, in Flanders. He published among other works a Harmony of the Gospel.

JANSENIUS or JANSEN, Cornelius, a celebrated Roman catholic bishop, the author of Jansenism. He was born at Accoy near Leerdam, in Holland, 1585, and after studying at Utrecht he in 1604 went to Paris, where he became acquainted with St. Cyran. He returned to Louvain in 1617, and two years after took his doctor's degree, and soon after was placed at the head of St. Pulcheria college, with a theological professorship. His abilities were so universally popular that he was twice sent by the university of Louvain as a deputy to the Spanish king, to whom he rendered himself acceptable by writing a severe book against the French, called Mars Gallicus, for their alliance with the protestant princes. Though this work possessed little merit, it procured him the bishopric of Ypres, and with it the hatred and persecution of Richelieu. He died of the plague 8th May 1638, aged 53. He wrote commentaries on the gospels, proverbs, &c. — some controversial books, &c. — but his most celebrated composition, the labor of 20 years, is his Augustinus, published after his death. In this book he explained and illustrated the doctrine of Augustine concerning man's natural corruption, and the nature and efficacy of the divine grace; but as this directly militated against the opinions of the jesuits, it drew upon his memory the severest opposition. The pope at last prevailed upon to exert his authority, and accordingly the use of the book was forbidden in 1641, and the next year Urban VIII. issued his bull for its final suppression. These measures excited violent animosities, but to give greater solemnity to the condemnation, the French bishops drew up five propositions from the doctrine of Jansen, which were submitted to pope Innocent X. and pronounced heretical. These propositions asserted, 1st, That there are divine precepts which good men though desirous, are unable to obey. — 2d, That no man can resist the influence of divine grace operating on his mind. — 3d, That to render human actions meritorious it is not necessary that they be exempt from necessity, but only that they be free from constraint. — 4th, That the Semipelagians err in maintaining that the human will is endowed with the power of either receiving or resisting the influences of preventing grace. — 5th, That whoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation by his death for the sins of all mankind, is a Semipelagian. These measures of the holy see were productive of great dissension in the French church, and when the next pope, Alexander VII. declared that none should be admitted into the church without subscribing to a renunciation of the doctrines of Jansen, the Jansenists ventured to dispute the infallibility of the pontiff, and to regard him as of inferior power to a general council. Opposition in this as in all controversies produced irritation and not conviction, and instead of suppressing the Jansenists, the efforts of the Jesuits and of the see of Rome tended to render them more numerous and more violent, not only in France, but in the Low Countries and in Germany.

JANSON or JANSONIUS, James, a native of Amsterdam, doctor of Louvain and professor of theology, and dean of St. Peter's college, was author of Commentaries on the Psalms — Song of Solomon — Job — St. John's Gospel, &c. He died 1625, aged 78.

JANSSENS, Abraham, a painter, born at Antwerp 1569. His descent from the Cross in Ghent cathedral is so much admired, that some attribute it to the pencil of Rubens, who was his rival in the public favor.

JANSSENS, Cornelius, a Dutch painter, whose portraits were much admired, and considered as equal to those of Vandyke. He resided for some time in England, and died 1665.

JANSSENS Victor Honorius, a painter of Brussels, who died 1739, aged 75. He studied at Rome under the patronage of the duke of Holstein, and on his return employed his pencil in adorning the sacred buildings of his native city.

JANUARIUS, St. bishop of Benevento, beheaded at Puzzuoli in the persecution of Dioclesian. His body was buried at Naples, where a noble chapel in the cathedral is dedicated to his memory. His blood is supposed to be preserved in a phial, and annually, on particular occasions, and when Vesuvius threatens an eruption, the holy vessel is produced, when, at the presence of the saint's head, which is then exhibited, the blood which before was congealed immediately liquifies. The mountain, as the superstitious Neapolitans believe, respects the solemnity, and earthquakes are very frequently thus prevented.

JAPHET, son of Noah is the progenitor of the nations of Asia and Europe. He was born B. C. 2448.

IARCHAS, a learned Indian philosopher, who is reported according to Jerome to have given Apollonius Tyaneus several magical rings of very great power bearing the name of the seven planets.

IARCHI, Solomon Ben Isaac, a Jewish rabbi, born at Troyes in Champagne 1104. At the age of thirty he travelled abroad and not only visited Italy and Greece, but penetrated to Egypt, Palestine, Persia, Tartary and Muscovy, and returned through Germany. He died at Troyes 1180; and his body was carried to be buried at Prague. His learning was very extensive, and consequently he is considered as one of the most illustrious rabbies. Among other valuable works he wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, &c. which have been translated by Fred. Breithaupt at Gotha 1710, 4to. His authority, and his interpretations of scripture are much respected by the Jews. He had three daughters who married learned rabbies.

JARDINS, Mary Catherine des, a French lady, born 1640 at Alencon in Normandy, where her father was provost. She left home early in consequence of an intrigue, and retired to Paris, where she determined to subsist by her pen. While engaged in the publication of novels, she gave a loose to her passions, and assumed the name of Villedieu, one of her favorites, with whom however she soon quarrelled. A fit of devotion on the death of a female friend restored her for a while to her senses, in the seclusion of her convent, but when returned to the world she again became dissipated and after the death of Villedieu, who died in battle, she married the marquis de la Chasse, who was only separated from his wife, by whom she had a son. After his death she attached herself to one of her cousins, and died at Clinchemare, on the Maine, 1683. Her works, consisting of dramas, poems, romances, and fables, were published in 10 vols. 12mo. 1702, to which two more were added in 1721. Her style is animated, though her stories and catastrophes are not always interesting, her verses however are feeble.

JARDYN, Karel du, a painter, born at Amsterdam 1640. He studied in Italy and resided at Venice, where he died 1678, and though a protestant, was buried in consecrated ground. His animals and landscapes are admired.

JAROSLAW, grand duke of Russia in the 10th century, is celebrated for the liberal patronage which he extended to learned men. He framed a code of laws for the benefit of his subjects, and to encourage learning he founded a school, and caused various useful books to be translated from the Greek into the Russian language.

JARRIGE, Peter, a Jesuit who became a protestant, and exposed his society in a work called the Jesuits on a scaffold. He afterwards returned to the society at Antwerp, and employed himself in refuting his former publication. He died at Tullies in France, 1670.

JARRY, Laurence Juillard du, a French poet and divine, born at Jarry near Xantes 1658. He came young to Paris, and was patronized by Bossuet, Bourdaloue and others, and obtained the poetical prize of the French academy 1679, and also in 1714, when Voltaire was his competitor. He was made prior of Notre-dame du Jarry, in Xantes, where he died 1730. He excelled as a preacher, and published — le Ministère Evangelique — Sermons — Ouvrages de Piété — des Poésies Chrétiennes, &c.

JARS, Gabriel, a native of Lyons, who with Duhamel visited the mines of Bohemia, Saxony, Hungary, Austria, Carinthia, England and other countries, and with the skill and genius of a true mineralogist, prepared his observations, which death however prevented him to publish. He was in 1768 made member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and died the next year aged 37. His Voyages Metallurgiques were published by his brother, 3 vols. 4to.

JAUCOURT, Lewis de, a Frenchman who disregarded the advantages of his birth and rank for the pleasures of study. His knowledge was very extensive, and in antiquities, morals, medicine and general literature, his assistance was very valuable to the French encyclopedie. He conducted the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, from its commencement in 1740, and assisted Gaubius and others in the publication of the Museum Sebæanum in 1734. He wrote also Lexicon Medicum Universale, in 6 vols. folio, but the MS. was lost in the vessel which conveyed it to Holland. He was member of the royal society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Stockholm, but refused the liberal invitations of the Stadtholder to settle in Holland, observing that he had no necessities nor ambition, but only wished for studious obscurity. He died Feb. 1780.

JAULT, Augustus Francis, professor of Syriac in the royal college at Paris, translated into French, Sharp's Surgery — Ockley's History of the Saracens — Floyer on the Asthma — a treatise on the venereal disease — and other works. He ranked high as a physician, and died at Paris 1757, aged 50.

JAY, Guy Michel le, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who ruined himself by printing at his own expence a polyglott bible. This beautiful work in 10 vols. folio, containing the Syriac and Arabic versions, which are not inserted in the polyglott of Ximenes, was begun 1628, and was completed 1645. In his honorable poverty he became an ecclesiastic, and was made dean of Vezelai, and counsellor of state. He died 1675.

IBARRA, Joachim, a native of Saragossa, eminent as a printer to the king of Spain. His Bible — the Mozarabic Missal — Mariana's History of Spain — Don Quixote — Gabriel's translation of Sallust — and other works, are excellent specimens of his correctness and the elegance of his printing. He invented a valuable sort of printing ink, and died 1785, aged 60.

IBAS, bishop of Edessa, was deposed and banished by the council of Ephesus, 449 for being an Nestorian, but he was restored by the council of Chalcedon 451.

IBBOT, Benjamin, a learned divine, born 1680, at Beachamwell, Norfolk, where his father was rector. He was of Clare hall, Cambridge, and in 1700 removed to Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he became a fellow 1706. He soon after resigned on obtaining the patronage of Tenison the primate, who made him treasurer of Wells cathedral, and rector of St. Vedast and St. Michael le Querne in London. In 1716 he was made chaplain to the king, and the next year, when his majesty visited Cambridge, he was by royal mandamus honored with the degree of D. D. In 1713 and 15, he preached Boyle's lectures, and some time after was appointed assistant preacher to Dr. Samuel Clarke, and in 1724 was installed prebendary of Westminster. He died the next year, 5th April, and was buried in Westminster abbey. His friend Clarke published, in 2 vols. 8vo. 36 of his sermons, after his death, for the benefit of his widow, and it was liberally patronized and supported by the great and opulent, who had often admired the eloquence and animation of his preaching.

IBEK, Cotheddin, a slave who usurped the throne of India after the death of his master Schehabeddin. The history of his conquests, &c. has been published, called Tage al Mather.

IBEK, Azzeddin, an officer in the Egyptian court of Malek al Saleh the sultan, who married his master's widow and ascended the throne. He was assassinated by his wife six years after, A. D. 1257.

IBEK, an Arabian, author of a book which describes the duties and qualifications of a secretary. He died 1348.

IBRAHIM IMAM, a Mahometan chiefpriest of noble birth and great influence. He was murdered by the caliph Marvan, who suffocated him in a bag of lime A. D. 748.

IBRAHIM, son of Maffoud, eighth caliph of the race of the Gaznevdes, acquired the title of conqueror by the extent of his victories. He was a liberal monarch, and not only patronized learning but erected mosques, &c. and died 1098, after a reign of 42 years.

IBRAHIM, brother of Haroun Raschid, was made caliph of Bagdad 817, but abdicated soon after and died at Samara 839.

IBRAHIM, a learned Mussulman doctor of Shiraz, author of several useful works on jurisprudence.

IBRAHIM, son of Achmet, succeeded his brother Achmet IV. as emperor of the Turks 1640. He took Candia, but was at last assassinated for his debaucheries and repeated cruelties, 1649.

IBRAHIM, Effendi, a Pole who established a printing press in Turkey, and published a treatise on the Military Art—a Turkish Grammar—an History of Turkey, &c.

IBYCUS, a Greek lyric poet, B. C. 540, murdered by robbers, whose crime was discovered by their mentioning his name at the sight of some cranes which they saw flying in the air.

IDACIUS, a Spanish prelate, author of a chronicle from the beginning of the reign of Theodosius to the 11th of Leo. His works were published by Simond, Paris, 1619, 8vo. He lived in the fifth century.

IDRIS, Gawr, a Welsh astronomer of such merit that one of the highest mountains of Wales still bears his name. He ranked as one of the three greatest astronomers of Britain. His age is unknown.

JEACOCKE, Caleb, author of the Vindication of the moral character of the apostle Paul, against the charges of hypocrisy and insincerity, brought by lord Bolingbroke, Dr. Middleton and others 1765, 8vo. was a baker of the High-street, St. Giles, who by his great application and merit was distinguished in the world, and became director of the Hand-in-hand fire office. He was a frequent attendant of the Robin Hood speaking society, Butcher-row, Temple-bar, where it is said his oratory proved often more powerful and convincing than that of Edmund Burke and other members who afterwards acquired celebrity in the House of Commons. He died 1786 much respected.

JEANES, Henry, a native of Albersey, Somersetshire, educated at Hart-hall, Oxford. He afterwards obtained the rectory of Beer-crocomb and Capland, Somersetshire, and also Chedzoy, after Dr. Walter Raleigh's expulsion. He favored the presbyterians, but died before his adherence to the tenets of the church was called in question 1662. He wrote a treatise on Abstinence from Evil 8vo. — On the Indifference of Human Actions, 4to — on Original Righteousness &c. 4to — Polemical Tracts against Dr. Hammond, Jer. Taylor, John Goodwin, &c. — Want of Church Government, &c.

JEANNIN, Peter, a Burgundian, advocate in the parliament of Dijon. He rose to consequence by his merit, and when the orders for the murder of St. Bartholomew were issued at Dijon, he opposed it with all his authority, and for his services was made president of the parliament there. After the destruction of the League he became a favorite with Henry IV. who employed him in negotiations with the Spaniards and Dutch, and after the king's death, he continued a faithful servant in the court of the queen mother. He died 1622, aged 82, after seeing seven successive kings on the throne of France. He published a collection of negociations and memoirs in folio 1659, and 4 vols 12mo. 1695, much esteemed.

JEURAT, Sebastian, a native of Paris, member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the National Institute, was distinguished as an able mathematician. He founded an observatory in the military school, and wrote new tables of Jupiter, 4to. — a Treatise on Perspective, 4to. — Observations on the Comet of 1759 — Observations on the Solar Eclipse of 1793 — Graphical Method of dissecting the Angle — Memoires sur les Lunettes Diplantidiennes, &c. — He died 1803, aged 99.

JEBB, Samuel, M. D. a physician, born at Nottingham, and educated at Peter-house, Cambridge. He favored the non-jurors, and was for some time librarian to Jeremy Collier; but upon his marrying a relation of Dillingham, the eminent apothecary of Red-lion square, he applied himself to pharmacy, and soon began to practise as physician at Stratford le Bow, where he continued the best part of his life. He afterwards retired with a moderate income to Derbyshire, where he died 9th March 1772, leaving several children, one of whom was sir Rich. Jebb, one of the physicians extraordinary to the king. He published a translation of Martin's Answers to Emlyn 1718, 8vo. — Justin Martyris cum Tryphone Dialogus, 1719 — de Vita & Rebus gestis Mariæ Scotorum Regina, 1725. — an edition of Aristides, with notes, 1728, 2 vols. 4to. — J. C. Britanni de Canibus Britannicis, &c. — Bacon's Opus Majus. — H. Hodii de Græcis illust. &c.

JEBB, John, son of the dean of Cashel, was born in London 1736. Part of his education was received in Ireland, and afterwards he entered at Peter-house Cambridge, and took orders, and obtained some preferment. He for some years delivered theological lectures in Cambridge, but he was prohibited in 1770, as he professedly embraced the tenets of the Socinians. In 1775, he resigned his gown and applied himself to the study of physic, and obtained a degree at St. Andrew's; and became a licentiate in London. He died March 1786 of a decline. He was a very warm controversialist. He had when at the university been a very strenuous advocate for yearly examinations; and in his political life, he showed himself a zealous friend of annual parliaments, of universal suffrage, of the abolition of subscription, and of the cause of America against the mother country. Besides physic and classical literature he was well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Saxon. He joined two friends in publishing a 4to. called Excerpta quædam e Newtonii Principiis, &c. His works were published in 1787, in 3 vols. 8vo. by his friend Dr. Disney, with an account of his life.

JECHONIAS, king of Judah, was carried prisoner to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, and after several years of captivity was made, B. C. 562, one of the officers of the king's court.

JEFFERY, Thomas, a native of Exeter, educated among the dissenters. He became assistant to Mr. Hallet, and in 1726 settled at Little Baddow, Essex, where he had a congregation, but two years after returned to Exeter, where he died soon after, aged about 30. He was author of True Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, against Collins the deist, 8vo. — the Divinity of Christianity proved from Scripture, — Christianity the Perfection of all Religion, 8vo. — a Review of his Controversy with Collins, &c.

JEFFERY, John, a divine, born 1647, at Ipswich, where he was educated, and at Catherine hall, Cambridge. On taking orders he returned to the curacy of Dennington, Suffolk, and in 1678 he was elected minister of a church at Norwich, where his eloquence as a preacher, his learning and his exemplary manners rendered him a popular and esteemed character. He was introduced by sir E. Atkyns the chief baron, to Tillotson, who when raised to the primacy, made him archdeacon of Norwich. He died 1720, aged 72. He was twice married. He published for T. Browne's Christian Morals — Whicote's Moral and Religious Aphorisms. He wrote also some sermons, &c. which appeared, 2 vols. 8vo. 1751. Dr. Jeffery was an enemy to controversy, and observed that it produced more heat than light.

JEFFERY, of Monmouth, ap Arthur, a British historian in the reign of Henry I. born and educated at Monmouth. He was made archdeacon of Monmouth and bishop of St. Asaph, 1152. He is known for an history of Britain, in which he gives a long and fabulous account of the first settlements in that country under Brutus the grandson of Ascanius. The work is written in a plain simple style, but the puerile stories and trifling incidents which it contains, render its authority very dubious, though Usher, Leland, Sheringham, sir John Rice, and others defend its authenticity against Polydore Virgil, Buchanan and others who regard it as fiction and forgery. The work was published in Latin at Paris 1517, 4to. and at Heidelberg, in folio, 1587. A translation of it into English by Aaron Thompson of Queen's college, appeared 1718, 8vo.

JEFFREYS, George lord, better known as judge Jeffreys, was born at Acton, Denbighshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and then removed to the Inner-temple. When called to the bar, he recommended himself by his application and zeal, and when introduced to the city of London, by his relative, alderman Jeffreys, he was elected recorder of the city. He afterwards became a favorite of the court, was made solicitor to the duke of York, and in 1680 knighted, and appointed chief justice of Chester. His next appointment was the place of chief justice of the king's bench, and on James the second's accession he was raised to the office of lord chancellor. He was a violent promoter of all the oppressive measures of that short reign, and his cruelty on the circuit, after Monmouth's rebellion, upon the deluded adherents of this unfortunate nobleman will always be remembered to his disgrace and ignominy. Though abusive in his language, he had at times a becoming sense of his dignity when on the bench; and it is said that, in the name of common humanity he threatened his severest vengeance against the mayor and corporation of Bristol who had been long in the habit of selling culprits in their town for exportation to the American plantations. At the revolution the chancellor dreaded the public indignation, and in the habit of a sailor endeavoured to escape to the continent. He was in this disguise at Wapping, drinking in a cellar, when a scrivener whom when in authority he had severely chastised, recognized his once dreaded features. The chancellor in vain attempted to elude the discovery by coughing and turning to the wall, with the pot in his hand; the alarm was given, he was seized by the mob, and conveyed to the lord mayor, and thence sent to the tower. He died there 18th April 1689, and was privately buried the Sunday night following.

JEFFREYS, George, an English writer born at Wel-dron, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow 1701. He refused to take orders, and applied himself to the law, and was called to the bar, but did not practise. He passed the latter part of his life in the family of the dukes of Chandos, his relations, and died 1755, aged 77. In 1754 he published by subscription a 4to. vol. of Miscellanies in prose and verse, among which are two tragedies Edwin, and Merope, both acted at the theatre Lincolns' Inn fields, and the Triumph of Truth, an oratorio.

JEHU, son of Jehosophat, was the 10th king of Israel, B. C. 885. Though he destroyed Joram and all the family of Ahab, and cut off all the idolatrous priests of Baal, yet he afterwards disregarded the worship of the true god, for which he was deprived of his kingdom by Hazael king of Syria, and died 856 B. C.

JEKYL, sir Joseph, son of a clergyman in Northamptonshire, became known as an able lawyer and an eloquent statesman. As the friend of the whigs he was one of the managers of Sacheverel's trial, and after maintaining his principles and popularity undiminished, he was made in the reign of George I. Master of the Rolls, privy counsellor, and was also knighted. In his pamphlet, called, the Judicial Authority of the Master of the Rolls stated and vindicated, he ably supported the power and independence of his office against the chancellor King. This great man died 1738, aged 75.

JEKYL, Thomas, D. D. brother of the preceding was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and obtained the vicarage of Rowd, Wilts, the lectureship of Newland, Gloucestershire, and the office of St. Margaret's minister, Westminster. He was author of Love and Peace recommended, in two sermons at Bristol, 1674, 4to. — Popery, a great Mystery of Iniquity, 1680, 4to. — True Religion the best Loyalty, 1682 — Exposition of the Church Catechism, and some other sermons.

JELLINGER, Christopher, a German, who studied at Basil, and Leyden, and after being some time a private soldier, came from Geneva to England. He found patrons and obtained the living of Brent in Devonshire, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He wrote Disputatio Theologica de Sacra Cœna — a New and Living Way of Dying — the Spiritual Merchant — 15 Conferences with Christ, &c. He died at Knightbridge, aged 83.

JENISCHUS, Paul, a learned native of Antwerp, banished for writing Theatrum Animarum. He died at Stutgard 1647, aged 89.

JENKIN, Robert, a divine, born at Minster, Isle of Thanet, Jan. 1656. He was educated at the King's school school, Canterbury, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow 1680. In 1710 he was elected master of his college, and also held the Margaret professorship of divinity. He refused to take the oaths at the revolution, but as the bishop of Ely could not visit the college without the invitation of the fellows, he remained with many others undisturbed, though at the accession of George I. a compulsory act was made which obliged all those who held preferment worth 5l. a-year to swear allegiance. Dr. Jenkin, in compliance with the law, saw several of his fellows expelled, but the uneasiness which he suffered, joined to the infirmities of age hastened his dissolution. He retired to his brother's house Norfolk, and died there 7th April 1727, and was buried in Holme chapel, where his brother was rector. His theological tracts were much esteemed, and among them an Examination of the Authority of General Councils — a Defence of Bishop Leake's Profession — Remarks on four Books, Basnage's History of the Jews, &c. — the Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion, of which the fifth edition appeared 1721.

JENKIN, William, a puritan, born at Sudbury, Suffolk, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was in 1641 made minister of Christ-church, Newgate, but was deprived for non-conformity 1662. He was concerned in Love's Plot, and therefore was sent to the tower, but procured his liberty by petitioning Cromwell. He was in 1684 sent to Newgate on the conventicle act, and died there four months after. He is author of Exposition on the Epistle of Jude, fol. — Celeugma or Clamor ad Theologos Hierarchiæ Anglicanæ — some Sermons, &c.

JENKINS, Henry, a native of Yorkshire, who lived to the extraordinary age of 169 years. His faculties remained strong to the last, and at an assize he appeared to give evidence of what had passed within his knowledge 140 years before. He remembered the battle of Flodden-field. As he was born before registers were kept, no place would acknowledge him as a native, so that much to the disgrace of his opulent neighbours, he was compelled to beg his bread in the last part of his life. He died 1670, and there is erected to his memory a monument in Bolton church, Yorkshire, where he was buried.

JENKINS, for Leoline, an English statesman and civilian, born at Lantrifaint, Glamorganshire, 1623. He was educated at Cowbridge school, and in 1641 removed to Jesus college, Oxford, but soon after with many other students, he took up arms in the royal cause. He however remained in Oxford till the king's death, and then retired to Wales to the seat of sir John Aubrey, the education of whose eldest son he undertook. He was afterwards tutor to other young men of family and consequence, but became obnoxious to the government, from whose resentment however he was saved by the interference of his friend Dr. Wilkins, warden of Wadham college. For some time he resided at Oxford, but being still considered as a dangerous man, he fled to the continent in company with some of his pupils, and travelled with them over France, Holland, and Germany. He returned home about 1658, and at the restoration was chosen one of the fellows of Jesus college. In 1661 he took his degree of LL. D. and was the same year, on the resignation of his friend Dr. Mansell, elected principal of his college. He was in 1663 appointed commissary of Canterbury by his patron Sheldon, the primate; and then removed to Doctors' Commons as advocate of that court. In 1664 he was engaged with other civilians in reviewing the maritime laws, and the same year was made judge assistant, and soon after principal of the Admiralty court; and in 1668 judge of the prerogative court of Canterbury. In 1669-70 he was knighted for his services in recovering the property of the deceased queen mother, against the claims of her nephew Lewis XIV. and afterwards became one of the commissioners to negotiate the union with Scotland. In 1671 he was elected member for Hythe, in Kent, and in 1673, after resigning his office of principal of Jesus, he went to Cologne as plenipotentiary to settle a treaty of peace with the Dutch, which did not succeed. The next year he was again deputed as a mediator of the treaty of Nimègue, with sir William Temple, the chief burden of which rested upon him. His labors however were unsuccessful, and on leaving the place 1679, he was nominated ambassador to the Hague in the room of his associate Temple, but soon after was again invited to renew his application for the treaty, which at last was that same year concluded. He returned home Aug. 1679, and was soon after elected representative of the university of Oxford. He ably opposed in parliament, the bill for the exclusion of the duke of York, and his services were rewarded by admission into the privy council, and the appointment of secretary for the northern provinces in 1680, and next year for the southern. He was again elected for Oxford university, and still opposed the exclusion of the duke of York; but the firmness with which he attacked and reprobated the violent measures of the court, exposed him to obloquy, so that at last he retired from office, 1684, to the privacy and literary solitude of his house at Hammer-smith. On James's accession he was sworn one of the privy council, and elected again for the university, but his infirmities increased and he found himself unable to attend his duty in parliament. He died, Sept. 1, 1685, and was buried in Jesus college chapel. As he was never married, he left his property to charitable uses, and was particularly a benefactor to his college. His letters and papers were printed, 2 vols. folio, 1724, by W. Wynne, with an account of his life.

JENKS, Benjamin, a native of Shropshire, who took orders and obtained the living of Harley in his native county, where he was minister 56 years, and died 1724, aged 78. He was also chaplain to lord Bradford, and wrote Submission to the Righteousness of God, 12mo. — Meditations, 2 vols. — Devotions, 12mo. — and other works of devotion of great simplicity and merit.

JENKINS, David, a native of Pendoylen, Glamorganshire, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford, from which he removed to Gray's inn to study the law. His abilities recommended him to Charles I. who made him a Welch judge, but his exertions were so great in the royal cause that he was arrested at Hereford 1645 by by the parliament, and sent to the tower. This severity did not terrify him; when brought before the commons he boldly refused to kneel, and would not acknowledge their authority, for which he was fined 1000*l.* and sent back to prison. The republicans were so violent against him that they passed an act to try him, in 1650, but that was prevented it is said by a singular speech of Harry Martin. At last Jenkyns, who expected daily to be led to execution, and who meant to die with the bible under one arm, and the Magna Charta under the other, was set at liberty 1656, and died seven years after, aged 66. His legal and political tracts appeared together 1681, 12mo.

JENNENS, Charles, a gentleman of dissenting principles, who in his youth displayed with such splendor the riches acquired by the industry of his family at Birmingham, that he was called Solyman the magnificent. He composed the words of some of Handel's Oratorios, and published the Lear, Hamlet, Othello, and Macbeth of Shakespeare, as the specimen of an intended edition of the poet, of which death prevented the completion. He died 20th Nov. 1773, and was buried at Gopsal, Leicestershire.

JENNINGS, David, D. D. in Scotland, was minister of Old Gravelane Meeting-house, Wapping, 44 years, and also presided over Coward's dissenting school. He wrote Introduction to the Use of the Globes, and the Orrery, 8vo. — Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals, 12mo. — Jewish Antiquities, 2 vols. 8vo. — Sermons, &c. and died 1762, aged 71.

JENSON, Nicolas, or Janfonius, an eminent printer and letter founder of Venice, by birth a Frenchman. He was commissioned, it is said, by the French king, to gain information with respect to the art of printing, lately invented at Mentz, and upon the death of his patron he retired to Venice, where he soon distinguished himself. His types are still admired for their neatness and beauty. He was the first who determined the form and proportion of the present Roman characters. The first books which issued from his press were, "Decor Puellarum," 1471, and the same year in Italian, "Gloria Mulierum," and afterwards various Classics. He died as is supposed about 1481, as none of his editions appear after that period.

JENYNS, Soame, an eminent English writer, born in London 1704. He was privately educated, and then entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he devoted himself to laborious study, but took no degree. In 1728 he published his "Art of Dancing," and in 1741 was elected member for Cambridge, which place, with the exception of two others, he represented till 1780. He assisted Moore in the publication of the "World," in 1753, and in 1755 he was made one of the lords of Trade, and continued so till the abolition of the board 1780. He died Dec. 18, 1787, aged 83, leaving no issue, though twice married. He was buried at Bottingham, Cambridgeshire. As a writer he distinguished himself by the purity of his language, and the elegance of his diction, by critical knowledge, and a delicate and lively humor. It is remarkable that from a serious believer in revelation he became a deist, and again, after wandering in the labyrinth of scepticism, he returned a devout convert to christianity, and on his death bed, gloried in the reflection that his, "View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion," had proved useful. His publications were poems, collected in a third edition 1778 — a Free Enquiry into the Origin of Evil — a View of the Internal Evidence, &c. — Political Tracts, &c. — all republished together in 4 vols. 8vo. by Nelson Cole Esq. 1790. He has been deservedly blamed for his violent attack on Dr. Johnson. In every respect his character was respectable and exemplary.

JEPHSON, Richard, an Irishman, for some time master of horse to the lord lieutenant of Ireland, but best known as a dramatic writer. He wrote Braganza, printed 1775 — the Law of Lombardy, a tragedy, acted 1779, — the Count of Narbonne, &c. He wrote besides the Campaign, an Opera — Julia, a tragedy — Two Strings to your Bow, a farce — the Conspiracy — the Confessions of J. Baptist Couteau, a satire on the atrocities of the French revolution, 2 vols. 12mo. 1794. — Roman Portraits, with Illustrations and Remarks, in 4to, an heroic poem of merit, &c. He died near Dublin, 1803.

JEPHTHAH, judge of Israel, is known in sacred history for his remarkably rash vow which he made when going to war against the Amorites, promising if successful to sacrifice to God the first living thing which met him. This was his own daughter, who was accordingly offered in sacrifice, though most commentators explain the history by saying that no human sacrifices were permitted by the Mosaic law, and that the daughter of Jephthah was only devoted to a life of perpetual celibacy, and not immolated.

JEREMIAH, second of the great prophets, was born of the tribe of Benjamin, B. C. 629. He was imprisoned for prophesying the calamities which awaited his country, and when Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, he was carried to Babylon, where he died 586 B. C. or according to some he was slain there by his vindictive countrymen. In a pathetic and sublime style the prophet foretold the captivity of his nation and their future return, and in another age the birth and the atonement of the Messiah.

JEROBOAM I. king of Israel, after the separation of the ten tribes from Rehoboam, son of Solomon, reigned 22 years, and died 954 B. C.

JEROBOAM II. son of Joash, was king of Israel, B. C. 826, but on account of his idolatry, the destruction of his race was foretold by Hosea and Amos, the prophets. He was defeated at Jezreel, by the Assyrians, and died 784 B. C.

JEROME, Sr. a father of the church, who died 420, aged 80. He is famous for his eloquence, his virtues, and his extensive learning. His works, which are all on theological subjects, were edited by Erasmus, 1526, and at Paris, 1693.

JEROME, of Prague, so called from the place of his birth, was a martyr to protestantism. He studied at the universities of Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and it is said, Oxford, and in 1396 became D. D. He warmly embraced the doctrines of his friend and master, Huss, and with him, was summoned to answer for his opinions before the council of Constance. He seemed inclined to answer the citation, but seeing Huss thrown thrown into prison, he privately withdrew to Uberlingen, and in vain applied to the emperor for protection. Though he promised to confront his persecutors, if guarded against violence, his fair claims were disregarded, he was seized as he attempted to return home, and dragged in chains to Constance. After being exposed to various insults, and artfully tempted to make a recantation of his opinions, he boldly declared himself the supporter of the tenets of Wickliffe and Huss, and thus triumphant in constancy over his enemies, he was condemned to the flames. On May 30th, 1416, he suffered at the stake: he endured his torments with great fortitude and resignation, and thus obtained the crown of martyrdom.

JEROME, of St. Faith, or Joshua Larchi, a Spanish Jew, physician to Peter de Luna, afterwards pope Benedict XIII. He disputed in the presence of this pope and of several cardinals at Tortosa, with the Jewish rabbies 1414, and by becoming a convert to christianity, he had such influence over his countrymen, and also by his treatise on the Errors of the Talmud, that 5000 Jews followed his example. His book appeared at Frankfort 1602.

JERVAS, Charles, a painter, born in Ireland. He studied under sir Godfrey Kneller, and by the patronage of Dr. G. Clark of Oxford, he visited France and Italy, for the improvement of his abilities. On his return to England he acquired some celebrity, more from the praises and friendship of Pope, than from his own merit. It has been observed, that the lines which the poet wrote in his praise, are more languid, and less happy, than any other of his verses. Horace Walpole, whose judgment should be decisive, says of him, that he was defective in drawing, coloring, and composition, and in likeness. In general his pictures are a light, flimsy kind of fan-painting, as large as life. He was however vain of his art, and after censuring the ear as the only faulty part of the beautiful face of lady Bridgewater, with whom he pretended to be in love, he produced his own as a perfect model. He published a translation of Don Quixote, without understanding Spanish, says Pope, and the work was honored with a supplement on the origin of romances of chivalry, by Warburton. He died about 1740.

JESSEY, Henry, a native of West Rowton, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge. He favoured the independents, for which he was imprisoned in 1641, but afterwards set at liberty by the parliament. He was afterwards minister of St. George's, Southwark, but was ejected 1662, and died the next year.

JESTYN, ap Gevorgant, prince of Glamorgan, was deprived of his right to the sovereignty on his father's death, 1030, in consequence of his violent and ungovernable temper, but succeeded the next king, his uncle Howell, 1043. By his dissention with the neighbouring princes, the English were invited to support the weaker party, and thus the country became the property of the artful invaders.

JESUA, Levita, a Spanish rabbi of the 15th century, author of a book called "Halichot Olam," the ways of eternity, of which Baschyfen printed an edition in Hebrew and Latin at Hanover, 1714, in 4to.

JESUS, a Jew, who foretold the calamities which were to fall on his nation, before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. During the siege he cried out, on seeing his prophecy fulfilled, woe to the temple, to the nation, and to me! and at that moment, says Josephus, he was killed by a dart.

JESUS, son of Sirach, a native of Jerusalem, was author of Ecclesiasticus, B.C. 200. His grandson, of the same name, translated the book into Greek, which is preserved in the Apocrypha.

JESUS CHRIST, the blessed saviour of the world, was born at Bethlehem, A.M. 4004, and was, after a life of the most exemplary sanctity, and of celestial benevolence, cruelly crucified by the Jews, on Mount Calvary, Friday 3d April, A.D. 36. His history is well known as recorded in the page of the four holy evangelists.

JETHRO, father-in-law of Moses, was priest and king of the Midianites. After the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, Jethro brought his daughter, Zipporah and her children to her husband, Moses, and gave him much good advice about the government of his nation.

JEUNE, Jean le, a French divine, of such piety and humility, that he refused a canonry to enter the rigid society of the Oratory. He was highly esteemed as a preacher, and as a man. He lost his sight at 35, and was twice cut for the stone, but he endured all these sufferings with great resignation. He died 1672 aged 80. His sermons, published in 10 vols. 8vo. were much esteemed by Massillon, and have been translated into Latin.

JEWEL, John, an English bishop, born at Buden, in Devonshire, 1522. He was educated at Barnstaple school, and at the age of 13 entered at Merton college, Oxford, and in 1530 was chosen scholar of Corpus Christi. By great application he acquired extensive knowledge, and became a respectable tutor in his college, and an able and popular preacher in the university, and in his parish of Sunningwell, near Oxford, of which he was rector. He was in his principles, a zealous protestant, and he proved it upon the accession of Edward VI.; but after that king's death, he was expelled from his college by the fellows, upon which he retired to Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, where many of his pupils followed him. The abettors of popery did not long suffer him in the enjoyment of retirement and security; he was compelled to subscribe to the popish doctrines, but his sincerity was doubted, and he escaped with difficulty, from the emissaries of Bonner, and passed to the continent. He resided for some time at Strasburg, in the house of his old friend, Peter Martyr, once divinity professor at Oxford. On Mary's death he returned to England, and was selected as one of the sixteen protestants who were to dispute with the same number of catholics in the presence of Elizabeth. In 1559 he was one of the commissioners for the extirpation of popery in the west of England, and a few months after was raised to the see of Salisbury. His merit and learning were further rewarded by the honorable grant of the degree of D.D. from the university of Oxford 1565. In his episcopal character he displayed that activity and vigilance so necessary fary in the establishment of order and regularity, after emancipation from catholic tyranny, and he personally inspected the conduct of all his officers, and completed the triumph of reformation in his diocese, by the impartial and exemplary conduct, which, emanating from himself, pervaded his courts and his clergy. His indefatigable application however undermined his constitution, and the regular habit of rising at four in the morning, and continuing engaged in prayer, in study, and in business till near 12 at night, proved at last unhappily injurious to health. He contracted a disorder which carried him off at Monkton Farley, in Sept. 1571, in his 50th year. This worthy man, so eminent for integrity, for liberality, for meekness, modesty, and every amiable virtue, was blessed with a most happy memory, and was well skilled in the learned languages, and also in German and Italian. His works were numerous and respectable. the best known of which, are his "Apologia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ," several times printed in England, and abroad, and translated into Greek, at Oxford 1614, and into English 1562, by lady Bacon. This valuable work, which merited and obtained the approbation of the queen and her two successors, and was recommended from the bench of bishops to be placed in all parish churches in England and Wales, was attacked by Hardyng, and defended by the author in the most masterly and unanswerable manner. His life has been written by Dr. Lawrence Humphrey, and by Featley.

JEZED I. fifth caliph, or successor of Mahomet, began his reign 680. He assassinated Husein, son of Ali, whom the Arabs had raised to the throne in opposition to him, and he showed himself cruel and revengeful against his rivals and enemies. He had a taste for literature, and died 683.

IGNATIUS, St. a father of the church, made bishop of Antioch by St. John the evangelist. After exhibiting many virtues in his province he was seized by Adrian, and exposed to the fury of wild beasts in the Roman amphitheatre. Seven of his epistles are preserved.

IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the emperor Michael Curopalata, by Procopia, and when his father was deposed by Leo, he retired to a monastery, and took the ecclesiastical habit. He was made patriarch 847, but his severe reprimand of Bardas, an incestuous courtier, procured his disgrace, and Photius was, after some time, placed in his room. He was restored under Basil, and presided at the eighth general council held at Constantinople. He died 878.

IGNATIUS, vid. LOYOLA.

IGOR, sovereign prince of Russia, after his father Rurick, invaded the east, and spread desolation over Pontus and Asia Minor. He died 945, and his widow Alga, who succeeded him, was converted to christianity.

ILDEFONSE, St. the pupil of Isidore of Seville, was abbot of a monastery at Toledo, and after the death of Eugenius, bishop of that see. He died nine years after, 667, aged 82, author of an Account of Ecclesiastical writers, and other works.

ILIVE, Jacob, an English printer, who in 1751 published a pretended translation of the "book of Jasher" a work full of absurdities. He also printed an oration, in which he maintained that this earth is hell, that the souls of men are apostate angels, and that the fire which will punish those consumed in this world will be immaterial. He also wrote other curious and eccentric pieces, which originated in a disordered imagination. He died 1768.

ILLESCAS, Gonsalvo, a Spanish ecclesiastic, author of an history of the Catholic Pontifical, with the Lives of the Popes, 2 vols. fol. 1570, continued by Lewis de Babia, to 1605, and afterwards by Mark de Guadaluara. He died 1580.

ILLTYD VARCHOG, or ILLUTUS, the knight, a saint, who is said to have come to Britain with Garmon, and to have presided over an ecclesiastical establishment made by Theodosius. He is also said to have taught the Welch an improved method of ploughing. He died 480.

ILLYRIUS, Matthias Flaccus, or Francowitz, a learned divine, born 1520, at Albona, in Istria. He studied at Venice, and after acquiring a very extensive knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, he came to Wittemberg to complete his education under Luther and Melanethon, whose principles he warmly embraced. He was one of the writers of the "Centuriæ Magdeburgenses," but the learning, the application, zeal, and abilities which he possessed, were far overbalanced by a restless, passionate, and unyielding temper, which created much dissention among the protestants. He wrote several learned works, and died 1575, little lamented.

IMBERT, Bartholomew, a poet of Nîmes, member of the academy of that city. He fell a sacrifice to a violent fever 1790, aged 43. He wrote a poem on the judgment of Paris, a work of merit—a volume of fables, inferior to those of La Fontaine — Les Egaremens de l'Amour, a novel, and other compositions of considerable eminence.

IMBERT, John, an advocate of Rochelle, lieutenant criminal of Fontenay-le-comte, who died at the end of the 16th century. He was author of Enchiridion juris te Scripti Galliæ, 4to. 1559 — Institutiones forenses, 8vo. 1541, works once in high esteem.

IMBERT, Joseph Gabriel, a painter of Marseilles, the pupil of Vander-Meulen and Le Brun. Disgusted with the world, he, at the age of 34, embraced the austere order of St. Bruns, yet, in the midst of his fervent devotions, he employed some portion of time in painting. He died at Avignon 1749, aged 83. His best piece is, a view of Calvary, at the high altar of the Chartreux, Marseilles.

IMHOFF, James William, a famous genealogist, lawyer, and senator of Nuremberg, where he died 1728, aged 77. He was deeply versed in the history of states. He published, "Historia Genealogica Regum Magnæ Britanniæ," and other works, containing the genealogies of princes, and of illustrious houses in Spain, Italy, France, and Portugal, much esteemed.

IMPERIALI, John Baptist, a physician, born 1568, at Vicenza, and one of the 24 nobles of Genoa. He studied at Verona and Bologna, and taught philosophy at Padua. He practised afterwards with great success at Vicenza, where he died May 1623. He wrote verses in the elegant style of Catullus. He published a 4to. vol. "Exercitationum Exoticarum," Venice, 1603.

IMPERIALI, John, son of the preceding, became eminent as a writer, and as a physician. He died 1653, aged 51. He published, "Musæum Historicum," 1640 — and "Musæum Physicum, seu de Humano Ingenio."

IMPERIALI, Giuseppe Renato, a cardinal, born at Genoa 1651. He is known for a magnificent and valuable library, which still adorns the city of Rome, and of which the catalogue was published 1711, folio, by Fontanini. In 1730 he was proposed to the conclave, to fill the vacant chair of St. Peter, and lost it by a single voice. He died 1737, aged 86.

INA, a king of the West Saxons, who went to Rome in 726, and there founded an English college, which was supported by an annual tax drawn from the English nation, called Peter-pence.

INACHUS, founded the kingdom of Argos, about 1858 B.C. Some authors place his age in the time of Moses, and others 346 before the departure of Israel from Egypt.

INCHOFER, Melchior, a German jesuit, born at Vienna, 1584. He studied the law with great success, but at the age of 28 he went to Rome, and entered among the jesuits. He taught mathematics and divinity for some time at Messina, and published in 1630, in Latin, the blessed Virgin's Letter to the People of Messina, folio, which for a while gave offence; but upon his explanation, was deemed satisfactory to his fraternity. He was afterwards so displeased with the jesuits, that he wrote against them a severe satire, which appeared after his death, in Holland. He died at Milan 1648. He wrote an ecclesiastical History of Hungary, and several other works, which prove him to have been a very learned, but credulous man.

INDULPHUS, a Scotch king, said to be the 77th since the foundation of that monarchy. When his kingdom was invaded by the Danes, he marched at the head of his forces to repel them, but unfortunately was shot by an arrow as he pressed them too closely in their flight to their ships.

INGHEN, William Van, a native of Utrecht, who studied painting under Anthony Grebber, and afterwards in Italy. He settled at Amsterdam, where he died at the beginning of the 17th century. His pieces are held in great esteem.

INGENHOUSZ, John, a native of Breda, who became eminent as a chemist, and a physician. He learned in England, the Suttonian method of inoculation, and then went, by sir John Pringle's recommendation, to Vienna, where he inoculated the daughter of Joseph II. He was fellow of the royal society, and died 1799, aged 69. He is author of Experiments on Vegetables, 8vo. — Hulme's Treatise on the Gout, Scurvy, and Stone, translated into Latin — Chemical Treatises on impregnating Waters, &c. with fixed Air — besides papers in the philosophical transactions.

INGOULT, Nicholas Lewis, a native of Gisors, eloquent as a preacher among the jesuits, and author of some sermons, and of the 8th vol. of the memoirs of the jesuit missionaries in the Levant. He died 1753, aged 64.

INGRAM, Robert, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Beverley school, and Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He obtained the perpetual curacy of Bridhurst, Kent, and afterwards Orston vicarage, Notts, and then Wormington and Boxted in Essex. He wrote, a View of the Great Events of the seventh Plague, &c. concluding the Explanation of the Seven last Plagues, &c. 1785 — Account of the ten Tribes of Israel being in America, by Manasseh Ben Israel, with Observations, 1792 — Explanation of the Prophecy of the seven Phials of Wrath, &c. 1804. He died 1804.

INGRASSIA, John Philip, a physician of Palermo, celebrated for the skill with which he freed his country from the plague. He wrote, Veterinaria Medicina, Venice, 1568, and other works, and died 1581, aged about 70.

INGUIMBERTI, Dominic Joseph Marie d', a learned divine, born at Carpentras, of which city he became bishop. He was originally a Dominican, but afterwards devoted himself to the more austere order of the Cistercians, and by his learning and virtues, recommended himself to the notice of Clement XII. by whom he was made bishop, 1733. He died of an apoplexy, 1757, aged 75. He was a munificent as well as a pious prelate. His large revenues were applied to relieve the necessities of the poor, to the building of an hospital, the erecting of a large library, and other public and charitable uses. He published some treatises on Monastic Life — on Theological Subjects — besides the Lives of some Catholic Divines.

INGULPHUS, abbot of Croyland, was born in London, 1030, and educated at Westminster and Oxford. He was secretary to William of Normandy, before he invaded England, and in 1064, went to the Holy Land. He was made abbot by William, and died 1109. He was a great benefactor to his monastery, which he rebuilt, and for which he obtained some important privileges. He wrote an History of the Abbey from 664 to 1091, published among the "quinque Scriptores," by H. Saville, London, 1596, folio, Frankfurt, 1601, and Oxford, 1684.

INNOCENT I. a native of Albano, elected pope after Anastasius the first, 402. He defended Chrysostom, and condemned the Novatians and Pelagians. He died at Ravenna, 14th Feb. 417. Some of his letters have been published by Constant.

INNOCENT II. was elected pope after Honorius II. though part of the cardinals protested against his elevation to the papal chair, by appointing the son of a Jew, of the name of Peter de Leo, who assumed the appellation of Anacletus II. Innocent, though supported by the princes of Europe, except the kings of Scotland and Sicily, who acknowledged the authority of his rival, was at last driven from Rome by the tumults of Arnould de Bresse, and retired to France, where he held several councils at Clermont, Rheims, Puy, &c. After the death of Anacletus, and the abdication of his successor, Victor IV. he returned to Rome, where he held the second Lateran council in 1139, attended by 1000 bishops, and crowned Lothaire, thaire as emperor. He afterwards made war against Roger, king of Sicily, and died at Rome 24th Sept. 1143.

INNOCENT III. Lotbair Conti, a native of Anagni, raised to the popedom, 1198, after Celestinus III. though only 37 years old. To unite the christian princes in the recovery of the Holy Land, he preached a crusade against the Albigenes of Languedoc, and afterwards put Philip Augustus of France under an interdict, and excommunicated John, king of England, and Raymond, count of Toulouse. He raised the papal authority to such a height, that the Roman republic in its brightest days, was never more powerful, so that the pope was no longer the vassal of the neighbouring princes, but the temporal master of all sovereigns, whom he could depose or restore agreeably to his absolute will. Under Innocent, the Dominicans, Franciscans, Trinitarians, and other orders arose, which were still to spread farther, and to confirm the power of Rome. This pope, thus distinguished by political sagacity and courtly intrigue, died at Perouse, 20th July 1216. His works were published at Cologne 1515.

INNOCENT IV. Sinibaldi de Fiesque, chancellor of the Roman church, and cardinal, was elected pope, 1243, after the death of Celestinus IV. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Frederic, emperor of Germany, who wished to invade the rights of the church, and he held a council at Lyons, in which he excommunicated and deposed the imperial delinquent. This severe measure was displeasing to several princes; but Louis, king of France, interfered in vain with the inexorable pontiff, and the dispute was terminated only by the death of the emperor. Innocent died soon after his return from France, at Naples, 13th Dec. 1254. He wrote Apparatus super Decretales, folio, and was the first who invested the cardinals with a red hat, as a mark of their dignity.

INNOCENT V. Peter de Tarantaise, a Dominican, archbishop of Lyons, and a cardinal, made pope 21st Feb. 1276. He died the 26th June following. He wrote, Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul — Commentaries, &c.

INNOCENT VI. Stephen Albert, a native of Pompadour in Limoges, was bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1352 elected pope after Clement VI. He was of a peaceful disposition, and labored earnestly to reconcile the kings of England and France. He is blamed for bestowing too many honors on his family, though their good conduct deserved the highest dignities. He died 12th Sept. 1362. Some of his letters are extant.

INNOCENT VII. Come de Meliorati, a native of Sulmone in Abruzzo, was elected pope 1404, but opposed by the arms of Ladislaus, king of Naples, who drove him from Rome. He died 6th Nov. 1406.

INNOCENT VIII. John Baptist Cibo, a noble Genoese, of Greek extraction, bishop of Melfi, elected pope 1484. He labored much to re-establish union among Christian princes, and showed himself particularly attentive to the interests of his family, and of his children, whom he had had before he was admitted into the church. He was a benevolent pon-tiff, and died of an apoplectic fit, 28th July, 1492, aged 60.

INNOCENT IX. John Anthony Facchinetti, a native of Bologna, made a cardinal by Gregory XIII. for his services at the council of Trent. He was elected pope 29th Oct. 1591, and died two months after. He had formed the plan of clearing the port of Ancona, and other magnificent improvements.

INNOCENT X. John Baptist Pamphili, a native of Rome, who succeeded Urban VIII. 1644, at the age of 72. He persecuted the Barberinis, to whom he was indebted for his elevation; and he published his bull against the five propositions of the Jansenists. He died 6th Jan. 1655, respected for many excellent qualities, though censured for some foibles.

INNOCENT XI. Benedict Odescalchi, a native of Como, in the Milanese, was made a bishop and a cardinal by pope Innocent X. and elected pope 1676. He reformed several abuses in the ecclesiastical states, and opposed with great firmness Lewis XIV. by refusing to admit to bishoprics those persons who were recommended to him by the monarch, so that at his death, not less than 30 dioceses were vacant. He condemned the errors of the Molinists and the Quietists, and effected a strong coalition between Germany, Poland, and Venice, against the Turks. He died 12th Aug. 1689, aged 78.

INNOCENT XII. Anthony Pignatelli, a noble Neapolitan, raised to the papal chair 1691, after Alexander VIII. He issued a bull against the system adopted by his predecessors, of paying particular honors to the relations of popes, and condemned the Maxims of the Saints, written by Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. He died 27th Sept. 1700, universally regretted by the Romans, who mourned him as a beneficent father.

INNOCENT XIII. Michael Angelo Conti, a native of Rome, the eighth pope of his family. He was elected 1721, and died 7th March 1724, aged 69. His infirmities prevented the execution of several plans of improvement which he had formed, and it is said that he died of grief for having bestowed a cardinal's hat on Dubois.

INSTITOR, Henry, a Dominican, inquisitor-general of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and author, with James Springer, of Malleus Maleficorum, Lyons, 1484, often reprinted. He wrote besides, a treatise against Errors in the Sacrament — a book on Monarchy, &c.

INTAPHERNES, one of the seven nobles of Persia, who conspired against the usurper Smerdis, 521 B. C. He was afterwards put to death by Darius, for making attempts on the crown.

INTERIAN DE AYALA, John, a Spaniard, of the order of Mercy, who died at Madrid 1770, aged 74. He wrote some poems, besides Pictor Christianus Eruditus, folio, 1720, in which he censures the errors of painters in the representation of religious subjects.

INVEGES, Augustino, a Sicilian historian and antiquary, of the society of the Jesuits. He died 1677, aged 84. He wrote, besides an History of Palermo, in Italian, 3 vols. folio, 1649 — Historia Paradisi Terrestris, 4to. 1641 — la Cartagine Siciliana, 4to. 1651.

JOAN, a general under David, who slew Abner, and afterwards stabbed Absalom, his master's son. Though his cruelties were forgiven, on account of his great services, by David, yet he was put to death by Solomon for espousing the cause of his rival, Adonijah, B. C. 1014.

JOACHIM, abbot of Corazzo, and afterwards of Flora in Calabria, was born at Celico near Cosenza, 1130. He was of the Cistercian order, and travelled on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. It is said that he founded several monasteries, which he governed with great prudence, wisdom, and moderation. He pretended also to be a prophet, and his prophecies have appeared in a book called, "the Everlasting Gospel," which however is supposed by Mosheim, to have been written by some other missionary. Joachim died 1202, leaving a numerous sect behind, called Joachamites. The pope refused to canonize him, because some of his tenets were erroneous and profane. His works were published folio, Venice, 1516. His life has been written by Gervaise, a Dominican, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo.

JOACHIM, George, a native of the Grisons' country, appointed mathematical professor at Wittemberg, where he ably defended the Copernican system. He wrote, Ephemerides — de Doctrina Triangulorum — Orationes de Astronomia, &c. and died 1576, aged 62.

JOAN, Pope, a woman, placed by Platina among the successors of St. Peter, by the name of John VIII. or according to others of John VII. Though some affirm this to be a fictitious story, propagated for the discredit of the catholics, according to the report, a woman, born at Mentz, and supposed to be of English extraction, acquired so much celebrity at Athens and Rome, where she studied in man's clothes, that for her probity, learning, and virtues, she was honored with the degree of doctor, and was deemed worthy to succeed to the popedom on the death of Leo IV. Thus raised to eminence, Joan indulged the most indelicate amours with her favorite tutor, and being in a pregnant state, she improperly ventured, when near her time, to attend a procession through the streets of Rome. Thus circumstanced, she was delivered of a child between the Colosseum, and the church of St. Catherine, and died upon the spot, either through pain or shame, after enjoying two years the pontifical seat. In remembrance of this catastrophe it is said, the holy father turns his head aside when he passes by the fatal spot, and to prevent the recurrence of such immorality, it is asserted, that the elected pontiff, before he is installed, submits to an examination of his manhood, when seated on a pierced chair. This story, believed for some centuries, and excused or palliated by some of the catholic writers, and denied by others, is now considered as fabulous, as it never was mentioned for 200 years after the time when, it is asserted, it actually took place. Pius II. was the first who ventured, in the 15th century, to question the authority of the tradition, and after being agitated with great warmth by catholics and protestants for some time, it is now laid aside by both parties as ridiculous and puerile.

JOAN of Arc, or the maid of Orleans, a celebrated

French heroine, born at Domremy in Lorraine, 1412, of obscure parents. When she was servant at an inn, she pretended that she saw in a vision St. Michael, the tutelary saint of France, who ordered her to raise the siege of Orleans, which the English were then besieging, and to preside at the coronation of Charles VII. at Rheims. This was no sooner noised abroad, than she was introduced by Baudricourt, the governor of the neighbouring town of Vaucouleurs, to the king, whom she found out in the midst of his courtiers, though dressed in the plainest apparel. Charles, whose affairs were reduced to the greatest extremity, determined to employ this extraordinary woman, though her professions were ridiculed by the parliament; and Joan appearing among the soldiers, arrayed in the arms and the dress of a man, inspired them with such enthusiastic ardor that the siege of Orleans was raised, the English were defeated, and the monarch advanced to Rheims, where his coronation took place in the presence of the victorious heroine. For these services Joan was ennobled by the king, she assumed the name of Lys, and received a large grant of lands; but while she promised herself fresh victories, she was wounded at the siege of Paris, and she was taken prisoner at Compiegne. This event was regarded by the English as a great victory, but instead of receiving her with the humanity which a captive and a female required, they treated her not only with harshness, but accused her of witchcraft, and condemned her by the sentence of the university of Paris to be burnt. She suffered 30th May 1431, at Rouen, and as she walked to the fatal stake, she displayed the same courage and intrepidity which she had evinced under the walls of Orleans. By her death, Joan gained perhaps more friends to her master than her services and her triumphs had procured; and in thus cruelly putting to death a person whom the fortune of war had placed in their hands, not as a rebellious subject, but as a captive, whom the superstition of the times had exalted to extraordinary consequence, the English fixed an indelible stigma upon their character, and rendered their cause odious in the eyes even of their adherents in conquered France.

JOAN, queen of Naples, daughter of Charles, king of Sicily, murdered her first husband, Andrew of Hungary, and married another. The death of the murdered prince was avenged by his brother Lewis; but though Joan fled to Provence for a while, she recovered her kingdom, and destroyed her husband to marry a third, after whose death, she took a fourth. As she had no issue, she adopted her relation, Charles de Duras, who however revolted against her by the intrigues of the king of Hungary, in consequence of which she named for her successor Lewis of France, duke of Anjou. This was productive of a dreadful civil war, but Charles, obtaining Naples, seized the queen, and put her to death 1381, in her 55th year.

JOAN II. queen of Naples after her brother, Ladislaus, 1414, disgraced herself by her debaucheries. Her second husband, John count of March, offended with her conduct, destroyed her favorite, Pandolfus, and imprisoned her; but an insurrection restored her to liberty, and thrust her husband into a dungeon, from which he escaped to France, to lead a monastic life. Joan adopted for her heir Alphonfus, king of Arragon, and died 1434.

JOASH, son of Ahaziah, was proclaimed king of Israel, at the age of seven, by Jehoiada the high priest, by whose advice he governed well, and put to death his grandmother Athaliah who had destroyed all his family, and even attempted his life. On the death of his virtuous preceptor, he became idolatrous and was slain by two of his servants, B. C. 483.

JOASH, king of Israel after his father Jehoahaz, though he paid respect to the admonitions of Elisha the prophet, followed the idolatries of Jeroboam. He defeated the Syrians in three battles, took Amaziah king of Judah prisoner and reduced Jerusalem, and died B. C. 826 after a reign of 16 years.

JOB, patriarch of Uz near Idumea, is celebrated in sacred history for his sufferings and patience, his respect for the decrees of heaven, and his resignation in calamity. He was restored to honors and happiness after enduring the greatest misfortunes, and died about 1500 years B. C. His history is a most beautiful and sublime poem, which some attribute to Isaiah, and others to Moses.

JOBERT, Lewis, a Jesuit of Paris, distinguished as a preacher and a medallist. He died at Paris 1719, aged 72. He wrote theological tracts, and "la Science des Medailles," a valuable work, best edited, 1739, 2 vols. 12mo.

JODELLE, Stephen, lord of Limodin, was born at Paris 1532. He was one of the Pleiades or seven French poets mentioned by Ronfard. He was the first Frenchman who wrote plays in his own language, and with chorusses in imitation of the Greek. His Cleopatra was acted with great applause before the king, but in general his plays were long and tedious. He was also an orator, and well skilled in architecture, sculpture and painting. He at one time embraced the opinions of the protestants, but after ridiculing the mass in a Latin satirical poem of 100 lines, he returned to the profession of that religion, and probably thus escaped the murder of St. Bartholomew. He died 1573, aged 41, very poor, though he might have been independent in fortune, if he had cultivated his interest at court. A volume of his works was published 1574, containing besides Cleopatra and Dido, tragedies, Eugene a Comedy, and Songs, Sonnets, Elegies and Odes.

JOEL, the second of the minor prophets, foretold in an animated style the desolation of Judea by the Chaldeans, and in a passage quoted by Peter, announces the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on the believing christians. He flourished about 790 years B. C.

JOHN, Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was son of Zacharias and Elizabeth. He was born about six months before our Saviour, and after living a life of austerity in the deserts, where his food was locusts and wild honey, and his clothing camel's hair, he began to preach repentance of sins, and to baptize in the Jordan those who confessed their sins. Jesus was himself baptized by him, and the baptist bore testimony to his sacred office and supernatural appointment. At last John who had reproved Herod for marrying Herodias his brother Philip's widow, was cast into prison, and at the instigation of the vindictive queen he was beheaded, A. D. 29.

JOHN, the Evangelist, brother of James the great, was son of Zebedee and Salome. He was about 26 when the Messiah called him from his profession of fisherman to become a disciple, and he ever afterwards continued from his respect and attention the favorite of his master. At the last supper he leaned upon the breast of Jesus, and enquired who should be the traitor, and before the ascension the redeemer said of him to the question of Peter, "if I will that he tarry till I come what is that to thee," an answer which some of the christian converts improperly regarded as an assurance that he should not die before the end of the world. He afterwards preached the gospel in Asia, and penetrated as far as Parthia, and then fixed his residence at Ephesus. During the persecutions of Domitian he was dragged to Rome and thrown into a cauldron of boiling oil, from which he received no injury, and then was banished to Patmos where he saw his visions and wrote his Apocalypse. Under Nero, he returned to Ephesus, and at the request of the Asiatic churches he wrote his gospel to refute the errors of Cerinthus and Ebion, who maintained that our Saviour was a mere man. He wrote besides three Epistles. He died at Ephesus A. D. 100. at the age of 94, in Trajan's reign.

JOHN, surnamed Mark, was the disciple of the apostles, and attended Paul and Barnabas in their peregrinations to preach the gospel. When the two apostles afterwards disputed about the services, and the merits of their attendants, John followed Barnabas to Cyprus, and some years afterwards he was at Rome to minister to the necessities of Paul in prison. Some suppose that he died at Ephesus.

JOHN, a native of Nicomedia, who was roasted to death in defence of the faith in the persecution of Diocletian, 303.

JOHN, St. a native of Cyprus, raised to the see of Alexandria 610. He was remarkable for his benevolence and charity.

JOHN, secretary to Honorius, seized the throne of Constantinople on his master's death and was beheaded two years after at Ravenna, 425.

JOHN I. surnamed Zimisces, was of an illustrious family, and he seized on the throne of Constantinople by the assassination of Nicephorus Phocas, at the instigation of the empress Theophanon 969. Though he thus owed his elevation to murder, he governed with great moderation and displayed unusual valor against the Russians, Bulgarians and Saracens, whom he repeatedly defeated. He banished the empress Theophanon at the command of the patriarch, and he was poisoned by a cup-bearer at the instigation of the eunuch Basil, and he died 10th Jan. 976.

JOHN II. Comnenus, succeeded his father Alexis Comnenus on the throne of Constantinople 1118. He married Irene princess of Hungary, and was successful in his wars against the Mahometans, Servians, and other barbarians. He was a virtuous prince and banished luxury and effeminacy from his court. He died 3d April 1143, aged 55, in consequence of a wound received from a poisoned arrow in the chase.

JOHN III. Ducas, was emperor of Nice, whilst the Latinus

Latins were masters of Constantinople. Though successful against the neighbouring princes, whose dominions he conquered, he failed in his attempts to take Constantinople, and was obliged to make a treaty of peace with Baldwin the usurper. He afterwards waged war against the Bulgarians and died 1255, aged 62.

JOHN IV. Lascaris, succeeded at the age of six, his father Theodore the younger on the throne of Constantinople 1259. His youth exposed him to dangers, and his sceptre was seized by Michael Palæologus who put out his eyes, and confined him for the rest of life in a prison. He died under Andronicus II.

JOHN V. Cantacuzenus, emperor of Constantinople. Vid. CANTACUZENUS.

JOHN VI. Palæologus, succeeded his father Andronicus the younger on the throne of Constantinople 1341, and had the good fortune to free himself from the power of John Cantacuzenus his father-in-law who had usurped his sceptre. He afterwards defended himself against the Turks, but bought their peace with money. A more formidable opposition awaited him in the rebellion of his son Andronicus, who imprisoned him and his sons, and during these civil commotions, the Turks renewed their attacks against Constantinople and imposed upon the emperor very disgraceful terms. This weak and unfortunate monarch died of chagrin 1390, aged 60.

JOHN VII. Palæologus, emperor of Constantinople after his father Emanuel 1425, was unfortunate in his opposition against his Turkish invaders, and solicited in his defence the assistance of the Latins. More effectually to secure the support of the princes of the West, he meditated an union between the two churches, and the pope, Eugenius IV. favoring the plan called a council at Ferrara where the emperor attended in person, and where a reconciliation took place 1439, but not to continue long. John died 31st Oct. 1448, after a reign of 29 years.

JOHN I. pope, a Tuscan, who succeeded Hormisdas in the chair of St. Peter 523. He was thrown into prison by Theodoric who persecuted the Arians, and he died in confinement at Ravenna 526.

JOHN II. a native of Rome, pope after Boniface II. 533. He opposed the Nestorians and Eutychians, and died May 535.

JOHN III. a Roman, pope after Pelagius I. 560, was zealous in the decoration of churches, and died 13th July 573.

JOHN IV. a native of Salona, made pope 640, and died two years after.

JOHN V. a Syrian of benevolent character, raised to the papal chair 685. He died two years after.

JOHN VI. a Greek, made pope after Sergius 701. He died 9th Jan. 705.

JOHN VII. a Greek, who succeeded John VI. on the papal throne, and died 17th Oct. 707. He was a weak pontiff, and too compliant with the improper requests of Justinian.

JOHN VIII. a Roman, pope after Adrian II. 872, crowned Charles the Bald emperor 875. He held a council at Troyes 878, but was called back to Italy by the invasion of the Saracens, who proved so successful that they obliged him to pay an annual tribute. He was prevailed upon by Basil emperor of the East to acknowledge as patriarch Photius who had artfully banished the legal possessor Ignatius, but he afterwards saw the impropriety of his concessions, and therefore excommunicated the usurper. He died 15th Dec. 882. About 300 of his letters are preserved.

JOHN IX. a native of Trivoli, elected pope after Theodore II. 898. He died Nov. 900.

JOHN X. bishop of Bologna, and archbishop of Ravenna, was elected pope 914, by the intrigues of Theodora his mistress. He was more capable of leading an army, than of governing the church, and he defeated the Saracens, who ravaged Italy, but was afterwards driven from Rome by Guy duke of Tuscany. He was put in prison by Marofia daughter of Theodore and suffocated 2d July, 928.

JOHN XI. son of Alberic duke of Spoleto, and Marofia the wife of Guy of Tuscany, was made pope at the age of 25, by the intrigues of his mother 931. He was confined in the castle of St. Angelo with his licentious mother by his brother Alberic, and he died there 936.

JOHN XII. a Roman noble, son of Alberic, was elected pope 956, at the age of 18, and was the first who changed his name of Octavian by assuming that of John. He solicited the assistance of the emperor Otho, against the tyranny of Berenger who had established his power over Italy, and when he had succeeded in driving away his enemy, he crowned his illustrious ally, and swore to him inviolable fidelity, over the body of St. Peter. This alliance was of short duration, the pope became the friend of the son of Berenger, and united himself against his ancient ally and benefactor, in consequence of which Otho invaded Italy, and in a general council in 963 accused the pope of various crimes. John, convicted of adultery, violence and oppression, was deposed, and Leo VIII. placed in his room; but no sooner was the emperor returned to his dominions than the exiled pontiff entered Rome, and with the most barbarous cruelty mutilated his enemies. He was in 964 killed by an insulted husband, whose bed he had defiled.

JOHN XIII. a Roman, elected pope 965, by the power of the emperor, against the wishes of the Roman people. This violent step was productive of dissension, and the new pontiff was banished the next year by Peter, prefect of Rome; but the emperor reinstated him, and sent into exile his opponent in disgrace. John died 6th Sep. 972.

JOHN XIV. bishop of Pavia, and chancellor of Otho II. succeeded Benedict VII. as pope, 983. He was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, by the anti-pope Boniface VIII. and died there either of poison or of grief, 20th Aug. 984.

JOHN XV. pope after John XIV. died soon after his elevation, and even before his consecration according to some.

JOHN XVI. a Roman made pope 985. He was the first who rewarded the meritorious deeds of life by canonization. He died 30th April 996.

JOHN XVII. a Roman elected after Sylvester II.

1003. He died six months after. There was an anti-pope of that name who was seized by the soldiers of Otho III. who in derision cut off his hands and ears, and tore out his tongue, 998. His name was Philagathus.

JOHN XVIII. a Roman elected after John XVII. From this time the right of election passed from the Roman people to the clergy. John afterwards resigned his dignity for the obscurity of a monastery, and died 18th July, 1009.

JOHN XIX. son of the count of Tusculum succeeded his brother Benedict VIII. 1024. He crowned the emperor Conrad II. and died May 1033.

JOHN XX. the name given by some historians to the anti-pope Philagathus, or to John, son of Robert, or to the woman who is said to have filled the papal chair under the name of pope Joan.

JOHN XXI. a Portuguese, son of a physician was made pope 1276, but died eight months after by the fall of a building upon him at Viterbo 16th May, 1277. He left works of Philosophy, Medicine and Theology.

JOHN XXII. James d' Euse, a native of Cahors, who by the patronage of Charles II. of Naples, to whose son he was preceptor, rose to high ecclesiastical dignities, and in 1316 was elected to the popedom. He was an active pontiff, and founded several abbeys, and established some bishoprics in central towns. His pontificate however was disturbed by various quarrels, especially with the cordeliers whose order he intended to suppress. He died 4th Dec. 1334 respected for his frugality, prudence and sanctity. He was well skilled in medicine, and wrote the Thesaurus Pauperum — treatise on the Disorders of the Eyes — on the Gout — on the Formation of the Fœtus — Advice for preserving Health, printed at Lyons, &c.

JOHN XXIII. Balthasar Cossa, a Neapolitan, who was legate at Bologna, and chamberlain to Boniface IX. and on the death of Alexander V. was raised to the popedom 1410. His elevation was not without opposition; but to pacify faction he promised to resign the tiara, if Gregory XII. and Peter de Lune, or Benedict XIII. would also abandon their pretensions. Though these conditions were accepted and ratified with due formality in the council of Constance, he had the art to withdraw himself, and to re-assume the office and insignia of sovereign pontiff; but he was soon after deposed, and imprisoned. Three years after, 1418, he was restored to liberty and compelled to acknowledge the election of Martin V. by whom he was treated with great kindness. He died soon after at Florence, 22 Nov. 1419. He was in his character a most worthless and immoral man.

JOHN, king of England, surnamed Lackland, was the fourth son of Henry II. He unjustly deprived his nephew Arthur of his possessions in Brittany, and confined him in the tower of Rouen, where he was cruelly put to death, and having thus cut off the right heir of the English crown he was declared king. The states of Brittany, and Constance the mother of the murdered Arthur complained of the cruelties of the usurper before Augustus Philip of France, and the tyrant was condemned for the murder, and his dominions in France confiscated. He retired to England, derided and despised by his subjects, and to complete his disgrace he quarrelled with the pope and the barons. The pope excommunicated him, but he reconciled himself to him by acknowledging himself the vassal of Rome, and when he found the barons opposing force to his measures and threatening his deposition he consented to their request, and signed the Magna Charta, the glorious basis of British freedom. As this was extorted from him, John showed little inclination to observe it; and the barons to punish and dethrone him called over Lewis the son of the French king, and swore allegiance to him. Deserted by his subjects, and harassed by an army of foreigners, John at last found relief in death. His misfortunes pressed so heavily upon his spirits that he fell a victim to a fever at Newark, 19th Oct. 1216. He was buried in Worcester cathedral. His son Henry III. succeeded him.

JOHN, king of France, surnamed the Good, succeeded his father Philip Valois 1350. The beginning of his reign was marked by measures of severity, and in consequence of this, dissatisfaction and insurrection prevailed over the kingdom and favored the invasion of the country by the English. John opposed his enemies, but was defeated in a dreadful battle near Poitiers by the black prince Edward, and taken prisoner 1356. The imprisonment of John in England was the signal for civil dissension. France was torn to pieces by her rebellious chiefs, and the king, unable to procure his liberty by the payment of 300 millions of golden crowns, and by the cession of eight provinces for his ransom according to the treaty of Bretigni, returned from France, which he had visited on his parole, and died soon after in the Savoy, London, 8th April 1364, aged 54. Though impolitic, violent and imprudent in his character, John possessed bravery and generosity.

JOHN III. king of Sweden, son of Gustavus Vasa, succeeded in 1568 his brother Eric XIV. who had been deposed for his ill-conduct. He restored tranquillity among his subjects, and made a peace with Denmark; but his attempts to re-establish the popish religion in the kingdom were opposed by the nobles, and Lutheranism therefore prevailed. He died 1592.

JOHN II. son of Henry III. was at the age of two proclaimed king of Castile. Though educated in indolence and effeminacy by his mother, he showed himself brave in war, against the attacks of the kings of Navarre and Arragon, whom he obliged to sue for peace. He afterwards turned his arms against the Moors of Grenada, and defeated them with great slaughter. He died 1454, aged 50.

JOHN II. king of Navarre, succeeded his brother Alphonso on the throne of Arragon 1458. He made war for a long time against Henry IV. of Castile, and died at Barcelona 1479, aged 82. He left his kingdoms of Arragon and Sicily to his son Ferdinand, and Navarre to his daughter Donna Leonora.

JOHN, son of the emperor Henry VII. was, at the age of 14, elected to the kingdom of Bohemia 1309, against the intrigues of the duke of Carinthia. He displayed great valor, and after conquering Silesia he was declared king of Poland. In his expedition against the Lithuanians he had the misfortune to lose one of

of his eyes, and a Jew doctor to whom he applied at Montpellier for a cure, deprived him of the other. This misfortune did not however disarm him of his courage, he assisted Philip of Valois against the English, and in the battle of Crecy with his horse led by the bridle by two brave knights, he displayed singular acts of valor, and was mortally wounded 26th Aug. 1346. He was buried at Luxemburg.

JOHN I. king of Portugal, was raised to the throne 1384. though but the natural son of Peter the Severe, against the rights of Beatrix daughter of his brother Ferdinand I. His elevation was opposed by John king of Castile, who had married Beatrix; but the usurper established himself in his power by the defeat of his opponents at the battle of Alinbarota; afterwards John turned his arms against the Moors of Africa and took Ceuta and other places, and died 14th Aug. 1433, aged 76. Under his reign the Portuguese began their famous discoveries.

JOHN II. king of Portugal, was surnamed the Great, and succeeded his father Alphonso V. 1481. He was successful in his suppression of some insurrections, the leaders of which he punished with death, and afterwards he carried his arms into Africa, and was at the taking of Arzile and Tangiers. He afterwards defeated the Castilians at the battle of Toro, 1476, and with wise policy encouraged the maritime excursions of his subjects, and favored their settlements on the coasts of Africa, and in the Indies. He died of a dropsy 22d Oct. 1495, aged 41.

JOHN III. king of Portugal, succeeded his father Emanuel 1521. The beginning of his reign was marked by dreadful earthquakes which destroyed his cities and swallowed up the inhabitants; but John with benevolence and wisdom relieved the miseries of his subjects, and encouraged commerce and navigation. His fleets penetrated far into the East and discovered Japan, and to ensure the tranquillity of his Indian settlements he sent among them the celebrated Francis Xavier. He died of an apoplexy 1557, aged 55, deservedly respected as an humane and enlightened monarch.

JOHN IV. surnamed the Fortunate, was son of Theodore duke of Braganza, and was born 1604. He employed all the powers of his mind, and of his situation to the emancipation of his country, which the Spaniards after the death of Sebastian had conquered, and since held as a tributary province, and by the assistance of his brave countrymen he shook off the odious yoke, and was proclaimed king 1630. He died at Lisbon 6th Nov. 1636, aged 32.

JOHN V. succeeded Peter II. on the throne of Portugal 1707. He espoused the cause of the allies in the wars of the Spanish succession, and when the peace of Utrecht in 1713 restored tranquillity to Europe he devoted himself to the encouragement of commerce of literature, and of industry among his subjects. He died 1750 aged 61, universally regretted.

JOHN of Gaunt or Ghent, duke of Lancaster was the third son of Edward III. He was born at Ghent 1340, and distinguished himself by his valor in the field. In consequence of his marriage with Constance, the natural daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile and Leon, he laid claim to the throne on the death of his father-in-law, but was opposed by Henry of Transamare, and enjoyed nothing but the empty title of king. In the wars of the black prince his brother in France, he supported him by his intrepidity, and after his death succeeded to the management of affairs. On the accession of Richard II. he was dragged from the retirement which he loved, to clear himself against the accusations of the courtiers, who charged him with attempts to seize the crown, because he countenanced the doctrines of Wickliffe, against the overbearing power of the pope. He afterwards resigned his claims to the throne of Castile to his only daughter by Constance, who in 1386 married the heir apparent of that kingdom, and he received in return an honorable pension. John had for his third wife Catherine Swinford the governess of his children, and the sister of Chaucer's wife, and from his patronage of that poet he received pleasure, honor, and fame. John died 1399 highly respected for his valor and prudence. His son Henry succeeded to the English throne after the deposition of the second Richard.

JOHN SOBIESKI, king of Poland. vid. SOBIESKI.

JOHN of Austria, Don, was the natural son of Charles V. of Germany. He was unacquainted with his birth, till his father on his death-bed revealed the secret to his son Philip II. who honorably called him to court, and in 1570 placed him at the head of his army against the Moors of Grenada, whom he defeated. In 1571 he commanded the naval armament against the Turks and gained the celebrated battle of Lepanto, and two years after took Tunis. He was made governor of the Netherlands in 1576, and after taking Namur, Charlemont, and other towns, he completed his triumphs over the prince of Orange and the archduke Mathias, by the famous battle of Gemblours 1578. This celebrated warrior died 1578, at the early age of 32 in consequence of poison as it is supposed, administered by his enemies.

JOHN Fearless, count of Nevers and duke of Burgundy, distinguished himself at Nicopolis against Bajazet, who sold him his liberty for an exorbitant ransom. Restored to France he employed his influence in promoting sedition and civil war in the kingdom against the dauphin, afterwards Charles VII. and the partisans of the duke of Orleans. He murdered the duke of Orleans, and afterwards being reconciled to the dauphin he was assassinated in his presence by one of his courtiers 10th Sept. 1419, aged 48.

JOHN, of France, duke of Berry, was son of king John, and distinguished himself at the battle of Poitiers. He died at Paris 15th June, 1416, respected for his many virtues.

JOHN V. duke of Brittany, was surnamed the Conqueror, for the brave defence which he made against the emperor and against the king of France who wished to strip him of his dominions. He died 1st Nov. 1399.

JOHN VI. duke of Brittany, was a prince of great valor and equal benevolence. He was in the service of Charles VII. of France, and fought bravely against the English. He died 1446 much lamented by his subjects.

JOHN V. count of Armagnac was son of John IV. of Navarre. He disgraced himself by an incestuous commerce with his sister Isabella, which neither the representations of his friends, nor the threats of the pope could persuade him to abandon. At last he was banished from his dominions by the French king; but afterwards was reconciled to his persecutors and was killed in his palace at Lecture in a siege 1473.

JOHN, of Salisbury, a learned Englishman who in his youth was in the service of the abbot of Rheims, and then studied at Paris, where he took his degrees. He visited Rome, and at his return to Paris, opened a school there. He afterwards was in England and lived with Theobald, the primate, and with Thomas-a-Becket, and in 1177 was chosen bishop of Chartres by the clergy of that diocese, at the recommendation of Lewis the young king of France. He was an able prelate, and distinguished himself at the council of Lateran, and died 1181. His writings are lost, except Becket's Life — a Collection of Letters — and "Polycricon."

JOHN of Leyden, vid. BOCCOLD.

JOHN of Paris, a celebrated Dominican, theological professor at Paris. He supported the cause of Philip the Fair, against Boniface VIII. in his treatise de Regia Potestate and Papali; but the doctrines which he asserted with respect to transubstantiation proved highly offensive to the Roman see, and he was suspended from his ecclesiastical offices by the archbishop of Paris. He appealed to Rome, but died in that city before his cause was heard 1304. He wrote besides Determinatio de Modo existendi Corporis Christi in Sacramento Altaris, 8vo. — Correctorium Doctrinæ S. Thomæ, &c.

JOHN, of Udino, a celebrated painter, who studied under Giorgion at Venice, and Raphael at Rome. His fruits, animals, flowers, &c. exhibited great powers of execution. He died at Rome 1564, aged 70.

JOHNSON, Samuel, an English divine, born 1649, in Warwickshire, and educated at St. Paul's school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He early obtained the living of Corringham in Essex, which, on account of its unhealthy situation, he abandoned to the care of a curate, and came to settle in London. Here he plunged into the vortex of politics, and soon distinguished himself, and became the friend of lord Essex, and of lord William Russell, who made him his chaplain. He inveighed severely in his discourses from the pulpit, against the horrors of popery, and spoke with warmth against the succession of the duke of York to the throne. While his political friends wielded the weapons of eloquence in parliament, he himself attacked Dr. Hickes, the bold champion of passive obedience, in a pamphlet called, "Julian the Apostate." The work was quickly answered by Dr. Hickes, in a pamphlet called, "Jovian," and Johnson had already prepared a severe reply, which the seizure and imprisonment of his patron, lord William Russell, prevented him from publishing. His abilities, however, and his zeal were too conspicuous to be disregarded; after Russell's death, he was summoned before the privy council, and questioned about the answer he had written to Dr. Hickes, called, "Julian's Arts and Methods to undermine and extirpate Christianity;" but when he declared that he had suppressed it, and when his persecutors could procure no copy of it, though it was entered at Stationers'-hall, he was dismissed. But soon after he was prosecuted for the publication of Julian the Apostate, and though ably defended by counsellor Wallop, he was condemned before Jeffries, and sentenced to pay 500 marks, and to be imprisoned till it was paid. Though thus confined, his spirit was not subdued: he still wrote against popery; and when the army was drawn up on Hounslow heath in 1686, he drew up "an Address to the Protestants of the Army," which, after the dispersion of 1000 copies, was seized, and exposed the author to fresh persecution. He was in consequence of this condemned to stand in the pillory, in Palace yard, at Charing cross, and the Exchange, to pay a fine of 500 marks, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, after being degraded from the priesthood. The degradation took place by the hands of bishops Crew, Sprat, and White; and on December 1, 1686, the sentence was executed. The stripes which he received were 317, from a whip of nine cords knotted, which he endured with great firmness and even alacrity. The king appointed a successor to his living, but as in the divesting him of his sacerdotal habit, either by accident or design, he had been permitted to retain his cassock, his degradation was considered as incomplete, and the bishop refused to admit the new incumbent without indemnity; and when he presented himself to the parish, the people refused to receive him in the room of Johnson, who thus retained his living. At the revolution, the parliament, 1689, resolved that the proceedings in the King's bench against Johnson, were cruel and illegal; and therefore they recommended him to the king for some ecclesiastical preferment suitable to his services and sufferings. The deanery of Durham in consequence of this was offered to him, which he refused as a reward inadequate to his merits; but at the solicitation of lady Russell, and the influence of Tillotson, a pension of 300l. a-year was obtained from the king, for his own and his son's life, besides a gratuity of 1000l. In 1692 his house was forcibly entered in the night by seven assassins, who seemed to have been actuated to vengeance and murder by the publication of his book called, "Argument to prove the Abrogation of King James, &c." Though his life was thus threatened with instant death, the cries of his wife prevailed upon the ruffians, who left him, after inflicting some severe bruises on his body, and two wounds on his head. His constitution was weakened by this dreadful catastrophe, and by the persevering spirit of his persecutors, though his zeal against popery remained unshaken. He died May 1703. All his treatises were published in 1 vol. folio, 1710; a second edition of which appeared 1713. Johnson in his character, was firm, undaunted, and enthusiastic; but his temper was violent, overbearing, and unsubmitive; and probably to the furious zeal with which he attacked those who differed from him, and to the abusive language which he indiscriminately used against his opponents, he might attribute the virulence and persevering spirit of his persecutors. His works appeared 1710, in 1 vol. folio.

JOHNSON, John, a nonjuror divine, born at Frindsbury, near Rochester, 1662, and educated at Canterbury school, and Magdalen college, Cambridge. He afterwards entered at Corpus Christi, of which he became fellow 1685. He was in 1686 presented to the vicarages of Batton and Heron hill, near Canterbury, by Sancroft, the primate; and in 1697 he was further promoted by Tenison to the living of Margate, and afterwards to Apuldre. His abilities as a scholar and divine were very great, and therefore he was twice chosen proctor in convocation for Canterbury. But though protected by government, he manifested some opposition to the establishment, and not only expressed a mean opinion of the articles and liturgy of the church, but even refused to take the oaths of allegiance to George I. This threatened dangers, which however he prudently avoided by timely submission, though he afterwards continued restless, dissatisfied, and disloyal. He died 15th Dec. 1725. He wrote the "Clergyman's Vade-mecum," an excellent book, 2 vols. 12mo. — collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. — the Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar Unveiled and Supported, 8vo. — a paraphrase on the Psalms, &c.

JOHNSON, or JANSEN, Cornelius, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. He came to England in the reign of James I. and drew that monarch, as well as the nobility of his court. He was soon after eclipsed by the superior fame of Vandyke; though his pictures possessed great merit, in their high finishing, and the correctness of their drapery. He died in London.

JOHNSON, Martin, a seal engraver, better known as a painter. His landscapes are particularly excellent, and give a most correct and perfect delineation of the delightful prospects of England. His pieces are very scarce, and preserved in the cabinets of the curious with great care. He died in the beginning of James II.'s reign.

JOHNSON, Charles, a member of the Middle Temple, who left the profession of the law for the muses. He wrote some plays, which, by the friendship of Wilks, were acted on the stage, and received some applause. He married a young widow, with a moderate fortune, and opened a tavern in Bow street, Covent-garden, which he relinquished at his wife's death, having acquired a decent competence. He died about 1744. Though he is not ranked among the greatest of dramatic writers, yet he possessed merit, and deserved popularity. His dramatic pieces are 19 in number. He is immortalized in Pope's Dunciad, because, says the note, he was famous for writing a play every year, and for being at Button's coffee-house every day, and for falling a martyr to obesity, and the rotundity of his parts.

JOHNSON, Maurice, an eminent antiquary, born of an ancient and respectable family at Spalding, where he established a Gentleman's literary society. He was of the Middle Temple, and was bred to the bar. By his wife, daughter of Mr. Ambler, he had 26 children, 16 of whom sat down together at his table. He was one of the last founders of the Antiquarian society; and by his benevolence, and the liberality of his various communications, he fully deserved the handsome eulogium written on him by Dr. Stukeley, and inserted in the minutes of the society, to whose memoirs he contributed so much. He made a curious collection for the history of Caerulius. He died, after suffering much from a vertiginous disorder, 6th Feb. 1755.

JOHNSON, Thomas, a native of Selby, Yorkshire, brought up to the business of an apothecary in London. He became, according to Wood, the best herbalist of his time; and wrote, Iter in agrum Cantuariam, 1629 — Ericetum Hamsteadianum, 1632, the first catalogue of plants published in England — Gerard's Herbal improved, a valuable work — Essay on the Bath Waters, &c. He was an officer in the royal army, and was made M. D. by the university of Oxford for his services. He died in consequence of a wound which he had received in the shoulder at the siege of Basinghouse, 1644.

JOHNSON, Samuel, a celebrated English writer, born at Lichfield, 7th Sept. 1709. He was the son of a bookseller, and was educated at Lichfield school, where he had among his school-fellows, Dr. James, and Dr. Taylor; and after being one year at Stourbridge school, and passing two years in unsettled studies at home, he entered, Oct. 1728, at Pembroke college, Oxford. His exercises in the university displayed, as they had done at school, superior powers; and his translation of Pope's Messiah into Latin verse, appeared so highly finished, that the poet spoke with the highest respect of his translator, and declared, that posterity would doubt which poem was the original. Unhappily Johnson had to struggle with poverty at college, and in consequence of the insolvency of his father, he left the university in 1731, without a degree. Returned to Lichfield, he found his prospects in life dreary and unpromising. After his father's death, his whole property amounted to only 20l.; and thus destitute, he willingly accepted the offer of an usher'ship at Bosworth school. The situation proved disagreeable, and in a few months he removed to Birmingham, where, under the patronage of a bookseller, he published his first literary labor, a translation of Lobo. In 1734 he returned to Lichfield; and the next year he married Mrs. Porter, a widow of Birmingham, a lady much older than himself, and not possessed of the most engaging manners, or the most fascinating person. As she brought him 800l. he began to fit up a house at Edial, near Lichfield, for the reception of pupils; but as he had only three scholars, among whom was David Garrick, the plan was dropped, as utterly impracticable and ruinous. About this time, under the patronage of Mr. Walmesley, his earliest friend, he began his Irene; and in March 1737, he first visited London in company with his pupil, Garrick, like himself in quest of employment, and equally doomed to rise to celebrity in his profession. In London he formed an acquaintance with Cave, the printer of the Gentleman's magazine; and his first performance in that work was a Latin alcaic ode, inserted in March 1738. Thus encouraged, he returned to Lichfield to fetch his wife; and from 1740 to 1743, he was laboriously employed in the service of this periodical work, and during that period, wrote the parliamentary debates, valuable not as the effusions of orators, but as the bold composition of a man of genius on such subjects as were supposed to engage the legislators of the age. In 1738 he published his London, a poem, in imitation of Juvenal's third satire, which was well received, and honored with the commendation of Pope, and passed to a second edition in one week. Though distinguished as an author, Johnson still felt the pressure of poverty, and therefore he applied for a school in Leicestershire; but though recommended by lord Gower, he was disappointed, as he had not the requisite degree of M. A. His attempts to be admitted at Doctors' Commons, without academical honors, proved equally unsuccessful; and therefore he determined to depend on the efforts of his pen for subsistence. Besides his valuable contributions to the Gentleman's magazine, he in 1744 published the life of Savage, a work of great merit, which, in the elegant language of pathetic narration, exhibited the sufferings and the poverty of a friend, whose calamities he himself had shared and bewailed. He began in 1747, his edition of Shakespeare, and published the plan of his English dictionary. This gigantic work was undertaken under the patronage of the booksellers; and the lexicographer engaged a house in Gough-square, where, with the assistance of six amanuenses, he proceeded rapidly in the execution of his plan. This great work, so valuable to the nation, and so honorable to the talents of the author, appeared, May, 1755, in 2 vols. without a patron. Lord Chesterfield, who had at first favored the undertaking, but had afterwards neglected the author, endeavoured, by a flattering recommendation of the work in "the World," to reconcile himself to his good opinion; but Johnson, with noble indignation, spurned at the mean artifice of his courtly patron; and his celebrated letter reflected, with independent spirit and in severe language, against his selfish and ambitious views. The dictionary produced 1755. but as the money had been advanced during the composition of the work, there was no solid advantage to be procured on the publication, and fame could ill satisfy the demands of creditors, and supply bread to the indigent author. In 1749 the Irene had been brought forward on the stage, by the friendship of Garrick, but with no success. The Rambler was undertaken 20th March, 1750, and till the 17th March, 1752, when it ceased, a paper had regularly appeared every Tuesday and Saturday; and it is remarkable that, during the whole of that time, only five numbers were contributed by other authors. But these publications, popular as they were, still left Johnson in distressed circumstances; and in 1756, the year after the publishing of his dictionary, he was arrested for a debt of five guineas, from which the kindness of Richardson relieved him. In 1758 he began the Idler, and continued it for two years with little assistance; and on the death of his mother in 1759, that he might pay some decent respect to her funeral, and discharge her debts, he wrote his Rasselas, and obtained for it, from the booksellers, the sum of 100*l*. Happily, however, these high services to literature, were not to pass unrewarded: in 1762 he was honorably presented by the king, on the representation of Mr. Wedderburne, with a pension of 300*l*. per annum, without a stipulation of future exertions, but merely, as the grant expressed it, for the moral tendency of his writings, a character to which his Rambler was most fully entitled. From public motives, and not from obsequious flattery, Johnson afterwards became a political writer, and his "False Alarm," and his "Thoughts on the Falkland Islands," displayed, in a very striking degree, the great powers of his mind in the defence of the measures of the court. These services first suggested the idea of introducing him into the House of Commons; but lord North did not attend with sufficient respect to the recommendations of Mr. Strahan, and of other gentlemen, who wished to see the gigantic powers, and the commanding elocution of this literary hero, exerted in parliament, and the proposal was dropped. In 1775 Johnson was complimented by the university of Oxford with the degree of LL. D. by diploma, as he had before received from them the degree of A. M. and the same honors from Trinity college, Dublin; and the circumstance reflected equal credit on those who bestowed, and on him who accepted the high distinction. In 1777 he began his Lives of the Poets, which he finished in 1781, a work of great merit, and which exhibits, in the most pleasing manner, the soundness of the critic, the information of the biographer, and the benevolent views of the man. In 1781 the loss of his friend, Mr. Thrale, in whose hospitable house and society he had passed 15 of the happiest years of his life, affected him much; he found his health gradually declining, from the united attacks of the dropsy, and of an asthma; and while he expressed a wish to remove to the milder climates of France and Italy, it is to be lamented that the applications of his friends for the increase of his pension proved abortive. During the progressive increase of his complaints, he divided his time in acts of devotion, and in classical recreations; and during his sleepless nights, he translated several of the Greek epigrams of the Anthologia into Latin verse. It is remarkable, that Johnson, whose pen was ever employed in recommending piety, and all the offices of the purest morality; and whose conduct and example in life exhibited the most perfect pattern of the christian virtues; should, in the close of life, betray dreadful apprehensions of death. By degrees, indeed, the terrors which his imagination had painted to itself, disappeared; but still his example teaches us, that if the most virtuous and devout view the approach of death with trembling and alarm, the unrepented sins of life have much to apprehend from the all-searching eye of God. Johnson expired on the 13th Dec. 1784, full of resignation, strong in faith, and joyful in hope of a happy resurrection. His remains were deposited in Westminster abbey, near the grave of his friend Garrick; and the nation has paid an honorable tribute to his memory, by erecting to him a monument in St. Paul's, with an elegant and nervous epitaph from the pen of Dr. Parr. By his wife, who died March, 1752, and was deeply lamented by him, Johnson had no issue. His works are very numerous, and all respectable. Some of his smaller pieces were published by sir J. Hawkins in 1787, with his life in 11 vols. 8vo. and of these an edition, by Murphy, appeared in 1792, in 12 vols. 8vo. His letters, and every particular respecting his character, conduct, opinion, connections, &c. have engaged the attention of the public, in the various publications of Mr. G. Strahan, Mrs. Piozzi, and others, and particularly in the interesting and valuable account of his life by Boswell, with whom he travelled to the Hebrides, of which he gave an account in 1773. In his person, Johnson was large, corpulent, and unwieldy, with little of the graces of polished life, occasionally offensive by involuntary or convulsive motions, and in his dress, singular and slovenly. His conversation, however, made atonement for the deficiencies of his personal appearance, and though from the superior powers of his mind, the great independence of his character, and the gigantic vigor of his genius, he was positive, and very impatient of contradiction, he was ever interesting and instructive, and exhibited at all times great goodness of heart, unshaken steadiness of principle, and commanding benignity. Humane, charitable, generous, and affectionate, with all his little defects of temper, it may truly be said, that there was scarce a virtue in principle which he did not possess. His goodness flowed from the heart, and his religion was the pure stream from the fount, humble, devout, contrite and pious. As a literary character, his name stands on very high ground; correctness, elegance, and variety every where clothed under a strong and nervous style, captivate, enliven, and edify. The powers of a sound, and matured judgment, of a vigorous imagination, and a most retentive memory, were happily united to illustrate what was obscure, to render pleasing what was harsh and unseemly, to explain what was difficult, and to embellish what was devoid of grace, of beauty, or of attraction. Besides the instructive account of his life by Boswell, much information may be collected from the labors of Hawkins, Murphy, Anderson, &c.

JOHNSTON, Arthur, a physician, born at Caskieben, near Aberdeen. After studying at Aberdeen, he went to Rome, and to Padua, where he took the degree of M.D. 1610. He next travelled through Italy, Germany, Denmark, England and Holland, and at last settled in France, where he had by two wives, 13 children. After distinguishing himself as a Latin poet at Paris, he returned after 24 years' absence, to Scotland, in 1632, and was then introduced to Laud, who at that time was in the north with Charles I. He dedicated his poetical paraphrase of David's psalms, to his patron, by whose interest he was made physician to the king. He visited in 1641, one of his daughters, who was married at Oxford, and being seized with a violent diarrhoea, died there in the course of a few days, aged 54. He wrote besides Epigrams — Musæ Aulicæ, &c.

JOHNSTONE, George, known as one of the commissioners, sent with lord Carlisle and Mr. Eden, to treat with the Americans during the war, was the son of a Scotch baronet. He was brought up to the sea service, and was made master and commander 1760, and two years after, post captain, and in 1763 appointed governor of West Florida. He after his return to England, sat in parliament for Cockermouth and Appleby, and fought a duel with lord George Germaine, in consequence of some reflections which he had made in parliament, on his conduct. He also distinguished himself for his zeal in the affairs of the East India company, and for his violent attacks on the conduct of lord Clive. He was author of Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies, particularly in Bengal, 8vo. 1771; and he died 1787.

JOINVILLE, John-Sire de, a French statesman, born of a noble family in Champagne. He became one of the favorite lords in the court of Lewis IX. and was consulted on all occasions with confidence by the monarch. He wrote the History of St. Louis, an interesting work, best edited by Ducange, 1668, folio, and also in 1761, by Melot. He died about 1318, aged nearly 90 years.

IOLLO COCH, a Welch bard, who from 1370 to 1420, was engaged in the court of Owen Glendowr, to rouse his countrymen by his warlike songs against the English.

JOLY, Claude, a French writer, born at Paris 1607. He was canon of the cathedral, and also precentor. He died in consequence of a fall into a trench, made for the foundation of a high altar in his church, 1700, at the great age of 93. He published a collection of maxims for the Education of a Prince, against the false Politics of Mazarine, burnt by the hands of the hangman, 1665 — Codicil d'Or, on the same subject, &c.

JOLY, Guy, the secretary, and faithful friend of Cardinal de Retz, was author of "Memoirs of his Times," from 1641 to 1665.

JONAH, the fifth of the minor prophets, flourished under Joash and Jeroboam, kings of Israel. When he refused to go to Nineveh, and fled in a ship to Tarshish, he was during a dreadful storm, thrown, at his own request, into the sea, and after being three days swallowed by a large fish, he was cast out on dry land. His preaching to the Ninevites was attended by their conversion. The gourd, the sudden decay of which he bitterly lamented, while he disregarded the fate of the thousands of Nineveh, is supposed by some to be the plant called Palma Christi. He died about 761 B. C.

JONAS, Anagrimus, a learned Icelander, the astronomical coadjutor of Gundeband, bishop of Holum, in Iceland, the pupil of Tycho Brahe. On the death of his friend, he refused to succeed him in his diocese, but remained in the humble but peaceful situation of minister of Melftadt. In his 86th year he took for his second wife, a young girl, and died about nine years after, 1640. His works were Idea Veri Magistratus, 1589, 8vo. — Brevis Commentarius de Islandia, 1593, 8vo. — Anatome Blekeniana, &c. 1612 — Epistola pro Patria Defensoria, 1618 — Vita Gundebandi, 1630, 4to. — Crymogæa, &c. 1630, 4to. — Specimen Islandiæ, &c. 1634, 4to.

JONAS, Justus, a learned divine, born at Northausen, in Thuringia. He was the friend, and the able defender of Luther and of his doctrines. He was principal of the college of Wittenberg, for some time, and died 1555, aged 62.

JONATHAN, son of Saul, and the faithful friend of David, was slain in battle with his father by the Philistines, B. C. 1055.

JONATHAN, a general of the jews, son of Matthias, and brother to Judas Maccabeus, after defeating Bacchides, the Syrian chief, and Demetrius Soter, and his general Apollonius, was at last treacherously seized by Tryphon, and cruelly put to death, though a large ransom had been paid for his liberation, B. C.

JONES, Inigo, a celebrated architect, born 1572, in the vicinity of St. Paul's, London, where his father was a cloth-worker. He was apprenticed to a joiner, and his attention to his business, and his improvement in the art of designing, gradually recommended him, and the earl of Pembroke, sensible of his great natural genius, generously enabled him to travel over Italy, and the best part of Europe. While on his travels he was noticed at Venice by Christian IV. king of Denmark, and he returned to England in the train of that monarch. He soon gained the protection of the English court, he was made architect to the queen, and to prince Henry, but when he succeeded to the reversion of surveyor-general of the king's works, he with unusual generosity, refused to accept any salary, till the heavy debts contracted under his predecessor, had been totally liquidated. In 1620 he was directed by the king, when at lord Pembroke's at Wilton, to examine the group of stones, called Stone Henge, and after deep research, and exact measurement he concluded, that this venerable pile is nothing but a Roman temple, dedicated to Cælus, and erected between the times of Agricola and Constantine. He was also that same year, appointed one of the commissioners for repairing St. Paul's cathedral, and he continued in the same honorable appointments under Charles I. He was also made manager of the masques and interludes in fashion in those times of pomp and pageantry, and it was in this office, that he unfortunately quarrelled with Ben Jonson, who with all the virulence of an enraged poet, ridiculed his friend in the character of Lantern Leather-head, in the comedy of Bartholomew fair, and in other pieces. Notwithstanding these attacks of private malevolence, which were disgusting not only to the friends of both parties, but even to the king, Jones, increased in fame, in popularity, and in opulence. The troubles of the nation, however, affected him deeply, he was not only grieved for the misfortunes of a kind master, but his property was plundered on account of his loyalty, and after the king's death, he was obliged to pay 400l. as a composition to Cromwell. Worn out with years, and with grief at the public calamities, he died 1652, and was buried in St. Bennet's church, St. Paul's wharf, where the monument erected to his memory, was greatly defaced by the fatal fire of 1666. Though sprung from a low origin, Jones so improved the native powers of his mind, that he became an excellent mathematician, a tolerable scholar in Greek and Latin, a decent poet, and to the highest celebrity in architecture, added an extensive knowledge of all human sciences. Besides the repairing of St. Paul's, in a style of commanding grandeur, and national dignity, he displayed his abilities in the design of the palace of Whitehall, in the erection of the banqueting house, of Catherine's chapel in St. James's palace, the church and piazza of Covent-garden, and other private buildings.

His "Stone Henge restored," was published 1655, in folio, by Mr. Webb, his friend and heir, and in 1665, appeared "a Vindication" of the work, reprinted in 1725. Several designs of his buildings are preserved in Campbell's Vitruvius Britannicus. The principal part of his designs were published by Kent, 1727, folio, and other inferior designs in 1744. He left in MS. some valuable notes on Palladio's architecture, published 1714, by Leoni.

JONES, William, a learned mathematician, born 1675, in the isle of Anglesey. He taught mathematics in London, and had in the number of his pupils, lords Hardwicke and Macclesfield. By the friendship and influence of lord Hardwicke, he obtained a sinecure of 200l. a year, and afterwards succeeded to the more lucrative office of deputy teller in the exchequer. His abilities mean time recommended him to the notice of the learned. He was the friend of Newton; and the correspondent of the greatest mathematicians of Europe. He died in easy circumstances, in 1749, but it is to be lamented, that the work which he had completed with great and intense labor, as an introduction to the mathematical and philosophical compositions of Newton, has been lost. The author had just completed it when attacked by illness, and he had just time, before he expired, to send it fairly written, by an amanuensis to his friend, lord Macclesfield, recommending the publication for the benefit of his family. The work, however, was forgotten, and at lord Macclesfield's death, the manuscript could no where be found. The works of Mr. Jones were a compendium of the Art of Navigation, 8vo. 1702 — Synopsis Palmariorum Matheseos, 8vo. 1706, several papers in the philosophical transactions, and other works to support the doctrines of his friend Newton, against the attacks of Leibnitz, and other philosophers.

JONES, for William, a learned judge, son of the preceding, was born in London, 1748. The early loss of his father was supplied by the attentive care of his mother, a woman of high character for sensibility and understanding, and he was placed at Harrow school, where he acquired such perfect knowledge of classical learning, that Dr. Sumner, the master, declared that he knew Greek better than himself. He entered at University college, Oxford, in 1764, and devoted himself laboriously to the study of the oriental languages. He became at the age of 19, tutor to lord Althorpe, and though he paid due attention to his pupil, he yet found time to read the best part of the old testament in the original, while resident at Wimbledon. He visited the continent in 1769, with his pupil, and in 1770, entered at the temple to study the law. Deservedly distinguished as an able scholar, he now proved to the world, how usefully he had devoted himself to literature, and he published in 1774, his Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, dedicated to the university of Oxford. His translation of Iſæus, with learned notes, appeared in 1779, and the next year he felt for the safety of the empire, and in consequence of the London riots, published an inquiry into the legal mode of suppressing riots. In 1793 his legal knowledge, and his acquaintance with the literature of the east, recommended him to the ministry, as a fit person to preside in the supreme court.

court of Calcutta, and on that occasion, he received the honor of knighthood, and soon after, married Anna Maria Shipley, the bishop of St. Asaph's daughter. He left England in April 1793, and on his arrival in India, he was enabled to establish an Asiatic society, for the purpose of illustrating the history, learning, and antiquities of the east. To the memoirs of this learned body, the formation of which his active mind had planned, in his voyage from Europe, he made most valuable contributions. When disengaged from the occupations of his judicial office, he unbent all the powers of his comprehensive mind, to the literature of the east, and he acquired such an acquaintance with the Sanscrit language, and the code of the Bramins, that he was courted and admired by the most learned and intelligent of the native Indians. To enlarge our knowledge of Asiatic history, and Eastern literature, was not however the sole object of his active mind, he was a pious and a sincere christian, and his researches were equally directed to investigate and to prove from oriental books, and from the various traditions of the heathen natives, the great historical facts, and important details contained in the holy scriptures. In one of his discourses to the Asiatic society, he has evinced his attachment to the religion of his country, and his belief in her sacred tenets, by supporting the validity of the Mosaic history of the creation, in a manner more satisfactory and more convincing than any other writer. This great and good man, from whom so much was expected still, in the paths of oriental science and literature, who deserved so well of his country, and of her Asiatic colonies, by his firmness, his legal knowledge, and his unshaken integrity, was snatched away after a short illness at Calcutta, 27th April 1794, aged 48. His remains were interred in the burial ground at Calcutta, where an English inscription by himself, and a Latin one by his brother judge, sir William Dunkin, mark the spot. An elegant monument has lately been erected in St. Paul's cathedral, which does no less honor to his merits than to the munificence and liberal sentiments of the East India directors, by whom it was raised. The works of sir William have been published in 6 vols. 4to. 1799, and prove him not only an elegant scholar, but a good poet, an able critic, and an indefatigable historian, whose name must be revered wherever virtue and literature are cultivated. His life has been written by his friend, lord Teignmouth, 4to. 1804.

JONES, William, an English divine, born at Lowick, Northamptonshire, 1726, and educated at the charter-house and university college, Oxford, where he obtained an exhibition. After entering into orders he took the curacy of Finedon, Northamptonshire, where he wrote his answer to bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit. In 1754 he married the daughter of the Rev. Brook Bridges, and became curate to his brother-in-law, at Wadenhoe, where he wrote his catholic Doctrine of the Trinity, a work of merit. In 1764 he was presented by Secker to Betherfden vicarage, Kent, and afterwards he went to reside at Nayland, Suffolk, till on the elevation of Dr. Horne, to the see of Norwich, he became domestic chaplain to his old and venerable friend. He afterwards was invited by lord Kenyon to undertake the tuition of his two sons, and in 1798 he was presented by the archbishop to the living of Hollingbourne, in Kent. As a divine, Mr. Jones was a pious and exemplary character. He espoused the tenets of the Hutchinsonian system, as he evinced in his Essay on the first principles of Natural Philosophy, published in 1762, and completed in his Physiological disquisitions, or Discourses on the Natural Philosophy of the Elements, 1781. During the French revolution, he ably supported the government of the country, by some seasonable and well written pamphlets, particularly an excellent collection of tracts, called the Scholar Armed, 2 vols. 8vo. He also published 2 vols. of sermons in 1790. This worthy man died 6th Jan. 1801. His works have been collected together and published in 12 vols. 8vo. with a full account of his life. For some time he held Pluckley rectory, in Kent, which he exchanged for Pafton, in Northamptonshire. His Memoirs of his pious friend bishop Horne, is an interesting performance, and does honor to his head and heart.

JONES, Henry, a poet, born at Drogheda, in Ireland. He was bred a bricklayer, but nature formed him for a poet, and after he had distinguished himself by his productions in the midst of his humble mechanical employment; he was introduced to lord Chesterfield, when lord lieutenant, in 1745. That nobleman, pleased with his poetical effusions, brought him over to London on his return from Ireland, and by his influence, procured a liberal subscription to the poems of his humble friend. He also recommended him strongly to Colley Cibber, he prevailed upon the managers of Covent garden, to introduce his plays on the stage, and nearly secured the reversion of the laurel for his brow; but while the patron was kind and generous, the poet was fickle, violent, prodigal, and capricious. After various vicissitudes of fortune, the consequence of imprudence and folly, he died in great want, April 1770, in a garret of the Bedford coffee-house. Though not a poet of superior reputation, he possessed merit. His "Earl of Essex," by no means a contemptible performance, appeared in 1753.

JONES, Jeremiah, a dissenting divine, educated under his uncle, Sam. Jones, of Tewkesbury, who had among his pupils, bishops Butler, Chandler, and Secker. He kept a school at Nailsworth, and presided over a dissenting congregation at Avening, Gloucestershire, and in his manners was an amiable, easy and affable man. He wrote a Vindication of the former part of St. Matthew's Gospel, against Whiston's charge of dislocations, &c. 1719 — a new method of settling the canonical authority of the old testament, 3 vols. 8vo. 1726, lately reprinted, Oxford. He died 1724, aged 31.

JONES, Paul, a native of Selkirk, in Scotland, who settled in America, and by embracing the independent principles of his new country, became a formidable enemy to the trading interests of Britain. He obtained in 1775, a commission from congress, and by his bravery, was made the next year, captain of marines. Well acquainted with the coasts of Ireland and Scotland, he came to Europe, to infect the trade of the country, and made a descent at Whitehaven, where he destroyed the shipping of the harbour, and afterwards on the estates of lord Selkirk, whose plate and furniture he carried away in triumph. After taking the Drake sloop of war, off Carrickfergus, he retired to Brest, and with a fresh reinforcement, with the Pallas, Richard, and Vengeance, he again scoured the Irish sea, and advancing round the island, attacked the Baltic fleet, and took the Serapis frigate, and the Countess of Scarborough armed ship, after a gallant action off Flamborough head. These bold exploits made him a favorite, not only in America, but in France, where the king presented him with a handsome gold hilted sword, and made him a knight of the military order of merit. The peace put an end to his depredations and glory. He died at Paris 1792, where he had come from America, for the settlement of his private affairs.

JONES, John, a Benedictine monk, born in London, and educated at Merchant Taylor's, and St. John's college, Oxford. As he was inclined to the Roman catholic faith, he went to Spain, and took the name of Leander de Santo Martino, with the degree of D. D. He was afterwards made Hebrew and divinity professor, and vicar-general of his order, and died in London 1636. He wrote Sacra Ars Memoriae ad Scripturas divinas in promptu habendas, &c. accommodata, 8vo. — Conciliatio Locorum Communium totius Scripturae, — the Bible with a glossary, 6 vols. fol. &c.

JONES, David, a native of Caernarvonshire, who died about 1780. He wrote some poetical pieces of merit, and edited two collections of Welch poetry, and made besides, a collection of ancient Welch MSS.

JONES, John, a Welch antiquary, known for his collecting, and his transcribing of old Welch MSS. on which he bestowed the labor of above 40 years. Fifty large volumes are still preserved, bearing the date of 1590 to 1630.

JONES, Rice, a Welch poet, born in Merionethshire. He published Welch Anthology, 4to. 1770, containing selections from the poets of various ages. He died 1801, aged 86.

JONES, Griffith, an English writer, editor of the London Chronicle, and connected with Johnson, in the literary magazine, and with Smollet and Goldsmith in the British magazine. He was a very amiable character, and projected with his brother, those various and entertaining books which are now become so fashionable, as well as valuable for the improvement of young minds. He died 1786, aged 65.

JONES, John, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He wrote a play called Adrasta, or the Woman's Spleen.

JONES, John, a medical writer, born, says Dr. Aikin, in Wales. He took his medical degree at Cambridge, and practised with reputation in Bath, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire. He wrote the Dial of Ages, 1556 — the Benefit of ancient Baths, 1572 — a brief Discourse of the natural beginning of all growing and living things, &c. 1574 — Galen's Elements translated. He died about 1580.

JONES, sir William, judge of the king's bench, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. was author of Reports in his court, and in that of common pleas.

JONES, sir Thomas, a judge of the king's bench, under Charles II. and James II. author of some reports. When James wished to assert the dispensing power, and said he could soon have 12 judges of his opinion; True, answered sir Thomas, you may have 12 judges, but not 12 lawyers.

JONES, Richard, a Welchman, the ingenious author of "Gemma Cambrium," in Welch, which contained in clear brevity, all the books and chapters of the bible, published 1652. He was admitted at Jesus college, Oxford, 1621, and died in Ireland; but when is unknown.

JONG, Ludolph de, a Dutch painter, who died 1697, aged 78. His portraits were finished in a superior style, and by his genius and industry, he amassed a large fortune.

JONGHE, Baldwin, or Junius, a Franciscan monk, born at Dordt, in Holland. He was author of Tuba Concionatorum — Sertum Catholicum fidei, and other works on divinity, and died at Brussels, 1634.

JONIN, Gilbert, a jesuit, known also as an eminent poet. He died at Tournon, 1638, aged 42. He wrote Greek and Latin odes, elegies, &c. with great elegance. He also translated Anacreon into Latin. His works appeared at Lyons, 6 vols. 8vo.

JONSIUS, John, a native of Holstein, who distinguished himself as an elegant writer at Frankfort, on the Maine. He died young, 1659. His Latin treatise, De Scriptoribus Historiae Philosophiae, edited, Jena, 1716, in 4to. is much admired.

JONSON, Benjamin, a celebrated English poet, born at Westminster, 1574. His father, who was a clergyman, and had severely suffered in the reign of Mary, by imprisonment, and by the loss of his property, died about a month before the birth of the poet. He was placed at Westminster school, where Camden was then master, but the imprudent marriage of his mother with a bricklayer, altered his plans of life. He was recalled home to work in his step-father's business, but this so disgusted him, that he enlisted for a soldier, and passed with the army into the Netherlands, where he distinguished himself greatly by his personal valor. On his return to England, he seemed determined to pursue his studies, and entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, but the narrowness of his circumstances cut short his residence in the university, and destitute of resources, he applied for support to the stage. His first appearance was at the Curtain, one of those mean and obscure theatres which then were built in the skirts of the town, but his efforts were ridiculed, and in the most common characters, he was unable to perform with credit. His prospects, however, were soon clouded, he fought a duel with a brother actor, and dispatched him, while he himself received a wound in the arm. He however escaped punishment, as he was discharged from prison, by some means now unknown, though during his confinement, he was prevailed upon by the insinuation of a priest, to become a convert to the church of Rome, in which he continued for 12 years. Soon after this, since he could not shine as an actor, he attempted to write plays, but his efforts at first were unsuccessful, till Shakespeare, who like himself, had felt the feverities of fortune, extended his friendship to him, and not only interested himself in his behalf, but supported his claims to public applause, by acting himself in some of his characters. His first play printed, was, every Man in his Humor, a comedy, which was generally followed by another every year; but when his enemies ridiculed the tardy tardy efforts of his muse, he produced his "Volpone," in five weeks. By joining with Chapman and Marston in writing "Eastward-Hoe," a comedy, he was accused of reflecting on the Scotch nation, and with his two poetical companions was thrown into prison, but upon making due submission they escaped the loss of their ears and noses, and obtained a pardon. As the exhibition of masques was then very popular, the genius and abilities of Jonson were employed for the diversion of the court; he composed in 1603 part of the device, which was to entertain James as he passed from the tower to Westminster abbey on his coronation, and continued during that reign and the beginning of the next, to preside over all the amusements and the pageantry of the royal household. Thus favored by the court, Jonson became a popular character, and by his merit deserved and obtained the friendship of men of taste and literature, of Shakespeare, Beaumont, Fletcher, Donne, Camden, Selden, Corbet, and others. He visited France in 1613, and in 1619 was honorably presented with the degree of M. D. by the university of Oxford. That year he succeeded on the death of Daniel to the place of poet laureat, of which the king, two years before had granted him the reversion, and on his petition his salary of 100 marks was in 1630 augmented to as many pounds. About this time he visited his friend and correspondent Drummond of Hawthornden in Scotland, and celebrated his adventures in a poem which was afterwards unfortunately burnt. Yet though liberally patronized by the king, and handsomely rewarded for his plays and masques, Jonson through carelessness or extravagance was poor. From the solitude of an obscure lodging he solicited and obtained the king's favor, but the gratuity of 100l. from his royal patron averted but for a while the increasing horrors of indigence. He died of the palsy 6th Aug. 1637, in his 63d year, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Over his grave, on a rough pavement stone the gift of Jack Young of Great Milton Oxfordshire, are inscribed these quaint, but expressive words "O rare Ben Jonson." The literary fame of Jonson drew against him a crowd of mean and obscure poetasters who expected gain and reputation by attacking his superior merit; but his funeral obsequies were sung by "the friends of the muses," by lord Falkland, lord Buckhurst, Beaumont, Hawkins, Waller, Cartwright, Mayne, Waryng and others. His works were edited in 1716, in 6 vols. 8vo. and more completely in 7 vols. 8vo. with notes by Mr. Whalley 1756. Jonson was married, and had some children, but none survived him.

JONSTON, John, a Polish naturalist, born at Sambor 1603. He travelled over Europe and died on his estate at Lignitz, Silesia, 1675. He published a natural History of Birds, Fishes, Quadrupeds, Insects, Serpents and Dragons, folio, 1653 — a treatise on Hebrew and Greek Festivals, 1660 — Thaumatrography 1661, &c.

JORAM, king of Israel after his brother Ahaziah B. C. 896. He was delivered from the power of Benhadad the Syrian who besieged his city, but though he acknowledged the interference of God, and the prophetic fame of Elifha, he became an idolator. He was afterwards defeated by Hazael king of Syria and slain by his servant Jehu, as he fled from the battle B. C. 884.

JORAM, king of Judah after his father Jehoshaphat 889. B. C. was drawn into idolatry by the arts of Ahab his father-in-law, whose daughter Athaliah he had married. He was engaged in war with the Edomites who rebelled against him, and with the Philistines who defeated him. He died 885. B. C.

JORDAN, sir Joseph, an English admiral, to whose extraordinary valor his country was indebted for the naval victory of Solebay over the Dutch 1672. The time of his death is unknown.

JORDAN, Charles Stephen, a Prussian writer, vice-president of the academy of sciences at Berlin. He died at Berlin his native city 1746, aged 46, and the king, Frederic the great, not only erected a monument to him with this inscription, "here lies Jordan, the friend of the muses, and of the king," but wrote an eulogy in his praise. Jordan wrote Literary Travels in France, England, and Holland, with Satirical Anecdotes, 8vo. — a Miscellany of Literature, Philosophy, History, &c. — the life of De la Croze; works which some critics do not esteem so highly as his royal friend did.

JORDAN, Thomas, a dramatic author in the reign of Charles I. Two of his comedies and a masque are mentioned with commendation by Langbaine and others.

JORDAN, John Christopher, privy counsellor to the king of Bohemia, was eminent as an antiquary. His notes on the Chronology of Dionysius Hal. Polybius, Diodorus Sic. and Livy are excellent. He died about 1740.

JORDANO, Luca, a celebrated painter, born at Naples 1632. He early studied under his neighbour Joseph Ribera, and displayed such abilities that at the age of seven his pieces were highly respectable. He visited Rome and the other cities of Italy, where he studied and copied the works of the greatest masters, but especially those of Pietro da Cortona, Paul Veronese, L. da Vinci, M. Angelo, and A. del Sarto. He improved upon the beauties of other masters with such effect that he was called by Bellori the ingenious bee who extracted his honey from the flowers of the best artists. His reputation gradually spread not only over Italy, but the rest of Europe, and Charles II. of Spain, was so pleased with his productions, that he invited him in 1692 to adorn the Escorial and the churches and palaces of some of the Spanish cities. Jordano by the excellence and the variety of his pieces, which exceeded in number those of every other painter, even Tintoret, acquired great opulence. He died at Naples 1705, and a monument was erected to him in St. Bridget church before the chapel of St. Nicolas de Bari which had been beautifully adorned by his pencil. In his private character he was very amiable, he was benevolent in his conduct, friendly to his pupils, and to great affability united a remarkable flow of wit and humor.

JORDANS, James, a painter, born at Antwerp 1594. He was instructed in his art by Adam Van Oort, and Rubens, and to the excellence of the best masters added a deep and correct study of nature. His early marriage riage with the daughter of Oort his master, prevented his visiting Italy; but application and genius supplied every deficiency. In his pieces he displayed great judgment and correctness; his manner was bold, yet graceful; striking, yet natural. His works adorned the public buildings of some of the cities of Flanders, and he also labored for the kings of Sweden and Denmark. He was a pleasant and agreeable companion, easy in his manners, and lively in his conversation. He died at Antwerp 1678, aged 84.

JORDEN, Edward, an English physician, born 1569 at High Halden, Kent, and educated at Hart hall, Oxford. He studied in foreign universities, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. On his return he practised in London, and was member of the college of physicians, but his attempts to manufacture allum proved injurious to his fortune. The latter part of his life was spent at Bath, where he died of the gout and stone, Jan. 1632. He wrote a Discourse on the Disease called the Suffocation of the Mother, 4to. — Discourse on Natural Baths and Mineral Waters, 4to. 1631, reprinted by Guidott with a treatise on the Bath Waters, &c. 1649.

JORNANDES, author of a book de Rebus Gothicis, et de Origine Mundi, et de Rerum et Temporum Successione 1617, 8vo. was a Goth in the reign of Justinian.

JORTIN, John, an English divine, born in London 23d Oct. 1698. His father was of French origin, and came to England when toleration was not allowed to the protestants of France. Young Jortin was educated at the Charter-house, and in 1715 he entered at Jesus college, Cambridge. He was engaged two years after at the recommendation of his tutor Dr. Thirlby, in making extracts from Eustathius for Pope's Homer, but though his services were approved, he never was introduced to the poet. In 1722 he published "Lusus Poetici," some Latin poems which were well received by his friends, and in 1726-7 as being fellow of his society he was presented to the college living of Swavesey, near Cambridge, which he resigned in 1728 upon marrying, and came to settle in London where he resided for 25 years. He at first officiated at a chapel in Bloomsbury, and in 1737 obtained the living of Eastwell, Kent, which he soon resigned on account of the insalubrious air of the place. In 1746 he was made afternoon preacher to Oxendon chapel, and the next year he became assistant to Dr. Warburton at Lincoln's Inn. In 1749 he was appointed to preach Boyle's lectures, and in 1751 he was made rector of St. Dunstan in the East by Herring the primate, who four years after conferred on him the degree of D. D. In 1762 he became chaplain to Osbaldeston bishop of London, who gave him a prebend in St. Paul's, the living of Kensington, and in 1764 the archdeaconry of London. He died after a short illness, Sep. 5, 1770, and was buried in Kensington new church-yard, leaving a widow and a son and a daughter. Dr. Jortin respectable as a divine and as a man, was deservedly esteemed as a polite scholar and an able orator. His publications were numerous and highly valuable. He published in 1730, four sermons on the Truth of the Christian Religion, afterwards incorporated in his Discourses on the Truth of the Christian Religion, 8vo. 1746 — Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern, 2 vols. 8vo. — Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, 8vo. 1751, continued in four succeeding volumes down to 1517, — the era of the reformation — Six Dissertations on Different Subjects, 8vo. 1755 — Life of Erasmus, 4to. 1758 — Remarks on the Works of Erasmus, 4to. 1760, besides other inferior works. In 1771 four volumes of his sermons were published by his son, and inscribed to his parishioners of St. Dunstan's, republished with 3 vols. more, 1772, &c.

JOSEPH, son of Jacob by Rachel, was the favorite of his father, and consequently was exposed to the envy and hatred of his brothers, who at last sold him as a slave to some Midianitish merchants, by whom he was carried into Egypt. In Egypt by his prudence, and virtue, and under the protecting hand of providence, he rose to become the governor of the country, and he saw, during the famine which prevailed in the land and in Canaan, his brothers prostrate themselves before him according to the fulfilling of his dreams. He afterwards sent for his father and his family to settle in the land of Goshen, and after governing the nation with wisdom and success he died about 1636 B. C. His bones were brought out of Egypt by Moses, and buried in Canaan. Joseph had two sons Ephraim and Manasseh who became heads of two tribes in Israel.

JOSEPH, husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the lineage of David. He was son of Jacob according to St. Matthew, or according to St. Luke of Heli, a difference which is explained by recollecting that Heli and Jacob were brothers, and that after the death of Heli Jacob married agreeable to the law of Moses, his brother's widow and became father of Joseph.

JOSEPH, of Arimathea, a man of opulence and a counsellor, who became privately a disciple of our Saviour. After the crucifixion he buried the body of his master in a new tomb, and then joined himself to the apostles. He died at Jerusalem.

JOSEPH I. 15th emperor of the house of Austria, was born at Vienna 28th July, 1678. He was crowned king of Hungary 1687, elected king of the Romans 1690, and in 1705 on the death of his father Leopold he succeeded to the empire of Germany. Pursuing the same political measures as his father, he engaged England, Savoy and Holland in his war against France, to raise the archduke Charles to the throne of Spain, and then exerting his power as head of the Germanic empire he deprived the electors of Bavaria and of Cologne of their dominions for assisting his enemies, and in the most despotic manner he divided their possessions among his friends and relations. Thus absolute in Germany, he turned his arms against Italy, and not only Mantua, Parma, Modena, Lucca and Genoa, but even Etruria, Sicily and Naples became obedient to his dictates. From Italy he marched against the Hungarian insurgents headed by the brave prince Ragotzki whom he defeated and obliged to fly into Turkey. His successes were stopped by the attack of the small pox which proved fatal 17th April, 1711, in his 33d year.

JOSEPH II. emperor of Germany, son of Leopold and Maria Theresa, was born 13th March, 1741, elected king of the Romans 1764, and crowned emperor the following year on the decease of his father. He was in his conduct actuated by the most benevolent motives to improve the prosperity of his country; and to be acquainted with the wants and situation of his subjects he travelled over the greatest part of his dominions. In Croatia he facilitated the commercial intercourse of his Hungarian subjects by the forming of a high road between Zing and Carlstadt; at Venice, he settled in an amicable manner the boundaries of his kingdom and those of the republic, and in Bohemia he administered to the wants of his people and checked the ravages of the famine which the troubles of Poland had caused. He afterwards had two interviews with the king of Prussia whose great military character he highly admired, but unfortunately these visits ended in a mutual plan for the violent seizure of part of the Polish provinces. In 1781 he passed into France, but he disregarded the pompous ceremonies with which the court wished to receive him, and found greater pleasure and more sincere satisfaction in examining the curiosities of Paris, the manufactures of Lyons, and the canals of Picardy. Anxious to listen to the complaints of the unfortunate, he often disguised himself to converse with obscure individuals and to relieve their distresses; and that every opportunity might be indulged of displaying his humanity he appointed one day in the week in which he would receive petitions even from the meanest beggar. In 1780 he succeeded by the death of the empress queen, to the crowns of Hungary and Bohemia, and soon after published decrees in favor of the liberty of the press and of toleration. The respect and attachment to his person which the Flemings had displayed was repayed by his improvements in the harbour of Ostend at his own expence, and by his declaring the place a free port. His attempts however to render the navigation of the Scheldt free, though favored by Lewis XVI. met with opposition from the Hollanders who viewed with jealousy the rise of a rival in the commerce of Antwerp. With his usual humanity Joseph saw and pitied the state of the peasants through his states, and therefore slavery was abolished in Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia; and with equal boldness in favor of spiritual freedom he published an edict to disclaim the secular submission of his subjects to the see of Rome, and to suppress some of the monasteries. This severe attack excited the alarm of the pope; but the journey of Pius VI. to Vienna could not reconcile the emperor, or abolish his decree, and soon after, in 1786, the ecclesiastical princes at Ratisbon determined to withdraw from the temporal jurisdiction of Rome. His visit to the empress of Russia at Cherson in the mean time did not only tend to ensure the partition of Poland, but aimed at the expulsion of the Turks from Europe. But though an humane prince, Joseph was not a warrior; he indeed reduced Schabatz in person, but his troops were defeated under prince Lichtenstein, and the dreadful battle of Rohadin which lasted four days proved fatal to his views, and the siege of Belgrade was abandoned. Laudohn indeed by his valor and great experience restored confidence among the imperialists, and by the taking of Darbicza, Novi, and Belgrade, contributed to the glory of his master's arms, which ill success hitherto had tarnished. The war, however, was unpopular, and a peace hastily concluded left the emperor the opportunity of attending to the discontents and tumults which had now been excited in the Netherlands. Before these could be checked Joseph fell a sacrifice to a lingering disease, and died 20th Feb. 1790. He was succeeded by his brother Leopold. Though admired for his benevolence, Joseph has been blamed by some historians for his fondness of innovation, and for the formation of plans which he had not the wisdom to complete, or the firmness to execute.

JOSEPH, king of Portugal, of the family of Braganza, ascended the throne 1750, and died 24th Feb. 1777, aged 62 years and eight months. His reign was turbulent and unfortunate. Lisbon was swallowed in 1755 by an earthquake, and in 1758 a violent conspiracy was formed against the monarch whose life was saved by the personal courage of his coachman, and in consequence of this, the jesuits who had meditated the assassination, were expelled from the kingdom and their property confiscated. Afterwards the king quarrelled with the court of Rome, and in 1761 a war was kindled against Spain, in which he was assisted by the English. In the latter part of his reign he resigned the reins of government into the hands of his queen, Mary Anne of Spain.

JOSEPH MEIR, a learned rabbi, born at Avignon 1496. He died near Genoa 1554. He wrote an Hebrew book on the annals of the kings of France and the Ottoman sultans, &c.

JOSEPH, Ben Gorion, a Jewish historian, who abridged the history of Josephus, with whom he is often confounded by the rabbins. He flourished in the 10th century. His works appeared with a Latin version by Gagnier, Oxford, 1706, 8vo. — and in Hebrew and Latin, Gotha, 1707, 4to.

JOSEPH, of Paris, a capuchin, the friend and confidant of Richelieu. His services were such in the employment of emissaries, that Lewis XIII. procured him a cardinal's hat, which he did not live to receive. He died of an apoplexy at Ruel, 1638. His life has been frequently written and contains curious particulars.

JOSEPH, Father, an apostate monk, who under the assumed name of Joshua and at the head of 6000 banditti attempted in 1678 to extirpate the catholic religion in Hungary. After committing the greatest enormities his followers were dispersed upon the sudden death of their leader.

JOSEPHUS, Flavius, a celebrated Jewish historian, who studied at Rome, and afterwards bravely defended a small town of Judæa against Vespasian for seven weeks. He was taken into the favor of the emperor, and was with him at the siege of Jerusalem, where he alleviated the misfortunes of his country, and obtained all the sacred books in the booty. He wrote the History of the wars of the Jews in Greek — the Antiquities of the Jews — a Defence of the Jews — books of very great merit and best edited by Havercamp, Amsterdam, 2 vols. folio, 1725. He died A. D. 93 aged 56.

JOSHUA, son of Nun, and of the tribe of Benjamin, was appointed by Moses as his successor to conduct the people of Israel into the possession of the land of Canaan. He died B. C. 1424, aged 110.

JOSIAH, king of Judah after his father Ammon 641 B. C. is celebrated for the zeal with which he restored the law of Moses, and destroyed idolatry. He died B. C. 610, aged 39, in consequence of the wounds which he received in a battle at Megiddo against Necho king of Egypt.

JOUBERT Laurence, a physician, born at Valence in Dauphiny 1530. He studied at Paris and at Rome, and afterwards settled at Montpellier, where he became, after Rondelet's death, Regius professor 1567. His reputation was so great that nothing was considered as too difficult for his art, so that Henry III. sent for him to consult him how he might render his marriage prolific, which however was unavailing. He died 1582. His writings are in French, and in Latin, and all on his profession; the best edition of which is 1645, 2 vols. folio.

JOUBERT, Francis, a priest of Montpellier who was confined in the bastille for his attachment to the doctrines of the Jansenists. He died 1763, aged 74. He is author of a commentary on revelations, and other works.

JOUBERT, Bartholomew Catharine, a native of Pont-de-Vaux, in the department of Ain, born 14th April 1769, and bred up to the law. The revolution altered his pursuits, and panting for military glory he entered into the army, and from a grenadier rose to the rank of general. He was second in command under Bonaparte in the conquest of Italy, and signalized himself at the battles of Millefino, Ceva, Montebaldo, Rivoli and in the Tyrol. His valor and presence of mind were such that Bonaparte going to Egypt emphatically told the directory, I leave you Joubert. He was afterwards opposed to the Russians under Suwarrow, at the battle of Novi, but was killed at the beginning of the engagement 1799, leaving behind him the character, not only of a great general, but of an amiable man.

JOYANUS, Flavius Claudius, a native of Panonia, made emperor after Julian's death, an honor which he accepted upon the promise of the army to become christians. He made a dishonorable peace with the Persians, and was accidentally suffocated by charcoal which had been placed in his room, seven months after his elevation to the throne 364 A. D.

JOVINIAN, a monk of Milan who became the head of a sect, who maintained that our Saviour's body was not real flesh, but a phantom. He enlarged the number of his followers by offering violence to women, and by permitting the indulgence of every sensuality, till at last Honorius ordered him to be whipped and sent into banishment. He died in Dalmatia in consequence of his debauchery, 406. A. D. His works were attacked by Jerome.

JOVIUS, Paul, an eminent historian, born at Como in Italy 1483. After studying in his native place, he went to Rome for the advantages of the Vatican library in his literary pursuits, and here he wrote his first piece "de Piscibus Romanis," which he dedicated to cardinal de Bourbon. He also attached himself by the meanest flattery to Francis I. king of France, who granted him a pension, which however was discontinued in the reign of the next monarch, through the influence of Montmorency, constable of the kingdom, whom Jovius had offended. The favorable manner in which he had spoken of the house of Medicis in his historical compositions, induced him to hope he might obtain a bishopric from Clement VII: he made the request, and gained the see of Nocera, but under the next pontiff he attempted in vain to obtain the vacant bishopric of his native place, and upon the refusal he retired in discontent to Florence, where he employed himself in the completion of his history. He died 1552, and was buried in St. Laurence's church at Florence. His history containing the events of his own times from 1494 to 1544 was printed 3 vols. folio, Florence 1552, and at Strasburg 1556; but though valuable and interesting, it is to be read with great caution. To great learning Jovius united wit and liveliness, his style was elegant and polished, and his judgment solid. In his private character he was dissolute and licentious, and to a reprehensible degree credulous. There was another Paul Jovius, who from a physician became bishop of Nocera 1585, and distinguished himself as a poet and man of letters.

JOVIUS, Benedictus, brother to the historian, was known as a poet and historical writer.

JOUSSE, Daniel, a lawyer, born at Orleans. He died 1781, aged 77. He wrote some valuable works on his profession.

JOUVENCY, Joseph, a French jesuit, professor of belles lettres at Caen and afterwards at Paris. He died at Rome 1719, aged 76. He defended in his writings the Jesuit Guignard whose works had inflamed Castal to attempt the life of Henry IV. and did not scruple to compare this assassin to our Saviour and the judge who condemned him to Pontius Pilate. He continued the History of the Jesuits from the year 1591 to 1616, but the work was condemned by the parliament of Paris 1713. He wrote besides "Latin orations" an Appendix De Diis & Heroibus Poeticis, and valuable notes on Persius, Juvenal, Ovid, Martial, &c.

JOUVENET, John, a French painter born at Rouen 1641. His family who were distinguished as painters, were of Italian origin. After studying under his father, he went to Paris, and improved himself under Le Brun, and gained the approbation of the academy of painting by presenting them his Esther fainting before Ahasuerus. After passing through all the offices of the academy he was made one of the four perpetual rectors, on the death of Mignard. His paintings are numerous and very valuable, especially his sacred pieces. In his old age he was struck with the palsy in his right side, and then began to use his left hand, with astonishing dexterity and success in the completion of some of his pieces. He died at Paris 1717 leaving no children, but a nephew of great merit in his profession.

JOYEUSE, Anne de, a duke and admiral of France, the favorite of Henry III. He was mild in private life, but as a commander extremely severe. He was killed in an expedition against the Huguenots 1587.

JOYEUSE, Francis de, brother to the above, was a cardinal, and the able and political confidential minister of Henry III. and IV. and Lewis XIII. He founded some public edifices, and died dean of the college of cardinals at Avignon 1615.

JOYNER, William, or Lyde, an English writer born in St. Giles's parish, Oxford, April 1622. He was educated in the schools of Thame, and Coventry, and then entered as demy at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. At the time of the rebellion, he embraced the popish religion and went abroad, and afterwards returned to London. In 1678 he came to live at Horspath near Oxford, but was arrested by the vice-chancellor, as a jesuit; but upon his appearance at the sessions he was discharged and then retired to the obscurity of the village of Ickford in Buckinghamshire. On James' accession he was restored to his fellowship, but was expelled the year after, and died at Ickford 14th Sep. 1706. He wrote the Roman Emperors, a comedy, 1670, 4to. — Observations on Cardinal Pole's Life, 1686. 8vo. — Latin and English poems.

IRELAND, Samuel, an ingenious mechanic in Spitalfields. His skill in drawing and engraving became to him the source of distinction and comfortable independence. He published a picturesque Tour through Holland, France, and Brabant, 1790 — Picturesque Views of the Thames, 8vo. 1792 — Picturesque Views of the Medway, 1793 — Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth, 1794 — Picturesque Views and Account of the Inns of Court. He died 1800. He has been deservedly censured for his attempt to impose upon the world a folio volume which he called a Collection of Letters, Papers, &c. written by Shakespeare. The forgery for some time excited much of the public attention and afterwards his son published a declaration in which he acknowledged himself alone guilty of this attempt to impose upon the good sense of the public.

IRETON, Henry, a republican general in the civil wars. He possessed great abilities, and uncommon valor, and deserved the friendship of Cromwell, whose eldest daughter, Bridget, he married. He was sent to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and died at the siege of Limerick 26th Nov. 1651, much lamented. His body was buried with great pomp in Westminster abbey, but at the restoration it was dug up and exposed on Tyburn gibbet, with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw. His daughter Bridget married Thomas Bendish.

IREVISA, John, vicar of Berkeley, Gloucestershire, was born in Cornwall. At the request of his patron, Thomas lord Berkeley, he translated the "Polychronicon" 1387.

IRNERIUS, called also Wernerus, or Guarnerus, a German lawyer of the 12th century. He studied at Constantinople and Ravenna, and taught at Bologna. He was properly the restorer of the Roman law, and therefore deserved from his numerous pupils the name of "Lucerna Juris." He was the father of the Glossators, and prevailed upon the emperor Lotharius, whose chancellor he was, to introduce the creation of doctors in the universities, an honor which spread from Bologna, where it first had its rise, to the other learned bodies of Europe. He died 1150 and was buried at Bologna.

IRONSIDE, Gilbert, a native of Hawkesbury, educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and made rector of Winterbourn, Dorsetshire. He was author of a Sermon 1660, and of seven questions of the Sabbath, 4to. and at the restoration he was made bishop of Bristol, where he died 1671, aged 83.

ISAAC, son of Abraham and Sarah was born 1896 B. C. His father's faith was tried by an order from heaven to offer this favorite son as a sacrifice on the mountains of Moriah. Isaac was father of Esau the progenitor of the Edomites, and of Jacob the ancestor of the Israelites. He died 1716 B. C.

ISAAC COMMENUS, Greek emperor in the room of Michael Stratioticus 1057. After a prudent but turbulent reign he retired to the solitude of a monastery, leaving the crown to Lucas Constantine, and died two years after, 1061.

ISAAC, Angelus, Greek emperor after Andronicus Comnenus 1185. He was imprisoned and deprived of his sight by his brother Alexius, after whose death he was restored to the throne. He died 1204.

ISAAC, Caro, a rabbi who left Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand, which in 1492 banished the Jews from his dominions, within four months, except they became Christians. He went first to Portugal and then retired to Jerusalem, where he devoted himself to study and solitude. He wrote "the Generations of Isaac" which is a commentary on the Pentateuch of Moses. The book is esteemed, and has passed through several editions, the last of which is at Amsterdam, 1708.

ISAACSON, Henry, a native of London, secretary to bishop Andrews. He compiled a valuable work on Chronology, fol. and died 1654, aged 73.

ISABELLA, daughter of Philip the Fair, king of France, was born 1292. She married, 1308, Edward, afterwards the second of England, but her licentiousness disgraced her character, and embittered the latter part of her life; and her partiality to her favorite, Mortimer, proved so offensive to her son Edward III. that he ordered her to be confined in the castle of Rising, where she languished 28 years of captivity, and died at the age 75.

ISABELLA, of Bavaria, married Charles VI. king of France, 1385. She was a woman of licentious manners, of an intriguing disposition, and of a most vindictive temper. She dishonorably sacrificed her only son to her partiality for the English, and wished for the triumph of Henry V. of England, who had married her sixth daughter Catharine, rather than the prosperity of her country under the government of their natural sovereign. She died little lamented, at Paris, 30th Sept. 1435, aged 64.

ISABELLA, daughter of John II. of Castille, was born 1451, and married 1469 Ferdinand V. king of Arragon. She succeeded to the kingdom of Castille 1474, and though opposed by the pretensions of her niece, she crushed all opposition, and by the union of Castille and Arragon she was with her husband proclaimed sovereign of Spain. She possessed great powers of mind, and was distinguished by her integrity, her justice, and her public and private virtues. Her reign is remarkable for the conquest of Grenada from the Moors, and the discovery of America, by the bold genius of Columbus, but it was disgraced by the introduction of the sanguinary tribunal of the inquisition. Isabella died of a dropy 1504, aged 54, leaving only one daughter, Jane, who married Philip of Austria and became mother of Charles V.

ISABELLA, daughter of Alphonso, duke of Calabria, bria, married by proxy in 1489, John Galeazzo Sforza a minor. The union of these lovers was put off by the intrigues of Lewis Sforza, the uncle and the guardian of the bridegroom, who had himself fallen in love with Isabella; but when his guilty addresses were received with the contempt which they merited, he determined on revenge. By marrying Alphoncina the daughter of the duke of Ferrara, he gained an active accomplice in his criminal intentions, the unfortunate Galeazzo was poisoned, and the disconsolate Isabella fled to Naples, and after seeing the destruction of all her family, she retired to a small town in the neighbourhood, where she died 1524. Her daughter married Sigismund king of Poland.

ISABELLA, sister of Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, married in 1539, John Zopolita, waivode of Transylvania, afterwards king of Hungary. The birth of a son so pleased the father who was engaged in the siege of Fogarra, that he communicated his joy to his army, and in a feast which he gave his soldiers he unfortunately fell a victim to his great intemperance 1540. Thus left unprotected and unable to resist the arms of Ferdinand of Austria, against whom her husband had made war, she in an evil hour called to her aid Solyman the Turkish sultan, who instead of protecting her, seized her capital, and obliged her to fly to Transylvania, of which she was soon after stripped by the great successes of her enemies. She recovered Transylvania in 1556, and died two years after, respected for her magnanimity and courage.

ISÆUS, a Greek orator, born at Chalcis in Eubœa. He had numerous pupils, among whom was Demosthenes. Ten of his orations are extant. Another Greek orator who flourished at Rome, A. D. 97.

ISAIAH, the greatest of the prophets, was son of Amos, and of the lineage of David. He is called the evangelical prophet from the clear and consistent manner in which, in language of grace, fire and sublimity, he describes the coming and the attributes of the Messiah. He prophesied from 735 to 681 B. C. and is said to have been cut into two with a wooden saw by the cruel orders of king Manasseh.

ISDEGERDES, king of Persia after Sapor, was valiant, but debauched and cruel. He defeated the younger Theodosius, and persecuted the Christians. He died by the kick of a horse, A. D. 420.

ISELIN, James Christopher, a learned German, born at Basil 1681. He was professor of history and eloquence at Marburg, 1704, and was advanced to the chair of divinity at Basil, 1711. He died at Basil 1737. Of his numerous writings, the chief are "De Gallis Rhenum transeuntibus, Carmen Heroicum — de Historicis Latinis Melioris Ævi Dissertatio — Dissertations and Orations on various subjects.

ISHMAEL, son of Abraham, by Agar, was born 1910 B. C. He was driven away with his mother by his father, and settled at Paran, where he became the progenitor of the Arabians.

ISHMAEL, I. sophy of Persia, was descended from Ali the son-in-law of Mahomet, and distinguished himself by his valor, prudence, and wisdom, on the throne. He died 1523 in the 18th year of his reign.

ISHMAEL II. sophy of Persia after Thomas, 1575, was the murderer of his eight brothers, and at last was poisoned 1579 by his own sister who repented his embracing the tenets of a different sect of Mahometans.

ISIDORE, St. a disciple of St. Chrysostom, who became a hermit near Pelusium, where he died about 440. Some of his letters, &c. are extant, edited Paris fol. 1388, in Greek and Latin.

ISIDORE, of Alexandria, an Egyptian placed over a monastery by Athanasius, and called the Hospitaler. He defended his patron against the Arians, for which he was expelled by Theophilus the patriarch. He died at Constantinople 403.

ISIDORE of Cordova, author of commentaries on the books of Kings, dedicated to Paul Orosius, the disciple of Augustine, was bishop of Cordova in the age of Honorius and of Theodosius the younger.

ISIDORE of Seville, a bishop of Seville, called the doctor of his age, and the ornament of his church, from his learning and humanity, died 636, after presiding 40 years over his see. He was author of Commentaries on the Scripture — a Chronicle from Adam to 626. — a treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers, and other works.

ISIDORUS of Charax, a Greek author, 300 B. C. His description of Parthia has been edited by Hefschilius, and also at Oxford, 1703.

ISINGRINIUS, Michael, an eminent printer of Basil, who printed in Greek the works of Aristotle in a style and manner much superior to those of former editors, even of Aldus Manutius. His edition of the history of plants by Fuchs was equally admired. He lived in the 16th century.

ISMENIAS, a Theban general who refused to kneel before the Persian king, but by dropping and taking up his ring, performed in the opinion of the courtiers, the homage due to their sovereign. — A musician of that name. When taken prisoner by the king of Scythia, the monarch observed that the neighing of his horse was more pleasing than the music of Ismenias.

ISOCRATES, a Greek orator, born at Athens 436. He devoted himself to the public instruction of youth. His 21 orations are best edited by Beattie, 2 vols. 8vo. 1749.

ISRAEL, Manasseh Ben, a learned rabbi in the Low Countries, who offered to Cromwell 200,000l. for permission to his countrymen the Jews to settle in England, and to have the use of St. Paul's cathedral. This was opposed with spirit by the clergy, but it is said by Heath, that the protector "gulled the Jews of their earnest money." He wrote several works mentioned by Wolfius, and in the Bodleian catalogue, and died 1657.

ITTRIGIUS, Thomas, a German divine, born at Leipzig 1644. He was educated at Leipzig, Rostock, and Strasburg, and rose by his merit to the professorship of divinity at Leipzig in 1691. He died April 1710. He wrote besides dissertations in the Leipzig acts — Dissertatio de Hæresiarchis Ævi Apostolici eique Proximi — Prolegomena ad Josephi Opera — Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ primi & secundi Seculi Selecta Capita, — Exhortationes Theologicæ — Historia Synodorum, &c.

JUAN, George, a Spaniard, knight of Malta, and known as an able mathematician. He went with Don Anthony de Ulloa, and the French mathematicians to Peru, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He published, lished, on his return, Observations on the Voyage; in Spanish, translated with the remarks of Ulloa, into French, and published 2 vols. 4to, Amsterdam. He wrote besides a treatise on the Construction and Management of Vessels. He died at Madrid 1773.

JUBA, king of Mauritania was driven from his kingdom by Cæsar for espousing the cause of Pompey. He destroyed himself B. C. 42.

JUBA, son of the preceding was carried prisoner to Rome by Cæsar, but under Augustus he recovered his dominions and married Cleopatra, Antony's daughter. He wrote the history of Arabia—the History of Rome,—and other works in Greek, &c.

JUDA, Leo, son of a priest of Alface by a concubine, was well skilled in Hebrew, and died minister of Zurich 1542, aged 60. Besides a translation of the bible from the original, he wrote against Erasmus who had reflected on him for changing his religion.

JUDA, Hakkadish, a learned rabbi, the friend of Antoninus. He collected, 26 years after the destruction of the Temple, “the Mishna” or Constitutions and Traditions of the Jewish Magistrates, &c. This book is the text of the Talmud which has been well edited by Surenhusius, 3 vols. folio.

JUDA-CHING, a rabbi of Fez, in the 11th century, called the prince of Jewish grammarians, author of an Arabic dictionary and other works.

JUDAH fourth son of Jacob and Leah, was the head of a tribe, and to him his father in the spirit of prophecy declared that the sceptre should not depart from him, till the Messiah should come, which was fully accomplished. He died 1636 B. C. aged 119 years.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, so called from the place of his birth in the land of Ephraim, was the disciple and the betrayer of Jesus. When he found that his master was condemned, he threw back the 30 pieces of silver for which he had betrayed the innocent blood, and went and hanged himself.

JUDE, St. an apostle, and the author of an epistle, was brother of James the less, and he is called sometime, Thaddeus, Lebheus, or the zealous. He preached the gospel in Libya, Mesopotamia, Syria, Idumæa and Arabia, and suffered martyrdom at Berytus as it is supposed A. D. 80.

JUDEX, Matthæw, a learned German, born at Tipposwald in Misnia, 1528. He studied at Dresden, Wittemberg, and Magdeburg, and afterwards became divinity professor at Jena, a place from which he was soon driven. His learning was great, and his private character highly respectable, yet he unfortunately had many enemies, and the persecution to which he was exposed shortened, it is said, his life. He died 1564, aged 36, leaving five children by his wife, whom he had 10 years before married at Magdeburg. He was concerned in the composition of the two first Centuries of Magdeburg, and he had proposed to write an ecclesiastical history.

IVES, or YVES, bishop of Chartres 1093, was born at Beauvais, 1035. He died after a life of great piety 1115, and was canonized. There are extant of his compiling “a Collection of Decrees”—Exceptiones Ecclesiasticarum Regularum—Sermons—a Chronicon, &c.

IVES, John, an eminent antiquarian, born at Yarmouth, and educated at Caius college, Cambridge. He was raised to the revived office of Suffolk herald, but without any emolument, and he was also fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He died of a deep consumption 9th June, 1776, aged 25 years. His library and collection of coins, medals, paintings, &c. were sold by auction. He published “three select papers” from his own collection, besides remarks upon the Gariannonum of the Romans, the scite and remains fixed and described, 12mo. 1774.

IVETEAUX, Nicholas Vauquelin seigneur de, a French poet, born at Fresnaye. He was made preceptor to the duke of Vendome, the son of Gabrielle d'Estrees, and afterwards to Lewis XIII. when dauphin. The licentiousness of his manners rendered him incapable of holding the benefices which the court intended for him, and when reproached by Richelieu for his dissolute conduct, he retired to his house in St. Germain, where he spent the rest of his life in epicurean ease and voluptuous indulgence. As he considered the pastoral life the most agreeable, he dressed himself in the habit of a shepherd, and attended by his mistress disguised as a nymph playing on the harp, he wasted away his time in the grossest sensuality, regardless of the opinions of the world, or the calls of religion. He died 1649, aged 90, at a country seat near Germigny. He wrote Institution d'un Prince, a poem of merit—Sonnets, Songs, &c. in the Delices de la Poësie Francoise, 1620, 8vo.

JUGLARIS, Aloysius, an Italian jesuit, born at Nice. He taught rhetoric in his society, and was then preceptor to prince Charles Emanuel at the court of Savoy, and died at Messina, 15th Nov. 1653. He wrote 100 panegyrics on Jesus Christ, 40 in honor of Lewis XIII. some on several learned bishops, besides epitaphs &c. His works were together published at Lucca 1710.

JUGURTHA, natural son of Masinabal, and grandson of Masinissa king of Numidia, served with credit in the Roman armies in Spain, and afterwards instead of dividing the kingdom with Adherbal and Hiempsal, the two sons of his uncle Micipsa, he destroyed them and seized upon the whole sovereignty. The Romans interfered, but Jugurtha possessed courage, and opposed their armies. After various successes he was defeated by Metellus, and by Marius, and at last betrayed into the hands of the Romans by Bocchus. He died at Rome 106 B. C. six days after his arrival.

JUIGNE BROISSINIERE, D. Seigneur de Moliere, author of Dictionnaire Theologique, Historique, Poétique, Cosmographique & Chronologique, Paris, 4to. 1644, and Rouen 1668, was an advocate of the French parliaments. His work is considered as incorrect by Moreri.

JULIA, a virgin and martyr of Carthage. When her country was ravaged by Genferic she was sold to a pagan, and put to death for refusing to join in a heathen sacrifice 440.

JULIA, daughter of Cæsar and Cornelia, was a Roman lady of great virtue. After the death of Cor. Cæpio, her husband, she married Pompey, and died in childbed, 53 B. C.

JULIA, daughter of Augustus, was the wife of Metellus, in England enabled him to consider William III. as the instrument of God raised up against antichrist. While with enthusiastic zeal he attempted to convince the world of the truth of his explanations, and of the fulfilling of the prophecies, he excited, by his violence, a host of enemies against him. Bayle, who had long been his friend, took up the arms of controversy against him, and so unpopular were his principles, that in several of the churches of Holland, his opinions on baptism, justification, and other ecclesiastical topics, were publicly condemned, though his name was omitted in the censure. These troubles, and the popular discontent which his accusation of heterodoxy, against Saurin, pastor of Utrecht, excited, produced a dejection of spirits, which, after continuing some years, carried him off, 1713, at Rotterdam, in his 76th year. He was a man of great learning, and vast information; but unfortunately he was violent in his temper, intolerant in his principles, and unwilling to yield, or even to listen, to the candid representations of his opponents. His chief works are, Histoire du Calvinisme & du Papisme mise en Parallele, &c. 1683 — Lettres Pastorales, 3 vols. — le Vrai Systeme de l'Eglise, &c. — l'Esprit de M. Arnauld, 1684 — les Prejuges Legitimes contre le Papisme — le Janseniste Convaincu, &c. — traite Historique contenant le Jugement d'un Protestant sur la Theologie Mystique, &c. 1700 — Traite de la Nature & de la Grace — Apo-logie pour l'Accomplissement des Prophetes, 1687, &c. — sermons, &c.

JURIN, Dr. James, secretary of the Royal society, and president of the college of physicians, London, was eminent as a physician and as a writer. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and had a dispute with Michellotti on the momentum of running waters, with Keill and Senac on the action of the heart, with Robins on distinct vision, and with the followers of Leibnitz on moving bodies. His treatise on vision is printed with Smith's optics. He died 1750.

JUSSIEU, Anthony de, an eminent botanist, born at Lyons, 1686. He travelled over various parts of Europe to improve the science of botany, and natural history; and he was, for his great abilities, admitted into the academy of sciences at Paris, and made botany professor in the Royal garden, and professor to the king. Besides several valuable communications to the learned societies of Paris, he abridged Barrelier's work on the plants of France, Spain, and Italy — and made an appendix to Tournefort's — and wrote a discourse on the Progress of Botany. He died 1758.

JUSSIEU, Bernard de, brother to the preceding, was born at Lyons, 1699. He was equally eminent as a botanist and physician, and was member of the learned societies of Europe. He was a great favorite with the king, over whose plants he was appointed curator, and whose botanical garden at Trianon he adorned with great skill. He wrote, the Friend of Humanity, &c. — and edited Tournefort's plants near Paris, 2 vols. 12mo. He died 1777, universally esteemed, aged 79. His brother Joseph, was also an excellent naturalist, as well as engineer. He was with Condamine in Peru, 1735, and he published an account of his voyages, &c. He died 1779.

JUSTEL, Christopher, counsellor and secretary to the French king, was born at Paris, 1580. He wrote Code of Canons of the Church Universal — and the Councils of Africa, with notes — and the Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne — and Collections of Greek and Latin Canons. He died at Paris 1649.

JUSTEL, Henry, son and successor of the above in his offices about the king, was born in Paris, 1620. He was highly respected for his learning, and he was particularly attached to England, and to her literary characters, such as Locke, Dr. Hickes, &c. He gave to the university of Oxford the Greek MSS. of his father's Canones Ecclesie Universalis, for which he was in return complimented with the degree of LLD. 1675. He had long foreseen the persecution of the protestants, and on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he migrated to London, and was made keeper of the king's library, St. James's, with a salary of 200l. per annum. This he held till his death, Sept. 1693, and was succeeded by Dr. R. Bentley. He wrote several learned works.

JUSTI, N. de, a German mineralogist, who studied at Jena, 1720, supported by the liberal contributions of those friends who foresaw his future celebrity. Under the direction of professor Zink, he acquired an extensive knowledge of mineralogy, and became known by his treatise on political œconomy. He examined, with philosophic eye, the various mines of Schemnitz, Hanneberg, Hungary, and Austria, and for his services was made a member of the council of mines; and some time after he was nominated professor of political œconomy and natural history at Göttingen university. He was meditating the plan of a German Encyclopedia, after the French, when he was carried off by a sudden disease. His works were, a treatise on Mineralogy, 1757 — a treatise on Money, a work of great merit, for which, by the misinterpretation of some passages, he was for a little time imprisoned, with severe treatment, at Breslaw, by order of the king of Prussia, and the elector of Wirtemberg — Miscellanies on Chemistry and Mineralogy, 2 vols. 4to. &c.

JUSTIN I. from a swine-herd and soldier, rose to the rank of general, and was proclaimed emperor of the east by his army, on the death of Anastasius, 518. He opposed the Arians, and with great munificence rebuilt Antioch, and other towns, which had been destroyed by an earthquake, and died A. D. 527, aged 77, respected for his piety, wisdom, and humanity.

JUSTIN II. was nephew and successor of Justinian, 565. He caused his relative, Justin, the last emperor's grand nephew, to be assassinated, and treated some of his subjects with cruelty on suspicion of treachery. His indolence and weakness gave way to the superior arts of his wife, Sophia, niece of the empress Theodora, who managed the empire with great ability, with the assistance of Tiberius. Justin made war against Chosroes, king of Persia, and obtained some advantage over his enemy. He died 5th Oct. 578.

JUSTIN, St a native of Sichar in Samaria, who, from from a heathen philosopher, became a zealous supporter of Christianity. During the persecution of Antoninus, he appeared before the emperor, and pleaded the cause of the injured Christians with success. He suffered martyrdom 166. He wrote two apologies for the Christians, besides a Dialogue with Trypho, best edited 1636, folio.

JUSTIN, a Latin historian, who abridged the universal history of Trogus Pompeius, in a very pleasing and interesting style.

JUSTINIAN I. emperor of Rome after his uncle, Justin I. 527, is celebrated more from the fame of his general Belisarius, than his own personal exertions. The Roman laws were under him reduced into a code, which was called the Digests or Pandects, and the more modern laws were likewise collected under the name of Novellæ. He firmly opposed the popes, Sylvester and Vigilius, and abolished the Roman consulate. He built St. Sophia's church at Constantinople, and died 565, aged 83.

JUSTINIAN II. succeeded his father Pogonatus Constantine, 685. He was successful against the Saracens; but his infamous intention of destroying all the inhabitants of Constantinople, procured his deposition and banishment, 694. He, 10 years after, regained his throne with the assistance of the Bulgarians; but he was at last assassinated, with his son Tiberius, by Philippicus Bardanes, who ascended the throne, 711.

JUSTINIANI, St. Lawrence, a noble of Venice, general of the monastery of St. George, in Alga. He was made the first patriarch of Venice, 1451, by pope Eugenius IV. He died four years after, aged 74, and was canonized by Alexander VIII. 1690. His works, consisting of Lignum Vitæ — de Casto Connubio — Fasciculis Amoris — and other pious treatises, were published at Lyons, 1568, folio, and Venice, 1755, with an account of his life.

JUSTINIANI, Bernard, nephew of the preceding, was born 1407-8, at Venice. He studied at Verona and Padua, and was employed by the pope. In 1461 he went as ambassador from Venice to Lewis XI. of France, who knighted him. After being 20 times raised to the office of Sage grand, he was, in 1474, made procurator of St. Mark, an honor inferior only to the doge. He died 1489. He left de Origine Urbis Venet. printed, 1492, folio — the Life of his Uncle — and other historical works.

JUSTINIANI, Augustin, bishop of Nebo, in Corsica, was born at Genoa, 1470. Francis I. of France, patronized him on account of his learning, and made him his almoner, with a liberal pension. After being professor of Hebrew for five years at Paris, he returned to Genoa, and passed over to his diocese, 1522. He perished, together with the vessel which conveyed him from Genoa to Nebo, 1536. He wrote, Psalterium Hebræum, Græcum, Arabicum, & Chaldaicum, cum tribus Latinis Interpretationibus & Glossis — besides other works.

JUSTINIANI, Fabio, a native of Genoa, who became bishop of Ajaccio, and died there, 1627, aged 59. He is author of Index Universalis Materialium Biblicarum — a Commentary on the book of Tobit, &c.

JUVARA, Philip, a Sicilian architect, born at Messina. He was the pupil of Fontana, and distinguished himself by the beautiful edifices which he erected at Turin. He went to Spain on the invitation of Philip V. but the model which he proposed for the construction of a magnificent palace, on the ruins of that which had been destroyed by fire, though approved, was not carried into execution, through the intrigues of the queen; and Juvara, disappointed and chagrined, died of grief at Madrid, 1735, aged 50.

JUVENAL, de Carleucas Felix, a French writer, born at Pezenas, where he also died, 1760, aged 81, highly respected as an amiable private character. He wrote, Principles of History — Essays on the History of the Sciences — Belles Lettres — the Arts.

JUVENALIS, Decius Junius, a Roman poet, celebrated for the spirit, boldness, and elegance of his satires, not unmixed, however, with licentious expressions and indecent remarks. He was sent in honorable exile as governor of Egypt, and died at Rome under Trajan, 128.

JUVENCUS, Cassius Vedius Aquilinus, a Spaniard, of noble birth, in the fourth century. He wrote a poem, in four books, on the life of our Saviour, a work of little merit.

JUXON, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Chichester, and educated at Merchant Taylors, and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1598, and president 1621. His intimacy with Laud, who was of the same college, raised him to high stations: in 1627 he was made dean of Worcester, in 1633 clerk of the king's closet, the next year bishop of Hereford, and before consecration, translated to London. He was, in 1635, made lord treasurer; but whilst these high appointments offended the puritans, and drew their indignation against the ministry, and particularly against Laud, Juxon was exemplary in his conduct, and irreproachable in the discharge of his duties. He suffered severely during the rebellion; and after attending his royal master to the scaffold, he was imprisoned by the suspicious parliament, who wished him to disclose the private conversation which he had held with the king, but without effect. At the restoration, Juxon was raised to the see of Canterbury. He died 4th June 1663, aged 81, and was buried in St. John's chapel, Oxford.

IWAN V. John Alexiowitz, second son of Michaelowitz, succeeded his brother, Feodor Alexiowitz, 1682, on the throne of Russia. As his powers of mind, however, were very weak, he was declared incapable of reigning, and sent to a monastery, and the sceptre was placed in the hands of his brother Peter. This change displeased his sister, Sophia, who wished to obtain the supreme power, and by her intrigues, Iwan was drawn from his confinement, and seated on the throne with her and with Peter. This divided sovereignty continued for six years; but the design of Sophia to sacrifice her brother Peter to her ambition, proved abortive, and the proscribed prince confined his guilty sister in a convent, and seized the reins of government alone. Iwan died 1696, aged 35, leaving five daughters.

IWAN VI. of Brunswick Bevern, succeeded, when three three months old, his great aunt, Anne Iwanova, as emperor of Russia, 1740. The guardianship of his minority was entrusted, by the dying empress, to her favorite, Ernest, duke of Biren; but soon after the regent was removed, and the emperor's mother, Anne of Mecklenburg, was placed at the head of the government as guardian. The next year the unfortunate child was dethroned, and confined in a fortress, from which a monk had the art to remove him, and to carry him to Germany. The attempt did not, however, succeed, and Iwan was again immured in a monastery, where he was at last put to death, 16th July, 1764, by order of Catherine, the wife of Peter III. who ascended the throne, 1762.

IZAACK, Richard, a native of Exeter, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He was afterwards chamberlain and town clerk of his native town, of which he wrote the history, published, 1677, 8vo. and again improved by his son, 1724.

K.

KAL

KABBETE, John, a Dutch painter, who travelled over France and Italy to improve himself. He settled afterwards at Amsterdam, where he died 1660. Some of his landscapes and ruins, which possess great merit, have been engraved by Perelle.

KANTER, John, professor of poetry, mathematics, and theology at Rinletz, and member of the society at Gottingen, was born at Wolmar, Hesse Cassel, 1649. He died 1729, author of Dissertations on Theology, Philosophy, &c. in 2 vols. 12mo.

KAIN, Henry Lewis le, a celebrated actor, born at Paris, 14th April, 1728. He was originally engaged in the making of surgical instruments, and was introduced to Voltaire, who observed and cultivated his talents, and enabled him to appear on the French theatre, and to acquire there such celebrity, as to be called the Garrick of France. Lewis XV. though prejudiced against him, acknowledged his merit, and all France followed the monarch's example. In the expression of grief, despair, sensibility, and all the strong emotions of the mind, Kain had no superior. His first appearance on the stage was in 1750, and he died at Paris of an inflammatory fever, 8th Feb. 1778. It is remarkable, that Voltaire, who foresaw his greatness, was never present at his representations, as he left France for Prussia a few days before the appearance of his friend on the public theatre; and after an absence of 27 years, he heard, on his return to Paris, that Kain was no more. Kain left two children.

KALE, William, a Dutch painter, who died 1693, aged 63. His paintings on gold, silver, and crystal vases, on gems, and other precious stones, were highly admired.

KALGREEN, N. a dramatic writer of Sweden. Besides his Gustavus Vasa, an opera, &c. he wrote some lyric poems, and died 1798.

KALRAAT, Barent Van, a native of Dordt, eminent as a painter. His views of the Rhine possess great merit. He died 1721, aged 71.

KALUBKO, Vincent, a Polish historian, elected bishop of Cracow by the chapter. He retired to a monastery of the Cistercians, when his cathedral was burnt, 1218, by lightning, and there he died, 1223. He wrote Chronicon Regni Poloniae, in the form of a dialogue.

KAM-HI, emperor of China, succeeded to the throne 1661. He was the grandson of a Tartar prince, who had in 1644 invaded and conquered China, and he showed himself a liberal patron of the literature, and of the arts of Europe, and of the labors of christian missionaries. Though well acquainted with geography, he never would suffer a map to appear before him, except China was placed in the midst of the earth. He died 1722, aged 71.

KAMPEN, Jacob Van, a native of Haerlem, born 1658, and eminent as a painter. The figures in his pieces are generally as large as life, and with strong and happy coloring and effect.

KANDLER, John Joachim, an ingenious artist, employed in the porcelain manufactory of Meissen. His figures were much admired for execution and grace, especially his St. Paul, the scourging of Christ, the death of St. Xavier, the 12 apostles, &c. The groupe which he completed at the desire of Augustus, of Poland, for Lewis XV. was deservedly commended, and procured a very handsome reward from the French monarch. Kandler was a native of Selingstadt, in Saxony, and died 1776, aged 70.

KANOLD, Jahn, author of some works on the plague — of Memoirs on Nature and Art, in German — a periodical work, and other things, was a German physician, and died at Breslaw, 1729, aged 50.

KANT, Immanuel, a native of Konigsberg, son of a snyder, descended from a Scotch family, of the name of Cant, settled in Prussia. From the charity school of his village, he removed to Fredericianum college, and then in 1740 to the university. To maintain himself he now became a private tutor in a clergyman's family, afterwards in a nobleman's, and then returned to the university, where he took the degree of M. A. in 1755, and became a public tutor of celebrity. His knowledge was very extensive, and his publications were equally numerous, but he paid particular attention to metaphysics, and though his labors were sometimes obscure, his principles principles and opinions were popular, but while followed by numbers, he found himself attacked by some severe opponents. He died 12th Feb. 1804, aged 80. His works are on the theory of the winds — physical Geography — Principles of Motion and Rest — Volcanoes in the Moon — the Rotation of the Earth on its Axis, and what alterations had taken place, &c.

KATEB, a Prussian poet, at the court of the Samanides. He wrote some moral poems of great merit.

KAUNITZ RITBERG, prince of, a celebrated statesman, for 40 years chancellor and prime minister of Austria. He was first ambassador in France, and by negotiating the marriage of Antoinette, with Lewis XVI. he acquired great consequence. He served with fidelity, Maria Theresa, Joseph II. and Leopold, and by his abilities and intrigues, gained a great ascendancy in the European courts. He died at Vienna, 1794, aged 84.

KAY, William, a native of Breda, distinguished as an historical painter. He died 1568, aged 48, it is said, of grief, because the duke of Alva, while sitting to him for his picture, passed sentence of death on counts Egmont and Hoorn.

KEACH, Benjamin, author of Travels of True Godliness, in the style of Bunyan, and of scripture Metaphors, in folio, reprinted 1777, works of great merit; was a baptist teacher, who died at the beginning of the 18th century.

KEATE, George, a native of Trowbridge, Wilts, educated at Kingston school. After visiting Geneva, and Voltaire, and making the tour of Europe, he entered at the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar. Promotion and honors, however, followed not so rapidly as he expected, and he quitted the profession to become an author. Among other things, he wrote, Ancient and Modern Rome, a poem, 1760 — an Account of the Pelew Islands, from captain Wilson's papers, and other works. He died 1797, aged 68.

KEATING, Jeffery, a clergyman of Tipperary, author of the history of the poets of his own country, printed in London, with the genealogies of some Irish families. He died 1650.

KEBLE, Joseph, an English lawyer, son of Richard Keble, serjeant at law under Cromwell's usurpation, was born in London, 1632. He was of Jesus college, Oxford, and was made fellow of All-Souls, by the parliamentary visitors, 1648. He settled afterwards at Gray's Inn, and when a barrister, was remarkable for his regular and constant attendance at the court of king's bench, though employed in no cause. He died suddenly, Aug. 1710. He published an explanation of the laws against recusants, 8vo. 1681 — an Affistance to Justices of the peace, &c. folio — Reports from the King's Bench, Westminster, 3 vols. folio — two Essays on Human Nature, or the Creation of Mankind, and on Human Actions. He left besides in MS. above 100 large folios, and 50 thick quartos.

KECKERMANN, Bartholomew, a native of Dantzic, who studied at Wittemberg, Leipzig, and Heidelberg. After being professor of Hebrew at Heidelberg, he was honorably invited by his fellow-citizens of Dantzic, to come and settle amongst them. He obeyed their summons, 1601, but he fell a sacrifice to his intense application in the education of youth, and in the pursuits of literature, and died 1609, aged only 38. His works, which are learned, though, says G. Vossius, full of plagiarism, were collected and published at Geneva, 1614, 2 vols. folio.

KEENE, Edmund, an English bishop, born at Lynn, Norfolk, where his father was an alderman. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, and in 1740, by the interference of his brother, the English ambassador in Spain, with Walpole, he was made rector of Stanhope, Durham, in the room of bishop Butler. In 1748 he succeeded Dr. Whalley, at the head of St. Peter's college, and in 1750 he served the office of vice chancellor, and showed himself a warm and judicious advocate for the improvement of university discipline. His efforts, however, were not without opposition and obloquy; he was ridiculed in the prose pamphlet, "Fragment," and in the poem called, "Capitale." In 1752 he was made bishop of Chester, and on the death of Dr. Mawson, 1770, he was translated to Ely. In this new appointment he obtained an act of parliament, to alienate the old palace of Holborn, belonging to his see, and for building a new one in Dover street, and thus he not only got rid of a great incumbrance, but added an annual revenue of 5000l. to repair and maintain his palace. He died 1781, leaving a son, who was member for Cambridge, and a daughter.

KEILL, John, an eminent mathematician, born at Edinburgh, Dec. 1st, 1671. After studying, and taking the degree of M. A. in his native city, he followed his friend and tutor, David Gregory, to Oxford, and in 1694 entered at Baliol as a Scotch exhibitioner. Here he soon acquired celebrity, as being the first who taught Newton's principles by proper experiments, and soon became better known by his "Examination of Burnet's Theory of the Earth" to which were subjoined "Remarks on Whiston's new Theory." In 1700 he was appointed deputy professor of natural philosophy at Oxford, by Dr. Millington, and the next year he published his famous treatise, called "Introductio ad Veram Physicam," which has been considered as a most able introduction to Newton's Principia. He was next elected member of the royal society, to whose transactions he was a respectable contributor. In 1709 he was made treasurer to the Palatines going to settle in New England, and after his return, the next year, he was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy, at Oxford. In 1711 he was engaged in a controversy with Leibnitz, and ably defended the claim of sir Isaac Newton to the invention of fluxions, in which his efforts were seconded and approved by the royal society, against the violent attacks of the foreign philosopher. The same year he was made decypherer to the queen, and two years after was honored with the degree of M. D. by the university of Oxford. His edition of Commandinus' Euclid, appeared 1715, and 1718 his Introductio ad Veram Astronomiam, translated by himself into English, at the request of the duchess of Chandos. He was carried off by a fever, 1st Sept. 1721, in his 50th year, highly respected. He was married 1717.

KEILL, James, younger brother to the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, 27th March, 1673. He applied himself to medical studies, and particularly to anatomy, and had for his merit, the degree of M. D. conferred upon him by the university of Cambridge. He settled at Northampton, 1703, as a physician, and he died there from that painful disorder, a cancer in the roof of his mouth, 16th July 1719, and was buried in St. Giles's church, where a monument was erected by his brother. He published an Account of Animal Secretion — the Quantity of Blood in the Human Heart, and Muscular Motion — Medicina Statica — Anatomy of the Human Body, 8vo. — an Account of the Dissection of John Bayles, aged 130. — a Translation of Lemery's Chemistry, and papers in the philosophical transactions.

KEITH, James, field-marshal of Prussia, the younger son of William Keith, earl marshal of Scotland, was born 1696. He was educated under Ruddiman, and intended for the law, but the breaking out of the rebellion showed the military bent of his genius. He joined the pretender, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and then fled to France, where he applied himself to mathematics, and the studies of a military life. After travelling through Italy, he became in 1717, acquainted with the Czar Peter, but he refused to enter into the Russian service, and went to Madrid, where he obtained a commission in the Irish brigade. He afterwards accompanied his friend and patron, the duke of Lyria, in his embassy to Russia, and there he engaged in the service of the Czarina, was made lieutenant-general, and honored with the black eagle. Here he distinguished himself in the wars against the Turks and the Swedes, as well as in negotiations; but dissatisfied with the politics of the court, and the servility which attended his situation, he left Russia, and came to Berlin, where the king of Prussia raised him to great honors, and made him governor of his capital, and field marshal of his armies. He gained so strongly the confidence of that monarch, that he was his counsellor in the cabinet, and his companion in his relaxations, and he attended him in his travels through Germany, Poland, and Hungary. After distinguishing himself as a warrior and a politician in the service of his new master, he was unfortunately killed at the battle of Hohenkerchen, 1758.

KELLER, James, a learned jesuit, born at Sekingen, 1568. He was counsellor to Albert of Bavaria, and the confidential friend of the emperor Maximilian. He died at Munich, 1631. He wrote various books under fictitious names; but his Mysteria Politica, 1635, in 4to. from its contents, was exposed to the censures of the Sorbonne, and burnt publicly.

KELLEY, Edward, a famous necromancer, born at Worcester, 1555, and educated at Oxford, which he left without a degree. For some ill conduct in Lancashire, he lost both his ears at Lancaster, but afterwards became an active associate to Dr. Dee, and travelled with him abroad, and ably supported him in his pretended intercourse with familiar spirits. By his celebrity, and his art of commuting metals into gold, he recommended himself to the notice of the emperor Rodolphus II. who knighted him, but afterwards dissatisfied with his impostures, sent him a prisoner to Prague. Kelley endeavoured to extricate himself from confinement, but he fell from the window of his apartment, and broke both his legs, in consequence of which he died soon after, 1595. His works were a poem on Chemistry — on the Philosopher's Stone — a Relation of what passed between Dr. Dee, and certain Spirits.

KELLY, Hugh, an Irishman, who from a stay maker, became a hackney writer to a lawyer, in London, and then turned author. He possessed great application, and wrote with fluency and success. He died 1777. His works are Thepiss, a poem, after Churchill's manner — Falfe Delicacy — a Word to the Wife — School for Wives, comedies — Clementina, a tragedy — the Romance of an Hour, a comic entertainment — the Memoirs of a Magdalen, a novel, and some periodical works.

KEMPIS, Thomas, a famous theologian, born at Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, 1380. He was educated at Deventer, and afterwards entered among the members of the monastery of mount St. Agnes. He here displayed great piety, patience, and self-mortification, and besides transcribing books of devotion, as the rest of his brethren, he composed several works of divinity, much admired by the papists. He died 1471, in his 92d year. The largest edition of his works, consisting of sermons, pious treatises, &c. is in 3 vols. folio, Cologne, 1660. His famous book, De Imitatione Christi, which has been translated into all languages, has been by some writers, ascribed to Gerson, a Benedictine monk. This has consequently occasioned not a little controversy.

KEN, Thomas, an English prelate, descended from an ancient Somersetshire family, was born at Berkhamstead, Herts, July, 1637. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, 1657. He was patronized by bishop Morley, and afterwards went to Holland, as chaplain to the prince of Orange. In 1683 he went with lord Dartmouth, against Tangier, and on his return, was made chaplain to the king. In his character he displayed great firmness and consistency of conduct, and far from offending his royal master, by refusing admittance into his house, to Eleanor Gwyn, the favorite mistress, he received higher marks of esteem, and was nominated to the vacant see of Bath and Wells. Before he was however admitted, Charles was taken ill, and was attended by his faithful chaplain, whose devout services were much interrupted by the interference of popish priests. On James's accession Ken was settled in his see, but though attempts were made to render him favorable to the projected alteration of the national religion, he remained steady to his principles, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower. At the revolution he was unwilling to take the oaths of allegiance to the new monarch, and therefore retired, and was deprived of his bishopric. He devoted the rest of his life to literary and pious pursuits, and was so much respected for his steady principles, that queen Anne granted him a pension of 200l. per annum. He died at Longleat, the seat of the Thynnes, in Wiltshire, of an ulcer in his kidneys, 19th March, 1710—11. He wished always to be impressed with such a sense of mortality that he continually carried his shroud in his portmanteau. His works were published 4 vols. 1721, and consist of hymns, pious manuals, an epic poem in 13 books, called Edmund, sermons, &c. His nephew, Hawkins, prefixed an account of his life. Though accused of popish principles, he died in the faith of the church of England.

KENDAL, George, a native of Dawlish, Devonshire, educated educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and made by bishop Brownrigg, prebendary of Exeter, and in 1647, rector of Blissland, Cornwall. He afterwards removed to a benefice in London, and took his degree of D. D. 1654. Though he recovered his prebend at the restoration, he lost it and all his preferment in 1662 for nonconformity. He was author of a Vindication of the Doctrine of Grace and Special favor to the Elect, &c. fol. — the Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints, against John Goodwin, fol. &c.

KENNEDY, John, M. D. a Scotch physician who resided for some years at Smyrna, and died 26th Jan. 1760. His valuable collections of Greek and Latin coins and pictures, were sold by auction, and afterwards came into the possession of Dr. Hunter. In his dissertation on the coins of Carausius Dr. Kennedy asserted that Oriana was the emperor's guardian goddess, an opinion which excited a violent controversy between him and Dr. Stukeley, who supported that Oriana was the wife of Carausius.

KENNEDY, John, rector of Bradley, Derbyshire, was author of Scripture Chronology, 8vo. 1751 — Jackson's Chronological Antiquities Examined, 8vo. 1753, &c.

KENNEDY, James, second son of sir W. Kennedy by Margaret, daughter of Robert III. king of Scotland, was educated at Paris and Rome, and became regent during the minority of James II. He was archbishop of St. Andrew's, and the founder of St. Mary's college there. He died chancellor of Scotland 1472, aged 68.

KENNET, White, an English prelate, born at Dover, 10th Aug. 1660. His father was vicar of Postling in Kent, and from his mother's father, a wealthy shipwright, he derived the name of White. He was educated at Westminster school, and entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he applied himself with unusual perseverance to study, and published his letter from a student, concerning the approaching parliament, a political pamphlet which highly offended the whig party. He also published at this time his "Ballad" a political poem, and in 1684 appeared his translation of Erasmus' Moriae Encomium. That year he took his degree of M. A. and was then presented to the living of Ambrosden, Oxfordshire. In 1689 whilst shooting, his gun burst, and wounded his skull so severely that he was trepanned, and was ever after obliged to wear a black patch on the injured part. He distinguished himself at Oxford as an eloquent and popular preacher, and as an active tutor in his hall, and in 1693 he was presented to the rectory of Shottesbrook in Berkshire. In 1699 he took his degree of D. D. and the next year, unsolicited was appointed minister of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London. In 1701 he became archdeacon of Huntingdon, and that year engaged with Dr. Atterbury in a controversy about the rights of convocation. In 1705 he preached Dr. Wake's consecration sermon which was much applauded, particularly by judge Holt, and some time after was appointed chaplain to the queen. His sermon at the funeral of the duke of Devonshire in 1707, notwithstanding the censure of some wits, proved very agreeable to the next duke who recommended him to the deanry of Peterborough. The opposition which he showed to Sacheverell for some time exposed him to obloquy, and when the ministry were changed he was represented as an enemy to the queen and her government. The imputation was industriously circulated and with such malignity that in an altar piece painted for Dr. Welton, rector of Whitechapel, Judas was represented in the number of the 12 apostles at the last supper, with the countenance of Dr. Kennet, and more strongly to point the resemblance, the black patch appeared on his head. The picture was viewed and condemned by the sober spectator, and the bishop of London at last ordered the scandalous piece to be removed from the church. His popularity however was not diminished, he was some time after promoted to the see of Peterborough which he enjoyed ten years. He died in St. James's street, London 19th Dec. 1728. He had begun to make a large collection of maps, papers, &c. to write a full history of the propagation of christianity in the English American colonies, which never was completed. He wrote the third volume of "a Complete History of England" published by the booksellers 1706, besides a Vindication of the Church — a Letter to the Editors of Somner's treatise of the Roman Posts, &c. — Sermons, &c. His valuable MSS. collection was purchased by the earl of Shelburne, and a curious MS. diary by him is also preserved in the noble lord's library.

KENNET, Basil, younger brother of the bishop, was born 21st Oct. 1674 at Postling. He was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1697. In 1706 by his brother's interest he was made chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, but so violent was the opposition which he met from the papists when he reached Italy that he escaped with difficulty the horrors of the inquisition. On his return to Oxford 1714 he took the degree of D. D. but died very soon after of a slow fever, the seeds of which he had brought with him from Italy. Basil Kennet was distinguished in private life as an amiable and benevolent man, and as an author his works are sufficient proof of his great abilities. He published in 1696 Romæ Antiquæ Notitia, in two parts, a valuable book addressed to the duke of Gloucester — the Lives and Characters of the Antient Greek Poets, 8vo. 1697, also inscribed to the duke to whom it was expected he was to be appointed subpreceptor — an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed after Dr. Pearson, 1705 — an Essay towards a Paraphrase on the Psalms, &c. 8vo. 1706 — Sermons, &c. on various occasions, 1715, 8vo.

KENNETH II. the 69th king of Scotland, succeeded his father Alpin 823. He made war against the Picts and conquered them, and he brought the famous stone chair to Scone in which the kings of Scotland were crowned, till carried to England by Edward I. He died 854.

KENNETH III. son of Malcolm, obtained victories over the Danes, and also over the English at Strathclyd. He was assassinated by his subjects 994 for attempting to alter the right of succession in favor of his family.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, a celebrated Hebrew scholar, lar, born at Totnefs, Devonshire 1718, where his father was parifh clerk. His talents were difplayed at fchool with fuch fuccefs that by the liberal contributions of fome gentlemen, friendly to infant merit, he was fent to Exeter college, Oxford. Here he devoted himfelf to ftudy with fo much affiduity that by the publication of two popular difertations — on the Tree of Life — and on the Oblations of Cain and Abel — he obtained the degree of B. A. from the univerfity, gratis, and before the ftatutable term. His excellent fermons next recommended him to public notice, but about 1753, he began to digeft the plan of his great and national labor, the publication of the Hebrew text of the bible collated from various MSS. In this arduous undertaking, too expenfive for the resources of a private man, he was nobly fupported by the munificence of learned bodies, and even of fovereign princes; and to accelerate, and indeed remunerate his labors, he was made canon of Chrift church, and keeper of the Radcliffe library. After indefatigable patience and the moft laudable perfeverance he completed his great undertaking. The compendious hiftory of the Hebrew text from the clofing of the canon to the invention of printing, with an account of 103 MSS. appeared firft; in 1760, the propofals for collecting the MSS. at home and abroad were laid before the public; in 1776 the firft volume was publifhed, and in 1780 his labors were brought to a conclufion in the 8th volume. After thus contributing largely to the improvement of Hebrew literature and faced criticism, this worthy man began to publifh fome remarks on felect paffages of the Old Testament, but died before the completion, at Oxford in 1783. He left a widow, but no children. He was vicar of Culham, Oxfordshire.

KENRICK, William, a native of Wafford Herts, who from the humble occupation of a rule maker, became a popular writer. He went to Leyden to improve himfelf, and at his return in 1759 he publifhed his epiftles philofophical and moral in verfe. In 1766 appeared his “Falftaff’s Wedding,” a comedy, an admirable imitation of Shakefpeare, and which he at firft intended to impofe on the world as the production of that great bard. For fome time he wrote in the Monthly Review, but in confequence of a difpute with the principal, he fet up the London Review, which did not much anfwer. He was equally unfucceffful in the news paper which he began in oppofition to the Morning Chronicle, which after conducting fome years he abandoned, from a fimilar quarrel. He tranflated Rouffeau’s Emilius and Eloifa — Milot’s Hiftory of England — and other works, and produced befides various dramatic pieces, which if not all fucceffful yet poffeffed merit. He died 1779.

KENT, William, a native of Yorkfhire, who abandoned the bufinefs of coach painter for the fuperior branches of the profefion. By the liberality of fome friends he was enabled in 1710 to go to Rome, and improve himfelf; but the patronage and confidence of lord Burlington raifed him to confequence and independence. On his return to London, he was employed in various works, but he poffeffed little genius as a painter. His talents however difplayed themfelves foon as an ingenious and able architect, and his temple of Venus in Stowe gardens, Holkham houfe, Norfolk, and other buildings are monuments of his genius. By the influence of lord Burlington and other friends he obtained the place of mafter carpenter, architect, painter, keeper of the pictures, &c. to the king, with a falary altogether worth 600l. per ann. He died of an inflammation in his bowels, at Burlington houfe, 12th April 1748, aged 63. He may be defervedly confidered, as Walpole obferves, the father of modern gardening in England.

KENTIGERN, or St. Mungo, a Scotchman, educated according to Camden, at Oxford, and made bifhop of Glasgow. He was the pupil of Palladius and founded St. Afaph monaftery in the fixth century.

KENYON, Lloyd lord, an Englifh judge, eldeft fon of Lloyd Kenyon of Briyno, Efq. was born 1733 at Gredington, Flintfhire, and on leaving Ruthin fchool Denbighfhire, he became an articted clerk to Tomlinfon, attorney at Nantwich, Cheshire. On leaving Cheshire he entered at Lincoln’s Inn, and was called to the bar in 1761. Though known as an able lawyer and a good conveyancer, and much employed in chancery, he did not rapidly rife to eminence, till in 1780 he was called upon with Erskine to defend lord George Gordon. Diftinguifhed on this memorable occafion, he was in 1782 made attorney general and chief juftice of Chefter, and elected member of parliament for Hindon, Wilts. He was in March 1784 made mafter of the rolls, and on lord Mansfield’s refignation in 1788, he was by the recommendation of lord Thurlow raifed to fucceed him as chief juftice of the King’s bench, with the dignity of the peerage. In this elevated office lord Kenyon endeared himfelf to the people of England, as an upright and impartial judge, as the friend of his country, the fupporter of her conftitution, the advocate of virtue, and the unshaken punifher of vice, however great or powerful the offender. Though warm in his temper he never fuffered juftice to yield to prejudice or paffion, but regarded the ftrict execution of the law as the firmeft bulwark of national honor. The death of his eldeft fon, a young man of promifing abilities, in a decline, is fupposed to have haftened his diffolution, by producing, in confequence of his broken fpirits, the black jaundice of which he died at Bath, 2d April, 1802, aged 69. He left two fons, George his fucceffor in the title, and Thomas.

KEPLER, John, a celebrated aftronomer, born 27th Dec. 1571 at Wief in the duchy of Wirtemberg. His family was refpectable, though his father was reduced from high military offices, to the humble occupation of an inn-keeper. His earlieft years were not improved by education, but on his father’s death he went to Tubingen univerfity, where he ftudied philofophy and mathematics with great attention, and made fuch progreff that in 1593 he was invited to a mathematical chair at Gratz in Styria. In 1597 he married, and three years after in confequence of the confufion which prevailed in religion and politics, he left Styria and went to fettle in Bohemia where the friendship of Tycho Brahe had invited him. Tycho introduced his friend to the emperor Rodolphus, but the intimacy which which it was fondly expected was calculated to contribute not only to the advancement of science, but to mutual comfort proved the source of dissatisfaction and distrust. Kepler was offended with the reserve of his friend, and Tycho did not communicate all the knowledge which honor and promise would have dictated. These rising dissensions however were stopped by the death of Tycho, and Kepler left to the exertion of his own powers was directed to finish the tables begun by his friend, which he dedicated to his imperial patron under the title of Rodolphine tables. But though appointed mathematician to the emperor for life, and though respected for his learning and abilities, Kepler had to struggle with the horrors of poverty through the jealousy or malice of the imperial ministers who paid him his pension with a very sparing hand, so that he removed from Prague to Lints, and in 1613 assisted at the assembly at Ratisbon, and was particularly consulted in the reformation of the calendar. He went in 1630 to Ratisbon to solicit the payment of the arrears of his pension, and whilst there he was seized with a fever, occasioned it is said by hard riding, and fell a victim to the disease in Nov. of the same year. His works were besides, Ephemerides—Phyfica Cœlestis Tradita Commentarius de Motibus Stellæ Martis—Epitome Astronomicæ Copernicæ—Somnium Astronomicum de Astronomia Lunari—Prodromus Dissertationum Cosmographicarum, &c. a work which the author considered as his best performance, and which he valued so much that he declared he would not exchange the glory of the discoveries which he had made, to become elector of Saxony. As an astronomer Kepler was a man of high celebrity, whose genius and discoveries have been deservedly commended by Des Cartes, Newton, Gregory, Horrox, and other astronomers. He first proved that the planets do not move in circles, but in ellipses, and that in their motions they describe equal areas in equal times, and that the squares of their periodical times are equal to the cubes of their distances. Yet though thus the worthy precursor of the great Newton he maintains puerile absurdities and foolishly imagines that the earth has a sympathy with the heavens, and that the globe is a huge animal which breathes out the winds through the holes of the mountains, as through its mouth and nostrils. After his death his wife married again. His son Lewis was a physician at Konisberg in Prussia, and published his father's Somnium Astronomicum, and died at Konisberg 1663.

KEPPEL, Augustus Viscount, second son of the earl of Albemarle was distinguished as an able admiral. He accompanied Anson round the world, and when raised to the highest honors of his profession he was placed at the head of the English Channel fleet, and on the 12th July, 1778, he engaged the French fleet under d'Orvilliers off Ushant, but the action was partial, and the next day when the admiral wished to renew the engagement he found it impossible. This encounter spread great discontent through the nation, and the admiral was tried at Portsmouth on the accusation of sir Hugh Palliser, the second in command, and honorably acquitted. The charge was retorted by the admiral, and sir Hugh Palliser was censured by the sentence of a court-martial. In 1782 the admiral was made a peer, and under two administrations was twice made first lord of the admiralty. He was an able officer, and a man of great respectability in private life, and it is much to be lamented that a political difference between him and the second in command prevented that exertion of British valor which might have ensured a most brilliant victory to the fleet. He died 1786.

KERCKCHORE, Joseph Van der, a painter of Bruges, who died 1724, aged 55. His council of the Gods, preserved in Ostend town-hall, is much admired.

KERCKRING, Thomas, a physician, who lived at Hamburg, as the grand duke of Tuscany's resident. He was member of the London royal society, and obtained some celebrity in his profession. He died at Hamburg 1693. His chief works are Spicelegium Anatomicum, 4to.—and Anthropogeniæ Ichnographia, in which he supported the doctrine of an ovary in the human female.

KERGUELIN DE TREMAR, Yves Joseph, author of a relation of a voyage in the North sea, 4to. 1768—naval events of the war between France and England, 1778, &c. was a naval French commander of merit, and died 1797.

KERI, Francis Borgia, a learned Jesuit of Hungary, author of an history of the emperors of the East, from Constantine to the fall of Constantinople, and of the Ottoman princes their successors. He was also an able astronomer, and made some improvements in the telescope. He died at Buda 1769.

KERKHERDERE, John Gerard, historiographer to the emperor Joseph I. was born near Maestricht 1678, and died 1738. He published some Latin poems, besides a Commentary on Daniel, and a treatise on the Situation of the Earthly Paradise, which he placed above Babylon.

KERSAINT, Armand Guy Simon, count of, a native of Paris, who served with credit in the French navy, and on the breaking out of the revolution took an active part in the measures of the national assembly. He was attached to the party of the Girondists, and therefore in the convention he opposed boldly the violent measures of the sanguinary terrorists. On the day of the condemnation of Lewis XVI. he had the magnanimity to resign his seat in the bloody assembly, and when called to their bar, he with undaunted countenance defended his conduct. So much virtue could not pass unpunished in those days of slaughter. He was discovered in his retreat and dragged before the revolutionary tribunal and condemned to die, 5th Dec. 1793. He was then aged 52.

KERSEY, John, author of an excellent book in folio, called "the Elements of Algebra,"—of an English Dictionary—and of an Edition of Wingate's Arithmetic, was born at Bodicott, near Banbury, Oxfordshire, and died about 1690, aged 74.

KERVILLARS, John Marin de, a Jesuit who translated Ovid's Fasts and Elegies into French, and assisted in the Memoires de Trevoux. He died at Paris 1745.

KESSEL, John Van, a native of Antwerp, born 1626.

1626. His flowers, birds, and insects, executed according to the seasons of the year, possessed great merit, and are now very scarce. His portraits were after the manner of Vandyk. His son Ferdinand who was also eminent, though inferior to his father in the execution of his pieces, was patronized by John Sobieski at Warfaw. A nephew of Kessel also settled at Antwerp and acquired celebrity by painting after the manner of Teniers' Conversations, &c.

KEREL, Cornelius, a Dutch painter, who came to England and painted Elizabeth and her nobility. On his return to Holland he made himself ridiculous by his attempting to paint with his fingers and even with his toes. He died 1602.

KETT, William, a tanner of Norfolk, who raised and headed an insurrection in the reign of Edward VI. His followers amounted to above 20,000 men, and by inveighing against inclosures, and the oppression of the nobility, he increased his influence among the deluded multitude. He took Norwich, and defeated lord Northampton, but was afterwards routed by lord Warwick, and hanged with some of his associates on the tree which he had called the tree of reformation, and where he administered justice and issued orders to his followers, 1549.

KETTLEWELL, John, an English divine born at North Allerton, Yorkshire, 10th March, 1653. After an education in his native town, he entered at Edmund hall, Oxford, and five years after was elected fellow of Lincoln, where he became an able tutor. By his publication of "Measures of Christian Obedience," 1681, he acquired great reputation, and was patronized by the dukes of Bedford, and by lord Digby, who gave him the living of Colehill, Warwickshire. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths of allegiance, in consequence of which he was deprived of his living and went to settle in London, where he was respected as an able writer, and good divine. He died of a consumption in Gray's Inn lane 12th April 1695, and was buried in the grave which once contained Laud's remains at Barking. He is represented by Nelson who knew him well, as an amiable man in private life, benevolent, learned, and humble. His works, which consisted of Religious tracts, besides tracts upon "New Oaths," the duty of Allegiance, &c. were collected into 2 vols. folio, 1718, with his life prefixed.

KEULEN, Janffen Van, a portrait painter of Dutch extraction, born in London, and for some time the favorite of Charles I. and of the English court before the introduction of Vandyk. Though he fell in the public estimation by the celebrity of his rival, he yet had the good sense of living with him on the most intimate terms, and died 1665.

KEYSLER, John George, a German antiquary, fellow of the London royal society, was born at Thournau 1689. He was carefully educated at the university of Hall, and then travelled as tutor to the two sons of count Giech-Buchau, and visited the chief cities of Germany, France, and the Netherlands with the eyes and the judgment of a philosopher. He afterwards undertook the care of the two grandsons of baron Bernstorff, minister of state to the elector of Hanover, and after viewing in their company the chief places on the continent, he came to England, where he was received with all the respect due to learning, and eminent virtue. He was admitted fellow of the London royal society, and deserved it by his explanation of Stonehenge, which he called an Anglo Saxon monument, and by a dissertation on the mistletoe of the Druids. He spent the rest of life in tranquil and honorable retirement under the patronage of his pupils, and died 20th June, 1743, aged 54, of an asthma. As he was an able antiquarian he published Antiquitates Selectæ Septentrionales & Celticæ, &c. Hanover, 12mo. 1720 — besides Travels through Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, &c. translated into English, 1756.

KHERASKOF, Michael, a Russian poet of the 18th century, made vice-president of the college of mines, counsellor of state, and curator of Moscow university. He wrote a poem on the Utility of Science — some tragedies — Pindaric odes, fables, idyls, satires — Ariadne and Theseus, a romance — Numa Pompilius, a poem, in four cantos, besides "Rossiada," an epic poem in 12 cantos, which celebrates in animated and sublime, though occasionally in unharmonious verse, the conquest of Casan by Ivan Vassilevitch II.

KHILHOF, Prince, a Russian nobleman, ambassador to Charles XII. of Sweden, and ungenerously thrown into prison when that monarch undertook war against Russia. After 18 years' confinement he died in the prison of Westeras, just as he was going to be restored to liberty 1718. During his imprisonment he wrote the Kernel of the Russian History, in seven books, to his own times, which though an abridgement possesses considerable merit, and was published in 1770 by Muller in 8vo.

KICK, Cornelius, a painter of Amsterdam of great merit. His flowers were represented with such brilliancy that they exhibited all the freshness and beauty of nature. He died 1675, aged 40.

KIDDER, Richard, a learned prelate, born in Suffolk, or as Wood says in Suffex. In 1649 he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and obtained from that society the living of Stanground, Huntingdonshire, from which he was ejected in 1662 for non-conformity. He however, afterwards, conformed and obtained from lord Essex the rectory of Raine in Essex, and in 1674 the living of St. Martin Outwich, London. In 1681 he was made prebendary of Norwich, and in 1698 dean of Peterborough. On the deprivation of Ken for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to William and Mary, 1691, he was appointed in his place to the see of Bath and Wells. He was unfortunately killed in his bed with his lady by the fall of a stack of chimnies in his palace at Wells in the great storm which happened in the night between the 26th and 27th Nov. 1703. He was privately buried in the cathedral. Dr. Kidder was an elegant and learned writer, and a most able divine. His publications were sermons preached at Boyle's lectures, and inserted in "Demonstration of the Messias," in three parts — a commentary on the five books of Moses, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. besides some controversial tracts, &c.

KIEN-LONG, emperor of China, died at the end of the 18th century after a reign of 60 years, at the age of of 90. When lord Macartney appeared at his court, he gave him some of his verses to be presented to the English king. In his character he appeared to be a popular, sensible, and benevolent monarch.

KIERINGS, Alexander, a Dutch painter of Utrecht, who died 1646, aged 56. His landscapes were much admired for correctness, so that even the fibres of trees were distinctly seen in his pieces.

KILBURN, Richard, author of a survey of Kent, published 1659 in 4to. in his 54th year, was a native of Kent.

KILBYE, Richard, a native of Radcliffe, Leicestershire, was fellow of Lincoln college, Oxford, 1577, and was elected rector in 1590. He was afterwards Hebrew professor in the university and obtained a prebend in Lincoln cathedral, and was one of the translators of the present bible. He was also author of some sermons, and died 1620.

KILBYE, Richard, a minister of All-hallows, in Derby, who wrote the Burden of a Loaded Conscience, often reprinted, and died 1617.

KILIAN, Cornelius, a native of Brabant, for 50 years corrector of the press to Plantin. He published Ety-mologicon Linguae Teutonicæ, — some Latin poems — an apology for correctors of the press against authors. He died 1607.

KILLIGREW, Catharine, daughter of sir Anthony Cook, was born about 1530 at Giddy hall, Essex, and married Mr. Henry Killigrew who for his services as ambassador was knighted. To a great genius she joined an extensive knowledge of Greek, Hebrew and Latin, and wrote verses with elegance. She died about 1600.

KILLIGREW, William, son of sir Robert Killigrew, was born at Hanworth, Middlesex, 1605, and after three years' residence at St. John's college, Oxford, he travelled abroad. At his return he was appointed governor of Pendennis castle and Falmouth haven, Cornwall, and gentleman-usher of the privy chamber to Charles I. He suffered severely during the civil wars, for his attachment to the royal cause, but at the restoration he was again taken into favor and made vice-chamberlain to the king, an office in which he continued 22 years. He died 1693 and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote four plays, the Siege of Urbin, Selindra, Ormasdes, or Love and Friendship, Pandora, published at Oxford 1666, in folio, besides Midnight and Daily Thoughts in prose and verse, 8vo. — the Artless Midnight Thoughts of a Gentleman at Court, &c. 8vo. &c.

KILLIGREW, Thomas, brother to the preceding, page to Charles I. and groom of the chamber to Charles II. was born 1611. He visited Spain, France and Italy, and for some time was English resident at Venice. He wrote 11 plays, collected into one folio volume 1664, besides other things. He was twice married and died 1682, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He was a man of great wit, and in his facetious company Charles II. passed many a vacant hour, in the highest familiarity. Though remarkably jocular in conversation, his writings display little of that vein of humor.

KILLIGREW, Henry, brother to the preceding was born 1612. He was of Christ church, Oxford, and then became chaplain in the king's army, and in 1642 was created D. D. and made chaplain to the duke of York and prebendary of Westminster. After suffering during the civil wars he was at the restoration reinstated in his prebend, and made master of the Savoy hospital, and rector of Wheatthistead, Hertfordshire. He wrote at the age of 17 the Conspiracy, a tragedy, afterwards altered into Pallantus and Eudora 1652. He also published some sermons, &c. and died about 1690.

KILLIGREW, Anne, called by Wood "a grace for beauty, and a muse for wit," was daughter of Henry just mentioned. To a highly finished education she added great skill in painting, and drew the picture of the duke of York and of the duchess to whom she was maid of honor. This excellent woman, admired for piety and benevolence as well as learning, died of the small pox, June 1685, and she had the felicity of having her merits celebrated by the energetic muse of Dryden. In 1686 appeared her "poems" in 4to.

KILLIGREW, Margaret, known as the writer of 13 folio volumes, was daughter of Thomas Lucas, and second wife of W. Cavendish duke of Newcastle. The life of this her husband is the best of her works, and it has been translated into Latin. She died 1673.

KILWARDEN, Arthur Wolfe lord, an Irish judge. Though born of an obscure family, he received a liberal education, and after some residence at Trinity college, Dublin, he was called to the bar 1766. His abilities gradually recommended him, he became king's counsel, was chosen member of parliament, and in 1787 made solicitor general and in 1789 attorney general. The death of lord Clonmel opened his way to the dignity of chief justice of the king's bench in which high office all his measures were conducted with wisdom, integrity and justice. The moderation and impartiality of his public life, and his private virtues, however, were not proof against the violence of a blood-thirsty mob. During a popular insurrection in the streets of Dublin, he was met by an armed multitude, as he returned from the country, and his carriage was immediately surrounded by the ferocious rabble, and he and his nephew the Rev. Richard Wolfe were dragged away and piked to death in Thomas street, Dublin, 23d July, 1803. His daughter who was with him in the coach was spared by the murderers, one of whom courteously protected her and conveyed her to a place of safety. The last words of the expiring judge were that no violent punishment should be inflicted on his murderers, but that they might be impartially tried by the law.

KIMBER, Isaac, a native of Wantage, Berks, known as a dissenting divine, and eminent as the author of the Life of Oliver Cromwell, 8vo. — History of England, 4 vols. 8vo. — Life of Bishop Beveridge, prefixed to his works — Twenty posthumous sermons, &c. He was also for some years engaged in the London magazine, and died in London 1758, aged 66.

KIMBER, Edward, son of the preceding, left the trade of a bookseller, for the army, and served with credit in America. He was, after his father, editor of the London magazine, and wrote an history of England, 10 vols. 8vo. — the Pocket Peerage of England, Scotland and Ireland — besides Joe Thompson, a novel, and other works. He died 1769, aged 50.

KIMCHI, David, a Jewish rabbi at the beginning of the 13th century, born in Spain. His commentary on the Old Testament is much valued, as well as his Hebrew dictionary, best edited 1506, folio,—and Grammar, 1545. He was in consequence of his learning and eloquence, appointed 1232 to settle the disputes between the synagogues of France and Spain, about the works of Maimonides. His brothers Joseph and Moses were likewise eminent in literature.

KINASTON, Francis, son of sir Edward, was born in Shropshire, and educated at Oriel college, Oxford. He took his master's degree at Cambridge, and when introduced at court was knighted. He translated into Latin Chaucer's Troilus and Cressida, and also published in 1636 the constitutions of the Museum Minerva, a learned society, of which he was the first president. He died 1642.

KING, John, an English prelate, born at Wornall, Bucks, 1559, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford. He became chaplain to queen Elizabeth, dean of his college 1605, and bishop of London 1611. He died 30th March 1621. He was an eloquent speaker in the star chamber, according to Coke, and so eminent as a preacher, that king James called him the king of preachers. He published lectures on Jonah, besides sermons.

KING, Henry, son of the preceding, was born at Wornall, Jan. 1591, and educated partly at Thame school, and Westminster, and admitted student of Christ church 1608. He was chaplain to James I. and was made archdeacon of Colchester, canon of Christ church, and in 1638 dean of Rochester, and 1641 bishop of Chichester. Though suspected with truth of puritanical principles, he was treated with great harshness during the civil wars. At the restoration he recovered his bishopric, and died Oct. 1669, universally esteemed as the epitome of all honors and virtues. He published sermons—Exposition of the Lord's Prayer—the Psalms of David turned into metre—poems, elegies, sonnets, &c.—Latin and Greek poems.

KING, John, second son of the bishop of London, was student, and afterwards canon of Christ church, Oxford, and canon of Windsor. He was also public orator of the university, and died 1639. He is author of Oratio Panegyrica de Caroli Principis in Hispan. Adventu—Gratulatio pro Carolo Reduce, &c.—Cenotaphium Jacobi, &c.—besides sermons.

KING, Edward, a promising young man, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge, 1633. He was soon after drowned as he was passing from Chester to Ireland, a melancholy circumstance, which gave birth to the beautiful poem of Lycidas, by his friend Milton. A collection of his poems has been published, which does credit to his abilities as a favorite of Apollo.

KING, William, a humorous English writer, born in London, 1663, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, where he was student. In 1688 he appeared before the public as the defender of Wickliffe against the calumnies of Varillas, in a manner strongly expressive of his wit and learning; and at the same time he determined to follow the law as his profession. He took his degree of LL. D. 1692, and by the favor of Tillotson, the primate, was admitted to plead in the courts of civil and ecclesiastical law. In 1694 his Animadversion on Moleworth's pretended Account of Denmark, which had offended the Danes, was so much approved, that he was appointed secretary to the princeis Anne of Denmark. In 1697 the literary world was engaged in the controversy about the epistles of Phalaris, and Dr. King published on the occasion, two letters, addressed to Mr. Boyle, for which he was severely handled by Dr. Bentley. Though fully qualified to shine as an advocate, as he evinced in the case of lord Anglesea's divorce, yet he shrunk from the laborious fatigues of active business, better pleased with the character of a polite writer, whose powers were occasionally called into action by a spirit of satire, or the wish to amuse by facetious sallies. By degrees, however, a comfortable independence was dissipated in pleasure and indolence; and Dr. King was, by the interest of his friends, lords Rochester and Pembroke, appointed, about 1702, judge of the high court of the admiralty in Ireland, sole commissioner of prizes, keeper of the records in Birmingham tower, and vicar-general to the primate. These honorable and lucrative offices, however, could not fix the giddy attention of Dr. King; he preferred wit and the mules to active life and independence, and resigned all his employments, and returned to London about 1708. In 1710 he was engaged with Swift, Oldsworth, Mrs. Manley, and others, in the publication of the Examiner, in vindication of the queen's measures, and of the new ministry; and at the trial of Sacheverell, he employed his pen in the happiest vein of satire against the Whigs. In 1711 he was, by the friendship of Swift, appointed to the office of gazetteer, worth 250l. per annum. But such was the indolence of his disposition, and the fickleness of his mind, that oppressed with the idea of sitting up occasionally till three or four o'clock, to correct the press, he resigned the appointment the midsummer, next year. He soon after found his health decline, and shutting himself up for some time against all society, he died at some lodgings opposite Somerset house, provided him by his friend, lord Clarendon, 25th Dec. 1712. He was interred in the north cloisters of Westminster abbey. This singular man, though apparently chargeable with levity, was in his real character, virtuous and religious, in his dealings conscientious, and though fond of trifles, entertaining in his conversation, sincere and benevolent in his disposition, and so tender hearted that tears would often flow profusely on the least moving occasion. Besides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote, Historical Account of Heathen Gods and Heroes, for the use of Westminster school—the Life of M. A. Antoninus, from Madame Dacier—Dialogues of the Dead—a Journey to London, after the manner of Lister—the Transactioner—the Art of Love—the Art of Cookery—Rufinus, &c.—Britain's Palladium. His original works in verse and prose were published, 3 vols. 8vo. 1776.

KING, William, archbishop of Dublin, was born at Antrim, 1st Dec. 1650, and educated at the school of Dungannon, after which he entered at Trinity college, Dublin. He was patronized by archbishop Parker, of Tuam, and soon distinguished himself by his abilities as a writer in defence of the protestant cause in Ireland. He entered the lists against Manby, dean of Londonderry, who had lately become a convert to the catholic faith, and who vindicated his conduct in a pamphlet. His exertions in this controversy appeared so meritorious, that he was made dean of St. Patrick, and became a most active and indefatigable supporter of the revolution, though exposed to personal danger and constant persecution in consequence of the temporary success of the catholics, and of the cause of James II. in Ireland. After the battle of the Boyne, he was promoted to the see of Derry. In 1691 he published, "the State of the Protestants in Ireland, under James II." and afterwards applied himself sedulously to promote union and concord in his diocese. In 1702 appeared, in 4to. his celebrated work, "De Origine Mali," in which he supports that the evils which exist in the world, are not inconsistent with the goodness of God. This able performance, though well received at home, excited the censure of foreign critics, and among others was opposed by Bayle and Leibnitz. The work was translated into English by Edm. Law, afterwards bishop of Carlisle, with notes, &c. and a refutation of the several opinions which militated against the doctrine of the author. The third edition of the translation, 2 vols. 8vo. appeared 1739. In 1702 he was translated to the see of Dublin, and at three different times was one of the lords justices of Ireland. He died at Dublin, 8th May 1729. His other works were, a Discourse concerning the Inventions of Men in the Worship of God, 1694; which engaged him in a controversy with Boyce, one of the dissenters of his diocese — sermons, &c.

KING, Peter, chancellor of England, was born at Exeter, 1669. His father, who was a grocer and falter, intended him for an assistant in his business; but the son, after being engaged some years in the shop, at last broke from the obscurity of an humble trade. He had devoted his leisure hours to laborious study, and he was advised, by his maternal uncle, Mr. Locke, who left him half his library at his death, to improve himself further by studying at Leyden, and afterwards he entered at the Inner Temple. Here his superior abilities and his unceasing application raised him soon to eminence, and after distinguishing himself at the bar, he obtained a seat in the House of Commons in 1699, for Beeralston, Devon. But though raised to consequence by the practice of the law, he did not forget literary pursuits; his "Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, &c. of the Primitive Church," appeared in 1692; and in 1702, he published the History of the Apostles' Creed, with critical observations on its several articles, two works of great merit and extensive popularity. In 1708 he was made recorder of London, and knighted by queen Anne: the next year he was one of the managers of the House of Commons in the affair of Sacheverell; and at the accession of George I. he was raised to the office of chief justice of the Common Pleas. In 1725 he was created a peer, and immediately succeeded lord Macclesfield as lord chancellor. Though his abilities were great, yet it is said, the public expectation was disappointed by his conduct in chancery, as more of his decrees were repealed by the lords than had been known for the short time he presided in the court of equity. He resigned the seals in 1733; and, weakened by a paralytic disorder, died at his seat, at Ockam, Surrey, July 22, 1734, leaving four sons, and two daughters, and a widow, daughter of Richard Seys, of Boverton, Glamorganshire, esq.

KING, William, an English writer, son of the Rev. Peregrine King, was born at Stepney, Middlesex, 1685. He was educated at Salisbury, and Baliol college, Oxford; and in 1718, was made principal of St. Mary hall, by lord Arran, the chancellor, to whom he was secretary. In 1722 he resigned his headship upon becoming candidate to represent the university, but was defeated by Dr. Clarke, and then went to Ireland. While in that kingdom, he wrote his "Toast," an epic poem, conveying much satire, which he did not publish, but dispersed among his friends. At the dedication of the Radcliffe library in 1749, he spoke a Latin oration in the Oxford theatre, and was universally applauded, and deserved the high encomiums of T. Warton, in his Triumphs of Isis. Dr. King, in his political principles, was a strenuous tory, and not much affected to the Hanoverian succession; and in those times of violent party, he did not escape the abuse of the hirelings of ministry. He published about 1754, an "Apology," in 4to. in which he boldly attacked his adversaries, and refuted their frivolous and malevolent accusations. He published the first five volumes of South's sermons, and was esteemed for his wit and learning, and for great independence of spirit. He died 1763.

KING, sir Edmund, a surgeon and chemist, esteemed by Charles II. who is said to have spent much time in his laboratory. He attended the king in his last illness, and was ordered 1000l. by the privy council, which he never received. Some of his papers on ants, on the transfusing of blood from a calf to a sheep, and on animalcules in pepper, are found in the philosophical transactions. The time of his death is unknown.

KING, John Glen, D. D. a native of Norfolk, educated at Caius college, Cambridge. He was chaplain to the English factory at Petersburg, and was appointed medallist to the empress of Russia, at whose request he undertook a work on medals, but died 1787, before its completion. He published, the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church, with an Account of its Doctrines, Worship, and Discipline — Observations on the Climate of Russia, &c. with a View of the Flying Mountains, near Petersburg — Observations on the Barberini Vase.

KIPPINGIUS, Henry, a native of Rostock, educated in the university there, where he took the degree of M. A. He was pressed for a soldier, and served in the army; but when observed by a Swedish counsellor with a Latin book in his hand, his fortunes and his merits became known, and he was made the librarian of the noble inquirer, by whose interest also he procured the place of sub-rector of Bremen university. He wrote a Supplement to the History of John Pappus — treatises on the Creation — on Roman Antiquities, &c. and died 1678.

KIPPIS, Andrew, eminent as a biographer, was born in 1725, at Nottingham, and educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. He first settled as a dissenting teacher at Boston, Lincolnshire, 1746, and four years after removed to Dorking, Surrey, and in 1753 became the minister of the congregation of Princes street, Westminster. In 1763 he engaged as philological tutor in Coward's academy, for the education of dissenting ministers, and afterwards acquired such eminence as a writer, that he was created D. D. by the university of Edinburgh, and admitted fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies in London. Dr. Kippis died 1795, in Westminster, and was buried in Bunhill-fields' burying ground. The best known of his works is the Biographia Britannica, of which he began to publish a new edition in 1777, and of which five volumes appeared, and a sixth was nearly ready for the press before his death. He published, besides, a Vindication of Protestant Dissenting Ministers in their Application to Parliament, 1773, which created a controversy, though in amicable terms, between him and Dean Tucker—the Life of Captain Cook, 4to. 1788—the Life of Dr. Lardner, prefixed to the edition of his works, 1788—several sermons, and tracts: and he was also concerned for some years in the Monthly Review, and afterwards in the Library, a periodical work in 1761, which did not succeed; and he also wrote the History of Knowledge, &c. which so much recommended the sale of the new Annual Register. The style of Dr. Kippis was clear, elegant, and pleasing, and from his great application and extensive reading, he was a man of intelligence, learning, and judgment.

KIRCH, Mary Margaret, a native of Leipzig, daughter of Matthias Winkelman a Lutheran divine. She married in 1692, Godfrey Kirch, an astronomer of eminence of Luben in Lower Lusatia, who when appointed royal astronomer in 1700 in the newly established academy of sciences at Berlin, found in his wife an intelligent assistant, and an able calculator. She discovered in 1702 a comet, on which she and her husband published some observations, and in 1707 she observed that remarkable aurora borealis which the astronomers of Europe, and particularly the Paris academy of sciences noticed in their memoirs. The husband died 1710, and the following year his wife published a Discourse on the approaching conjunction of Jupiter, Saturn, &c. This respectable woman equally eminent for her private virtues died at Berlin 1720, aged 50. Her son Christian Frederic acquired some celebrity by his writings, and as astronomer to the Berlin academy of sciences, and died there 1740, aged 46.

KIRCHER, Athanasius, a jesuit, born 1601, at Fulda, in Germany, taught at Wirtzburg, in Franconia, and then went to settle in the jesuits' college at Avignon, 1635, and from thence passed to Rome where he was professor of mathematics and Hebrew. He died at Rome 1680. His works are very numerous, but rather curious than useful, amounting to 22 vols. folio. 11 in 4to. and 3 in 8vo. He is described as ridiculously fond of hieroglyphical characters and inscriptions. The chief of his works are Œdipus Ægyptia- cus, &c. 4 vols. fol. — Ars Magnesia — Lingua Ægyptiaca Restituta — Mundus Subterraneus, &c. — Organon Mathematicum, &c. — Ars Magna Sciendi, &c.

KIRCHER, Conrad, of Augsburg, is known by his Greek Concordance of the Old Testament, Frankfurt 1602, containing the Hebrew words in alphabetical order, with the corresponding Greek words placed under.

KIRCHMAN, John, a learned German born at Lubeck 1575. He studied at Frankfurt, Jena and Strasburg, and after acquiring celebrity as a scholar he was invited by the magistrates of Lubeck, in 1613, to undertake the office of rector of their college, which he executed with great reputation. He died 20th March, 1643. He wrote "de Funeribus Romanorum" — de Annulis, &c.

KIRCHMAN, N. an eminent professor of philosophy at Petersburg, who was unfortunately killed by a ball of fire, while he was making experiments on electricity, and endeavouring to draw down the electric fluid from the clouds, 6th Aug. 1758.

KIRCHMAYER, John Gaspar, professor of logic at Wittemberg, was born at Uffenheim in Franconia, and died 1700, aged 65. He was a learned man and published some valuable commentaries on Corn. Nepos, Tacitus, Cicero, Sallust, and Pliny — Orations and Poems — a treatise de Balsamo, &c.

KIRK, Colonel, an English officer in the service of James II. who disgraced himself by his cruelties in the west of England against the unfortunate abettors of Monmouth's rebellion in 1685. To the most wanton barbarity, it is said that he added lust of the most offensive nature, though some are inclined to doubt the truth of his barbarities mentioned in Pomfret's poem. It is said that James in his wish to make converts to the catholic religion solicited this monster, who rudely replied, that when quartered at Tangier he had promised the dey, when he changed religion he would become a Mahometan. Kirk was in the army under king William. The year of his death is unknown.

KIRKLAND, Thomas, a physician of eminence who died at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, 1798, aged 77. He was member of the medical societies of Edinburgh and London, and acquired some celebrity as an intelligent writer and a popular practitioner. He wrote an inquiry into the State of Medical Surgery, 2 vols. 8vo. — Observations on Pott's Remarks on Fractures — Commentary on Apoplectic and Paralytic Affections, 8vo. — treatise on Child-bed Fevers, 8vo. — Thoughts on Amputation.

KIRSTENIUS, Peter, professor of physic at Upsal, and in the service of queen Christina, was born at Breslaw in Silesia, 25th Dec. 1577. He applied himself assiduously to literature, and to botany and philosophy, and after studying for 14 years at Leipzig, Wittemberg, and Jena, he visited the Low Countries and France, and afterwards extended his travels to Italy, Greece, and Asia. He had for some time the management of the school, and of the university of Breslaw, but he resigned it for the practice of physic, and the study of Arabic. He accompanied Oxenstiern to Sweden, and was in 1636 chosen professor of physic at Upsal, but he died 18th April 1640. He was according according to his epitaph, well acquainted with 26 languages. His principal works are Grammatica Arabica—Tria Specimina, &c.—Decas Sacra, &c.—Vita quatuor Evangelistarum ex antiquissimo Codice M. S. Arabico eruta, folio.—Notæ in S. Matthæum.

KIRSTENIUS, George, a native of Stettin in Pomerania, eminent as a botanist, who died in Sweden 1660, aged 48. He was author of Disquisitiones Philologicæ, 4to.—Adversaria & Animadversiones in Agricolæ Commentaria, &c. 4to.

KLEBER, J. B. a celebrated French general, born at Strasburg 1750. He was early devoted to architecture, and to improve his talents he was sent to Paris to refine his taste by the instruction of the well-known Chalgrin. Here by accident he saw some foreigners insulted in a coffee-house, and with noble indignation he defended them against their opponents, and thus secure in their gratitude and friendship he was prevailed to accompany them to Munich. In this new situation he obtained from Kaunitz, the son of the imperial prime minister, a lieutenancy in his regiment, but after eight years of honorable service in the Austrian army he returned to France. He was now appointed inspector of the public buildings of Upper Alsace by Galaisiere, and for six years devoted himself to the peaceful labors of his profession. The French revolution recalled him to a military life and he obtained from Wimpfen the place of adjutant major in Custine's army. For his great and meritorious services at the taking of Mayence he was raised to the rank of general of brigade; but when faction solicited enemies to Custine, whom the revolutionary tyrants already doomed to the scaffold, Kleber had the courage not only not to accuse him, but to speak favorably of his conduct. In la Vendée he directed the attack of the island of Noirmontier, but the cruelties exercised on the innocent royalists were too shocking for his benevolent mind; he solicited his recall, and was permitted to go to the army of the North. The defeat of the Austrians at Merber-le-Chateau, and at Marchiennes was rapidly followed by the fall of Mons, the evacuation of Louvaine, and the siege of Maëstricht, which in 10 days opened its gates to the conqueror. These victories, followed by the submission of Duffeldorf, of Frankfort, and the battle of Butzbach, instead, however, of serving the gallant Kleber, rendered him suspected to the directory, and he retired in discontent to the solitude of a country house near Paris. Here he employed himself in digesting memoirs of his military life, when Bonaparte going to Egypt called him away to follow his standard and share his glories. At the siege of Alexandria, as he was scaling the walls, he was wounded on the head, but did not retire from the field of danger. When Bonaparte advanced against Cairo he left his faithful friend commander in Alexandria, and when he afterwards quitted Egypt to return to Europe he appointed him his successor with full powers. Though victorious on all sides Kleber listened to a proposal of peace, and he signed the treaty of El-Arisch with sir Sidney Smith which permitted the French to return with their arms and baggage to Europe. This armistice was not approved by the English government, and after he had delivered some of his fortresses into the hands of the Turks, Kleber was informed by lord Keith that the treaty of El-Arisch was void. Undismayed at his situation, the general with great presence of mind provided against every imminent danger; he recovered the strong holds which had been given up, and he marched at last to the attack of a Turkish army at the obelisk of Heliopolis, and defeated them with great slaughter, though ten times more numerous than his own soldiers. After this victory he subdued the spirit of insurrection which had burst forth at Cairo, and in other places, and he now formed plans for the peaceful government of the country, and for a regular intercourse between the various towns of Egypt, when he was suddenly attacked, while walking in his garden, by Solyman, a Turk, who dispatched him with four blows with a dagger, 1800. In his appearance Kleber was pleasing and comely, his stature was six feet, well proportioned; his features were mild, but his eyes were expressive, and in the field of battle his voice, otherwise soft and melodious, spoke with the terror of thunder.

KLEIST, Ewald Christian de, a native of Zeblin in Pomerania, distinguished as an officer in the Prussian service, and as a poet. The battle of Kunnersdorff between the Russians and Prussians, Aug. 1759, proved fatal to him as he was, as major, leading his men of Hauffen's regiment into the thickest of the fight. His idyls after the manner of Gessner are much admired for their elegance and simplicity, and his moral treatises also possess merit. He wrote besides Reflections on the Military Art, 1759.

KLINGSTADT, a painter born at Riga 1657. He died at Paris aged 77. His miniatures for snuff boxes were much admired, though generally very licentious. His larger pieces were rare, but exquisitely finished, and for some of them he exacted as much as 500l, sterling.

KLOCKER, David, a painter born at Hamburg. After improving himself in Italy he settled at Stockholm, where the king liberally patronized him. His pieces, which are chiefly historical, and possess merit, are preserved in Sweden. He died 1698, aged 79.

KNAPTON, George, a portrait painter in crayons, the pupil of Richardson, and the keeper of the king's pictures, died at Kensington 1778, aged 80.

KNELLER, sir Godfrey, a eminent painter, born at Lubec 1648. He was educated at Leyden and was intended for the military profession, but his genius directed him to the drawing of figures; and after making a rapid progress in the art, under the instruction of Rembrandt at Amsterdam, he went to Rome. Here he studied under Carlo Marat and Bernini, and then went to Venice, and afterwards came to England, where his reputation quickly recommended him to the notice of Charles II. and of the court. He continued in favor with the succeeding monarchs, and acquired such celebrity that he drew no less than 10 crowned heads, besides electors and princes. William III. was particularly sensible of his abilities, he knighted him, and made him a gentleman of his privy chamber, and George I. honored him with the title of baronet. He was also created a nobleman and knight of the holy Roman empire by Leopold, and received the degree of LL. D. from the university university of Oxford. Kneller deserved these honors; no painter surpassed him in the outline and graceful disposal of his figures, and his likenesses were always considered as remarkably striking, though expressed in a flattering manner. Kneller honored by princes, and flattered by poets and wits, was not a little ostentatious of his consequence, he lived in great splendor at his house at Whitton near Hampton-court, but though accused of vanity, his manners are represented as blameless. He died Oct. 27th, 1723, and was buried at Whitton, and a monument by Rybrach, with a partial inscription by Pope was erected to his honor in Westminster abbey.

KNIGHT, Samuel, a native of London, educated at St. Paul's school and Trinity college, Cambridge. He held two livings, and was prebendary of Ely, and arch-deacon of Berks, and also chaplain to George II. He published the lives of Colet, and of Erasmus, 8vo. and died 16th Dec. 1746, aged 72, and was buried in his church at Bluntisham, Huntingdonshire.

KNOLLES, Richard, a native of Northamptonshire, educated at Oxford. After being some time fellow of Lincoln college, he was elected master of Sandwich school, where he became celebrated as a public teacher, and where he died 1610. He wrote Grammaticæ Latinæ, Græcæ, & Hebræicæ Compendium — History of the Turks, 1610, folio, a valuable book, often reprinted and improved, especially by Ricaut, 1680, folio. — the Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings and Emperors, to 1610. — a brief Discourse of the Greatness of the Turkish Empire, &c.

KNOLLES, sir Robert, a native of Cheshire, known as a warrior in the wars of Edward III. in France. From a common soldier, he became a general, and acquired both celebrity and opulence by his conquests in France. With the spoils of castles, cities, and monasteries, which he had destroyed, he built Rochester bridge, as a monument of his exploits. He died at his estate in Kent, 1407, aged 90.

KNOLLIS, Francis, an English statesman. He was born at Grays, Oxfordshire, and educated at Oxford, and when introduced at the court of Edward VI. he was distinguished for his zeal in the cause of reformation. During Mary's reign, he retired to the continent, but on Elizabeth's accession, he obtained the office of vice-chamberlain of the household, and of privy counsellor, and afterwards was made treasurer of the household, and knight of the garter. His abilities were employed on various occasions by the court, and he was one of those commissioners who sat at the trial of the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots. He was author of a treatise against the Usurpation of Papal Bishops, 1608, 8vo. and a General Survey of the Isle of Wight, never printed, and he died 1596.

KNORR VON ROSENROT, Christian, a learned German, who died 1689, aged 53. He is supposed to be the author of Kabbala Denudata, seu Doctrina Hebræorum Transcendentalis, &c. Opus Antiquissimæ philosophiæ. &c. ex Hebræo, Sultzbach, 1677, and 3 vols. fol. 1684, Frankfurt.

KNOTT, Edward, a jesuit, born at Pegsworth, near Morpeth, Northumberland. His real name was Matthias Wilson, and he entered among the jesuits, 1606, and was professor of divinity in the English college at Rome. He was afterwards provincial of England, and died in London, 4th Jan. 1655-6, aged 75, and was buried at St. Pancras. He was a great disciplinarian, and possessed of extensive learning. His writings against the protestants, gave rise to Chillingworth's famous book, called the Religion of Protestants.

KNOWLER, William, an English divine, the learned translator of Chrysostom's Comment on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. He died 1767, aged 68.

KNOWLES, Thomas, a native of Ely, educated at Ely school, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was made lecturer of Bury St. Edmund's, and prebendary of Ely cathedral, and died at Bury, 1802. He was an able divine, and wrote the Scripture Doctrine of the Existence and Attributes of a God, 12 sermons, 8vo. — Answer to Bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit, for which he was made D. D. by Secker — Lord Hervey's, and Dr. Middleton's Letters on the Roman Senate — Dialogue on the Test Act — Observations on the Tithe Bill — Primitive Christianity, in Defence of the Trinity — Advice to a young Divine, in six Letters — The Passion, a sermon — Observations on the divine Mission of Moses — On Charity and Sunday Schools — A discourse on Confirmation.

KNOWLTON, Thomas, an English botanist. He was in the service of Dr. Sherrard, and afterwards of lord Burlington, at Laneborough, Yorkshire, and died 1782, aged 90. His observations on the situation of the ancient Delgovicia, and on two men of extraordinary size, and on large deers' horns found in Yorkshire, appeared in the philosophical transactions, in letters to Mr. Catesby. He also discovered in Wallengfenmere, the moor balls, or globe conserva, called by Linnæus, Conserva Ægagophila.

KNOX, John, the famous reformer of Scotland, was born 1505, at Giffard, East Lothian, and educated at the university of St. Andrew's, under the celebrated John Major. He applied himself sedulously to the study of divinity, but the conversation of Wishart, the English commissioner in Scotland, as well as the writings of Jerome and Austin, opened his mind to the gross impositions of popery. He embraced publicly the tenets of the protestants, and then retired from persecution, into Germany, but some time after returned to St. Andrew's. Here he boldly began to preach against the pope, and afterwards passed over to England, where he became chaplain to Edward VI. and might have obtained a bishopric, had he not been an enemy to the liturgy and the established form of episcopacy. At the accession of Mary, he went over to the continent, and after visiting Frankfort and Geneva, and profiting by the counsels of Calvin, he determined to return to Scotland, 1555. The reformation was already gaining ground, even in the absence of her able supporter, and Knox by his eloquence, and his manly undaunted appeals to the leading men of the country, increased the number of his converts. In 1556 he again visited Geneva, but in his absence his enemies accused him of heresy, pronounced sentence of death against him, and burnt him in effigy at Edinburgh. He heard of the violence of his persecutors, and wrote from Geneva, "an Appellation against the unjust sentence pronounced against him," &c. and also also the "First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women," directed against the tyrannical measures of Mary of England, and of Mary of Lorraine, queen regent of Scotland. In 1559 he again returned to Scotland, and began effectually to establish the reformation. The kingdom was divided into 12 districts, and Edinburgh, as the most important, was entrusted to Knox. Regardless of the power of the queen, he publicly declared from the pulpit, that the mass established in her chapel was more frightful than 10,000 enemies, and when honored with a conference with his royal mistress, he offended her with the freedom and boldness of his address, and violently inveighed against her marrying the popish earl of Darnley. Notwithstanding these measures so hostile to the government, Knox was respected in his person, and in 1567 he preached the sermon at the coronation of James VI. He met, however, with some opposition from his followers, who wished to establish in his church, a sort of episcopacy, which proved very repugnant to his feelings, and was rejected with great indignation. He died Nov. 24, 1572, not a little afflicted at the intelligence of the bloody massacres just perpetrated at Paris. He was buried at Edinburgh, and his funeral was attended by many nobles, particularly Morton, the regent, who respected his abilities, and commended his zeal. His publications are not numerous, though it is to be lamented, that he appeared as the defender of the violent and atrocious measures pursued at Edinburgh, and especially of the murder of cardinal Beaton, once his persecutor. His History of the Reformation in Scotland was published after his death, and the fourth edition of it in folio, 1732, contains all his other pieces. Knox was twice married, and had children by both his wives. Two of his sons by his first wife became fellows of St. John's college, Cambridge, where they had received their education.

KNOX, John, a London bookseller, known as the planner of a herring fishery, and of a settlement on the north-east coast of Scotland. He published a Systematic View of Scotland, and died 1790.

KNÜPPER, Nicholas, a native of Leipzig, eminent as a painter. He died 1660, aged 57. His battles and conversations possessed peculiar merit.

KNUZEN, Matthias, a celebrated atheist, born at Holstein. He was very zealous in making proselytes, and his followers, who were numerous in some of the cities of the continent, and even in England, were called conscienciaries, as they regarded conscience, learning, and reason, as the only guides of man. They maintained that there was no god, no after-life, and they rejected religion, priests, and magistrates as impositions on the world. This wild enthusiast died at the end of the 17th century. His Latin letter, and his two dialogues in defence of his opinions, were refuted by Musæus, a Lutheran professor.

KNUZEN, Martin, a native of Königsberg, professor of philosophy there. He wrote various works, but the chief is his Defence of the Christian Religion. He died 1751, aged 38.

KNIGHTON, Henry, author of a chronicle of the English history, from 950 to 1395, and of a History of the Deposition of Richard II. both preserved in the collection of English historians, published 1652, was a canon regular of Leicester.

KONBERGER, Winceslaus, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, is his best piece, which is still viewed with admiration in the church of Notre Dame, at Antwerp. He died 1604, aged 70.

KOEMPFER, Engelbert, a German physician, born at Lemgow, in Westphalia, 16th Sept. 1651. After improving himself in the universities of Dantzic, Thorn, Cracow, and Königsberg; he visited Upsal, and recommended himself to the notice of Charles XI. of Sweden, and accepted the place of secretary to the embassy, sent in 1683 to the sophi of Persia. During this employment, he had various opportunities, which he gladly improved, of visiting the curiosities natural and artificial, in passing through Russia, in Georgia, and on the banks of the Caspian sea. For two years he resided at Ispahan, but when the ambassador prepared to return, he obtained permission to go further into the east, and he engaged himself as surgeon to the Dutch East India fleet. In his way he examined the ruins of Persepolis, and afterwards visited Gamron, Arabia Felix, the coast of Malabar, Ceylon, Bengal, and Batavia. In 1690 he accompanied the annual embassy of the Dutch to the court of Japan, and after staying two years in that distant country, he prepared to return to Europe. He quitted Batavia, Feb. 1693, and after touching at the cape of Good Hope, reached Amsterdam in October. In 1694 he took the degree of M. D. at Leyden, but the popularity which he acquired as physician, prevented the immediate arrangement of his valuable papers and observations on subjects of natural history, botany, and mineralogy. Whilst he promised himself length of life, he found that his constitution was shattered by fatigues in distant climates, and some family difficulties hastened his dissolution. He died 2d Nov. 1716. His MSS. and drawings were purchased of his executors, by sir Hans Sloane, and his History of Japan appeared in London, 2 vols. fol. 1727. His Amœnitates Exoticæ, a valuable work, was published 1712.

KOENIG, Daniel, a Swiss, who translated into Latin, Arbuthnot's, Tables of Ancient Coins, published at Utrecht, by professor Reitz, 1756. He died at Rotterdam, in consequence of the severe treatment which he received from the mob at Franeker, who mistook him for a spy, because he spoke French. He was only 22.

KOENIG, Samuel, brother to the preceding, was professor of philosophy, and natural law at Franeker, and afterwards became librarian to the prince of Orange, at the Hague. He was an able mathematician, and was engaged in a quarrel with Maupertuis, and in consequence of his "Appeal" written on the subject, he enlarged his reputation, and the number of his friends. He wrote various works, and died 1757.

KOERTEN, Joanna, a native of Amsterdam, whose great ingenuity and refined taste in embroidery, in drawing, in water colors, in wax models, in artificial ornaments, &c. was universally admired, and drew strangers to behold and commend the effects of her singular genius. Peter the great, of Russia, was one of those who complimented her on her abilities. The figures and landscapes which she cut with scissars, out of paper, were much celebrated, and the fine exhibition of groupes of trees, arms, eagles, crowns, &c. which she presented to the consort of Leopold, was liberally rewarded with with 4000 guilders. She also executed the portrait of the emperor in the same style. She died 1715, aged 65.

KOETS, Roelof, a native of Zwoll. His abilities as a painter were universally known, and William III. of England, paid particular attention to him. His portraits, it is said, amounted to 5000, and all in a very superior, and highly finished style. He died 1725, aged 70.

KONIG, George Matthias, a learned German, born at Altdorf, in Franconia, where he became professor of poetry, and of Greek, and also librarian. He was an able scholar, and was author of a biographical dictionary, called Bibliotheca Vetus & Nova, 4to. 1678, which though censured by some, is yet possessed of merit. He died Dec. 29, 1699, aged 83.

KONIG, Emanuel, a physician of Basil, where he died 1731, aged 73. He published various works on medicines, highly esteemed in Switzerland.

KORNMAN, Henry, a German lawyer in the beginning of the 17th century, author of some treatises, De Miraculis Vivorum — De Miraculis Mortuorum — De Virginitatis Jure — De Linea Amoris.

KORTHOLT, Christian, professor of divinity at Keil, was born 15th Jan. 1633, at Burg, in the island of Feme- ren. He studied at Burg, Sleswick, Stettin, and Rostock, Jena, Leipzig, and Wittenberg. In 1662 he was made Greek professor at Rostock, and in 1665 removed to Keil, where he enjoyed the favor and the patronage of the duke of Holstein, and became vice-chancellor of the university. He died, 31st March, 1694, greatly lamented. He wrote various works, De Veracitate, &c. — De Naturâ Philosophiæ, &c. and a valuable work on Christ, as God and Man.

KORTHOLT, Christian, grandson of the preceding, was professor of theology at Gottingen, and died in the flower of his age, 1751. He published, "Leibnitz's Latin Letters," 4 vols. and his French Letters in one volume.

KOTTER, Christopher, a fanatic, who lived at Sprotow. In 1616 he began his enthusiastic career, and threatened the princes and nations of Europe with terrible judgments, according to the directions, as he said, of an angel. He was pilloried in the emperor's dominions, and afterwards banished, and he then retired to Lusatia, where he died 1647, aged 62. He was the friend of Comenius, and his reveries with those of two others, were published at Amsterdam, 1657, and called, Lux in Tenebris.

KOUCK, Peter, a Dutch painter, who after travelling to Constantinople, settled at Antwerp, and became principal painter to Charles V. and died 1550, aged 50. His views of Constantinople, &c. are highly valued.

KOULI KHAN, Thamas, or Nadir, a celebrated warrior, born 1687, in a village, in the province of Cherasan, in Persia. He was the son of a shepherd, but he quitted the humble occupation of his youth, and by selling some of his father's sheep, he collected a number of desperate followers, who, attached to him, shared his dangers and his booties in plundering caravans, and attacking defenceless travellers. By degrees he saw himself at the head of 6000 brave adherents, and became so formidable, that his assistance was solicited by the Schah Thamas, whose throne was usurped by Eschref, the chief of the Aghwans. With the most impetuous valor, Kouli attacked the enemy, and soon routed them, and then seated his master on the throne of his ancestors at Isfahan. Thus victorious he pursued the flying Aghwans, to Candahar, and after carrying terror and desolation before him, and obtaining an immense booty he returned to Isfahan. Instead, however, of finding Thamas engaged in a Turkish war, as he had recommended, he saw him lulled into effeminate security, and therefore, displeased with his conduct, he boldly seized his person, and proclaiming his son, an infant, six months old, Sophi of Persia; he declared himself regent of the kingdom. Eager after military fame, Kouli immediately made war against the Turks, with the most astonishing success, displaying every where in his conduct, valor, prudence, and heroism. On the death of the young king, 1737, he signified his intention of resigning his honors; but the nobles, excited by his private intrigues, interfered, and invested him with the sovereign power, and seated him on the throne of Persia. Now elevated to the height of his ambition, he wisely saw that war was the only support of his greatness, and therefore with a numerous army, devoted to him by his liberality, and by his personal valor, he marched against India. The Mogul empire was rapidly conquered, 200,000 men were put to the sword, and a booty of 145 millions rewarded the victor at the taking of Delhi. To the possession of the Mogul dominions, was soon added the conquest of the Usbec Tartars, and the capture of Buchara, their chief city; and on all sides, wherever he turned his arms, he found no power able to withstand his attacks. Such astonishing successes required wisdom and decision to cement them, but unfortunately, when his abilities were wanted to give stability to his immense dominions, Kouli became capricious, proud, and tyrannical. With injudicious violence he attempted to introduce the religion of Omar among his subjects, and to render his decrees more terrible, he put to a cruel death the priests who opposed his measures, and even sacrificed his own son to his ferocious measures. This conduct revolted the attachment of the Persians, and the nobles who foresaw in the capricious cruelty of their master their own destruction, conspired against him, and assassinated him, 8th June, 1747, after he had reigned 20 years over one of the most extensive and powerful empires of the world.

KRACHENINNIKOW, Stephen, a Russian naturalist, educated at Petersburg. He was engaged 10 years in making observations on the natural productions of Kamtschatka, and the neighbouring country, and on his return, in 1743, he was made associate of the academy, and in 1753, professor of botany, and natural history. His travels, &c. were published in Chappe d'Auteroche's Account of Siberia. He died 1755, aged 42.

KRANTZ, Albert, a famous historian and divine, born at Hamburg. He became professor of philosophy and divinity at Rostock, 1482, and in 1498 was elected dean of the chapter of Hamburg, where he died 1517. The best known of his learned works, are Chronica Regnorum, Aquiloniorum Danicæ, Sueciæ, &c. — Saxonia five de Saxoniciæ Gentis Origine, &c. lib. 13. ad ann. 1501 — Vandalia, five de Vandalarum Origine, &c. — Metropolis, five Historia Ecclesiastica Saxoniciæ, and other works.

KRAUSE, Francis, a native of Augsburg, the disciple of Piazzetta, and eminent as an historical painter. Though his pieces possessed merit, he died poor, after a residence of some years in France, 1754, aged 48.

KRESA, Father, a native of Moravia, confessor to the king and queen of Bohemia, where he died 1715, aged 67. He was well acquainted with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese, and wrote Analysis Speciosa Trigonometriæ Sphæricæ, &c.

KRUGER, John Christian, author of poems and comedies, and translator of Marivaux's Theatre into German, acquired also some reputation as an actor, and died at Hamburg, 1750, aged 28.

KUHLMAN, Quirinus, a famous fanatic, born at Breslaw in Silesia, 1651. While his learning promised the fairest fruits, he was attacked at the age of 18, by a violent illness, from which he recovered with difficulty. But with returning health, he displayed the wildest manners, and pretending to have held converse with departed spirits and aerial beings, he set up for a prophet. He went to Holland, where the reading of Behmen's works increased the extravagance of his reveries. Though seemingly devoted to spiritual affairs exclusively, he had some respect for the things of the world, he kept some concubines, and extorted money from the credulous, by threatening terrible and approaching vengeance if they did not satisfy his wants. After wandering over England, France, and the east, he was at last stopped at Moscow, and burnt, 3d Oct. 1689, on account of some prophecies which were interpreted as improper and seditious. He published Prodromus Quinquennis Mirabilis, 1674, and other things.

KUHNUS, Joachim, a learned native of Gripwalde, Pomerania, who after studying at Stade and Jena, became principal of the college of Oettingen, in Swabia, and three years after, in 1676, was elected Greek professor of the university of Strasburg. The professorship of Hebrew was afterwards added to his other appointments, and he acquired great celebrity by his publications, and in the number of his pupils. He died 11th Dec. 1697, aged 50. He published excellent editions with notes, of Ælian, Diogenes, Pausanias, besides other works.

KUICK, John Van, a painter of Dordt, who was accused of heresy, by the jesuits, in consequence of some offence which he had given to the fraternity, and cruelly burnt to death 1572, aged 42.

KUNCKET, John, an able chemist, and ingenious philosopher, born in the duchy of Sleswic, 1630. He died 1702. He published at London, Observationes Chemicæ, 1678, 12mo. and discovered the phosphorus of urine, and introduced several useful improvements in the arts, and philosophy.

KUPIESKI, John, a painter of Bohemia, born 1667, who studied in Italy, and acquired such reputation as to deserve and enjoy the patronage of the emperor Charles III. of the Czar Peter, and other princes.

KUSTER, Ludolf, a learned critic, born at Blomberg, in Westphalia, 1670. The abilities which he early displayed, recommended him as tutor to the sons of the Prussian prime minister, and his services were rewarded by the promise of a professorship in the university of Berlin. In the meantime he travelled over Holland Germany, France, and England, whereat last he produced, after four years' laborious investigation, his edition of Suidas, in 3 vols. folio, at Cambridge. The work was honorably received by the university, the editor was complimented with the degree of doctor, and advantageous offers were made to him to settle there. He, however, declined them all, to take possession of his Berlin professorship, which, together with the place of king's librarian, he soon after relinquished with capricious indifference, and went to Amsterdam, where he published his Aristophanes, in 1710, and an edition of Mills' Greek Testament. From Amsterdam he went to Rotterdam, and then to Antwerp, where he was prevailed upon by the jesuits, to renounce the protestant tenets for the catholic faith, in 1713. This dereliction of his religion, or his services to literature, recommended him to the French king, who granted him a pension of 2000 livres, and appointed him associate of the academy of inscriptions. Kuster did not long enjoy his honors at Paris. He died the 12th Oct. 1716, of an abscess in the pancreas, aged only 46. His other works, were an edition of Jamblicus's Life of Pythagoras — Historia Critica Homeri — Bibliotheca Novorum Librorum ab 1697, usque 1699, 5 vols. — De Vero Ufu Verborum Mediorum apud Græcos, a valuable book, &c.

KUYF, Jacob, a landscape painter of eminence, who founded the academy of painting at Dordt, 1643. His son, Albert, rose superior to his father in fame, and excelled him in the delicacy of his coloring, and the variety and correctness of his pieces.

KYD, Thomas, a writer in the age of Elizabeth. He published 1595, Pompey the Great, a play, translated from the French of Garnier.

KYDERMYNSTER, Richard, abbot and historian of the Benedictine convent of Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, was born at Worcester. Besides the History of his Convent in 5 books, he wrote some pieces against the Reformation, &c. and died at his abbey, 1531.

KYNASTON, John, an English divine, born at Chelster, 5th Dec. 1728, and educated at Brazen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow 1751. He gained great reputation in the university, by his oration, "De Impietate C. Corn. Tacito, falso objectatâ," on the foundation of sir Francis Bridgman, delivered in the chapel of his college, 1761, and published. He wrote some other things, and died in consequence of breaking his left arm very near the shoulder, June 1783.

KYNWELMARSH, Francis, a native of Essex, who studied the law at Gray's Inn, and assisted Gascoigne in his translation of Euripides's tragedy of Jocasta. He wrote some poetry of considerable merit, which, together with the poetical trifles of his brother Anthony, are preserved in the Paradise of Dainty Devices, 1576.

KYRLE, John, the celebrated man of Rofs, immortalized by the muse of Pope, and more by his own beneficent actions. With an estate of only 500l. a-year, he was the blessing of his native county of Hereford; he built a church, endowed hospitals, and had the good fortune to be seconded in his charitable works by the liberality of his opulent neighbours. He died 1724, aged 90, but "no monument, inscription, stone," as the poet observes, mark his remains.

LAB

LABADIE, John, a famous enthusiast, born 10th Feb. 1610, at Bourg in Guienne. He was educated amongst the jesuits of Bourdeaux, but quitted their society, when his studies were completed; though some affirm that he was disgracefully expelled for his irregularities and hypocrisy. He came to Paris where as an itinerant preacher he acquired celebrity, and was presented by Coumartin, bishop of Amiens, to a canonry in his cathedral. At Amiens the singularity of his doctrines soon collected a number of devotees around him; but when his intrigues with the nuns produced his disgrace, he retired to Bazas, and afterwards to Toulouse. There his opinions had such effect upon the nuns that they were persuaded to listen to his spiritual harangues, with their person stark naked, while in thus imitating Adam and Eve, they aspired to superior mental purity; but these indecorous meetings were no sooner mentioned to the archbishop than Labadie was dismissed in disgrace. He next excited the public attention at Montauban, and then passed to Orange, and next to Geneva where he resided some years. In 1666 he went to Middleburg, where his followers became very numerous. He afterwards retired to Erfurt, but soon left it in consequence of the war, and took up his residence at Altona in Holstein, where a violent colic carried him off in 1674, in his 64th year. In his manners Labadie was austere, with a mixture of candor, piety, and hypocrisy, and he had the art of insinuating his principles with such efficacy, that the most learned and the most virtuous became converts to his wild opinions. Among his warmest admirers were Mademoiselle Schurman, Madame Bourignon, Elizabeth princefs Palatine, and others. With an air of gravity and of affected sanctity, he imposed upon the credulity of his pupils, and after beginning with ghostly advice, and the most serious exhortations to mental innocence and bodily purity, he often ended with the grossest sensualities. His mystical opinions, which once were very prevalent, and procured to his followers the appellation of Labadists, are no longer regarded. In his particular tenets he maintained that God might deceive, that the holy scriptures were not necessary to salvation, that the Old Testament was carnal, and that the New, regarding only the state of the spirit, made all men free; that the observation of the Sabbath was unnecessary; that the church was divided into two parts, the degenerate, and the regenerate, or his followers, and that self denial and the mortification of the senses, cherished and improved by mental prayer, would raise man to the possession of God, and to a familiar conversation with him. The propagation of these heterogeneous and inconsistent doctrines for a while had an astonishing influence on the multitude, and almost excited civil war in some of the provinces of Holland.

LAB

LABAT, John Baptist, a Dominican of Paris, professor of philosophy at Nancy. He went in 1693 as missionary to America, and returned in 1705 to France. He was for some time at Boulogne, and died at Paris, 6th Jan. 1738. He published, Nouveau Voyage aux Isles de l'Amerique, 6 vols. 8vo. — Voyages en Espagne & Italie, 8 vols. 12mo. — Nouvelle Relation de l'Afrique Occidentale, 5 vols. 12mo. compiled from others — Voyage du Chevalier Marchais en Guinée, 4 vols. 12mo. — Relation Historique de l'Ethiopie Occidentale, from Cavazzi's Latin works, 4 vols. 12mo.

LABBE, Philip, a jesuit of Bourges, of great learning, prodigious memory, and indefatigable application. He died at Paris 1667, aged 60, highly respected as an able critic, and an excellent private character. His works are de Byzantinæ Historiæ Scriptoribus, folio — Nova Bibliotheca MS. 2 vols. fol. — Bibliotheca Biblicarum, fol. — Concordia Chronologica, 5 vols. fol. — Concordia Sacræ et Profanæ Chronologiæ, &c. 12mo. — Le Chronologue Francois, 6 vols. 12mo. — Bibliotheca Ante-Janseniana, 4to. — Notitia Dignitatum Imperii Rom. 12mo. — De Scriptoribus Eccles. Dissertatio, 2 vols. 8vo. — Conciliorum Collectio Maxima, 17 vols. fol. — Lives of learned Jesuits, &c. and some valuable works on grammar and Greek poetry.

LABBE, Louisa, a poetess, called the fair rope maker, because she married a rich rope maker of Lyons, who at his death left her all his property. For some time she aspired to distinction in arms, and conducted herself courageously at the siege of Perpignan, in men's cloaths. Her attachment to literature was also very great, and whilst as a courtesan she extorted a high premium for the possession of her charms, she was more condescending to men of letters, and admitted them to her favors gratis. Her works, in prose and verse, were printed at Lyons 1555, and 1762, 12mo. and are considered as possessing high merit. She died 1566, aged 40.

LABEO, Quintus Fabius, a Roman consul, who possessed great literary talents, and is said to have assisted Terence in the composition of his plays.

LABEO, Antistius, a Roman lawyer who opposed the government of Augustus, and refused the consulship, when offered to him by the emperor. His father was one of Cæsar's murderers, and patriotism and opposition to tyranny were hereditary in the family. — A tribune of that name caused the condemnation of Metellus, B. C. 148.

LABERIUS, Decimus, a Roman knight, who excelled as a writer of satirical productions or mimes, for the stage. Cæsar to disgrace him obliged him to repeat one of his pieces on the stage, and the poet with great presence of mind, spoke with censorious humor against the oppressor of his country. He died 44 B. C.

LABOUREUR, John le, a native of Montmorency, who who from the humble occupation of a gentleman's servant, rose to some consideration, and became an abbé prior of Juvigné, and almoner to the king, and commander of the order of St. Michael. He died 1675, aged 52. He published the Collection of Monuments of illustrious Persons buried in the Celestines' Church at Paris, 4to. 1642 — the History of Marshal Guebriant with the Genealogy of Budos, and other Families in Brittany — the Memoirs of Michael Castelnau, and other works. His brother Lewis wrote some poetry, and died 1679, and his uncle Claude, who was an ecclesiastic, published in 1643, notes and corrections on the Breviary of Lyons, &c.

LACARRY, Giles, a French jesuit who died 1684, aged 79. Though much employed as a professor of philosophy and theology, he wrote some useful works, Historia Galliarum sub Præfectis Prætoris Galliarum, 4to. — Historia Coloniarum a Gallis in Externas Nationes Missarum, 4to. — de Regibus Franciæ & Lege Salica — Historia Romana, 4to. — Notitia Provinciarum Imperii Utriusque cum notis, 4to. — besides editions of Vell. Parterculus & Tacitus de Germ.

LA COLONIE, John Martin de, a native of Perigord, who died at Bourdeaux 1759, aged 85. He served in the Austrian army, and obtained the rank of marshal. He wrote military memoirs, published Frankfort, 1730, and Brussels 1739, 2 vols. 12mo. and also an History of Bourdeaux, 3 vols. 12mo.

LACOMBE, James, a French historian, born at Paris 1724. He is author of some popular works, Abregé Chronologique de l'Histoire Ancienne — de l'Histoire du Nord — Revolutions de la Russie — Histoire de Christine, Reine de Suede, &c.

LACOMBE DE PREZEL, Honoré, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris 1725. He is author of several Dictionaries — de Jurisprudence — du Citoyen — de Portraits et d'Anecdotes des Hommes Celebres, &c. Another of the same name wrote a useful dictionary of old French, 7 vols. 8vo. 1765.

LACTANTIUS, Lucius Cælius Firmianus, a Latin father of the church, said to have been born in Africa, or according to some at Fermo in Italy. His abilities recommended him to the notice of Constantine, who made him tutor to his son Crispus. His style is much in the manner of Cicero, possessing force elegance and purity. Of his works, the best edition is that of Paris, 2 vols. 4to. 1748.

LACY, John, an excellent actor in the reign of Charles II. with whom he was a great and familiar favorite. He wrote the Dumb Lady — the Old Troop, or Monfieur Ragou — Sir Hercules Buffoon, three tragedies. There was an English gentleman of that name who favored the French impostors who called themselves prophets, at the beginning of the 18th century, and was imprisoned for some of his publications.

LACYDAS, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, successor to Arcesilaus in the second academy. His grief at the loss of a favorite goose was ridiculous. He died B. C. 112.

LADISLAUS I. son of Bela I. succeeded to the Hungarian throne after his brother Geisa 1077. He was an able politician and a warlike general, and after defeating the Bohemians, Russians, Tartars and Bulga-rians, and driving away the Huns from Hungary he marched against Dalmatia and Croatia where his sister was cruelly treated by her husband Zuonimir, and he added those provinces to his empire. To valor in the field he also added piety at home, and deserved for his great sanctity to be canonized by Celestinus III. in 1198. He died 30th July 1095.

LADISLAUS III. king of Hungary after his father Stephen V. was cruel and licentious. He divorced his wife to be more unrestrained with his concubines, and so offended his subjects by his oppression and immoral conduct that he was assassinated 1290, in the 18th year of his reign.

LADISLAUS IV. grand duke of Lithuania, and king of Poland since 1434, was made king of Hungary in 1440 on the death of Albert of Austria. He made war against the Turks and defeated their sultan Amurath II. by the valor of his general Huniades; but after making a solemn peace with his enemy he was prevailed upon by the pope's ambassador to violate it. In consequence of this, Amurath hastened to give his aggressor battle, and proved victorious in the dreadful fight near Varnes, 11th Nov. 1444. Ladislaus was slain, but though his head was carried in triumph through the Turkish camp, the conqueror honored his remains with a most magnificent funeral.

LADISLAUS V. son of Albert of Austria, succeeded Ladislaus IV. under the protection of Huniades. It is said that he was poisoned by the Hussites, against whose sect he behaved with great rancor.

LADISLAUS VI. son of Casimir king of Poland, was raised to the throne of Hungary after Matthias Corvinus, 1490, in preference to his own brother Albert, to Maximilian of Austria, and to John the natural son of the late king. He made war against the Turks and other nations, and died after a very turbulent reign 1516.

LADISLAUS, or LAUNCELOT, the liberal and victorious, was count of Provence and succeeded his father Charles Duras as king of Naples 1386. His elevation was opposed by Lewis II. duke of Anjou, and by pope John XXIII. and this excited dreadful civil wars. In 1403 he seized the crown of Hungary, during the imprisonment of king Sigismund who soon after obliged him to retire into Italy, and afterwards he was defeated by his rival Lewis on the banks of the Garigliano in 1411. In the mean time though defeated he had the art to reconcile the pope to his interest; but at the moment that the pontiff promised himself tranquillity, Ladislaus marched against him and seized Rome, and afterwards turned his victorious arms against the Florentines, to whom he dictated terms of peace, 1413. Whilst promising himself greater success, Ladislaus died suddenly at Naples, 16th Aug. 1414, aged 38. It is said that his mistress, the daughter of a physician, had been prevailed upon by the vindictive Florentines to administer poison to him, so that he expired in the greatest agonies. He had been three times married, but left no issue.

LADISLAUS I. king of Poland, son of Casimir I. succeeded his brother Boleslaus II. 1081. He was fond of peace, but yet brave in war, as he defeated in three battles the Prussians and Pomeranians who wished to invade his kingdom. He died 26th July, 1102.

LADISLAUS II. king of Poland, after his father Boleslaus III. 1139, made war against his brothers, and was at last, after various successes, banished from his throne. His brother Boleslaus IV. succeeded him, and granted him Silesia at the request of Frederic Barbarossa. He died at Oldenburg 1159.

LADISLAUS III. king of Poland in 1296, proved so oppressive in his conduct towards the clergy and the people, that his subjects revolted and placed Wenceslaus on the throne. Now a fugitive, Ladislaus learned wisdom in adversity, and on the death of his successor, by the influence of the pope, he was again placed on the throne, and showed his gratitude by the mildness, justice, and popularity of his government. He defeated the revolted Pomeranians with the assistance of the Teutonic knights; but when these warriors had seized Dantzic as the reward of their exertions, the offended king marched against them, and cut to pieces their army, consisting of 20,000 men. He died soon after, 10th March, 1333, highly and deservedly respected.

LADISLAUS V. surnamed Jagellon, grand duke of Lithuania, obtained the crown of Poland 1386, by his marriage with Hedwige, daughter of Lewis king of Hungary. Hedwige had been placed on the throne of Poland, provided she took for her husband the person whom her subjects approved, and consequently Ladislaus, honored with the affection of the queen, left the superstitions of paganism, and was baptized and raised to the sovereignty. His reign was mild, but vigorous, he defeated the Teutonic knights in frequent battles, and added Lithuania to his Polish dominions, but refused the crown of Bohemia which was offered to him by the Hussites. He died 31st May, 1434, aged 80, universally and deservedly respected for his probity, his integrity, and all those virtues which should grace a throne.

LADISLAUS VI. king of Poland, son of Ladislaus V. was duke of Lithuania, and king of Hungary as already mentioned.

LADISLAUS, Sigismund, VII. king of Poland and Sweden after the death of his father Sigismund III. 1632, had displayed great bravery before his elevation, in his wars against the Turks, 150,000 of whom he had slain in various battles. When raised to the throne he governed with great moderation, but without forgetting the interests of his people, as he attacked the Russians who threatened him, and obliged them to make peace. He died without issue 1648, aged 52.

L'ADVOCAT, John Baptist, a jesuit, Hebrew professor, doctor and librarian of the Sorbonne, was born in the diocese of Toul 1709. He died at Paris 1765. He wrote a Geographical Dictionary, 8vo. — an Historical Dictionary, 2 vols. 8vo. abridged from Moreri, but since much enlarged — an Hebrew Grammar — a Tract on Councils — a Dissertation on the 67th Psalm — a Critique on some new Translations of Scripture, &c.

L'ADVOCAT, Louis Francis author of a treatise on a new system of morals and physics, was dean of the chamber of accounts at Paris, and died there 1735, aged 91.

LÆLIUS, Caius, a Roman consul, distinguished for his abilities as an orator and a man of learning. He was the friend of young Scipio, and is said to have assisted Terence in his plays — Another of the same name was the friend of the elder Africanus, and assisted in his victories over Asdrubal and Syphax.

LAER, Peter, a Dutch painter, surnamed from his deformity Bamboche. Some of his pieces which were elegant, but on trifling subjects, were in the Orleans collection. He was an amiable and facetious man, and died 1675.

LAET, John de, a native of Antwerp, director of the Dutch East India company. He died at Antwerp 1640, and was author of some useful works — Historia Naturalis Brasiliæ, folio — Novus Orbis, folio, 1633 — de Regis Hispaniæ Regnis & Opibus, 8vo. — Respublica Belgarum — Gallia — Turcici Imperii Status — Perfici Imperii Status — Vitruvius, printed by Elzivir, fol. 1649.

LÆVINUS, Torrentinus, commonly called Vander Beken, or Torrentin, was a native of Ghent, and studied at Louvaine. He made the tour of Italy, and on his return was appointed canon of Liege. He went as ambassador to Philip II. of Spain, who rewarded his services by making him bishop of Antwerp. From Antwerp he was translated to the archbishopric of Mechlin, where he died 1595. He founded the college of Jesuits at Louvaine, and by the elegance of his Latin poetry deserved to be called the prince of Lyric poets. He also edited Suetonius with notes.

LÆVIUS, a Roman poet, author of Love Games, and other poems now lost.

LAFITAU, Joseph Francis, a French jesuit, missionary among the Iroquois. He published a Comparison of the Manners of the Americans, with those of Ancient Times, 2 vols. 4to. — The Discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World, 4 vols. 4to. — Remarks on Ginseng, 12mo. He died 1755.

LAFITAU, Peter Francis, brother to the preceding, was born at Bourdeaux. He distinguished himself as a preacher and a negotiator, and became such a favorite by his wit and facetiousness with pope Clement IX. that he made him bishop of Sisteron. He died 1764, aged 79. He was author of History of the Constitution Unigenitus, 2 vols. 12mo. — History of Clement II. 2 vols. — Sermons, 4 vols. — Spiritual Letters, &c.

LAGALLA, Julius Caesar, a native of Padulla, in the kingdom of Naples. He studied at Naples, and when only 18 was made physician to the pope, and professor of logic at Rome, where he died 1623, aged 47. He was a very learned man, and wrote Disputatio de Cælo Animato, &c.

LAGERLOOF, Peter, professor of eloquence at Upsal, was employed by the king of Sweden to write the Histories, ancient and modern, of northern Europe. His Latin is considered as very correct and elegant. He died 1599, aged 51.

LAGNY, Thomas Fantet seigneur de, a native of Lyons, brought up to the bar, a profession which he relinquished for his favorite study of mathematics and philosophy. By the liberal support of the duke de Noailles he studied at Paris, and was made member of the academy of sciences. After a residence of 16 years as hydrographer to the king at Rochfort, he was invited to to Paris, to become librarian to Lewis XIV. with a liberal pension. He was author of, New Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots, 4to. — la Cubature de la Sphere — Elements of Arithmetic and Algebra, 12mo. — Analysis of Problems, 4to. — besides several papers in the memoirs of the academy. He died 1734, aged 74.

LAGUNA, Andrew, a physician, born at Segovia, 1499. He was about the person of Charles V. with whom he was a favorite, and died 1560. He wrote, Annotations on Dioscorides — Epitome of the works of Galen — a treatise of Weights and Measures.

LAHARPE DES UTINS, N. a native of Vaux, driven from his country for his attachment to French principles. He distinguished himself in the French army in Italy, under Bonaparte, and was killed near Fombio, April 1796.

LAHAYE, William Nicholas de, a French engraver of great merit, born 1725. More than 1200 maps, charts, &c. are mentioned as finely executed by him. He died at the beginning of the present century.

LAINÉZ, Alexander, a French poet, born 1650, at Chinay, in Hainault, and educated at Rheims. He travelled over Greece, the Archipelago, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Palestine, Egypt, Malta, Sicily, Italy, Switzerland, and France; but on his return to his native town, he found himself reduced to poverty. Two years after the abbé Faultrier, after suspecting him improperly of seditious measures, extended his protection towards him, and enabled him to settle at Paris, in possession of a comfortable competence. In this situation he was the soul of company, courted by the learned, the gay, and the opulent, but though given much to the pleasures of the table, yet fond of learning. He died April 18th, 1710, at Paris. His poetical pieces, which possess great vivacity and elegance, are all short, as the effusions of the moment and not of laborious study. They were collected and published 1753, in 8vo.

LAINÉZ, James, a Spaniard, the friend and successor of Loyola, as general of the jesuits, in 1558, was at the council of Trent, where he distinguished himself as the zealous supporter of papal power. His services were warmly acknowledged by pope Paul IV. who not only granted him power of altering and modifying the laws of his society, and of making contracts and agreements without their knowledge, but permitted him to have prisons independent of the secular power. Though ambitious, he refused a cardinal's hat, and died at Rome 1565, aged 53.

LAIRE, Francis Xavier, a native of Vadans, near Gray, distinguished for his learning, and knowledge of bibliography. He wrote, Memoirs for the History of some great men of the 15th century, with a Supplement to Mattaire's Annals of Typography, 4to. — Specimen Historicum Typographiæ Romanæ, &c. 8vo. — Epistola ab Abbate Ugolini, 8vo. — the Origin and Progress of Printing in Franche Comté, 12mo. — Index Libror. ab Inventa Typographia ad 1500, 2 vols. 8vo. — the edition of Aldini, 12mo. &c. He died at Sens 1800, aged 61.

LAIRESSE, Gerard, a Flemish painter, born at Liège 1640. He studied under his father, who was also a painter; but he soon surpassed him in execution, and acquired fame by painting some historical pieces for the electors of Cologne and Brandenburg. His gallantries reduced him to indigence; but one of his pictures falling into the hands of a Dutch merchant, he was persuaded to go and settle at Amsterdam, where his merits were soon known and rewarded. His pictures were so highly finished, that the Hollanders called him their best history painter, and their second Raphael. In his old age he lost his sight, and died at Amsterdam 1711, aged 71. His best piece is said to be a Moses, when a child, trampling on Pharaoh's crown. He was also eminent as a musician, and an engraver, and wrote a work on the Principles of Painting, translated into English. He left three sons, two of whom were painters. Of his three brothers, Ernest and John were eminent for painting animals, and James excelled as a flower painter.

LALIS, a celebrated courtesan of Hyccara in Sicily, who chiefly resided at Corinth, where she sold her favors so high, that non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum, became proverbial. Diogenes, the cynic, was one of her admirers. She is said to have been stoned in Thessaly by the women, jealous of her power over their husbands.

LAKE, Arthur, a native of Southampton, educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow. He was in 1608 made dean of Worcester, and in 1616 raised to the see of Bath and Wells. He died 1626, respected as an amiable man, and an exemplary prelate. A folio volume of his sermons appeared after his death.

LALANDE, Michael Richard de, a musician, born at Paris 1657. The pleasing powers of voice which he possessed when chorister of the church of St. Germain l'Auxerre, were unfortunately lost when he reached to manhood; but when refused, by Lulli, to appear as a violin player at the opera, he broke his instrument with indignation. Under the patronage of the duke of Noailles, he studied the organ, and became instructor to two of the princesses in music, composer to Lewis XIV. and master of his chapel. His compositions appeared in 2 vols. folio, deservedly admired. He died at Versailles 1726.

LALLI, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Orsina. He was employed in civil affairs under the pope, and the duke of Parma, and died 1637, aged 64. He wrote, Domiziano Moscheida — il Mal Francese. — besides the Destruction of Jerusalem — the Æneid translated, and other miscellaneous poems.

LALLY, Thomas Arthur, count, an Irishman in the service of France. His family had followed the fortunes of James II. He distinguished himself at the battle of Fontenoy; and in 1756 was sent as governor-general to the French possessions in the East Indies. After taking Gondalore and Fort St. David, he was defeated before Madras, and obliged to retreat to Pondicherry, which he surrendered, after an obstinate siege, to the English 1761. On his return to Europe, he was accused of selling Pondicherry to the English, and was condemned by the parliament to lose his head. The sentence was executed in 1766, but his son, Lally de Tollendal, obtained, in 1783, a reversal of of the cruel sentence, and was restored to his father's possessions and honors.

LAMBALLE, Marie Therese Louise of Savoy Carignan, princess of, was born at Turin, 8th Sept. 1749, and married the duke of Bourbon Penthièvre, by whom she was left a widow, young, beautiful, and amiable. When appointed intendant of the royal household of Marie Antoinette, she gained and deserved, by her good conduct, the confidence and friendship of her mistress. On the flight to Varennes, Madame Lamballe, by another road, quitted France, and from Dieppe came to England, where she might have lived happy; but she no sooner heard of the imprisonment of her royal friend, than she hastened back to Paris to share her sorrows and soothe her miseries in the Temple. This attachment was too noble to escape the notice of her tyrants. She was dragged to the prison of la Force, and on the fatal 3d of Sept. 1792, she was summoned to appear before a self-erected and bloody tribunal. When questioned about the queen by these ferocious murderers, she answered with firmness and dignity; but when some seemed to express pity for her misfortunes, and to applaud her innocence, the others stabbed her with their sabres, and after cutting off the head and the breasts, they tore out her still palpitating heart. Not satisfied with this, the diabolical monsters went in procession with the bleeding head and the heart, at the top of a pike, to expose them to the view of the unfortunate queen, and her wretched family; while the mangled body, with fresh insults, was dragged triumphantly through the streets. This illustrious female was one of the most innocent victims of the revolution; her name was never attacked with revolutionary sarcasms or libellous invectives; and though her tyrants cut her off by a horrid assassination, they never dared to asperse her character.

LAMBECIUS, Peter, a learned German, born at Hamburgh 1628. He studied in Holland and Paris, and at the age of 19 obtained great reputation by his essay on Aulus Gellius, published 1647. In 1652 he was appointed history professor of Hamburgh, and in 1660 rector of the university. In this situation he found himself exposed to great vexation from the censures of critics, and from the disobedience of his students; and when he attempted to repair his shattered fortune by marrying an old but rich woman, he found himself more bitterly exposed to persecution. His wife's temper was so intolerable, that within a fortnight of the celebration of his nuptials, he left Hamburgh, determined never to return to it. He repaired to Rome, where he renounced protestantism, by publicly professing the catholic faith, and afterwards returned to Vienna, where he was appointed librarian to the emperor, and also counsellor, and historiographer. He died of a dropsy at Vienna 1680. He wrote, Origines Hamburgenses, from the year 808 to 1292, 2 vols. 4to. — a catalogue of the MSS. of the Vienna Library, 8 vols. folio.

LAMBERT, Anne Therese, marquise de, an ingenious lady, born at Paris 1647. She married Henry Lambert, marquis of St. Bris, in 1666, and he died 20 years after. Her house became the general rendezvous of the learned, the polite, and the elegant. She died 1733, aged 86, universally respected. Her works have been collected into 2 vols. 12mo. and display an elegant taste, great sense, and the effusions of a virtuous heart. Her Advice of a Mother to a Son and Daughter — Reflections on Women — treatise on Old Age — and the Female Hermits, are much admired.

LAMBERT, John, a lawyer, who, during the civil wars, distinguished himself at the battles of Naseby and Fife, and was made a major-general. He favored the elevation of Cromwell to the protectorate, but opposed his assuming the title of king. At the restoration, he was excluded from the indemnity act, and was therefore tried and condemned to death. He was, however, reprieved, and sent in exile to Guernsey, where he died.

LAMBERT, Claude Francis, a French ecclesiastic, who became a writer for the booksellers, and died 1765 at Paris. He was author of New Telemachus, 3 vols. — Memoirs of a Woman of Quality, 3 vols. — History of all Nations, 14 vols. — Literary History of Lewis XIV.

LAMBERT, George, a landscape painter, who died Feb. 1st, 1765. He imitated the manner of Wootton, and afterwards that of Gaspar, and executed some admired scenes for the play-houses, and some large pictures for the East India company, still preserved in Leadenhall street.

LAMBERT, George Henry, an able mathematician, born at Mulhausen, in Alsace, 1728. His treatises on the Orbits of the Comets — on the Properties of Light — on Perspective, &c. were much admired. He died at Berlin of a consumption, 1777.

LAMBERT of Schawenburg, a German Benedictine, who went to Jerusalem in 1058, and published on his return, a dry chronicle from Adam to the year 1077, printed, Basil 1669, folio. The work is little else but a compendious history of Germany.

LAMBIN, Denys, professor of belles lettres at Paris, was born at Montrevil, in Picardy. His commentaries on Plautus, Lucretius, Cicero, and Horace, and his Latin translations of Aristotle's Morals and Politics, and of some of the orations of Demosthenes and Æschines, do credit to his abilities as a critic and a scholar. He died 1572, of grief for the death of his friend, Peter Ramus, who had been murdered at the massacre of Bartholomew, a melancholy fate, which he dreaded for himself.

LAMBRUN, Margaret, a Scotch heroine. The tragic fate of Mary, queen of Scots, so affected her husband, who was in her confidential service, that he died of a broken heart; and Margaret therefore determined to avenge, by one fatal blow, the death of her beloved mistress, and of her affectionate husband. Thus roused to revenge, she assumed a man's dress, and came to England, and appeared in the presence of Elizabeth. Her eagerness, however, to reach the queen, made her drop one of her pistols, and this circumstance immediately occasioned her arrest. When brought before the queen and interrogated, she, with undaunted countenance, declared herself to be not a man but a woman, and that she was determined to avenge the deaths of her mistress who had been so iniquitously murdered, and of her husband, who had fallen a sacrifice to his sorrow. Neither reason nor force, added she, can hinder a woman from vengeance when she is impelled by love. Elizabeth heard this with calm dignity, and replied, "you then persuade yourself that in assassinating me you have done your duty in satisfying your love for your mistress and your husband; what think you now to be my duty towards you?" On her asking whether she made this question as a judge, or as queen, Elizabeth replied, as a queen, then, rejoined Margaret, you ought to grant me a pardon. What assurance have I, answered Elizabeth, you will not repeat the attempt? Madam, replied Margaret, a favor granted under restraints is no longer a favor, and in so doing you would act against me as a judge. The address and the unyielding firmness of the assassin, had due weight with the magnanimous queen. Margaret received an unconditional pardon, and at her request she was conducted out of the kingdom, and landed on the coast of France.

LAMI, Bernard, a philosopher, born of a noble family at Mons, 1645. He was so warm an admirer of the principles of Descartes, that he was in consequence exposed to persecution, and deprived of his professorship at Saumur, and of all his ecclesiastical preferments. He died at Rouen 1715. His writings were esteemed. They were, Elements of Geometry, &c. 2 vols. 12mo. — Discourses on the Sciences, &c. treatise on Perspective — Demonstration of the Holiness and Truth of Christian Morality, 5 vols. 12mo. — Apparatus Biblicus, a valuable book, 4to. — de Tabernaculo Fœderis, &c. folio — Harmonia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to. — The Art of Speaking, with Reflections on Poetry, 12mo.

LAMI, Dom Francis, a writer, born at Montyreau, in the diocese of Chartres. From a soldier he became an ecclesiastic, and distinguished himself against Spinosa. He died at St. Denys, much regretted, 1711, aged 75. His book on Self Knowledge, 6 vols. 12mo. is greatly esteemed. He wrote besides, Philosophical Letters — a treatise on the Effects of Thunder — and other pieces, in a pure and elegant style.

LAMI, John, ecclesiastical professor at Florence, is well known as the careful editor of the works of Meursius, in 12 vols. folio. His book on the Trinity was censured by the jesuits, and defended by himself. He was a very facetious and agreeable companion. He died at Florence 1774.

LAMIA, a Greek courtesan, concubine to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, and afterwards to Demetrius Poliorcetes.

LA MOIGNON, Christian Francis de, an able lawyer, son of the marquis de Bafville, born at Paris 1644. His learning, intelligence, and great powers of oratory, recommended him to the notice and partiality of Lewis XIV. and he became advocate-general, and president of the parliament of Paris. He died in 1709, highly respected not only by the court, but by the people, by whom his virtues and abilities were deservedly admired. He was author of, le Plaidoyer — a Letter on the Death of Bourdaloue, &c. His father, who was a man of great literary merit, and president of the parliament of Paris, died 1677.

LAMPE, Frederic Adolphus, professor of theology, and rector of the university of Bremen, died there, 1729, aged 46. He wrote an admired treatise, de Cymbalis Veterum, 12mo. — besides History, Sacred and Ecclesiastical, 4to. — Commentary on St. John's Gospel, &c.

LAMPLUGH, Thomas, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he was fellow 1642. He followed the torrent during the civil wars, but at the restoration conformed, and was made head of Alban hall, and rector of St. Martin in the fields. In 1672 he was raised to the deanry of Rochester, and four years after to the see of Exeter. On William's landing, he exhorted the people to adhere to the fortunes of James, but soon after fled to London, and reconciled himself to the conqueror, on whose head he placed the crown, and by whom he was made archbishop of York. He died at Thorp castle 1691, aged 76.

LAMPRIIDIUS, Ælius, a Roman historian, author of the Lives of Commodus, Antoninus, &c. edited in the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores, 2 vols. 8vo. 1671.

LAMPRIIDIUS, Benedict, a Latin poet of Cremona, who taught Greek and Latin at Rome under Leo X. In 1521 he went to Padua, and some time after to Mantua, where he became tutor to the son of Frederic Gonzaga. His Greek and Latin epigrams, and his lyric verses are elegant, but far inferior to the style of Pindar, which he imitated. He died 1540.

LANA, Francis de, a jesuit, born at Brescia 1637. From his Magisterium Naturæ & Artis, published, Brescia, 3 vols. folio, it appears, that he first had an idea of aerostation, and in support of his prior claim, before Montgolfier, the inventor of air balloons, a work called, Navis Volans, extracted from his works, was published at Naples, 1784.

LANCASTER, James, an English navigator. He went, in 1591, with a squadron to the East Indies, where he visited Ceylon and Sumatra, and after destroying some of the enemy's ships, not without loss, he sailed back to England. Unfavorable winds drove him on the African coast, and while on shore, his crew cut the cables and set sail, leaving him on an island, from which he escaped by means of a French ship, and landed at Rye, 1594. In another expedition he coasted along the Brazils, and took the town of Fernambuco, and returned 1595, loaded with immense booty. He was afterwards sent to the East Indies by the East India company, and he obtained advantageous settlements at Achen, and at Bantam from the native princes, and soon after returned to England, where he spent the remainder of life in ease and independence. He died about 1620.

LANCASTER, Nathaniel, D. D. a native of Cheshire, patronized by lord Cholmondeley. He became rector of Stamford Rivers, near Ongar, Essex, and died 20th June, 1775, aged 75, leaving two daughters. His Essay on Delicacy, published 1748, was much admired. He wrote also, Public Virtue, or the Love of our Country, a sermon — the Old Serpent, or Methodism Triumphant, a long poem, &c.

LANCELOT, Claude, a native of Paris, tutor to the prince of Conti, and afterwards a Benedictine monk, in in the abbey of St. Cyran, from which he was banished, in consequence of some private quarrels, to Ruimperlay, Lower Brittany, where he died 1695, aged 79. He was the able author of Nouvelle Methode pour apprendre la Langue Latine, 1644 — & le Grec, 1656, translated into English by Nugent, under the title of Port-royal Grammars. He published also, Delectus Epigrammatum, 2 vols. 12mo. — Life of St. Cyran — Observations on Sacred Theology, &c.

LANCELOTTI, John Paul, a native of Perugia, eminent as a canonist, whose abilities were employed by pope Paul IV. in compiling the institutions of canon law, in imitation of Justinian's civil institutions. He wrote some other things, and died 1591, aged 80.

LANCJEAN, Remi, the most eminent of Vandyck's pupils, was a native of Brussels. His subjects are generally religious, and finished in a very superior style. He died 1671.

LANCISI, John Marca, a physician, born at Rome, 26th Oct. 1654. He distinguished himself early for his abilities as a medical man and a philosopher, and in 1668 was made physician to pope Innocent XI. He was in the same office with his successor Clement XI. and gained universal reputation by his writings, and the excellence of his private character. He died 21st Jan. 1720. He gave in his lifetime, his noble library, of more than 20,000 volumes, to the hospital of the holy ghost, for the use of students, &c. He wrote several books on his profession.

LANCRET, Nicholas, a French painter, brought up under Jellot and Watteau. He strongly imitated, but not with success, the manner of Watteau: his pieces, however, are agreeable. He died at Paris 1743, aged 53.

LANCRINCK, Prosper Henricus, a German painter, born at Antwerp about 1628. He lost his father when very young, but having a strong genius for painting, he improved himself by studying the manner of the most eminent masters of Europe in the collection of Van Lyan. He came over into England, where he was liberally patronized by the nobility; but unfortunately the most finished of his pictures were burnt in the house of his friend, sir William Williams. His landscapes were much admired. He fell a sacrifice to his intemperance, and died in August 1692. There still remains a valuable collection of pictures, drawings, prints, antique heads, &c. most of which he brought from abroad.

LANDA, Catherine, a learned lady, author of an elegant Latin letter to Peter Bembo 1526. She was sister to count Augustin Landa, and wife of count John Fermo Trivulcio.

LANDEN, John, a self-taught mathematician, born in Northamptonshire. He obtained the patronage of lord Fitz-William, to whom he was agent; and in 1766 he was chosen fellow of the Royal society. He died 1790, aged 71. Besides interesting papers in the philosophical transactions, he published, Mathematical Lucubrations, 1755 — Mathematical Memoirs, in 2 vols. very abstruse, but very curious and valuable.

LANDINI, Christopher, a learned Venetian of the 15th century, author of a translation of Pliny's Natural History into Italian — of some notes on Dante — and of Commentaries on Horace.

LANDO, Hortensio, a physician of the 16th century, born at Milan. He is author of several works under fictitious names. He wrote, Philoctetes, a dialogue, reflecting on Erasmus — and two others, called Cicero Relegatus — and Cicero Revocatus, ascribed falsely to cardinal Alcxander.

LANDO, Bassiano, a physician of Padua, author of some medical works. He was assassinated by a robber, 1562.

LANDRI, bishop of Paris, and founder of the hospital called, Hotel de Dieu, was known for his great charity and benevolence during the famine of Paris. He died about 660.

LANE, Jane, an English woman, to whose great heroism and preference of mind Charles II. was indebted for his escape. The royal fugitive, after his concealment in Boscobel tree, rode before her in the livery of her servant, from her father's house, Bentley hall, Staffordshire, to the house of Mr. Norton, near Bristol, from whence he proceeded to Brighton, and escaped to France. At the restoration she was amply rewarded, and married sir Clement Lister, bart. of Packington hall, Warwickshire.

LANFRANC, archbishop of Canterbury, was a native of Pavia. After studying at Bologna, he came to France, and taught at Avranches, from whence he came to Bec abbey, where he was elected prior 1044. He afterwards visited Rome, and complained to the pope of the doctrines of Berenger, and soon after his return, he was made abbot of St. Stephen at Caen, by William of Normandy. When that prince had conquered England, he raised Lanfranc to the see of Canterbury, vacant by the deposition of Stigand. The new primate repaired to Rome to obtain the pall from the hands of the pope, who treated him with great respect; but he showed throughout a firm and becoming opposition against the encroachments of the holy see. He died 28th May 1089. He rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded some hospitals, and repaired several churches and religious houses. In his character he was esteemed as an able politician. His writings, including his piece against Berenger, were published in 1648, by Dom d'Acheri, a Benedictine monk of St. Maur.

LANFRANC, John, an Italian painter, born at Parma, 1581. As he was poor, he was placed in the service of count Horatio Scotti, who observing his genius by his various drawings in coal on the walls, placed him under the care of Augustus Caracci. He afterwards studied under Annibale, whom he assisted in the execution of some of his finest pieces. He assisted also in the adorning of St. Peter's church at Rome, with such taste and success, that Urban VIII. knighted him. He was a great imitator of the manner of Correggio, but such was the impetuosity of his genius, that he frequently forgot the rules of his art, and substituted boldness for correctness. He chiefly excelled in painting domes, and in painting in fresco, and in drawing figures above the natural proportion. He died at Rome, 1647, aged 66, leaving a widow and several children, respectable in life, and and possessed of great genius, and many accomplishments.

LANFRANC, a physician of Milan. His abilities, and the success which he displayed in restoring surgery to a regular and respectable system, procured him enemies in his profession, and he removed to France, where he died 1300. His Chirurgia Magna & Parva, appeared at Venice, fol. 1490, and Lyons, 1553.

LANG, John Michael, author of Philologia Barbaro-Græca, 1708, Nurimb. 4to. — Dissertationes Botanico-Theologicæ, 1705, Altorf, 4to. — De Fabulis Moham-medicis, 1697, 4to. was professor of divinity at Altorf, and died 1731, aged 67.

LANGALIERE, Philip de Gentils, marquis de, first baron of Saintonge, distinguished himself in the service of France, during 20 years, and in 32 campaigns, but his merits did not prevent his disgrace by the intrigues of his enemy, Chamillar the minister. He was afterwards in the service of the emperor, and of the king of Poland, but at last he was suspected of secret intrigues with the Turks, and was arrested by the direction of the emperor, as he was going to Hamburgh. He died of a broken heart in prison, at Vienna, June 1717, aged 66. The French Memoirs, published under his name, in 8vo. 1708, are fictitious.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, an English writer, born at Bartonkirke, Westmoreland, educated at Blencow school, and removed to Queen's college, Oxford. He became fellow of his house, and acquired literary celebrity by his edition of Longinus, and by other publications, so that he was elected keeper of the archives in 1644, and the next year, provost of the college. He died 10th Feb. 1657-8, and was buried in the college chapel. During the civil wars he remained unmolested in the cultivation of literature in his college, and in familiar correspondence with Usher, Selden, and other learned men.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, son of the preceding, was born at Oxford, 15th July, 1656. In his younger years, he was imprudent and extravagant, but afterwards applied himself to dramatic compositions. He was elected senior beadle of the university, and published, about 1690, an appendix to a catalogue of all the graduates of the university. He died June 1692. He is also author of a new Catalogue of English Plays — an Account of English dramatic Poets.

LANGDALE, Marmaduke, an Englishman of great courage. In the civil wars he warmly espoused the royal cause, and raising a troop, he defeated Fairfax, raised the siege of Pontefract castle, and seized Berwick and Carlisle. On the final triumph of the republicans, he retired to Flanders, and was, in reward of his gallant services, created a baron by Charles II. He died 1681.

LANGÉ, Joseph, Greek professor of Friburg, in 1600, published Elementale Mathematicum, reprinted 1625, and he edited Polyanthea, 2 vols. folio, &c. He turned, in the latter part of life, catholic.

LANGÉ, Charles Nicholas, a Swiss naturalist, author of Historia Lapidum Figuratorum Helvetiæ — Origo Eorundem — Methodus Testacæ Marinæ distribuendæ, 1722, 4to. &c.

LANGÉ, Rodolphus, canon of Munster, studied Greek and Latin in Italy, and distinguished himself as a poet.

His Taking of Jerusalem, a poem, is mentioned with approbation. He died 1519, aged 81.

LANGELANDE, Robert, an old English poet, one of the first disciples of Wickliffe. He is the author of "the Visions of Pierce Plowman," a poem in 20 parts, replete with spirit and humor, and severely satirical against the various occupations of life, but particularly against the clergy. To the obscurity of an obsolete style in this once admired poem, is to be added an ungrateful alliteration, so harassing to the ear of the reader, and so inimical to the freedom of the poet.

LANGHAM, Simon, an English bishop, and a cardinal, successively abbot of Westminster, bishop of Ely, and in 1366, archbishop of Canterbury. He was made treasurer of England by Edward III. and cardinal legate by Urban VIII. He died at Avignon, 1376.

LANGHORNE, John D. D. an English poet and divine, born at Kirby Stephen, Westmoreland, son of a clergyman. When in orders he became tutor to the sons of Mr. Cracroft, of Lincolnshire, whose daughter he married, and whose early death he lamented pathetically with his friend, Mr. Cartwright, in his poem called Constantia. Besides the living of Blagden, Somersetshire, he was prebendary of Wells, and justice of the peace. He died 1st April, 1779. He wrote sermons, 2 vols. — Plutarch's Lives translated — Poems, 2 vols. 12mo. — Letters of Theodosius and Constantia, 2 vols. 12mo. — Solyman and Almena, a tale — Frederic and Pharamond — Effusions of Fancy, 2 vols. — Fables of Flora, in verse, &c. besides critiques in the Monthly Review.

LANGIUS, John, of Lawenburg, in Silesia, studied physic at Pisa, where he took his degrees, and afterwards practised at Heidelberg, and was physician to four successive electors palatine. He died at Heidelberg, 1565, aged 80. He published Medical Epistles, Basil, 1554, in 4to. a curious work.

LANGLAND, John, a native of Henley, Oxon, educated at Magdalen college. He successively became principal of Magdalen hall, dean of Salisbury, canon of Windsor, bishop of Lincoln, and in 1532 chancellor of Oxford. He was a popular and benevolent man, and favored strongly the king's divorce from Catharine of Aragon. He died May 7th, 1547, and had his body buried at Eton college, his heart at Lincoln, and his bowels at Woburn. His works were published in folio, 1532, London.

LANGLE, John Maximilian, a native of Evreux, for 25 years the minister of the reformed church of Rouen. He wrote a Defence of Charles I. of England — 2 vols. of sermons — the Whole Duty of Man, translated from the English, and died 1674, aged 84.

LANGLE, Samuel de, son of the preceding, was born in London, but carried to France when only one year old. From the ministry of Rouen reformed church he removed to Charenton; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came over to England, where he obtained a Westminster prebend, and the degree of D. D. from Oxford university. He died 1699. His Letter on the Differences between the church of England and the dissenters, was published by Stillingfleet.

LANGLEY, Batty, an English architect, author of some useful books on the prices of work, and of materials, rials, as the Builder's Jewel — and Builder's Price Book, and other treatises for bricklayers, masons, carpenters, &c. He died 1751.

LANGTON, Stephen, an Englishman, educated at Paris. He became chancellor of Paris, and a cardinal of Rome, and afterwards was made archbishop of Canterbury, by the pope, who refused to admit the candidate nominated by the monks of that city. King John resisted this appointment; but the pope, armed with the spiritual power, put the monarch and his people under an interdict, if they refused to obey. The timid monarch, alarmed by the preparations of France to invade his kingdom, submitted at last to the papal decrees, received Langton as archbishop, and accepted absolution from his hands. Langton afterwards became obnoxious to the pope's displeasure at Rome, for resisting the extension of his power in England, and for refusing to excommunicate the rebellious barons; but was reconciled to the holy see, and died in peace in England, 9th July, 1228, after being 22 years at the head of the church. He was a man of great abilities as a writer, and as a politician. His works are mentioned by Bayle and Tanner.

LANGTON, John, an English Carmelite monk, who was at the council of Basil, and wrote an English chronicle.

LANGUET, Hubert, a learned Frenchman, born at Viteaux, 1518. He was minister of state to the elector of Saxony, and from a catholic became a strong protestant, by reading the works, and frequenting the company, of Melancthon. After making the tour of Italy, of Livonia, and Laponia, and enjoying the confidence of Gustavus, king of Sweden, Languet was employed as envoy to France, by Augustus, elector of Saxony, 1565. He was afterwards engaged in negotiations at Heidelberg, Cologne, Spire, and Stettin, and in his second embassy to France he was nearly sacrificed in the horrid massacres of St. Bartholomew, though he had the good fortune to save the life of his friend, Philip de Mornay, and of the learned Wecheliu, in whose house he lodged. In 1574 he was envoy at Vienna; but in the controversy which took place in Saxony, between the Lutherans and the Zuinglians, about the eucharist, he was violently suspected of favoring the latter, upon which he retired from the court of the elector to Prague, where he entered into the service of John Casimir, count Palatine. He next was employed by the prince of Orange, at Antwerp, but his health did not permit him to display those active services which he had shown in the affairs of other princes. He died at Antwerp, 20th Sept. 1581, and was honored at his funeral by the attendance of the prince of Orange. He was a man of great political knowledge, and deservedly esteemed by the wisest and most eminent men of his age, particularly Thuanus, Mornay, &c. Mornay says of him, with feeling and truth, Is fuit qualis multi videri volunt, is vixit qualis optimi mori cupiunt. His letters in Latin to the elector of Saxony, were printed, Halle, 4to. 1699. Besides letters to sir Philip Sidney, 12mo. 1646, and other things.

LANGUET, John Baptist Joseph, a relation of the above, born at Dijon, June 6th, 1675. He studied at Paris, and became a doctor of the Sorbonne, and vicar of St. Sulpice, after being curate of the place for some years. He rebuilt his church, and rendered it one of the finest in the world for architecture and ornaments. He began the work with little money, but his zeal, and the emulation which he excited among his parishioners, whose number amounted to 150,000, surmounted every obstacle, and the consecration in 1745, was attended with such splendor, that the king of Prussia with his own hand, thanked the public spirited vicar for the success and popularity of his great exertions. He also founded the house of the infant Jesus, divided into two parts, one of which was for the support of 35 poor ladies, and the other of more than 400 poor women, who are usefully employed in spinning, and in the working of cloths and linens. This noble institution in 1741, contained more than 1400 women and girls, engaged in industrious labors, and encouraged in habits of virtue, by example and precept. The whole life of this truly great man was spent in deeds of humanity, so that it is said, he expended annually little less than a million of livres in charity. His popularity commanded not only the public esteem, but the favor of the great; but he refused all the high ecclesiastical promotions, and bishoprics, to which cardinal Fleury, the duke of Orleans, Lewis XIV. and XV. wished to raise him. He died 11th Oct. 1750, aged 75, at the abbey de Bernay.

LANGUET, John Joseph, brother to the preceding, was bishop of Soissons, and in 1731 archbishop of Sens, where he died 1753. He was a polemical divine, and translated the psalms, and was esteemed for his benevolence and piety.

LANIER, a painter whom Charles I. employed abroad to make a collection of pictures for him. Such pieces as he brought over, were distinguished by a particular mark, which now points them out to the curious. No further account is known of him.

LANNOY, or LAUNOY, Charles de, an able general in the service of the emperor, Charles V. He took Francis I. prisoner, at the battle of Pavia, and conducted himself with great humanity, and becoming respect towards the captive monarch. When Francis was restored to liberty, Lannoy was commissioned by the emperor, to conduct him back in safety to his dominions. He died at Gazette, 1527.

LANSBERGHE, Philip, a learned mathematician, born at Ghent, 1561, and minister of Antwerp, which he left for Holland when that city was taken by the Spaniards. He died at Middleburg, 1632, leaving behind him, Sacred Chronology, published 1626 — Essays on Astronomy, on Geometrical Triangles, on Measuring the Heavens, on the Motion of the Earth, &c. His son James was also an able mathematician, and defended his father against the attacks of Fromond, of Louvain, who pretended that the earth stood still. He died 1657.

LANZANO, Andrea, a painter born at Milan. He was the pupil of Carlo Maratti, and excelled for the correctness and elegance of his figures, and the beauty of his coloring. He died 1712.

LANZONI, Joseph, a native of Ferrara, who restored the academy there, of which he became secretary, and medical professor. Eminent as a physician, he was equally great as a man of letters, and an antiquarian.

He published various works collected into 3 vols. 4to. in Latin, 1738. He died 1730, aged 67.

LAPARELLI, Francis, a native of Cortona, eminent as an architect, a mechanic, and an engineer. His abilities recommended him to Cosmo I. duke of Tuscany, and he was employed by Pius IV. in the fortifications and defence of Civita Vecchia. He was in 1565 employed in the fortification of Malta, against the power of Solymán and his Turkish army, and under his judicious eye the city of Valette was planned. He afterwards was in the service of the Venetians, and died of the plague while before Candia 1570, aged 49. He assisted Michael Angelo in the completion of his designs for the erection of St. Peter's church at Rome.

LAPIDE, Cornelius, a French jesuit, author of 10 vols. folio. in Explanations and Commentaries on the Scriptures. He died at Rome 1637, aged 71.

LAPÓ, Arnulphus di, a native of Florence, known as an able architect. He restored the genuine art of architecture, and in his edifices, displayed taste, elegance, and solidity. The cathedral of Florence, and other public buildings, are monuments of his genius. He died 1300, aged 68.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, a dissenting minister born at Hawkhurst in Kent, 1684. He was educated in London, and then went to Utrecht, where he improved himself under Grævius and Burman, and afterwards he studied at Leyden. In 1713 he was engaged as tutor to the younger son of lady Treby, widow of the chief justice of common pleas, with whom he travelled over France, Holland, and the Netherlands. In 1723 he was employed with others in a course of lectures at the Old Bailey; but though his abilities were great, and universally acknowledged, he did not obtain a settlement among the dissenters till the 45th year of his age, when in 1729, he became assistant minister at Crutched Friars. His literary labors had now so distinguished him, that the college of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of D. D. This learned man so well skilled in scriptural erudition and ecclesiastical history, died at Hawkhurst, where he had a small estate, in 1768, of a decline. The best known of his works are his "Credibility of the Gospel History" in five volumes completed in 1743, a work of great merit, and so highly respected abroad that it was translated into Dutch and Latin — Letters on the Logos — a Vindication of three of our Saviour's Miracles, against the petulant cavils of Woolston. — Supplement to the Credibility, &c. All his works were collected by Dr. Kippis in 11 large vols. 8vo. to which his life is prefixed.

LARGILLIERE, Nicholas de, a French painter, born at Paris 1656. He studied under Gobeau, and then came to England, where he was noticed by Lely, and recommended to the patronage of Charles II. He returned to Paris, where he enjoyed the friendship of Vander Mulen and Le Brun, and was made historical painter to the French academy. On the accession of James II. he again visited England, and painted that monarch and his queen; but he soon after returned to France, where he was made director of the academy as a reward for his great merit. He died 1705. His best piece is the crucifixion of Christ.

LARON, Marcellus, a painter, born at the Hague, 1653. He came to England with his father, and displayed such abilities, that Kneller employed his pencil in finishing the drapery of his pictures. He possessed the art of copying with great success, and astonishing correctness, the pieces of the first masters. He died 1705, aged 52.

LARREY, Isaac de, a Calvinist born at Lintot near Bolbec. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he fled to Holland, and became historiographer to the States. He died 1719. His works are a History of England, 4 vols. folio. valuable for its intrinsic merit, as well as its excellent portraits — History of Lewis XIV. 3 vols. 4to. — a History of Augustus, 8vo. — a History of the Seven Wise Men, 2 vols. 8vo.

LARROQUE, Matthew de, a French protestant, born at Leirac, in Germany, 1619. His popularity was such, that after being 27 years minister of Vitré in Brittany, by the favor of the duchess of Tremouille, he was invited by the churches of Montauban, Bourdeaux, and Rouen, and in consequence of the honorable testimonies accepted the offers of the last. He died at Rouen 1684. His works are, a History of the Eucharist, 4to. — an Answer to Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux on the Communion of two Kinds, 12mo. — a treatise on the Regale, &c.

LARROQUE, Daniel de, son of the preceding, was born as Vitré, and in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, came to England, and afterwards visited Copenhagen and Amsterdam. He came to Paris, determined to become a catholic; but the satire which he wrote on Lewis XIV. on account of the famine of 1693, threw him into the prison of the Chatelet for five years. At his release he obtained a pension from the ministry, and died 1731. He wrote the Life of the Historian Mezeray — and translated Echard's Roman History — and Prideaux's Life of Mahomet, &c.

LASCARIS, Constantine, one of the learned Greeks, who upon the sacking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, fled to Italy. He taught Greek and polite literature at Milan, and afterwards at Messina, where his great abilities and high reputation drew crowds of respectful disciples, and among them Bembo. He died at Messina, when very old, at the close of the 15th century, and left his library to the senate. He published a Greek grammar at Milan, 1476, 4to, and other things.

LASCARIS, John, surnamed Rhyndacenus, was of the imperial family. He was employed by Laurence de Medicis to make a collection of books in Greece, and he was so fortunate as to be permitted by the grand signior to examine all the libraries of Constantinople, and Greece, in consequence of which he greatly enriched the collections of Italy. He was afterwards ambassador from Lewis XII. of France to Venice, and on the election of Leo X. he went to Rome, where he became director of the Greek college. He was an admirable scholar, and brought again into use the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, and wrote some epigrams and moral sentences in that language. He died 1535.

LASCI or LASKO, John de, a learned Pole, made provost of Grefna, and bishop of Vefprim in Hungary. He had shown such partiality for Zuinglius at Zurich, that he now boldly declared in favor of the reformation; in consequence of which he was dismissed from his bishopric, and retired, in 1542, to East Friesland, where he became minister of the church of Embden. He afterwards came to England, and was held in great esteem by the clergy, though he ventured to write a pamphlet against the habits and ceremonies of the English church; but in the reign of Mary he was obliged to fly from the country. He afterwards was reconciled to Sigismund, king of Poland, and employed by him in affairs of trust and importance. He died 13th Jan. 1560. He wrote some controversial tracts, &c. and was highly esteemed by Erasmus and others.

LASENA or LASCENA, Peter, a learned Italian born at Naples, 25th Sep. 1590. He settled at Rome, and under the protection of cardinal Barberini, and other learned men, he cultivated literature. His intense application proved at last fatal to him, he fell into a fever of which he died 30th Sep. 1636. He wrote Nepenthes Homeri, seu de abolendo Luctu—Cleombrotus—a tract on the Sports, Shows, &c. of Naples, &c.

LASSELS, Richard, a native of Yorkshire, educated at Oxford and at Douay, where he embraced the catholic religion. He wrote Travels in Italy, 2 vols. 8vo. and died at Montpellier 1768, aged 65. A person of his name and family, was very instrumental in the escape of Charles II. from the fatal battle of Worcester. He was then a cornet in the king's army.

LATIMER, Hugh, an illustrious prelate, born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire 1470. His father who was rather an industrious than rich farmer, educated him at a grammar school, and as his abilities were of superior order he sent him to Cambridge, where he took his degrees. Young Latimer, when admitted into the church, was a warm supporter of the established religion, against the innovations of Luther and Melancthon; but by degrees his prejudices in favor of the pope disappeared in the conversation of his friend Bilney, a man of pious character and of deep learning who even laid down his life in the support of the doctrines of the reformation. With his usual warmth the new convert zealously devoted himself to propagate those tenets which lately he had censured as impious and heretical, and so great was his influence, and so powerful his eloquence, that he was regarded as the head of his party. His severe trials, and successful efforts against the papists at last recommended him to the notice of lord Cromwell, and of Henry VIII. during the time of his intended divorce; and in reward for his services in the cause of the king and of the reformation, Latimer was nominated to the see of Worcester. In this new office he behaved with his usual spirit, yet not without moderation. In the convocation of 1536 he ably opposed the measures of the popish party, and was happily instrumental in the recommendation of the English translation of the bible to general perusal. But while he expected the final triumph of his party, he found the influence of Gardiner too powerful, and the enactment of the famous act called the six articles, in the parliament of 1539, proved so disagreeable to his feelings that he refused any longer to hold his bishopric, but preferred a life of retirement and privacy. His enemies, however, were not inactive, and not satisfied to see him stripped of his honors, they procured his imprisonment in the tower for the last six years of Henry's reign. The accession of Edward VI. restored Latimer to favor and to liberty; but while his friends solicited him to resume his episcopal functions, he repeatedly refused, and retired to Lambeth palace, where he lived on the bounty and in the friendship of Cranmer. Here his abilities were called into action; he assisted his learned friend in the composition of the Homilies, and frequently preached before the king, and displayed those powers of eloquence, and that strong vein of humor which the manners of the time allowed to be used in the pulpit. On the restoration of popery in the reign of Mary, the venerable Latimer was marked for destruction by the sanguinary Gardiner. He was seized, and from the tower was sent to Oxford, where he with Cranmer and Ridley were appointed to hold a dispute with some popish divines. This disputation was artfully intended to expose these champions of the reformation to the severest punishments of a partial and prejudiced tribunal, and therefore when Latimer and his revered associates rejected all the popish doctrines, except they rested on the clear authority of scripture, sentence of death was passed upon them. Latimer and Ridley were consequently burned at Oxford 1554, in the midst of the insults of the monks, and as they recommended their souls to God, while the fatal flames spread around them, the venerable Latimer comforted his fellow sufferer, exclaiming, We shall this day, my Lord, light such a candle in England as shall never be extinguished. His sermons have often been printed.

LAUD, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was born 7th Oct. 1573, at Reading, where his father was a clothier. He was educated at the free school Reading, and in 1589 he was removed to St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1593. He afterwards took orders, and in 1601 was ordained priest; but his chapel exercises against the puritans, whose doctrines he censured and refused, drew upon him the displeasure of Abbot the primate, then chancellor of the university. Though virulently attacked by the puritan party in the university, his learning and his abilities procured him friends; he in 1607 obtained the vicarage of Stanford, Northamptonshire, and the next year the living of North Kilworth, Leicestershire. In 1608 he took the degree of D. D. and became chaplain to bishop Neile, and exchanged Kilworth for Tilbury rectory in Essex, in 1609. In 1610 he succeeded to the living of Cuckstone, Kent, and resigned his Oxford fellowship; but the next year he was elected president of his college, by the assistance of his patron Neile, who exerted all his influence to counteract the partial misrepresentation of Abbot, and of chancellor Ellesmere, with the king. He was next appointed chaplain to the king, and in 1616 made dean of Gloucester, and the next year he accompanied the king to Scotland, to endeavour to persuade the Scotch clergy to conform with the rites and the liturgy of the Eng-fish church. In 1617 he was made rector of Ibsstock, in 1621, prebendary of Westminster, and soon after raised to the see of St. David's. In 1622 he held his famous conference with Fisher, the jesuit, in the presence of the duke of Buckingham and his mother, who were wavering in the protestant faith, and he had the good fortune not only to fix his opinions, but to obtain his future friendship. He officiated as dean of Westminster in 1626, at the coronation of the first Charles, and the same year he was translated to Bath and Wells, and two years after to London. In 1630 he was elected chancellor of Oxford, and in this dignified situation he contributed most liberally, during the whole of life, to adorn and improve his favorite university. He not only built the inner quadrangle of his college, and improved the foundation by various donations, but he raised that elegant building now called the Convocation house, and the library above, and enriched the public collection by the munificent present of 1300 valuable MSS. in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldean, Egyptian, and other ancient and modern languages, procured at great expence, and with infinite labor. The death of Buckingham raised him to the dangerous situation of prime minister, and in 1633 he succeeded Abbot as primate. In these high offices he labored strenuously to repress the fanatical spirit of the times, but his attempts to produce an uniformity between the churches of England and Scotland, not only proved unavailing, but exposed him to great obloquy. His attention to the independence of the Irish clergy was highly commendable, as he obtained from the king, in their favor, a grant of all the impropriations remaining in the crown. But the purest of his motives in these turbulent times were unfortunately misrepresented because he was connected with the court, and had a share in the prosecutions of the Star chamber against the obstinate puritans. He was branded with the name of incendiary because he exhorted his clergy to contribute to the raising of an army against the Scots, and when the parliament of 1639 was abruptly dissolved, all the odium of the violent measure was heaped upon him by the factions of the times, and his palace at Lambeth was attacked by an unprincipled mob of above 5000 rioters. Thus unpopular in the nation, and suspected by the commons, he was particularly attacked in the next parliament. The fate of Stafford was the forerunner of his own, and on the accusation of sir Henry Vane, he was seized and conveyed to the tower, 1st March, 1640-1. During the three years which preceded his trial he was exposed to every indignity, his revenues were confiscated, he was fined 20,000*l.* for his connection with the Star-chamber, and every article of comfort which might cheer his hours of solitude was carefully removed, and even the papers which he had prepared for his defence were rudely seized, and never returned. His trial began March 12th, and finished July 29th, 1644; but though nothing treasonable could be proved, such was the virulence of the commons, that a bill of attainder was passed the following November, against him, and the peers in the next January were forced by the threats of the mob to pronounce against him. His defence, firm, eloquent, undaunted and pathetic, could not avail before a prejudiced tribunal, and he was sentenced to be beheaded. He suffered on Tower hill, 10th Jan. aged 71, maintaining to the last the composure of innocence, and the resignation of piety. His body was deposited in All Hallows church, Barking, and in 1663 removed to St. John's college. In his character, Laud was a man of integrity, zealously attached to the rites of the church, sincere and ardent, but too often indiscreet and obstinate, and eager to sacrifice his fame and the interests of his master even for the sake of trifles. The severe prosecutions of the Star chamber and of the high commission courts were invidiously attributed to him, and in his zeal to unite the three kingdoms in the same form of worship, he exposed himself to the fury of the puritanical party whose designs were the demolition of the throne. Though unhappily tinged with too high notions of divine right, and of unlimited prerogative, for times of turbulence and civil dissention, it does not appear that he was inclined to favor the tenets of the church of Rome, though they might more powerfully have supported the measures of an arbitrary court. He was a man of extensive knowledge, and as Clarendon observes, his learning, piety, and virtue, have been attained by very few, and the greatest of his infirmities are common to all, even the best of men. He wrote "seven Sermons" on several occasions — Annotations on the Death of king James — Answer to the Remonstrance of the House of Commons — Diary published by Wharton, with other pieces, &c. — Summary of Devotions — Remains, fol. — Private Devotions, &c. — Letters, &c.

LAUDER, William, a native of Scotland, who studied in the university of Edinburgh, and taught Latin there. He published in 1739 an edition of Johnston's psalms, and in 1742 was appointed master of Dundee school. He afterwards came to London, and 1747 began to publish in the Gentleman's Magazine, his forgeries on Milton, which in 1751 he collected together under the name of an Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost, 8vo. His quotations, though for some time supposed to be genuine, were soon after proved to be forgeries from Grotius and others, by Dr. Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and the wretched plagiarist, overwhelmed with confusion, subscribed a confession of his offence, dictated by Dr. Johnson, and acknowledged the baseness of his conduct. Thus lost in the public opinion he went to Barbadoes, where he kept a school, but with little reputation. He died at Barbadoes, 1771.

LAUDON, or LOUDON, Gideon Ernst, a celebrated Austrian general, descended from a Scotch family, and born at Tootzan, 1716. He was in 1731 engaged in the Russian service, but despairing of preferment he entered into the Austrian army, and obtained the rank of captain in 1742. After the peace of 1748 he rose to the rank of major, and was afterwards made lieutenant-colonel of Croats; but his genius and abilities displayed in the seven years war against the brilliant evolutions of the great Frederic, soon called him to higher honors. He was made major-general and a knight of the military order of Maria Theresa in 1757, and the confidence placed in his valor and judgment was soon evinced in the great victory of Hochkerchen, and that of Kunnerisdorff. The Prussians were afterwards defeated at Landshut, and the gates of Glatz opened to the victorious general. At the peace of 1763 his services were rewarded with the dignity of a baron, and a pension, and three years after he was appointed member of the Aulic council, and in 1778 made field-marshal of the empire. In the war which took place between Turkey and Austria, he had fresh opportunities of distinguishing himself, the Turks were routed, and Belgrade was taken 1789. This illustrious chief died 14th July, 1790.

LAUGIER, Mark Antony, a jesuit, born at Manosque in Provence 1713. He quitted the jesuits upon some private dispute and applied himself to the arts. He died 1769. He is author of Essay on Architecture — History of Venice, 12 vols. 12mo. — History of the Peace of Belgrade, 2 vols. 12mo. — Apology for French Music, &c.

LAUNAY, Francis de, a French advocate of eminence, author of Remarks on the Roman and French System of Jurisprudence — and Commentaries on Laysel's Institutes, &c. He died 1693, aged 81.

LAUNOI, John de, a learned French writer, well skilled in the discipline, rights and privileges of the Gallican church, which he ably defended against the encroachments of the see of Rome. He was also a violent and determined enemy against legends, traditions and saints, and showed himself so disinterested, that he refused benefices, satisfied with the independence of an humble situation. He died at Paris 1678, aged 75. His writings, which are very numerous, are enumerated by Nicéron.

LAUNOY, Charles de, a French general. Vid. LANNOY.

LAUR, Philippo, an eminent painter, born at Rome 1623. He studied under his elder brother Balthasar, who died at the early age of 25, and under Angelo Coroselli, and soon acquired some celebrity. His large pictures for churches were admired, but particularly his historical subjects, with excellent landscapes in the back ground. His chief pieces were metamorphoses and bacchanals, in which he displayed great taste and judgment. He was of a cheerful disposition, and died at Rome 1694, aged 71, leaving a considerable fortune to his great nephews.

LAURA, the mistress of Petrarch, was the wife of Hugo de Sades. She died of the plague in 1348, aged 38. Vid. PETRARCH.

LAURATI, Peter, a native of Sienna, celebrated as a painter. He was the disciple of Giotto, and particularly excelled in his draperies, which were finished in such exquisite taste that the delicate proportions of the human limbs became visible through them. He flourished in the 15th century and chiefly resided at Siena and at Arezzo.

LAURENS, or LARENTIUS, Andrew, a native of Arles, professor of medicine at Montpellier, and physician to Henry IV. He died 16th August, 1609. His anatomical works, more elegant than correct, were printed at Paris, folio, 1600.

LAURENS, Honorius, brother to the preceding, was advocate of the parliament of Paris, and a strong friend of the league, and afterwards became by the favor of Henry IV. archbishop of Embrun. He wrote the edict of Henry III. to reunite the protestants and catholics, and died 1612.

LAURENT, Peter Joseph, a native of Flanders, famous for his astonishing mechanical powers. When only eight years old he constructed a hydraulic machine of great ingenuity, and when matured by time and by education, he was, at the age of 21, appointed superintendant of various public works, and of the canals of the Low Countries, and of Hainault. The junction of the Scheldt with the Somme, though presenting great difficulties, was effected by his persevering genius, by the means of a subterranean canal of three leagues extent; and other works were effected in Flanders, which, by removing the obstacles of nature, secured comfort and communication to the inhabitants of Valenciennes, Lille, &c. This ingenious man was honored with the order of St. Michael by the French king, and died 1775, respected in private life.

LAURENTIO, Nicolas, a remarkable character, in the history of modern Rome. Though but the son of a vintner and a laundress, he rose by his intrigues and eloquence to notice, and prevailed upon the Roman populace to expel their nobles, and entrust the sovereign power into his hands. His usurpation was the cause of war, and at last he was defeated; but a second time he rose to the supreme authority, and might have long continued absolute, had he not been cruel in his punishments. The populace irritated against him, set his palace on fire, and he was run through the body in his attempts to escape, and stabbed by a thousand wounds. His body hung by the heels in public derision, was at last taken down and buried by the Jews.

LAVATER, Lewis, an ecclesiastic, known for his abilities as a controversialist in favor of the protestants. He wrote Commentaries — Homilies, &c. — and a treatise de Spectris, a curious work. He died canon of Zurich, 17th July, 1586, aged 50.

LAVATER, John Gaspar Christian, a celebrated writer, born at Zurich 1741. He was pastor of the church of St. Peter's at Zurich, and as a minister he acquired great reputation both by his eloquent discourses, and his exemplary life. He was wounded by a French soldier when Zurich was taken by storm under Massena in 1799, and died there in consequence of it 12th Jan. 1801. He acquired deserved celebrity as a physiognomist, and his writings on the subject, possessing great merit, ingenious remarks, and truly original ideas have been translated into all the languages of Europe. His works are Poems — Solomon — Jesus Messiah, 4 vols. — Nathaniel, 8vo. — Letters Paternelles — treatise on Physiognomy — Journal of a Self Observer, 8vo. — Prose Works — Letters supposed to be written by Paul before his conversion, &c.

LAVINGTON, George, a native of Heavitree, Devonshire, educated at Exeter college where he took the degree of LL. D. He afterwards obtained a prebend at Worcester, a canon residentiaryship at St. Paul's, and the see of Exeter. He wrote the Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared, a curious work — a Tract on the Moravians — Single Sermons, &c. and died 1762, aged 79. He was buried in Exeter cathedral.

LAVIROTTE, Lewis Anne, a native of Nolay in the diocese of Autun, eminent as a physician, and as the translator of Maclaurin's Account of Newton's Discoveries, he wrote also Observations on the Hydrophobia and other medical works, and died 1759, aged 34.

LAVOISIER, Antony Laurence, a celebrated chemist, born at Paris, 26th Aug. 1743. At the age of 23 he obtained from the academy of sciences a golden medal for a memoir on the best method of lighting the streets with economy and efficacy. In 1768 he was chosen member of the academy, and enriched its memoirs by above 40 valuable dissertations on subjects of chemistry and political economy, the result of deep and laborious experiments. His new system of chemistry was received with great applause in France and over the continent, though it militated against the prevalent doctrine of phlogiston adopted and supported by the experiments of Dr. Priestley. He was treasurer of the academy after Buffon and Tillet, and successively was appointed farmer-general, register of powder and saltpetre, and commissary of the national treasury, and in these offices he labored assiduously with the most conscientious integrity, to advance the interests of the nation as well as to promote the improvement of science and natural history. These services deserved the highest rewards of national gratitude; but the revolution came to shorten his days. His abilities and virtues were too conspicuous to escape the notice of the sanguinary tyrants of France. He was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, but when he demanded the suspension of his sentence for 14 days, that he might finish some experiments serviceable to the public, the blood thirsty judge replied that France was not in want either of learned men or chemists, and immediately Lavoisier walked with composure to the fatal spot, and was guillotined, 6th April, 1794. He wrote Chemical and Physical works, 2 vols. 8vo. 1773 — Nouvelles Recherches sur le Fluide Elastique, a valuable work, 1775 — Report on Animal Magnetism, 8vo. — Methode de Nomenclature Chimique — Elementary treatise on Chemistry, 2 vols. 8vo. 1789 — Instruction on the making of Saltpetre, &c. 8vo. — de la Reproduction & de la Conformation comparees à la Population, 8vo. &c. Fourcroy pronounced his eulogy at the Lyceum, and la Lande has painted his character in the liveliest colors, and represented him as he was, a man of great virtue and benevolence, endued with all the amiable qualities of the heart, and the amplest resources of the mind.

Law, John, a celebrated projector, born at Edinburgh 16th April, 1671. He early applied himself to the study of arithmetic, geography, mathematics and algebra, but his prospects were all at once clouded by his unfortunate conduct. He debauched the daughter of a gentleman in London, and killed her brother who interfered in vindication of her character, and in consequence of this he was condemned to be hanged, but escaped from the hands of justice and fled to Holland, and then to Italy. He returned to his country in 1700 under the protection of the duke of Argyle, and proposed to the parliament various plans of finance, which were disapproved, in consequence of which he left the kingdom to seek encouragement and protection in foreign courts. He visited Brussels, Venice and Genoa, and at last he gained the confidence of the duke of Orleans the regent of France, and settled at Paris. He there established a bank in 1716, and soon it became the general bank of the kingdom, to which were united the interests of the Mississippi company. The hopes of immense gain, and the love of novelty gradually brought all the specie of the kingdom under his controul, and his paper rose to full twenty times its original value, and in 1719 was calculated as worth more than 80 times the circulating coin of the whole nation. Thus while France considered itself as rapidly rising into opulence and power, and while the infatuated projector purchased vast possessions, and united in his person the offices of comptroller and financier, the real resources of the kingdom were gradually diminishing, extravagance took place of economy, and the love of glory and distinction was disregarded for the sudden acquisition of riches. At last the bank was found incapable of answering the demands made upon it, and of paying for its paper, and though the decrees of the regent for a while supported its tottering credit, soon the eyes of the nation were opened, and each individual discovered that in parting with his gold and silver, he had received in return only paper which was of no value. The dissatisfaction became general, the people without bread and without money, besieged in vain the avenues of the bank, and afterwards carrying before the gates of the regent the bodies of three men who had unhappily been trampled to death in the tumultuous crowd, they exclaimed, behold the fruit of your system. At last the unfortunate Law, now become odious in the eyes of suffering France, fled in disgrace from a country which he had promised to raise to affluence and prosperity, and after wandering over Germany, Denmark, Holland and England, he settled at Venice, where he died 1729. He wrote a small treatise on money and paper credit. He was in his person well proportioned, of a dignified and commanding aspect, but in his conduct he was to immoderately attached to play, that he did not hesitate to venture his all on the chance of a die.

Law, Edmund, a native of Westmoreland, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards fellow of Christ's college, and was one of the members of that society, in the university, for a time celebrated under the name of Zodiac. In 1739 he obtained the living of Graystock, and soon after Salkeld, and in 1755 was made head of Peterhouse. In 1767 he was presented to a prebendal stall at Durham, and two years after raised to the see of Carlisle, over which he presided with great dignity, and with truly pastoral care. He was author of the Theory of Religion, 8vo. — Archbishop King's Origin of Evil, with notes, 8vo. — a View of the Controversy concerning an Intermediate State, 12mo. — Sermons, &c. and he died 1787, aged 84.

Law, William, an able divine, born at King's Cliff, North-

Northamptonshire, 1686. He was educated at Oxford, where he took his degrees, but did not enter into orders, as he had some scruples with respect to the necessary oaths, and thus could not obtain some valuable preferment which was intended for him. He wrote a Serious Call to a devout and holy Life — a treatise on Christian Perfection, &c. — besides some tracts against Bishop Hoadley, and the works of Jacob Behmen whose extravagant opinions he adopted in the latter part of life. He died 1761 in Northamptonshire, at the house of Mrs. Hesther Gibbon, the aunt of the famous historian, where he had for several years found an hospitable asylum. As a preacher among the dissenters he possessed influence, and his doctrines were powerfully enforced by the meekness and sanctity of his life, and by his inoffensive manners.

LAWES, Henry, an English musician, born at Salisbury about 1600. He was in the service of Charles I. and in 1653 published his "Ayres and Dialogues," in folio, with commendatory verses by the poets, Milton, Philips, Waller, &c. He set to music the Comus of Milton, and performed in it, when it was represented at Ludlow castle 1634. He was long patronized by the family of the earl of Bridgewater, and was the friend of Milton and other learned men. He died Oct. 21, 1662, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

LAWES, William, brother to the preceding, was also an excellent musician. He was commissary to general Gerard, and was killed at the siege of Chester. Two large MS. volumes of his works are preserved at Oxford.

LAWRENCE, Stringer, an English general in the service of the East India company. He died 1775, aged 78, and his services were honorably acknowledged by the company, who erected to his memory a handsome monument in Westminster abbey.

LAWSON, sir John, a native of Hull, who from an obscure origin rose in the navy and became captain of a ship under the parliament. Though by principle a republican, he joined Monk in effecting the restoration, and for his services was thanked by the houses of parliament. He served as rear-admiral under the duke of York, and in a battle fought against the Dutch on the 3d June, 1665 he was wounded by a musket shot in the knee, of which he died.

LAYARD, Charles Peter, an English divine, son of a physician of Greenwich, was educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. He obtained in 1773 and 1775 the Seatonian prize, and was by the strong recommendation of his friends, appointed minister of Oxendon chapel, and librarian to Tenison's library, St. Martin's parish. He was promoted in 1800 to the deanery of Bristol, and died 1803. He published some single sermons, and since his death a subscription has been raised, by the publication of a volume of his sermons, for the benefit of his family.

LAZARELLI, John Francis, a native of Gabio, author of sonnets, odes and satirical poems of merit, often printed. He died 1694, aged 80.

LEAKE, Richard, master gunner of England, was born at Harwich 1629. He distinguished himself in various engagements, especially against Van Trump 1673, when the Royal Prince, the ship in which he was, after the loss of her masts, and of 400 of her crew killed and wounded, was attacked by a man of war and two fire ships. In this distressing situation the English admiral Rooke, made a signal for the ship to strike her colors, but Leake animating his companions, declared the Royal Prince should never be given up while he lived, and thus boldly seconded by his two sons and an obedient crew, he brought off the ship safe to Chatham, though he had the misfortune to see his son Henry fall by his side. In consequence of this bravery he was made master gunner of all England, and store-keeper of Woolwich ordnance. He first contrived to fire off a mortar by the blast of a piece, a method still used, and he displayed great ingenuity in the composition of fire works. He died 1696.

LEAKE, sir John, son of the above, was born at Rotherhithe, Surrey, 1656. He was educated in naval knowledge under his father, and was with him at the memorable fight of 1673. He was afterwards in the merchants' service, but at last preferred advancement in the navy. He was made master gunner of the Neptune, 1675, and continued in that situation till 1688, when he was appointed to the Drake fire ship, against the intended invasion from Holland. He afterwards joined the party of the prince of Orange, and was very serviceable in rescuing Londonderry from the power of James II. In 1692 he was one of the heroes of the battle off Cape la Hogue, and till the peace of Ryswick in 1697, he continued to distinguish himself as an active and enterprising officer. In 1702 he was sent on the Newfoundland station, and he drove the French totally from the place, and thus acquired both reputation for the celerity of his measures, and opulence from the value of the prizes which he made. On his return he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and soon after knighted, and he then assisted sir George Rooke in the reduction of Gibraltar, and afterwards relieved that fortress, 1705, when besieged by the French by sea, and the Spaniards by land. That same year he again, a second time, relieved the fortress, with the co-operation of the prince of Hesse, and defeated the French fleet, and reduced Barcelona. In 1706 he again appeared before Barcelona, and relieved it so effectually that king Philip abandoned the siege, rendered memorable at the moment by a total eclipse of the sun which spread consternation among the enemy, whose device was a sun. From Barcelona, sir John proceeded to the reduction of Alicant and Ivica, and the island of Majorca, and then returned to England to receive the rewards of the queen and the congratulations of the people. On Shovel's death he was made admiral of the white, and commander of the fleet, in which high office, he convoyed the new queen of Spain to her consort Charles, and then reduced Sardinia and Minorca to the obedience of the allied monarchs. In 1708 he was elected member for Rochester, and the next year became one of the lords of the admiralty, but refused, on the resignation of lord Orford, to accept the place of first lord. In 1712 he was at the head of the expedition to take Dunkirk, and his various services were acknowledged by his being appointed a fifth

LEAKE, John, fifth time admiral of the fleet. The change of ministry at the accession of George I. reduced him to a private station, and he spent the rest of his life in retirement between Greenwich and Beddington, in Surrey, where he had two seats. He had an only son, whose ill-conduct in the first part of his life embittered his moments, and whose death in March, 1719, afflicted him so severely that his senses were clouded at intervals. This brave man died at his house, Greenwich, 1st Aug. 1720, aged 65, leaving his property to his wife's sister's husband, captain Martyn.

LEAKE, Stephen Martyn, son of captain Martyn, rose in the herald's college to the office of Garter. His work on English coins, called "Nummi Britannici Historia," 8vo. was twice edited, and is valuable. In 1750 he published the Life of Admiral sir John Leake, who had bestowed his estates upon him, as being the son of Lady Leake's sister. Of this work only 50 copies were printed, and also 50 of the statutes of the order of the garter, 4to. He died at Mile-end, Middlesex, 24th March, 1773, and was buried at Thorp, in Essex.

LEAKE, John, founder of the Westminster lying-in hospital, was a physician of reputation both as to practice and learning. He wrote various tracts on female diseases, midwifery, &c. and died 1792.

LEAPOR, Mary, an ingenious woman, obscurely born, and educated as the daughter of a gardener, in the house of judge Blencowe, at Marston, Northamptonshire. In her 24th year she was seized with the measles, and after a short life of unaffected modesty, and practical piety, she fell a victim to the disease, 1735, a few days after her mother. On her death bed she gave her father some papers, which were published in 2 vols. 8vo. and contained original poems of great merit, especially the Temple of Love, a dream, and the Unhappy Father, a tragedy.

LEBID, an Arabian poet, whose abilities were employed by Mahomet, to answer the satirical works written against him. He died at the age of 140, and his poems were so much esteemed, that they were affixed on the gates of the temple of Mecca.

LE BLANC, Marcel, one of the 14 jesuits whom Lewis XIV. sent to Siam. He was taken by the English as he was going to China, to convert the people to christianity, and he died in 1693, at Mofambique, at the age of 40. He is author of a valuable History of the Revolutions of Siam, 2 vols. 12mo.

LECLAIR, John, a native of Lyons, who excelled as a player on the violin. His compositions, consisting of sonatas, duets, trios, concertos, Scylla and Glaucus, an opera, &c. are highly and deservedly esteemed. He was assassinated in the night at Paris, 23d Oct. 1764, aged 67.

LECTIUS, James, a learned Genevese, four times syndic of his native city. He is known as the editor of "Poetæ Græci Veteres," 2 vols. folio. He was also a poet and critic, and died 1611, aged 53.

LEDESMA, Alphonso, a Spanish poet, who died 1623, aged 71. He received the epithet of divine, more from the sacred subjects which exercised his muse, than the sublimity of his compositions.

LEDYARD, John, an American, who went round the world with captain Cook. He afterwards, with a bold spirit of adventure, alone, and unarmed, travelled over the whole of the north of Europe and Asia on foot, as far as Behring's streights and Hudson's bay. He next set out to visit the barren deserts of Africa, but his attempt proved unfortunate, as he was cut off by disease at Cairo, 1786. The particulars of his travels are curious and interesting.

LEE, Samuel, a native of London, educated at Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He was in 1662 ejected from his living of Bishopsgate, London, for nonconformity, and in 1686 embarked for North America. The report of the revolution roused him with a wish to return to England, but in his passage, he was taken by a French ship, and died in prison, aged 64. He wrote a Description of Solomon's Temple, fol. — Discourse on the Ten Tribes — Israel Redux — the Life of John Rowe, &c.

LEE, Nathaniel, an English dramatist, son of a clergyman. He was educated at Westminster school, under Busby, and went to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B. A. 1668, but failed in his applications for a fellowship. Upon quitting the university, he came to London, and in 1672 exhibited himself as Duncan, in the tragedy of Macbeth, but without success, and therefore he had recourse to his pen for support. His first tragedy was "Nero, emperor of Rome," in 1675, and it was received with such approbation, that he every year, till 1681, produced a tragedy. His indigence, at last, and the wild enthusiastic turn of his imagination, deprived him of his reason, in 1684, and for four years he was confined in Bedlam. Afterwards his senses recovered, so that he wrote two plays, the Princess of Cleves, 1689, and the Massacre of Paris, 1690. His only income was now only 10 shillings a week from the theatre, as a pitiful reward for his services, but his reason was at times clouded, and he was found dead one night in the street, after a drunken frolic, 1690. He was buried in the church-yard of St. Clement Danes, in the Strand. His plays are 11 in number, and though the language is frequently bombastic, yet they possess strength, fire, and pathos; and he was, as Addison has observed, the first of modern tragedians, if he had known how to check the impetuosity of his genius. His Rival Queens, and Theodosius, are still favorites on the stage.

LEECHMAN, William, D. D. principal of Glasgow university, was author of 2 vols. of sermons, and an essay on prayer, which possess great merit. He died 1785, aged 78.

LEEPE, John Anthony Vander, a painter of Bruges. His landscapes, painted after nature, his sea views, &c. were greatly admired. He died 1720, aged 56.

LEEURO, Gabriel Van der, a native of Dordt, who excelled in the painting of animals, of herds of oxen, sheep, &c. He died 1688, aged 45. His brother Peter was also eminent in the same line of the profession.

LEGGE, George, lord Dartmouth, an able naval officer, brought up under admiral Spragge. He displayed such gallantry, that at the age of 21, he was made, in 1667, by Charles II. captain of a ship. In 1672 he distinguished himself in a battle against the Dutch, and the next year, was appointed governor of Portsmouth, master of the horse, and gentleman to the duke of York. In 1682 he was raised to the peerage, and the next year was sent to Africa, as governor of Tangier, with orders to destroy the works of that fortress, and bring off the English garrison, whose situation had been rendered perilous by the frequent attacks of the Moors. He successfully effected this, and was rewarded by the king, with ten thousand pounds. On James's accession, he was master of the horse, general of the ordnance, and constable of the tower, and when the prince of Orange meditated the invasion of the country, he failed against him as admiral of the fleet, but the failure of the wind prevented the meeting of the two squadrons. As he was strongly attached to James, he became suspected at the revolution, and was in consequence sent a prisoner to the tower, where he died, 25th Oct. 1691, aged 44.

LEGUANO, Stefano Maria, an historical painter, the pupil of Cignani, and Carlo Maratti. His pieces are masterly, and in the judicious diffusion of light and shade, and in the display of a correct taste, and strong genius, he is particularly eminent. He was born near Bologna, and died 1715, aged 55.

LEIBNITZ, William Godfrey, baron of, a celebrated philosopher, born 23d June, 1646, at Leipzig, where his father was professor of moral philosophy, and secretary to the university. Though he lost his father at the early age of six, his education was not neglected, but the strong powers of his mind were assiduously cultivated at his native university, where at the age of 20, he took his degree of master of arts. Not only here, and at Jena, his studies were directed to the acquisition of whatever could be reaped in mathematics and literature, from learned professors, but the contents of his father's valuable library were perused with avidity and success. The law was the profession to which he particularly directed his attention, but when he was refused the degree of doctor in that faculty, at Leipzig, because he spoke with disrespect of the principles of Aristotle, he repaired to Altorf, where his thesis de Casibus Perplexis, ensured him not only the academical honors he solicited, but the applauses of the learned students, and the liberal offer of a professor's chair. Declining this honorable offer, he went to Nuremberg, where he became acquainted with the minister of the elector of Mentz, who prevailed upon him to enter into the service of his master. Leibnitz accepted the offer with joy, and to prove his attachment to his new sovereign, he wrote a treatise to recommend the elevation of the elector to the vacant throne of Poland. He afterwards went to Paris in 1672, on the affairs of his friend, the prime minister, and in this journey, he not only formed a connection with the most learned men of France, but he applied himself more particularly to mathematical knowledge. In 1673 he visited London, and there received from John Collins, the secretary of the royal society, some hints about the invention of fluxions, by Newton, to which he afterwards laid claim, but on very slight and doubtful grounds. The death of his patrons, the elector and his minister, left him in narrow circumstances, but he found in the duke of Brunswick Lunenburg, a new friend, who not only favored his views in his literary pursuits, but settled a pension on him, with the appointment of counsellor. The next duke, afterwards George I. proved an equally favorable patron, and prevailed upon him to write the History of the House of Brunswick. In 1700

he was elected member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and on the erection of the Berlin academy that year, he was liberally nominated by the king of Prussia, perpetual president, and though not resident there, he largely contributed, by his papers, to enrich the memoirs of that learned body. He about this time devoted much of his attention to invent "an universal language," which might become the common language of the whole world. The plan had once been undertaken by d'Algarne, and by Dr. Wilkins, but not on so broad a foundation. Leibnitz proposed characters, which like those in algebra, might be not only simple, but expressive, and enable men of all nations to converse familiarly together, but though above 13 years were employed in this extraordinary design, the death of the philosopher prevented its final completion. In 1711 Leibnitz was made Aulic counsellor to the emperor, and privy counsellor to the Prussian court, with a salary; but the multiplicity of his engagements prevented him from finishing his History of Hanover. He was employed by Caroline, afterwards queen of England, to undertake a controversy against Dr. Clarke, on the subject of free-will, the reality of space, and other philosophical subjects. He proposed the erection of a learned academy at Vienna, under the patronage of the emperor, but death prevented the completion of his plans. He died 14th Nov. 1716, of those complicated disorders, the gout and the stone, aged 70. In his temper, Leibnitz was passionate, he possessed great strength of mind, a most retentive memory, and strong eagerness after knowledge. He was in his character, avaricious, and at his death, such a quantity of money was found in his house, hoarded in sacks, that the wife of his nephew, who inherited his property, died with excessive joy at the sight of so unexpected a sum. He had in his life the singular felicity of being esteemed as the greatest and most learned man in Europe, and he did not bely the public opinion. He was in his principles a strict Lutheran. He was never married, though it is said that he left a natural son. His works are Scriptores Rerum Brunsw. 3 vols. fol. — De Jure Suprematus et Legationis Principum German. under the fictitious name of Furstener — Codex Gentium Diplomaticus, 2 vols. fol. — Miscellanea Berolinens. — Notitia Opticæ Promotæ — De Arte Combinatoria — Essays of Theodicia, on the Goodness of God and Liberty of Man, 2 vols. 12mo. — Metaphysical Tracts — Questions of Philosophy and Mathematics — Theoria Motus Abstracti & Motus Concreti — Accessiones Historicæ, 2 vols. 4to. — De Origine Francorum Disquisitio — Poems, Latin, French, &c. — Collectanea, &c. — Recueil, &c. His mathematical works have been published by Dutens, 6 vols. 4to. 1767.

LEIGH, fr Edward, a learned Englishman, born at Shawell, Leicestershire, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He was member of the long parliament, and of the assembly of divines, and also a parliamentary general. He was imprisoned in 1648, as being a violent presbyterian, and afterwards employed himself totally in literary pursuits. He died at his house called Rushall hall, Staffordshire, June 2d, 1671. He wrote Critica Sacra — Annotations on the New Testament — Observations on the 12 Cæsars — Treatises of Religion, &c. — a Body of Divinity, &c.

LEIGH, Charles, an able naturalist, born at Grange, Lancashire. He practised physic, and was fellow of the royal society, and author of "the Natural History of Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire — History of Virginia — Treatises on Mineral Waters, &c." He died in the beginning of the 18th century.

LEIGHTON, Alexander, a native of Edinburgh, educated at the university there, where he became professor of moral philosophy. In 1613 he came to London, and by his two books called "Zion's Plea," and the "Looking Glafs of the Holy War," against the government, he drew upon himself the notice of the star chamber, who ordered him to have his nose slit, and his ears cut, and to be whipped from Newgate to Aldgate, and then to Tyburn. This dreadful sentence was executed with barbarity, but after 11 years of confinement, he was set at liberty by the parliament, 1640, and made keeper of Lambeth palace, now a state prison. He died insane, 1644, aged 57.

LEIGHTON, Robert, a Scotch divine, born at Edinburgh, son of the preceding. He was minister of a small church near Edinburgh, and conducted himself with such moderation, as offended the violent partizans of his times. His amiable character, however, was seen and admired by the magistrates of Edinburgh, who unanimously appointed him to preside over their college, where for 10 years he displayed all the abilities of a learned and popular preceptor. He was afterwards made bishop of Dumblane by Charles I. but finding his moderation and humility unable to stem the torrent of persecuting presbyterianism, he came to London, to resign his holy office. Instead, however, of accepting his abdication, Charles prevailed upon him to become archbishop of Glasgow, at a time when he hoped that exemplary piety, and the most unaffected manners, might recommend the measures of the court. But the virulence of party was so deeply rooted, that Leighton, about a year after, resigned the dangerous dignity which he could not support with comfort to himself, or advantage to his sovereign. He retired to Suffex, and by a sudden death, closed a life of literary labors, and of genuine goodness in 1684. He wrote a Commentary on St. Peter's Epistles, besides sermons and divinity tracts.

LEISMAN, John Anthony, a German painter, two of whose pieces are particularly admired; a landscape, with rough mountains and shady woods, with robbers darting unexpectedly to attack some travellers — and a sea port with elegant buildings and antiquities, ruins, &c. He died 1698, aged 94.

LELAND, John, the first and last antiquary royal of England, so called by Henry VIII. and deservedly named the father of antiquaries, was born in Leland, and educated at St. Paul's, under Lilly. By the friendship of Thomas Myles, he on the death of his parents, was maintained at Christ college, Cambridge, from which he removed to All-Soul's, Oxford. He improved himself afterwards by studying at Paris, and became, in ancient and modern languages, and in literature, the most accomplished writer of the age. His zeal for antiquarian research was happily patronized by the king, and he was empowered in 1533, by his master, to peruse the records of all libraries, and collections private and public, in the kingdom, for the elucidation of English history. Six years were thus laboriously employed in travelling through England and Wales, and that his income might be adequate to the expences of his journey, he was liberally presented by the king to the living of Popeling, near Calais, and afterwards made, in 1542, rector of Haseley, Oxfordshire, canon of Christchurch, and prebendary of Sarum. In 1545 he had digested four books, as the beginning of his labors, which he presented to the king, under the title of a New Year's Gift. To complete his further works he retired to his house in the parish of St. Michael le Querne, London; but such is the uncertainty and misery of human hopes, after six years' study he was suddenly deprived of his reason, probably in consequence of his intense application; and so violent was the phrenzy, that he never recovered. He died two years after, 18th April, 1552, and was interred in St. Michael le Querne's church, at the west end of Cheapside, which disappeared at the great conflagration of 1666. As to his character, England, says one of his contemporaries, never saw, and perhaps never will see again, a man equally skilled in the antiquities of his country. His Itinerary, and Collectanea, were published by Hearne, and so extensive are his resources, that he is as it were the common spring from which his successors and imitators, the Bayles, the Camdens, the Burtons, the Dugdales, the Gibsons, and others, have copiously drawn.

LELAND, John, a native of Wigan, in Lancashire. At the age of six he was deprived of the powers of his understanding and memory by the small pox, and for 12 months continued in that deplorable situation. His recollection afterwards gradually recovered, and when his parents removed to Dublin, he there applied himself with unusual diligence and success to literary pursuits. In 1716 he became assistant to Mr. Nathanael Weld, over a dissenting congregation; but he acquired greater popularity as a writer than as a preacher, respectable as he was. His view of the deistical writers that have appeared in England, 2 vols. 8vo. — and his Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, 2 vols. 4to. are the works of an able divine, by the most solid and convincing arguments, employing all his powers to refute atheism and infidelity. He wrote besides, a Defence of the Christian Religion against Tindal, 8vo. — a volume of Family Devotions, 12mo. and died 16th Jan. 1766, universally respected. His funeral sermon was preached by Nathanael Weld, his coadjutor.

LELAND, Thomas, D. D. a native of Dublin, senior fellow of Trinity college there, died 1785, aged 83. He was a man of learning, and strong powers of mind, and wrote, a History of Ireland, 4to. — the Life of Philip of Macedon — Principles of Human Eloquence, attacked by Warburton — translation of Demosthenes' Orations, &c.

LE LONG, James, author of the "Historical Library of France," a curious work, was of the Oratory, and died at his native place, Paris, 1721, aged 66.

LELY, sir Peter, an eminent painter, born in Westphalia, Germany, 1617. He studied his art at the Hague, and under de Grebber; and in 1641 came to England, where his landscapes and historical compositions recommended him to notice. He, however, soon discovered that portrait painting was a more lucrative employment, and therefore all his powers were directed to that branch of the art in which he acquired such celebrity. Though unable to travel to Italy, he procured the best pieces of that famous school, and uniting all their beauties to the suggestions of his own genius, he became a pattern of excellence to all other artists. In the graceful air of his heads, the variety and interest of his postures, and the easy management of his draperies, he was said to be inimitable. He was deservedly a favorite with Charles I. and with Charles II. who knighted him, and made him his chief painter. He married an English lady, and died of an apoplexy, at London, 1680, and was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent-garden.

LEMENS, Balthasar Van, a native of Antwerp, eminent as an historical painter. His figures were very graceful, and evinced the man of genius and of taste. He settled in London, and died there 1704, aged 67.

LEMERY, Nicolas, a French chemist, born 17th Nov. 1645, at Rouen, and placed there as apprentice to an apothecary. Anxious to study chemistry, he left Rouen, and came to Paris, and soon after went to Montpellier, where he soon acquired reputation under the instruction of Vernant, and became an able and interesting lecturer on chemistry. In 1672 he returned to Paris, and there began to dissipate those clouds of ignorance and prejudice which enveloped the science and language of chemistry: he provided himself a laboratory, and saw his lectures attended by numerous and respectable classes. As he was a protestant, his religion exposed him to persecution: therefore, after refusing to accept the invitations of the court of Berlin, he passed over to England in 1683, where Charles II. received him with great condescension. He, however, soon after returned to France, and yielding to the pressure of the times, he became a Roman catholic, that he might pursue his chemical studies without fear of persecution. On the revival of the academy of sciences 1699, he was made associate chemist and became a pensionary. He died of an apoplexy, 19th June 1715, aged 70. His works are, a Course of Chemistry, often edited—an Universal Pharmacopœia—an Universal treatise of Drugs—a treatise of Antimony.

LEMERY, Lewis, son of the above, was born at Paris 1677, and became physician to the king, and member of the academy of sciences. He wrote, an useful treatise on Food, 2 vols.—another on the Worms of the Human Body—besides several papers in the memoirs of the academy, and died 1743.

LEMNIUS, Levinus, a physician, born at Ziric-zee, Zealand, 1504. On the death of his wife, he took orders, and became canon of Ziric-zee, where he died 1568. He wrote, de Occultis Naturæ Miraculis—a treatise on Astrology—an Account of the Plants mentioned in Scripture.

LEMOINE, Francis, a French painter, born at Paris. Though without genius, he, by astonishing application, became an eminent painter. This unfortunate man destroyed himself in a fit of melancholy, 4th June 1737, aged 49. His chief works are, the Nativity at St. Roche—the Flight into Egypt—a Transfiguration—the Conversion of St. Paul—the Apotheosis of Hercules, at Versailles, the saloon of which he took four years in painting.

LEMON, George William, author of an Etymological English Dictionary, 4to. 1789, a work of merit, was a clergyman, and died 1797, aged 71.

LE MONNIER, Peter Charles, a native of Paris, who went with Maupertuis to measure a degree of the meridian towards the north pole. He wrote, Astronomical Institutions—Tables of the Sun—Corrections for those of the Moon—Lunar Nautical Astronomy, &c. He was member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the national institute, and died 1799.

LE MONNIER, Lewis William, brother to the preceding, was member of the academy of sciences, of the national institute, and of the London Royal society. He distinguished himself as an able physician, and as an experimental philosopher, and he contributed several valuable articles to the French Encyclopedie, especially on electricity, &c. He died 1799.—There was an ecclesiastic of that name, who, besides fables, tales, and epistles, translated Terence and Persius into French.

LENCLOS, Ninon de, a celebrated beauty, born 1615, at Paris, of a respectable family. Her mother wished to devote her to the seclusion of a convent, but her father, who was a man of wit and gallantry, prevented it; and the daughter, losing both her parents at the age of 15, soon showed how attached she was to the pleasures of the world. Courted for her polished understanding, and the vivacity of her wit, but more for her beauty, she rejected the honorable offers of matrimony; and as she possessed opulence, managed by economy, she determined to enjoy her liberty, and therefore yielded her person to those, who for greatness of talents, of birth, or of rank, were most pleasing to her licentious imagination. Yet in these voluptuous enjoyments, she affected to preserve the manners of a woman of virtue, and so captivating was her conversation, and dignified her personal deportment, that ladies of character and respectability became her friends and constant associates. Sensible of the charms of virtue, and well skilled in the works of Montaigne and Charron, she talked as a philosopher; but while she reasoned like Socrates, she unfortunately acted the part of Lais. Thus long flattered by the gay, the learned, and the opulent, she preserved her beauty almost to the last, and died 1706, aged 90. She left some children behind her. One of her sons, ignorant of her relationship to him, became enamoured of her; and when she, to check his passion, declared herself, by infallible proofs, to be his mother, the unfortunate youth, in despair, stabbed himself in her presence. Some of her letters are preserved in the works of St. Evremond, but the letters to the marquis de Sevigné, published as her own, though entertaining, are spurious.

LENFANT, James, a protestant divine, born 1661. He distinguished himself at Saumur and Geneva, and became minister of the French church at Heidelberg, 1683; but when the palatinate was invaded by the French, he retired to Berlin, where he died of a palsy 1728, aged 67. This respectable man was author of three capital works, the History of the Council of Constance—of Basil—of Pisa, each 2 vols. 4to. He wrote besides, the History of pope Joan—Pog-geana—sermons—the New Testament translated into Latin with Beaufobre.

LENGLET, Nicolas du Fresnoy, a French writer, born at Beauvais 1674. He was engaged in embassies, first as secretary to the French minister at the court of Cologne, and was afterwards engaged in the correspondence between Brussels and Holland. After reaching his 82d year, he fell asleep while reading by the fire, and then dropped into it, so that his head was nearly burnt off before he was discovered, 1756. His "Methode pour etudier l'Histoire," has been admired and translated into English. He was a voluminous but incorrect writer.

LENNARD, Sampson, a friend of Sir Philip Sidney, with whom he distinguished himself at the battle of Zutphen. He died about 1630, eminent as a translator of some works from the Latin and the French, and as well skilled in heraldry.

LENNOX, Charlotte, a native of New York, known as the learned author of Shakespeare illustrated, 3 vols. 12mo. containing an account of the histories from which the great bard is supposed to have drawn his plays—the Female Quixote, a novel of merit—Memoirs of Harriet Stuart—and of countess Berci—Henrietta, a novel—Philander, a dramatic pastoral—Sophia—Euphemia, novels—Sister—Old City Manners, two comedies—translations of Burney's Greek Theatre—and of Sully's Memoirs, &c. She was intimate with Johnson, Richardson, and other men of learning and wit, and died in low circumstances, 1804.

LENS, Bernard, a miniature painter, and good copyist of the works of others. He was painter and enameller to George II. and died 1741. He published some views, and drawing books, much admired.

LENTHAL, William, speaker of the long parliament, was born at Henley on Thames, Oxfordshire, 1591, and educated at Alban hall, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Lincoln's inn, and was regularly called to the bar, where he became known as an able counsellor. He was elected in 1639 member for Woodstock, and the next year, when the government was not popular enough to elect Gardiner, the recorder of London, speaker of the Commons, Lenthal, whom Clarendon represents as scarce equal to the high office, was seated in the chair. In this new and honorable situation, Lenthal consulted his interest and his fortunes by siding with the republican party, and while he affected respect towards the unfortunate Charles when he seated himself in the chair of the house, and inquired for the members who had offended him, his measures tended to secure the attachment of the Commons, and the good opinion of the people. Though dismissed from office by Cromwell in 1653, Lenthal was re-elected speaker the next year, and continued in office in the rump parliament. His dubious character, and the partiality which he had shown to the usurpation, exempted him, at the restoration, from the general bill of indemnity; but he afterwards obtained pardon from the king. The support, however, which he had given to the violent measures of the civil war, and the influence which he had exercised to prevent the restitution of royalty, embittered, it is said, his moments of reflection; and at his death in 1663, he expressed sincere contrition for his conduct. Some of his speeches and letters have been printed.

LENTULUS, Cneius, a Roman consul, put to death by Tiberius. He was both a poet and an historian.

LEO I. or ancient, succeeded Marcian on the throne of Constantinople, 457. He was a Thracian, though the particulars of his early history are unknown. He confirmed, in the beginning of his reign, the decrees of the council of Chalcedon against the Eutychians, and obtained signal victories against the barbarians; but his expedition against the Vandals was unsuccessful through the treachery of Aspar, his general. Leo punished this powerful offender, and destroyed him and all his family 471; but the Goths resented the severities exercised against their countrymen, and laid waste the provinces of the empire, even to the gates of Constantinople. Leo died soon after, 26th Jan. 474, praised by some historians, but severely censured by others.

LEO II. or younger, son of Zeno the Isaurian, and Ariadne, daughter of Leo, succeeded his grandfather, 474. Leo, who had ruined his constitution by his debaucheries, died soon after, aged 16, and his father Zeno, who had governed the empire for him, declared himself his successor.

LEO III. or Isaurian, was the son of a cobbler. He served first in the army, and was made, by Justinian II. one of his body guards, and raised, by Anastasius II. to the rank of general; and in 717 he became emperor. He signalized himself against the Saracens, who had ravaged Thrace, and attacked Constantinople itself, and he destroyed their fleet by means of the Greek fire. Proud of his victory, he banished Germanus from the see of Constantinople, and placed Anastasius in his room, and waging war against learned men and literature, he impiously set on fire the valuable library of his capital. Above 30,000 volumes, besides the choicest paintings and curious medals, perished in this dreadful conflagration. The popes Gregory II. and Gregory III. excommunicated this uncivilized barbarian; but while he prepared to revenge himself against the anathemas of Rome, he saw his invading fleet wrecked by a storm on the coast of the Adriatic; and he died soon after, 18th June 741, detested as a tyrant.

LEO IV. succeeded, in 775, his father, Constantine Copronymus. His reign was marked by the violent disputes between the Iconoclastes, or image breakers, and their religious opponents, whose cause he capriciously espoused by turns. He was successful in his attack against the Saracens in Asia, and died soon after, 780, aged 30. He was the husband of the famous Irene.

LEO V. the Armenian, became a general by his valor in the Roman armies, but he was disgraced and scourged as a slave by Nicephorus. Michael Rhangabus recalled him from exile to command the army, and so great was his popularity, that he prevailed on his troops to proclaim him emperor 813, and to depose his master. He afterwards obtained a signal victory over the Bulgarians, but disgraced himself by his cruelty. He was assassinated on Christmas day, 820.

LEO VI. or the philosopher, succeeded his father, Basil, the Macedonian, 886. He made war against the Bulgarians, Hungarians, and Saracens, and when he found himself unequal to the contest, he called to his assistance the Turks, who laid waste the country, and after plundering their enemies, sold their booty and their prisoners to their ally. Leo deposed the patriarch Photius, and afterwards his successor, Nicolas, because he presumed to excommunicate him for marrying a fourth time. He died of a dysentery, 9th June 911, in the 26th year of his reign. He was furnished the wife, from the protection which he extended to men of letters. He wrote some books of merit, the best known of which is, a treatise on Tactics, published by Meursius, Leyden, 1612.

LEO I. pope, surnamed the great, was employed in affairs of moment and difficulty by popes Celestinus I. and Sixtus III. the last of whom he succeeded in 440. He pursued vigorous measures to repress heresy, and was severe against the Manicheans, the Pelagians, the Priscillianists, and the Eutycheans. He sent four legates to the council which Marcian had assembled at Chalcedon, and afterwards he was commissioned as the most powerful ambassador, by Valentinian, to meet Attila, who was ravaging Italy, and marching to the gates of Rome. His eloquence prevailed with the fierce barbarian, who was induced to make peace, and to march back his forces across the Rhine. Four years after, however, he was less successful against Genserich, who ferociously entered the capital of Italy 455, and for 14 days abandoned it to the pillage and lust of his uncivilized soldiers. After an useful reign, Leo died, 3d Nov. 461. His works are preserved, printed in 2 vols. 4to. and also in folio, and they contain 96 sermons, 141 letters, &c.

LEO II. a native of Sicily, who succeeded Agatho in the popedom, 682. He was an able and resolute pontiff, and attempted to extend his power over the ecclesiastical bodies of the east. He first established the kiss of peace at the mass, and also the use of holy water. He died 3d July, 683.

LEO III. a Roman, who succeeded Adrian I. as pope, 795. In 799 a conspiracy was formed against him by the nephews of his predecessor, who were jealous of his elevation, and after the murderers had attempted to stab him, and to tear out his eyes and his tongue, they confined him in a monastery, from which he escaped to Charlemagne. Charlemagne espoused his cause, and reinstated him in the pontifical chair, and in 800 went himself to Rome, and received the imperial crown from his hands. In another conspiracy, after the emperor's decease, Leo behaved with greater severity, and put some of the accomplices to death. He died 11th June, 816. He was an eloquent and popular pontiff, respected abroad, and beloved by his subjects. Thirteen of his epistles are preserved.

LEO IV. a Roman, made pope after Sergius II. 847. He was a wife and courageous pontiff, and when the Saracens approached Rome, to pillage it, he boldly marched out to meet them, and though unsupported by the emperors of the east and the west, he gave them battle, and defeated them with great slaughter, and afterwards employed the captives to adorn and fortify that city, which they intended to destroy. He died 17th July 855.

LEO V. a native of Andrea, pope after Benedict IV. 903. He was soon after exiled and imprisoned by Christopher, and died of grief.

LEO VI. a Roman, pope after John X. 928. He died about seven months after.

LEO VII. a Roman, elected pope in 936, after John XI. He possessed many virtues, and died 23d April, 939.

LEO VIII. was elected pope by the authority of the emperor Otho, on the deposition of John XII. 963, and in consequence of this irregular appointment, he is called an antipope by Baronius and others. He was a pontiff of great merit and respectability, and died April, 965.

LEO IX. Brunon, bishop of Toul, was elected pope, 1048, and deserved the name of Saint, in the Romish calendar. He exerted all his authority in the councils of Italy, France, and Germany, to repress the debaucheries of the clergy, and the licentious morals of the laity, and to check the influence of heresy, particularly that of Photius. He visited Germany in 1053, to solicit the assistance of the emperor against the Normans, but in his attack upon these barbarous invaders, he was defeated near Beneventum, and taken prisoner. He was conducted in triumph to Rome by the conquerors, and died there, 19th April, 1054. His sermons, and other works are extant.

LEO X. John de Medicis, son of Lorenzo de Medicis, was born 1475, at Florence, and at the age of 11 was made an archbishop by Lewis XI. of France, and cardinal at 14, by Innocent VIII. He was employed as legate by Julius II. and was at the battle of Ravenna, where the French obtained the victory, 1512; but though taken prisoner, he was treated with great respect, and even veneration by the soldiers, as the representative of the holy pontiff. On the death of Julius he had the good fortune, by artifice and intrigue, to secure his elevation to the papal chair, 1513, and his coronation was conducted with the most unusual magnificence. Educated by the most learned men of the times, and allied to a family particularly dear to literature, he evinced his respect for learning, by the liberal patronage which he extended to its votaries. Though at the same time attached to pomp, and fond of pleasure, he did not neglect the duties of his high office, and the interests of the church. He put an end to the differences which had existed between his predecessor and Lewis XII. of France, and he concluded the protracted council of Lateran, in 1517. The affairs of the church were entrusted to Bembo, Sadolet, and other men of enlightened mind, and Leo considered that his throne was best supported, and his fame most surely extended by patronizing genius and literary talents, and encouraging the fine arts. Notwithstanding his popularity, Leo found enemies about his person, two of the cardinals, Petrucci and Sauli, prevailed upon his surgeon to poison a wound which he was to cure, but the conspiracy was timely discovered, and the accomplices punished. Petrucci was strangled in the prison, and Sauli purchased his life by the sacrifice of his immense possessions. Ambitious to distinguish himself, Leo formed two projects of great importance tance and glory; he meditated the union of all the christian princes, for the expulsion of the Turks from Europe, and he wished to complete the stupendous building of St. Peter's church, begun by his predecessor. To effect this, he in 1518, published the granting of indulgencies, by which the purchasers, for a sum of money, might free themselves from their sins. This extraordinary measure produced a schism between the Dominican and Augustine monks in Germany, and at last excited Martin Luther to preach first against the efficacy of these popish pardons, and next against the corruptions of the Roman church. The opposition of Luther at last drew down upon him the thunders of the Vatican, but the reformer, secure in his popularity, and in the protection of some of the German princes, prevailed against the pope, and severed the fairest part of the north from the dominion of Rome. In the war between Charles V. and Francis I. the support of the sovereign pontiff was solicited by both parties, but Leo in pretending to oblige both, fought only the aggrandizement of his family, and the extension of his power in Italy. It is said, that he died of a slight fever, caused by his excessive rejoicing at the misfortunes of France, though others attribute his death to the effects of some slow poison. He died 1st Dec. 1521. Besides his protection of poets and of learned men, he showed his attention to literature, by enriching the public libraries with collections of curiosities, and with valuable MSS.

LEO, an archbishop of Thessalonica, in the ninth century, distinguished as a mathematician, and as one of the great revivers of Grecian literature.

LEO, Pilatus, Greek professor at Florence, about 1360, first gave lectures on Homer, and other Greek authors. He perished in a shipwreck, as he returned from Constantinople to Italy.

LEO, of Modena, a celebrated rabbi of Venice, author of an Italian history of the rites and customs of the Jews — a dictionary, Hebrew and Italian, published Venice, 4to. 1612, and Padua 1640. He flourished in the 17th century.

LEO, the grammarian, compiled in the 12th century, a chronicle of Constantinople, from the time of Leo the Armenian, to Constantine VII.

LEO John, a native of Grenada, eminent as a geographer. After the ruin of his country, 1492, he went to Africa, in consequence of which he is sometimes called the African. He renounced the religion of Mahomet, and was esteemed by Leo X. He was author of the Lives of Arabian Philosophers — a Description of Africa, in Arabic, and died about 1526.

LEO, of Byzantium, a pupil of Plato, who was employed by his countrymen as ambassador to Athens, and to Philip of Macedonia. He was put to death by the treachery of Philip.

LEO, of Orvieto, a Dominican, who wrote an Account of the Popes — and another of the Emperors, 1308. These works, though not very elegant, were edited by Lami, 1737, 2 vols. 8vo.

LEO, Peter Cieca de, a Spaniard who travelled in America, and published an interesting account of Peru, finished at Lima, 1550. It is a work of merit.

LEONE, Arto, or Conaria, an historical painter, the pupil of Cornelius Engelbrecht. He died 1564, aged 66.

LEO

LEONI, Giacomo, a Venetian architect, who after being in the service of the elector palatine, settled in England, and published a fine edition of Palladio, 1742. He died 1746.

LEONICENUS, Nicolas, professor of physic at Ferrara, was the first who translated Galen's works, which he enriched with commentaries. He also translated the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, and besides Lucian and Dio Cassius. He died 1524, at the great age of 96.

LEONICUS THOMÆUS, Nicholas, a learned Venetian. He studied Greek under Demetrius Chalcondyles, at Florence, and read lectures on Aristotle, at Padua, with great reputation. He translated Proclus's Commentary on the Timæus of Plato, besides other works, and died at Padua, 1531, aged 75.

LEONIDAS, king of Sparta, was sent by his country to oppose the invasion of Xerxes. He met the enemy at the pass of Thermopylæ, and opposed them with such bravery, that had not treachery pointed out a secret way to the rear of the Spartans, their further progress would have been checked. Leonidas and his 300 brave companions fell, one only fled to meet disgrace at Sparta, B. C. 480.

LEONTIUM, an Athenian courtesan, strongly attached to the philosophy of Epicurus. She wrote a book against Theophrastus.

LEOPOLD, Saint, succeeded as marquis of Austria, 1096, and by his virtues deserved the surname of pious. He married Agnes, the sister of the emperor Henry V. by whom he had 18 children, eight sons, and ten daughters. He died 1139, and was canonized by Innocent VIII. in 1485.

LEOPOLD I. second son of the emperor Ferdinand III. and Mary Anne of Spain, was born 1640, and was made king of Hungary 1655, of Bohemia 1656, and elected emperor 1658. He waged war against the Turks, and though he proved successful by the valor of his general Montecuculi, he made a disadvantageous peace with them. Afterwards, when engaged to check the insurrections of his nobles in Hungary, Leopold found himself attacked by the Turkish forces, which penetrated with great rapidity into the heart of the empire, and laid siege to Vienna. While panic and terror prevailed, and the emperor saved himself by flight to Passau, the celebrated John Sobieski came to the assistance of his ally, the siege of Vienna was raised, and the Turks defeated. Leopold was also engaged in war with Lewis XIV. and lost Alsace, and saw his frontier towns pillaged and destroyed. The glory of his arms, was, however, well supported by the valor of his generals, especially of prince Eugene, of Savoy; but though he had the art to persuade the various princes of the Germanic constitution, to espouse his cause in his quarrels with neighbouring princes, he did not display that moderation towards his Hungarian subjects, which wisdom and interest might have dictated. The nobles were so dissatisfied with the severity of his measures, that in an assembly they meditated resistance against their sovereign, and declared the kingdom hereditary; but the death of the emperor prevented the fatal consequences of civil discord. He died 5th May, 1705.

LEOPOLD II. Peter Joseph, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, was born 1747. He was, for 25 years, grand grand duke of Tuscany, and in this principality, though perhaps too much attached to trifling forms, he governed with wisdom and moderation. On the death of his brother Joseph II. in 1790, he was elected emperor of Germany, and in this high dignity he evinced great abilities, and enlightened conceptions. By his influence, a reconciliation took place between the Turks, and Catherine of Russia, a treaty was made with Prussia, and the connection with England was cemented by every liberal mark of attachment and sound policy. The encroachments of French ambition had already irritated him, and he prepared to declare war against these lawless republicans, but death carried him off in the midst of his preparations, 1st March, 1792. His death, occasioned by a violent diarrhoea, was so sudden, that it was attributed, by some, to poison, but without truth. He was succeeded by his son, Francis II.

LEOPOLD, duke of Lorraine, son of Charles, the fifth duke, and of Eleanora of Austria, was celebrated for his military valor. At the peace of Ryswick he recovered Lorraine, of which a war with France had dispossessed his father, but though he was not permitted by the treaty to fortify his capital, he devoted himself to the happiness and prosperity of his country, and by the mildness of his government, raised around him an impregnable bulwark in the love and devotion of his people. He was a liberal patron of arts and sciences, and founded the university of Luneville, where he invited, by the most liberal promises, professors of merit and distinction. He died at Luneville, 27th March, 1729, aged 50, universally regretted. His son Francis, by Elizabeth, daughter of the duke of Orleans, was afterwards emperor of Germany.

LEOPOLD, William, archduke of Austria, bishop of Passau, &c. was at the head of the imperial armies in the 30 years' war, against the Swedes and the French, and he distinguished himself by his valor and wisdom in the field and in the cabinet. He died at Vienna, 1662.

LEOTAUD, Vincent, a French jesuit and mathematician, author of "Examen Quadraturæ" in which he proves the impossibility of squaring the circle. He died 1672.

LEOWICO, Cyprian, or LEOVITIUS, a noble Bohemian, born 1524. His "Ephemerides" was a collection of astrological productions, and incoherent reveries, by which he amused and terrified the superstitious. His prophecy, that the world would be at an end in 1584, for a while drew the attention of his countrymen from their pleasures and pursuits, to acts of devotion and piety. He held a conference with Tycho Brahe in 1569, and died 1574.

LEPAUTE, John Andrew, a French clock and watch maker, who made some valuable improvements in the mechanical parts of his profession, and died 1802. He wrote a Treatise on Clock making, published 1755, and again 1768, in 4to.

LEPICIER, Bernard, a French engraver, secretary and historian to the royal academy of painting, at Paris. His engravings after the style of Audran, were much admired. He died 1755, aged 59. He published in 2 vols. 4to. a catalogue of the French king's pictures. His son, Nicholas Bernard, died at Paris, 1784, aged 49, distinguished as a painter after the manner of Carlo Vasson, and as a professor in the academy of painting and sculpture.

LEPIDUS, Marcus Æmilius, one of the triumvirs with Augustus and Antony. He had Africa for his share in the division of the Roman empire, but soon lost it, by the intrigues of Augustus, and retired to privacy.

LEPRINCE, John, a French musician and painter, who in his way to Petersburg, was taken by an English privateer, whose crew plundered him of all his property, except his violin. The musician trusting to his powers, seized the despised instrument, and played upon it with such skill and effect, that the astonished sailors restored him all his property. During his residence at Petersburg, he was employed in adorning the palaces, and public buildings, but on Catherine's accession he returned to France, where he died, 1781, aged 48, member of the academy. His pieces, which are finished in the style of Teniers and Wouvermans, are much admired.

LE QUIEN, Michael, a learned Dominican, who wrote against Courayer, on the validity of ordination by English bishops. He was well skilled in ecclesiastical history, and died 1703, aged 42.

LERNUTIUS, John, a Latin poet, born at Bruges. His "Basia, Ocelli, & Alia Poemata" were published by Elzevir. He died 1619, aged 74.

LESBONAX, a philosopher of Mitylene, in the first century, some of whose grammatical treatises are still extant.

LESCAILLE, Catherine, a native of Holland, for the sweetness of her poetry called the Dutch Sappho, and the tenth muse. Her poems which display great genius, though often irregularities, consist of tragedies, published 1728. She died 1711, aged 62.

LESLEY, John, bishop of Ross in Scotland; was born 1527, of a very ancient family. He was educated at Aberdeen, and obtained a canonry in the cathedral there, 1547. He afterwards studied in the universities of Toulouse, Poitiers, and Paris, and in 1554 he was recalled home by the queen regent, and made vicar general of Aberdeen, and ordained priest of the parish of Une. In the dissensions which the reformation introduced in Scotland, Lesley who was a zealous papist, was commissioned by his party, to go and hasten the recall of queen Mary, who had lately lost her husband, Francis II. of France, and after meeting her at Vitri, he returned with her, 1561. His services to the queen recommended him, soon after, to the see of Ross, and he laboriously employed himself, with 15 others, to make a collection of all the laws of the kingdom, which were published at Edinburgh, 1566, and called the black acts of parliament, because printed in black letter. Upon Mary's flight to England, he appeared at York, 1568, and ably and zealously defended her cause against her accusers; and afterwards went to London as her ambassador. His measures to procure her liberty, by a marriage with the duke of Norfolk, proved offensive to Elizabeth, who regardless of the sanctity of his rank, sent him a prisoner to the isle of Ely, and then to the tower. In 1573 he obtained his release, and then retired to the Netherlands, anxiously soliciting the interference of the kings of Spain and France, the princes of Germany, and the pope, in the favor of his injured, and captive mistress.

In 1579 he was made suffragan to the see of Rouen, but in one of his visitations he was rudely seized by the Huguenots, who threatened to deliver him to the English, but he purchased his ransom for 3000 pistoles. Under the reign of Henry III. and of his successor in France, he was again exposed to persecution; but in 1593 he was nominated bishop of Constance. Yet, grandeur did not add to his happiness, and when he found it impossible to return to his diocese of Rofs, by the prevalence of the protestant religion, he retired to the monastery of Guirtenburg, near Brussels, where he died 1596. His abilities were acknowledged by friends and enemies to be very great, his integrity most exemplary, and his attachment to his unhappy mistress unshaken. Besides several pieces in favor of Mary, and other treatises, he published an excellent work, "De Origine, Moribus, & Rebus Gestis Scotorum, 1578, 4to.

LESLIE, John, a native of Scotland, educated at Aberdeen and Oxford. He travelled abroad, and acquired such a knowledge of the French, Spanish, Italian, and Latin, that he spoke those languages not only with fluency, but with remarkable elegance. After 22 years' residence abroad, he came back to England, and was patronized by Charles I. and the second. He was made bishop of Orkneys in Scotland, and in 1633 translated to Raphoe in Ireland, where he built a palace, so strongly fortified, that he was the last who surrendered to the arms of Cromwell. At the restoration he returned to England, and in 1661 was translated to Clogher. He died 1671, aged above 100, being the oldest bishop in the world.

LESLIE, Charles, second son of the preceding, was born in Ireland, and educated at Dublin, where he took his degree of M. A. He afterwards studied the law at the Temple, London, which he relinquished for divinity. In 1680 he took orders, and in 1687 he was made chancellor of the cathedral of Connor. He afterwards rendered himself very obnoxious to the papists of Ireland, he publicly entered the lists of theological disputation against them, and made converts to his own cause. Respected as a magistrate, and as a divine, he remained attached to the king's government; and though he opposed tyranny, he was zealous to support legal authority. In consequence, therefore, of his loyalty to James, he lost all his preferments at the revolution, and in 1689 he came over to England, to avoid the civil commotions which began to distract his native country. In his retirement he usefully employed the powers of his mind in combating the errors of the enemies of the church, both Jews and deists, Socinians and papists, quakers and infidels. He was, however, suspected of too familiar an intercourse with the abdicated monarch, and therefore was obliged to retire to France, where he joined the pretender at Barle Duc. He here exerted himself by his writings in favor of that unhappy family, and when their schemes of insurrection, in 1715, had failed, he attended them to Italy; but finding his adherence to protestant principles disagreeable to the pretender, he returned to Ireland in 1721, and died in his own house at Glaslough, county of Monaghan, 13th April, 1722. As a friend of the church of England, and as a man of principle, virtue, and integrity, Leslie was inferior to no man. His abilities as a writer, were of a superior cast, and whatever he sent into the world was read with avidity, and received with deference. His tracts, both theological and political, are very numerous, amounting to near 50. He left besides two folio volumes of theological works, in which he discussed the controversies which too much disturb the christian church.

LESSING, Gottbold Ephraim, a German poet, whose father, a man of literary talents, was minister of the congregation at Kametz. The son inherited the talents, and the application of the father; for five years he studied at Meissen, and after obtaining from his instructors, Klemm and Grabner, the character of an able and indefatigable scholar, he went to Leipzig, where he learned to excel in horsemanship, leaping, and fencing, and began to write for the stage. The liveliness of his temper, however, exposed him to calumny, and gave uneasiness to his father. With his friend Weisse he translated Mari-vaux's tragedy of Annibal, and here he finished his "Young Scholar," a comedy. Afterwards he went to Wittemberg, and also to Berlin, where he became acquainted with Voltaire, and published various things, often more in haste than with judgment. During the seven years' war he was, for a little time, secretary to general Tauenzien at Breslaw, and to other irregularities, added gaming, in the indulgence of which he forgot his character, and his literary pursuits. The abilities which he possessed, he unfortunately frequently misapplied, and in his wish to do something useful, he often promised more than he performed. His friend Mendelssohn, observed of him after his death, that he was advanced at least a century before the age in which he lived.

LESSIUS, Leonard, a jesuit, born near Antwerp. He was professor of philosophy at Douay, and afterwards filled the divinity chair at Louvaine, where his propositions on some scholastic subjects were exposed to ecclesiastical censure, which, however, the pope Sixtus V. in consequence of an appeal, fully reversed. He wrote De Justitia & Jure, fol. — De Potestate summi Pontificis — Hygiasticon, seu Vera Ratio Valetudinis — a Treatise on the Existence of a Deity, and on the Soul's Immortality, which have appeared in an English dress. He died 1623, aged 69.

L'ESTRANGE, for Roger, descended from an ancient family, was born 17th Dec. 1616, at Hunstanton hall, Norfolk. He was educated at Cambridge, and then attended Charles I. to Scotland in 1639, and during the ensuing civil wars, adhered most firmly to the royal cause. In 1646, however, he was betrayed by two villains, and tried and condemned as a spy by the parliamentary rebels, but his execution was delayed at first for 14 days, and then put off, till he took an opportunity of escaping in 1648, and saving himself, into France. In 1653 he took advantage of Cromwell's indemnity bill, and came back to England, and was, by application to the usurper, discharged. At the restoration, he was for a while neglected, till he was appointed licenser of the press. In 1663 he published the Public Intelligencer, a newspaper, which was laid aside when the London Gazette, first published at Oxford, made its appearance 1665. He again in 1679 set up another paper, called the Observer, in defence of the ministry, and of the character of the king; but while he ridiculed the popish plot, plot, and the other secret machinations of the enemies of all order, he exposed himself to the calumny of some interested persons, who wished to represent him as a dangerous man to government. When James II. came to the throne he knighted him, as he said, in consequence of his services and unshaken loyalty to the crown. In 1687 his Observator ceased, as he refused, though a loyal man, to espouse the cause of toleration recommended by the king. Yet some failed not to accuse him of being a papist, especially when his daughter became a convert to that communion. At the revolution sir Roger was neglected by the ruling powers, and even treated with contempt by the queen. He died 11th Sept. 1704, and was buried in the church of St. Giles in the Fields. His political tracts are very numerous, and besides these he translated Josephus, from D'Andilly's French — Cicero's Offices — Seneca's Morals — Aesop's Fables — Erasmus's Colloquies — Quevedo's Visions — Bona's Guide, &c. His language, however, was, as Gordon, the author of the Independent Whig, observes, coarse and vulgar. His genius tended to low wit and licentious buffoonery, and even in his fables he has made his beasts jesters, and instead of the language of freedom, he instils in their dialogue, doctrines of servitude, and a tame submission to tyranny.

LETHIEULLIER, Smart, esq. an English gentleman, born at Aldersbrook, in Essex, from an ancient family which had left France on account of their attachment to the reformation. He was of Trinity college, Oxford, and afterwards made a most valuable collection of medals, books, MSS. and natural curiosities on the continent. He died without issue, Aug. 27, 1760, aged 59. Some of his curiosities were consigned by his executors to the British Museum, and his library was sold by auction. He wrote some papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and in the Archæologia.

LETI, Gregorio, an Italian writer, born at Milan, 1630, and educated among the jesuits. He travelled, and embraced the protestant religion at Lausanne, and for 20 years lived at Geneva. He afterwards came to London, but though patronized by Charles II. he settled at Amsterdam, where he died 1701, with the title of historiographer of the town. His daughter married John le Clerc, and died 1734. As an historian he was esteemed, though often incorrect. He wrote the history of Lewis XIV. — of Philip II. of Spain — of Charles V. — of Queen Elizabeth — of Oliver Cromwell — of Pope Sixtus VI. — of Geneva, &c.

LEUCIPPUS, a philosopher of Abdera, B.C. 428. He was the pupil of Zeno, and first proposed the system of atoms, from which he made the world to originate.

LEUNCLAVIUS, John, a learned German, born at Amelburn, in Westphalia, 1533. He travelled much, and published an history of the Ottoman Empire, from materials which he collected in Turkey. He also translated Xenophon, Zosimus, &c. into Latin. He died at Vienna, 1593.

LEUSDEN, John, eminent for biblical knowledge, was born at Utrecht, where he became professor of Hebrew, and where he died 1699, aged 75. He was author of Onomasticon Sacrum — Clavis Hebraica & Philologica Vet. Testamenti — Novi Test. Clavis Græca, — Compendium Biblic. Vet. Testam. — Compendium Græcum Novi Testam. — Philologus Hebraeus — et Hebraeo Græcus — Notes on Jonah, Joel, Hosea, &c.

LEUWENHOEK, Anthony de, an eminent physician, born at Delft, in Holland, 1632. He acquired great celebrity by his curious and astonishing discoveries by the microscope. His letters to the royal society of London, of which he was member, printed 1722, 4to. and his Arcana Naturæ Detecta, 1714, 4 vols. 4to. are valuable. He died 26th Aug. 1723, aged 91.

LEVER, sir Ashton, son of sir d'Arcy Lever, knight, of Alkington, near Manchester, was celebrated as a judicious collector of rare and valuable curiosities. From Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where as a gentleman commoner, he was admired for his skill in horsemanship, he went to reside with his mother, and then settled on his estate, where he employed himself in collecting birds, and forming the most valuable aviary in the kingdom. Strongly attached to whatever was rare and astonishing in natural history, he devoted himself to the improvement of his collection, and by the favor of his friends, and his own indefatigable exertions, he soon found himself master of the most admired private museum in the nation. This curious collection, which was formed at great expence, was for some time exhibited in London, to the admiration of the public, and in 1785 was disposed of by way of lottery, and fell to the share of Mr. Parkinson, though it did not repay the proprietor the fourth part of his original expences. This valuable museum has lately been sold in small separate lots; but while a few individuals have thus been able to enrich their private collections, it is to be lamented, that the public purse was not opened to purchase the whole, and thus largely and liberally contribute to the enlargement of those institutions which display, in so pleasing a view, the taste, the genius, the labors, and the munificence of the English nation. Sir Ashton died in 1788.

LEVESQUE DE PONILLI, Lewis, a member of the French academy of inscriptions, and governor of Rheims, which he improved by the establishment of mathematical schools, and other valuable institutions. He wrote the Theory of agreeable Sensations, a curious book, translated into English, and died 1746.

LEVI, third son of Jacob by Leah, was honored among the tribes of Israel, and his posterity more immediately devoted to the service of god. He died in Egypt, B.C. 1612, aged about 136 years.

LEVINGSTON, James, a brave Scotchman, who distinguished himself in the wars of Bohemia, Holland, Sweden, and Germany, and afterwards became gentleman of the bed chamber to Charles I. who created him lord Levingston, and in 1641, earl of Calendar. At the beginning of the civil wars he sided with the parliament, but soon after he was reconciled to the king, whose forces he assisted in reducing York. He also attempted to rescue his master from the Isle of Wight, and took Carlisle, where he found a large supply of ammunition and arms. He died October, 1672.

LEWIS, John, a native of Bristol, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He obtained from Tenison, the primate, Minister vicarage in the Isle of Thanet, and the mastership of East-bridge hospital, Canterbury, and died at Margate, 1746, aged aged 71. He published the Life of Wickliffe, 8vo. — the Life of Caxton, 8vo. — the History of Faverham Abbey, 4to. — the History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet, 4to. — History of the Various Translations of the Old and New Testament into English, 8vo. — Wickliffe's Translation of the New Testament, folio.

LEWIS, kings of France, Vid. LOUIS.

LEY, for James, sixth son of Henry Ley of Jessent, Wilts, was raised by merit, to the office of chief justice in Ireland, and afterwards in England, and afterwards created baron Ley, and earl of Marlborough, and lord high treasurer, by James I. Some of his pieces on antiquity have been published by Hearne, and also his Reports 1659.

LEYBOURN, William, originally a painter, became a mathematician of eminence. He published Cursor Mathematicus, folio — a treatise on Surveying, folio, improved by Cunn — a treatise on Dialling 4to. — and also the Trader's Guide. He died about 1690.

LEYDECKER, Melchior, a native of Middleburg, professor of theology at Utrecht where he died 1721, aged 69. He is author of a curious treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews, 2 vols. fol. — History of Jansenism — Analysis of Scripture — Continuation of Horner's Ecclesiastical History — History of the Church of Africa, &c.

LEYDEN, Lucas Van, a Dutch painter in oil, in distemper, and on glass, and also eminent as an engraver. He acquired great celebrity by his painting of the history of St. Hubert, which he finished before the age of 15. With all his genius the proportional height of his figures to their distances is liable to censure. He died 1533, aged 39.

LEYSENS, N. a native of Antwerp. He studied painting at Rome, and settled at Antwerp, where his pious attentions to an aged and infirm parent were rewarded by the respect of his neighbors, and great success in his profession. He died at Antwerp 1720, aged 59.

LHUYD, Edward, a learned Welchman, born at Llanyrde, Carmarthenshire, and educated at Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1701. He succeeded Dr. Plot his tutor as keeper of the Ashmolean museum, and zealously devoted himself to study the antiquities of his native country. For this purpose he travelled with the observation of an active antiquarian, over Wales, Cornwall, Scotland, Ireland, and Bretagne, but before he had completed the digestion of his valuable materials he unfortunately died, July, 1709. He published Archæologia Britannica, or an Account of the Languages, Histories and Customs of the Ancient Britons, &c. vol. 1. fol. 1707, and left in MS. a Scottish or Irish English dictionary, which Malcolm a Scotch divine proposed to publish by subscription in 1732. Many of his observations were communicated to Dr. Gibson, and inserted in his edition of Camden's Britannia. His MSS. amounted to 40 vols. folio. 10 4to. and above 100 smaller, and were in the possession of the Seabright family, by whom they were communicated to Mr. Penant. Some of his letters are preserved in the Oxford museum.

LHWYD, or LHUYD, Humphrey, an antiquarian, born at Denbigh. He studied physic at Oxford, and took his degrees at Brazen-nose college, and then removed to practise physic in his native town. He died 1570, leaving behind him the character of an excellent rhetorician, sound philosopher, and indefatigable and accurate antiquarian. His publications were "an Almanack, &c. — Commentarioli Britannicæ Descriptionis Fragmentum 1572, published again by Moses Williams 1671, 4to. and translated into English by Th. Twyne under the title of the Breviary of Britain 1753, 8vo. — De Monâ Druidum Insulâ, Antiquitatî suæ Restitutâ 1568 — de Armamentario Romano — Chronicon Walliæ a Rege Cadwalladéro ad A. D. 1294 — the History of Cambria, left unfinished, but afterwards edited by Dr. Powel 1584, in 4to.

LIBANIUS, a sophist, born at Antioch on the Orontes. He had among his pupils Julian the apostate, and died at Antioch 390. He was a violent enemy of Christianity. His works have appeared, 2 vols. fol. 1606 and 1627, Paris.

LIBAVIUS, Andrew, a native of Hall in Saxony, who died at Cobourg in Franconia 1616. He was an able physician and wrote Syntagma Selectorum Alchemiæ Arcanorum, 2 vols. fol. — Epistol. Chemicæ, 1595, besides tracts against Paracelsus, &c.

LIBERI, Peter, a native of Padua, eminent as a painter. His pieces adorn the churches and palaces of Italy, the best known of which is Moses striking the rock. He died 1677, aged 77.

LIBERIUS, a native of Rome, pope after Julius I. 352. He subscribed very unwillingly to the condemnation of Athanasius, agreeable to the direction of Constantius. He died 366.

LICETUS, Fortunius, a physician, born at Rappollo in Genoa, 1577, became professor of philosophy and physic at Padua where he died 1655. He is author of some curious works on his profession, especially "de Monstris." He was himself born before the seventh month of his mother's pregnancy, but by being wrapped up in cotton his life was preserved.

LICHTENBERG, George Christopher, professor of philosophy at Gottingen, was an able German writer, and died there 1799.

LICINIUS, Tegula, a Latin poet B. C. 200. Nothing but fragments remain of his comic compositions. An orator and poet of that name flourished in the age of Cicero.

LICINIUS, C. Flavius Valerianus, son of a Dalmatian peasant, rose to the rank of a general in the Roman armies, and was made assistant emperor by Galerius. Constantine, who knew his merit, gave him his sister in marriage, but afterwards so great an enmity arose between them that only the death of Licinius in battle A. D. 324, ended the contest.

LICINIUS, Caius, a Roman plebeian, tribune of the people, author of a law to forbid the possession of more than 500 acres of land in any single individual. He also made a law to make the plebeians eligible to the consulship, and he was himself the first plebeian consul.

LIDDEL, Duncan, a native of Aberdeen. After studying in his native town he went at the age of 18 to Frankfort, where he applied to the mathematics, and then to Helmstadt where he took the degree of M. D.

1596, and became professor of mathematics and medicine. After travelling through Germany, and Italy he returned to his native country, where in gratitude for the honors and the success he had met in the world he founded six scholarships in Aberdeen university. He was author of Disputationes Medicinales, Helmstadt 1603, 4to. — Ars Medica succincte & perspicue Explicata, Hamburg, 1607, 8vo. and he died on his estate near Aberdeen, 1613, aged 52.

LIEVENS, John, a native of Leyden, 1607, eminent as a historical and portrait painter. He came to England at the invitation of Charles I. and painted the persons of the court, and several of the nobility, and after three years he returned to Antwerp, where he died.

LIEUTAUD, Joseph, physician to Lewis XVI. and member of the academy of sciences in 1752, was born at Aix in Provence. His chief works are "Anatomical Essays — Elements of Physiology — Synopsis of the Practice of Medicine — Historia Anatomico-Medica, 2 vols. 4to. — besides papers in the memoirs of the academy, &c. He died highly respected 1780.

LIGARIUS, Quintus, a proconsul of Africa, who opposed the ambitious views of Cæsar, but afterwards was reconciled to him. When accused by Tubero he was ably defended by Cicero. He was afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers.

LIGER, Lewis, author of the Paris Guide, and some useful works on gardening and agriculture, was born at Auxerre, and died 1717, aged 59.

LIGHTFOOT, John, a most eminent divine, born 29th March, 1602, at Stoke on Trent, Staffordshire. He was educated at Morton Green school, Cheshire, and in 1617 entered at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he soon became distinguished as an able scholar and an eloquent orator. After being some time assistant at Repton school, Derbyshire, he took orders, and from the curacy of Norton, Shropshire, was admitted as chaplain into the family of sir Rowland Cotton, of Bellapont, a great Hebraist in those days. Under the patronage of this hospitable man he devoted himself to the study of the oriental languages, and in 1629 published his "Erubhim, or Miscellanies Christian and Judaical," dedicated to his friend sir Rowland, who two years after gave him the rectory of Ashley, Staffordshire. Before this time Lightfoot had wandered in quest of settlement from London to Stone, and again to Hornsey near London, but now being in possession of a comfortable independence he devoted himself totally to literary pursuits, till, in the troubles of the times, his abilities made him known to the ruling powers, and in 1642, he departed for London, after resigning his living to his younger brother. He was now nominated one of the assembly of divines for settling the administration of the church, and in their meetings he distinguished himself as an eloquent, manly, and independent speaker. He was afterwards chosen minister of St. Bartholomew, behind the Royal Exchange, and in 1653 was, on the expulsion of Dr. Spurstow, made master of Catherine hall, Cambridge, and presented to the living of Much-Munden, Herts. He took his degree of D. D. 1652, and in 1655 was vice-chancellor of Cambridge. At the restoration he offered to resign to his predecessor Spurstow, but as his compliance with the measures of the usurpation was considered more as a matter of quiet resignation to superior authority, than of disloyalty to the exiled monarch, he was, by the interference of Sheldon the prime, and of others, permitted to retain his preferment. In 1661 he was one of the divines who had a conference at the Savoy about the liturgy; but disgusted with the violence of his associates he retired to his peaceful studies. He died 6th Dec. 1675, and was buried in Munden church, where his two wives were deposited before him. By the daughter of W. Crompton, Esq. his first wife, who died 1656, he had four sons and two daughters, and by the second, widow of A. Brograve, he had no issue. Lightfoot in the acknowledgment both of Englishmen and of foreigners, was one of the most eminent men in rabbinical learning this country ever produced; and his researches and commentaries were the grand store-house of succeeding annotators. Upon his "Harmony," he bestowed great and long labor. His works were collected together and first published in 1684, 2 vols. folio, of which a second edition appeared at Amsterdam 1686, to which a third volume was added in a third edition by J. Leusden, Utrecht, 1699, folio. Some more of his papers were published in 1700 by Mr. Strype.

LIGNAC, Joseph Adrian de, a priest of the Oratory, author of Letters to an American on Buffon's Natural History, 2 vols. 12mo. and other learned works. He was a native of Poitiers, and died 1762.

LIGONIER, John, earl of, an English field-marshal, who served under the great Marlborough, and in succeeding wars under Anne, and distinguished himself in the field, and also in the cabinet. He died 1770, aged 92.

LIGORIO, Peter, a Neapolitan, distinguished as a painter and architect. Paul IV. appointed him the architect of St. Peter's church, in which he was soon after succeeded by Michael Angelo. His designs after the antique compose 30 volumes. He died 1580.

LILBURN, John, an English enthusiast, born in 1618, at Thickney-Purcharden, Durham, the ancient seat of his family. At the age of 12 he was bound apprentice to a wholesale clothier, in London; but here he manifested the independent spirit of the times, and paid more attention to puritanical books than to business. In 1636 he was prevailed upon by Bastwick, a prisoner of the Star chamber, to go to Holland, and to print there his "Merry Liturgy," a violent pamphlet against the bishops, and in consequence of this, he was on his return taken up while distributing that and other obnoxious books, and for the offence he was whipt at the cart's tail, pilloried, fined 500l. and imprisoned. These punishments he underwent with such firmness and triumph that he was called by his party the saint, but at last the parliament interfered, though he had published some virulent papers, and headed a mob, clamoring for justice against Strafford. His sentence under the Star chamber was deemed tyrannical by the commons, and 2000l. were voted to him by the lords out of the estates of the royalists, which sum was afterwards increased, though he never received the whole. In the civil wars he gradually rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel, and behaved with great great bravery, especially at the battles of Edge-hill, Brentford, and Marston-moor; but his temper was so violent that he quarrelled even with his friend and patron the earl of Manchester, and wrote some virulent papers against him, for which he was sent by the lords to the tower. He petitioned the commons, but finding them slow in listening to his complaints he vented his abuse against the house, and declared in his "Oppressed Man's Oppression," that they were tyrants and ought to be pulled down. He at last, however, procured his enlargement, by means chiefly of Cromwell, whom he soon after abused, but his intemperance of language and conduct was such at last that the parliament ordered him to be fined 7000*l.* and banished out of the kingdom. He escaped beforehand, and went to Amsterdam where he began to intrigue for the restoration of the royal family, which he promised to effect for the reward of 10,000*l.* His offers, however, were regarded as the measures of a disappointed man, so that at the dissolution of the long parliament he again returned to England 1657, and was acquitted by a jury. After this he escaped Cromwell's resentment, by the interference of his friends, and retired to Eltham, where he turned preacher among the quakers. He died at Eltham, 29th Aug. 1657, aged 49, and was buried in the new burial place, Moorfields. His writings were numerous, but all abusive and political, and now deservedly forgotten.

LILIENTAL, Michael, a Prussian professor at Konigsberg. He published various dissertations, preserved in the memoirs of the Berlin academy, besides other works, and died 1750.

LILLO, George, a dramatic writer, born near Moor-gate, London, 4th Feb. 1693. Though a jeweller by profession and a man of business, he cultivated the muses and acquired great celebrity. His subjects were the common incidents of private life, but they were wrought in so masterly a manner, and delineated in such pathetic characters as touched the heart more forcibly than the misfortunes of kings and heroes. His "George Barnwell," "Fatal Curiosity," and "Arden of Feversham," have long been and continue to be the admiration of crowded audiences, when the tears that are shed by sympathizing nature bear a stronger testimony to the merits of the author than the most pompous descriptions of language. This worthy advocate of virtue was a dissenter in his religious opinions. He died Sep. 3, 1739. He was lusty in his person, not tall, and had the use of only one eye. His works were edited, 2 vols. 12mo. 1775 by Th. Davies; and Henry Fielding who knew him well, said in "his Champion," after his decease, that he had the spirit of an old Roman, with the innocence of a primitive christian.

LILLY, John, a native of Kent, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He afterwards removed to Cambridge, and became a great favorite at court. He was author of Euphnes, a miscellaneous description of characters, fol. — Endymion, Campaspe, Midas, played before queen Elizabeth — Woman in the Moon — the Maid's Metamorphosis, &c. He died 1600, aged about 47.

LILLY, William, an English astrologer, born in Leicestershire 1602. He was taught writing and arithmetic at Ashby-de-la-Zouch school, and then came to London, 1620, and engaged himself first as servant to a mantua maker, and four years after as book-keeper to a master of the Salters' company, and after his death he married his widow with a fortune of 1000*l.* Thus become his own master he began to frequent the puritanical meetings, and in 1632 applied himself to the study of astrology under Evans, a Welchman of debauched character. In this new character he acted with great precaution, his predictions were generally ambiguous, and if they failed, the deception was ascribed to untoward circumstances or false representations. In 1637 he settled at Horsham with a second wife, who, unlike his first, was violent in her temper, and extremely quarrelsome, but in 1641 he returned to London, where, in these superstitious times, his profession was much respected by all parties. He was frequently consulted by the parliamentary generals, and his assurances of success were productive of great animation in the soldiers. Though attached to the republicans, his services were solicited also for the king, and Mrs. Whorwood consulted him on the part of his majesty, and he informed her he might conceal himself in Essex, about 20 miles from London, and when he was confined in Carisbrook castle, he provided him with a saw and aquafortis, by which he might effect his escape. The parliament in the mean time patronized him by a salary of 100*l.* a year, which he resigned in two years, and in 1648 and the next year he greatly improved his property by delivering lectures on his art. At the restoration he was examined by the commons about the beheading of Charles which he declared was done by comet Joyce. After obtaining his pardon, under the broad seal of England, he returned to Horsham where he practised physic, as he had, through the friendship of Elias Ashmole, obtained a licence from archbishop Sheldon. He died of a palsy at Horsham, 1681, and was buried in Walton church, where a marble was placed by Ashmole with a Latin inscription, written by Smalridge, afterwards bishop of Bristol. Lilly lost his second wife in 1654 and married again the same year. He acquired property by his publications, and especially by his almanacs, and in 1659 was complimented with a gold chain and medal by the king of Sweden, whose name he had mentioned with particular respect. He adopted for his son Coley a taylor, whom he called Merlin junior, and to whom he gave the almanacs which for 36 successive years he had printed; but he left his estate at Horsham to the son of his friend Bulstrode Whitelock, and his magical instruments to his astrological successor, Dr. Caussin. His chief works are Christian Astrology, 4to. 1647 — a Collection of Nativities — Observations on the Life, &c. of Charles I. — Annus Tenebrosus, or the Black Year, &c.

LILY, William, an English grammarian, born at Odiham, Hants, 1466. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and after taking his bachelor's degree he went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. On his return he stopped at Rhodes, where he studied Greek, and also at Rome, where he still more fully improved himself. In 1510 the year after his arrival in England, he was in consequence of his great reputation for learning, made first master of St. Paul's school, then founded by dean Colet. For 12 years he presided with high celebrity over this foundation, and had among his pupils many persons who afterwards distinguished themselves in the state. He died of the plague in London 1522, aged 54. By his wife Agnes, he left two sons, and a daughter, who married Ritwise, his successor in St. Paul's school, who died 1532. Lily is the author of a valuable grammar, in which it is said he was assisted by his friends, Erasmus, Colet, and Wolfey; but though it has been recommended by royal authority for general use, Roger Ascham and some others have ventured to censure it as very imperfect and incorrect. He wrote besides, "Poemata Varia," and other pieces.

LILY, George, eldest son of the grammarian, was born in London, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, after which he went to Rome, and was patronized there by cardinal Pole. On his return to England, he was made canon of St. Paul's, and prebendary of Canterbury. He wrote some historical books, and was the first who published a correct map of Britain. He died 1559.

LILY, Peter, second son of the grammarian, was a dignitary of the church of Canterbury. His son Peter, was fellow of Jesus college, Cambridge, D. D. prebendary of St. Paul's, and archdeacon of Taunton. He died 1614, and some of his sermons were published by his widow.

LIMBORCH, Philip, a learned divine, born at Amsterdam, 19th June, 1633. His education was completed under the first masters, and after studying divinity for some time at Utrecht, he embraced the tenets of the remonstrants, and first appeared as a public probationary preacher at Haerlem, 1655. From Haerlem he went to Gonda; and in 1667 he was invited to Amsterdam, where he became deputy, and the next year successor, to Pontanus, the divinity professor. But he acquired popularity not only as a preacher, but as a writer, and as the editor of the letters of his uncle Episcopius, which contained the regular history of Arminianism. In 1686 he published his popular work, Theologia Christiana ad Praxim Pietatis, &c. in folio, which was well received, and quickly passed through four editions. In 1686 he had also a dispute with Isaac Orobio, a learned Jew, who had escaped from the Spanish inquisition at Seville, and practised physic at Amsterdam, and the result of this controversy appeared under the title of, Collatio Amica de Veritate Christianæ Religionis cum Erudito Judæo. In this and other performances he displayed great abilities, but in the management of his arguments he was modest and candid. He was employed in 1694 to recover from Judaism a young lady of Amsterdam, of the age of 22, who had, at the persuasion of the Jews, embraced their religion, and he succeeded, by the strength and solidity of his arguments, to remove all her doubts. This good, pious, and active man, was seized with St. Anthony's fire in the autumn of 1711, and died in consequence of it the following 30th of April. His funeral oration was spoken by John Le Clerc, and he is described as a solid preacher, an able annotator, a candid lover of truth, and in his private character, amiable and benevolent. He was greatly esteemed by Locke and Tillotson, and was the correspondent of several learned men in Europe. His History of the Inquisition, published 1692; fol. was translated into English by Sam. Chandler, 2 vols. 4to. 1731. He wrote besides other works.

LIMNÆUS, John, a German lawyer of Jena, known as the author of various learned works. He was tutor to Albert, margrave of Brandenburg, and died 1663, aged 71.

LINACRE, Dr. Thomas, a learned physician, descended from an ancient Derbyshire family, was born at Canterbury 1460. From the king's school in his native town he passed to Oxford, and was elected fellow of All Souls 1484, after which he travelled on the continent, and improved himself at Florence and at Rome, by the instruction of those eminent scholars, Demetr. Chalcondylas, Ang. Politian, and Herm. Barbarus. On his return home he took his degree of M. D. and was made professor of physic at Oxford, and afterwards became preceptor to prince Arthur, and physician to Henry VII. and afterwards to Henry VIII. In 1500 he abandoned physic for divinity, and obtained a prebend in Wells, and another in York cathedral, besides other preferment by the friendship of Wareham, the primate. He was also rector of Wigan, Lancashire, and prebendary of Westminster. He was not only the best Grecian and Latinist of his age, but he proved himself one of the most zealous promoters of the revival of learning in the kingdom; and by his means the college of physicians was founded, and of this excellent institution he became the first president. This good and worthy man died of the stone, after suffering great pain, 20th Oct. 1524, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral, where a Latin inscription, by Dr. Caius, recorded his meritorious services to literature and to mankind. He published a Latin translation of Proclus' Sphere, 1499 — the Rudiments of Grammar, for the Use of the Princess Mary — de Emendatâ Structurâ Latini Sermonis, Libri sex, a valuable work — and translations of Galen's works, in truly classical language.

LINANT, Michael, a French poet, the intimate friend of Voltaire. He three times obtained the prize of the French academy, and published some odes and other poems. He died 1749, aged 41, universally respected.

LIND, James, an English physician, author of a valuable treatise on the Diseases of Seamen, 8vo. and other works. He died 1794.

LINDANUS, William, a Dutchman, made the first bishop of Ruremonde, by Philip II. of Spain. He was in 1588 removed to Ghent, and died there that year. He was a native of Dordt, and wrote some Latin works on Theological subjects, and in defence of the catholic religion.

LINDENBRUCH, Frederic, the laborious and learned editor of Virgil, Terence, and other classics, and the author of, "Codex Legum Antiquarum," folio, a curious work, was a Fleming, and died 1638.

LINDSAY, John, a learned divine, educated at St. Mary-hall, Oxford. For some years he was the minister of a dissenting congregation in Aldersgate street, and was also a corrector of the press to Mr. Bowyer. He died June 21st, 1768, aged 82, and was buried in Islington church-yard. He wrote, "the Short History of the Regal Succession" — Remarks on Whiston's ton's Scripture Politics, 8vo. — and translated Masson's Vindication of the Church of England, reprinted 1727.

LINDSAY, fr David, a Scotch poet, born at the Mount, Fifeshire, 1496, and educated at St. Andrew's. After the fatal day of Flodden-field, he went over to France, and distinguished himself at the battle of Pavia; and on his return home, was made by James V. master of the heralds' office. He was also employed in several embassies, and wrote some admired poems. His Satires on the Vices of the Clergy were much admired. He wrote also an History of Scotland, three vols. now in MS. in the advocates' library Edinburgh. He died 1557, aged 61.

LINDSAY, David, a relation of the preceding, was born at Pitcorthie, Fifeshire, 1527, and educated at St. Andrew's. After studying in foreign universities he returned to support the reformed religion against queen Mary. He wrote the History of Scotland from 1437 to 1542, a curious work, but often injudicious, and wickedly partial. He died at his native seat 1593, aged 66.

LINDWOOD, William, divinity professor at Oxford in the reign of Henry V. was ambassador in Spain 1422, and for his services was made bishop of St. David's 1434. He wrote the Constitutions of the Archbishops of Canterbury from Langton to Chicheley, printed Paris 1505, and Oxford 1663; and he died 1446.

LINGELBACK, John, a German painter, born at Frankfort on the Maine 1625. He travelled over Holland, France, and Italy, to improve himself by studying foreign models; and on his return he exhibited a highly polished style of painting. His pictures were adorned with ruins of antiquity, his landscapes were rich and beautiful, and his genius proved so fertile, that the same subjects never appeared twice in his pieces. He returned to Amsterdam 1650, but the time of his death is not ascertained.

LINGUET, Simon Nicolas Henry, a French writer, born 14th July, 1736, at Rheims. He went, when young, into the suite of the French general who led an army against Portugal; and during his residence in Spain, he applied himself to the language, and translated some dramatic pieces into French. On his return to France, he devoted himself to the labors of the bar, and by his application and the brilliant powers of his eloquence, he acquired great celebrity, especially in his masterly defence of the duke of Aiguillon, and of Morangies. His high reputation excited the jealousy of his oratorical rivals, and by an unmanly combination they obtained a decree from the parliament that he should no longer be permitted to exercise his profession of pleader. Thus cruelly robbed of his honors, the disappointed orator had recourse to his pen, and produced several political pamphlets, a periodical journal, and his celebrated Theory of the Laws. The freedom of his observations excited against him the persecution of the prime minister, Maurepas, but upon the arbitrary suppression of his journal he fled to Switzerland, and then to Holland and to London. From England he passed to Brussels, and from thence wrote a petition to Vergennes to be permitted to return to France in security. His request was granted; but in 1779 some political delinquency threw him into the Bastille, where he remained two years, and was at last liberated on the promise of being moderate and prudent in his writings and in his conversation. He soon after passed to England, where he wrote his Memoirs on the Bastille, and then retired to Brussels, where he began his Political Annals. His Observations on the Freedom of the Navigation of the Scheldt, were read with admiration by the people of Brabant; and Joseph II. was so pleased with his arguments, that he permitted him to come to Vienna, where he complimented him with a present of 1000 ducats. The liberality of the monarch ought to have roused the gratitude of Linguet, but regardless of the kindness of his patron, he scrupled not to defend the violent measures which Vandernoot and the rebellious Brabanters were meditating against the authority of their monarch. Deservedly banished from Germany, Linguet came to Paris, to share in the dangers of the revolution, and in 1791 he appeared at the bar of the national assembly to plead the cause of the negroes of St. Domingo, and to inveigh against the tyranny of their white masters. During the reign of terror, he fled from the capital, but his retreat was discovered, and he was dragged from the country before that bloody tribunal which paid no respect either to age, to virtue, or to misfortunes. He was condemned to death, 27th June, 1794, on pretence of having disgraced his nation by paying the tribute of respect to the governments of London and Vienna. He walked to the scaffold with great composure, and fell with the resignation of a good christian. He wrote various works, 35 in number, the best known of which, besides those already mentioned, are, the History of the Age of Alexander — the Fanaticism of Philosophers — the History of the Revolutions of the Roman Empire, 2 vols. — Reflections on Light — History of the Jesuits — a Critique on Voltaire — Socrates, a tragedy.

LINIERE, Francis, a French poet of great literary merit, but of a dissipated character, and in opinion an obstinate atheist. He died as he had lived, a profligate, 1704, aged 76. His verses are said to possess great sweetness and elegance.

LINLEY, Thomas, an English musician and composer, who died 1795. He was one of the proprietors of Drury-lane theatre.

LINNÆUS, Charles Von, or Linné, the father of modern botany, son of a Swedish clergyman, was born at Roskhult, in the province of Smaland, Sweden, 24th May, 1707. He was educated at Lund in Scania, and at the university of Upsal, and he afterwards studied at Leyden, where he took his degree of M. D. in 1735. On his return to Stockholm, he practised physic with such popularity and success, that at the age of 34 he was nominated professor of physic and botany in the university of Upsal. He was also appointed physician to king Adolphus, who in 1753 created him a knight of the polar star, and in 1757 raised him to the honor of nobility; and his services were further acknowledged by the succeeding monarch, who in 1776 doubled his pension, and settled on him and and his family a valuable portion of land. With an unparalleled ardor, after knowledge, Linnæus undertook to explore the barren and inhospitable deserts of Lapland, and through 10 degrees of latitude he exposed himself, generally on foot, to every sort of fatigue. He afterwards visited the mines of Sweden, and extended his researches to the natural productions of Dalecarlia. In 1735 he visited Denmark, Germany, and Holland, and the following year he came to England. He was received in this country with distinction, recommended by a flattering letter from Boerhaave; but it has been observed that sir Hans Sloane, to whom the introduction was made, did not pay him that respect and attention which his merits deserved, and this probably prevented the intended settlement of this immortal philosopher here. The return of Linnæus to Stockholm was a glorious era in the Swedish annals of literature. He promoted the establishment of the royal academy of sciences, and became its first president. This great man was seized in 1776 with an apoplexy, but it did not prove fatal, as he survived till 1778, when an ulceration of the urinary bladder put an end to his existence, 11th Jan. in his 71st year. To his sagacious discernment, science is indebted for the useful and familiar division of plants, of animals, of herbs, &c. into classes. To the most extensive knowledge he united the most indefatigable industry; and before the publication of his Genera Plantarum, he most minutely examined the characters of more than 8000 plants. His works are, Systema Naturæ, sistens tria regna Naturæ, 1735, folio, and 2 vols. 8vo. 1756 — Bibliotheca Botanica, 8vo. — Hortus Cliffortianus, folio — Critica Botanica, 8vo. — Flora Laponica, 8vo. — Genera Plantarum, earumque Characteres Natur. 8vo. — Flora Suecica — Fauna Suecica, 8vo. — Flora Zeylanica, 4to. — Hortus Upsalienfis, 8vo. — Amœnitates Academicæ, 5 vols. 8vo. — Materia Medica, 8vo. — Animalium Specierum in Classes, 8vo. — Oratio de Incrementis Telluris Habitabilis, 8vo. — Nemesis divina — Plantæ Surinamenses. His son Charles, the last survivor of the family, died 1783, aged 45, professor of medicine at Upsal.

LINT, Peter Van, a native of Antwerp, 1609, known as an historical and portrait painter. He studied in Italy, and painted there with great reputation, and afterwards returned to Antwerp. — His relation, Hendrick Van, was also a good painter. His landscapes near Rome were much admired. Two of his pieces are in lord Moira's collection.

LINTRUST, Severinus, bishop of Wiburg, Jutland, professor of divinity and eloquence at Copenhagen, was author of some theological works in Latin, and died 1732.

LINUS, St. successor of St. Peter at Rome, ranks among the martyrs of that celebrated city. Tertullian, it is to be observed, places St. Clement as next successor to Peter.

LIOTARD, John Stephen, a crayon painter, born at Geneva 1702. He studied at Paris, and afterwards at Rome, and for a short time visited England in the reign of George I. He then made a journey to the Levant, and adopted the manners and habits of the east, which he relinquished upon marrying. He was in England in 1772, where he disposed of a large collection of pictures by auction. He was very correct in his paintings, but stiffness and formality were too visible. A fine head of him is preserved in Walpole's anecdotes. He died about 1780.

LIOTARD, Peter, a French botanist, born at Dauphiny. From an obscure peasant he became a soldier, but retired from the profession in consequence of a wound received at the siege of Mahon, and settled with his uncle, who was an herbalist at Grenoble. In this place the particular powers of his mind unfolded themselves. Though 40 he applied himself with such zeal and attention to botany, that he was made director of the public garden of Grenoble. He was the friend of Rousseau, and other learned men; and was so partial to Linnæus, that he knew the whole of his system of plants by heart. He died 1796.

LIPPI, Philip, a native of Florence, who from a Carmelite became a painter, and was surnamed the Old. He was a dissipated character, and died 1488, aged 67. In his style he imitated the manner of his master Masaccio. His son Philip, was also eminent as a painter, and died 1505, aged 45.

LIPPI, Lawrence, a native of Florence. He excelled as a painter in historical pieces and in portraits, and as a poet he possessed merit. His Malmantile Raquittato, under the assumed name of Pernoli Zipoli, is a burlesque performance, printed at Florence, 4to. 1688, and again edited 1731, with notes 4to. and Paris 1768, 12mo. He died 1664, aged 58.

LIPSIUS, Justus, a learned critic, born at Iscanum, between Brussels and Louvaine, 18th Oct. 1547. In his earliest years he displayed great powers of memory while at school at Brussels, at Aeth, at Cologne, and at the university of Louvaine, where he devoted himself assiduously to the cultivation of belles lettres and ancient literature. At the age of 18 he published his "Variarum Lectionum Libri tres," which he dedicated to the general patron of letters, cardinal Granvellan; and therefore when he visited Rome in 1567, he was made secretary to that distinguished ecclesiastical, and for two years treated with the greatest respect and hospitality. After viewing the classical remains of ancient Rome, and exploring the contents of her rich libraries, he in 1569 returned to Louvaine. He afterwards went to Vienna, and being prevented from settling in his country, he stopped at Jena, where he was honored with a professorship. From Jena he determined to retire to solitude and study in his own native seat of Iscanum; but the tumults of war drove him away again to Louvaine, and from Louvaine he came to Leyden, where he lived 13 years till 1590. The remainder of life was spent at Louvaine, notwithstanding the flattering invitations and offers of patronage which he received from the pope, from the cardinals, and from the kings of France and Spain, and there he died 23d March, 1606, in his 59th year. Celebrated as a scholar, and respected as a critic, Lipsius was, in his conversation, his dress, and his appearance, far from prepossessing, but rather disagreeable and mean. In his religious opinions he was culpably inconsistent, without faith, and without honor. He was born a Roman catholic, but he became a Lutheran at Jenà, again a catholic at Brabant, a Calvinist at Leyden, and again a bigoted catholic at Louvain. His last days indeed were clouded by disease, and weakness of understanding, but some parts of his conduct were long before ridiculous and puerile, and it could be scarcely credited, that the same man was at one time regardless of religion, and at another, so anxious to obtain the protection of the Virgin Mary, that he dedicated to her a silver pen, and a favorite gown, lined with fur. His works were published at Antwerp, 6 vols. folio, 1637, the most esteemed of which are a Commentary on Tacitus, much admired — His Orations, De Concordiâ, and on the Death of the Duke of Saxony — Electa — Saturnalia — De Militiâ Romanâ — Satira Menippæa — De Amphitheatris — De Rectâ Pronunciatione Lingvæ Latine, &c.

LIRON, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Chartres, and died at Mans, 1749, aged 84. He was author of Bibliothèque des Auteurs Chartrains — Les Annales de la Critique — Les Singularités Historiques & Littéraires, 4 vols. 12mo. works of great merit.

LIS, John Van der, a painter, born at Oldenburgh. His pieces were generally on scriptural subjects, and on moral sports, and possessed great merit. He died 1629, aged 59. Another painter of that name, eminent in historical representations, was born at Breda, and the disciple of Cornelius Poelenberg.

LISLE, Claude de, a native of Vaucouleurs, in Lorraine, bred to the law, which he quitted to study geography. He excelled as a teacher of geographical knowledge, and had among his pupils, Orleans, afterwards regent of France. He wrote Historical Relation of Siam, 12mo. — Introduction to Geography, with a treatise on the Sphere, 2 vols. 12mo. — an Abridgement of Universal History, 7 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1720, aged 76.

LISLE, William de, a French geographer, son of Claude, was born at Paris, 1675. His map of the world, published in 1699, recommended him so strongly, that he was elected into the academy of sciences. He was afterwards appointed geographer to the king, and instructed Lewis XV. himself, in geography, and wrote several works for his use. Scarce any respectable publication appeared without being decorated with his maps. He died of an apoplexy, 1726, when preparing a map of Malta, for Vertot's History.

LISLE, Joseph Nicholas de, an able astronomer, brother to William. He was born at Paris, and became by his celebrity, member of all the learned academies in Europe. He was in England 1724, and obtained, as he deserved, the friendship and admiration of Newton and Halley. In 1726 he was invited to Russia, and there he contributed greatly to the advancement of astronomy and geography, at the head of the observatory. At the age of 18 he made valuable observations on a total eclipse of the sun, but his greatest work is his Memoirs of the History of Astronomy, 2 vols. 4to. He returned from Petersburg in 1747, and died at Paris, 1768, aged 80.

LISLE, sir George, son of a London bookseller, learnt the art of war in Flanders, and distinguished himself in the civil wars. At the last battle of Newbury, when it grew dark, he fought in his shirt, to render his person more conspicuous to his men, and in consequence of his valor he was knighted by the king in the field of battle. He bravely defended Colchester, in 1648, and when the town surrendered he was inhumanly ordered to be shot by the victorious republicans. He suffered with great intrepidity, 28th Aug. 1648.

LISOLA, Francis de, a native of Befançon, for four years ambassador in England, from the emperor Ferdinand III. and afterwards envoy extraordinary at Madrid. His work "Bouclier d'Etat & de Justice" on the ambitious views of Lewis XIV. was highly offensive to the French. He died 1677. Some of his letters and memoirs have also been published, 12mo.

LISTER, Matthew, president of the college of physicians, was born at Thornton, Yorkshire, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Oriel college. He studied physic abroad, and took his degree of M. D. at Basil, and afterwards became physician to Anne, James's queen, and to Charles I. who knighted him. He was a great sufferer during the civil wars, and died near Louth, Lincolnshire, 1657, aged 92.

LISTER, Martin, nephew of sir Matthew, was born in Buckinghamshire, about 1638, and educated under his uncle, who sent him to St. John's college, Cambridge, where he became fellow, 1660. He studied physic, and travelled abroad, and at his return home, 1670, he settled at York, where he acquired great reputation. He also devoted much of his time to the study of antiquities and natural history, and for his many valuable communications he was elected fellow of the royal society. In 1684 he removed to London, and in 1698 attended the earl of Portland, when ambassador to the court of France. He published an account of his journey to Paris, which was ridiculed by Dr. King's Journey to London. He was made physician to queen Anne, 1709, and died Feb. 1711-12. His other publications are about eight in number, on natural history, on shells, &c.

LITHGOW, William, a Scotchman, who travelled on foot over Europe, Asia, and Africa, where he met various adventures, of which he has given a curious but marvellous relation. At Malaga he was tortured by the inquisition, and on his return was presented to king James and his court, so mangled that he was carried on a feather bed into the royal presence. He applied to the Spanish ambassador Gondamar, and when deceived by him, he insulted him, and even struck him in the king's chamber, for which he was sent a prisoner for nine months, to the Marshalsea. His travels are now a scarce book. He informs his reader, that he has walked on foot, more than 36,000 miles. The better part of his travels appears in Morgan's "Phoenix Britannicus."

LITTLE, William, an English historian, born at Bridlington, Yorkshire, 1136. He is often called Naubrigensis, as he was a monk of Newborough abbey. His History of England, from the invasion of William the Conqueror, to 1197, in 5 books, is highly esteemed for accuracy, judicious arrangement, and veracity. There is preserved in Christ-church hospital, Abingdon, Berks, a MS. by John Little, which records various interesting and curious particulars, concerning the abbey, and the history of that town.

LITTLEBURY, Isaac, an English divine, who published a translation of Herodotus. The work is well and faithfully executed, but without notes. The second edition in 2 vols. 8vo. appeared in 1720.

LITTLETON, or LYTTLETON, Thomas, an English judge, born at Frankley, Worcestershire. After a liberal education, he entered at the Inner Temple, and so ably distinguished himself, that Henry VI. appointed him steward of the court of the palace, and in 1455, king's serjeant, and a judge on the northern circuit. The troubles of the time did not lessen the public opinion of his integrity, Edward IV. granted him a pardon, and continued him in his offices, and afterwards made him one of the judges of the common pleas. In 1475 he was created knight of the bath, and died in a good old age, 23d Aug. 1481. He was buried in Worcester cathedral. He left three sons, William, Richard, and Thomas. The eldest son lived in splendor at Frankley, and died 1508. From him the present ennobled family are descended. The second was a lawyer of eminence, and it was for his use and instruction, that his father, in his old age, wrote his famous treatise on tenures and titles, first printed 1477, and often republished with Coke's commentary. The third son, Thomas, was knighted by Henry VII. for apprehending Lambert Simnel, the pretended earl of Warwick.

LITTLETON, John, a descendant of the Worcestershire Littletons, was known as an active member of parliament for his native county, in the 27th year of Elizabeth, but his attachment to Essex proved unfortunate. He was seized when that favorite was discarded from the protection of the queen, and being fined and condemned as a conspirator, he was saved with difficulty by the interference of sir Walter Raleigh, to whom he wrote an excellent letter. He died in prison, 1600. Several of his letters appear in the Biographia Britannica.

LITTLETON, Edward, a native of Shropshire, related to the Worcestershire family. He removed from Christ-church, Oxford, to the Inner Temple, and in 1628, distinguished himself in parliament as one of the members that appeared before the lords with the bill of rights. He was afterwards one of the managers in the impeachment of Buckingham, but notwithstanding his opposition to the court, he was made in 1639, chief justice of the common pleas, and the following year, lord keeper of the great seal, and a peer by the title of lord Littleton. In those turbulent times his partial adherence to the republican factions procured his dismissal from office, and he died at Oxford, 1645.

LITTLETON, Adam, a learned divine, born at Hales Owen, Shropshire, 8th Nov. 1627. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and in 1647 went as student to Christ-church, from which he was ejected the next year. Soon after he was usher at Westminster, and in 1658 was elected second master. In 1670 he was honored with the degree of D. D. by the university, in consequence of his merit, and four years after was made rector of Chelsea, and about that time obtained a grant from Charles II. to succeed Dr. Busby in Westminster school, to which, however, he did not succeed. He died 30th June, 1694, aged 67, and was buried in his church, Chelsea, where a monument records his services to literature. He was in his private character a worthy and amiable man, and as a philologist and grammarian, he had few equals. He published "A Latin Dictionary" — Elementa Religionis, &c. — Sixty one sermons — Seldon's Jani Anglorum, &c. translated, and other works. He began, but did not live to complete a Greek Lexicon.

LITTLETON, Edward, an able divine and poet, educated at Eton, under Dr. Snape. In 1716 he went to king's college, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a scholar, and a man of genius. In 1720 he was made assistant at Eton, and seven years after was elected one of the fellows of the college, and presented to the living of Maple Durham, Oxfordshire. In 1730 he took the degree of L. L. D. and became chaplain to the king. He died 1734, and was buried at Maple Durham, leaving a widow and three daughters. He was not ambitious of appearing as an author. His "Discourses," 2 vols. were published for the benefit of his family, and his poems have occasionally been printed in miscellanies, particularly in Dodley's. His poem on the spider is much admired.

LIVIA, wife of Tiberius Claudius Nero, afterwards married Augustus, and prevailed upon him to adopt her children. Some authors assert that she poisoned Augustus, to make room for her son Tiberius, who treated her with the highest disrespect. She died A. D. 29.

LIVINGSTON, John, a Scotch presbyter, educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M. A. 1621. He was banished, 1663, from Scotland, because he refused to take the oath of allegiance, on account of his intolerable religious opinions; and he went to Holland, where he officiated at the Scots' chapel, Rotterdam. He died Aug. 9th, 1672, aged 69. He wrote letters from Leith to his parishioners at Ancrum, and other works.

LIVINIUS, or LIVINEUS, John, Latin translator of some of the works of Gregory Nazianzen, of Chrysostom, and other fathers, and editor of Panegyrici Veteres, 8vo. 1599, was a native of Dendermonde. He studied at Cologne, and distinguished himself as a Grecian. He was canon of Antwerp, and he died there 1599.

LIVIVS Andronicus, a Roman comic poet, whose plays are lost. He flourished 240 B. C.

LIVIVS, Titus, a celebrated Latin historian, born at Padua, and patronized by the emperor Augustus, who entrusted to him the education of his grandson Claudius. He died at Padua, A. D. 17, aged 67. The best edition of his valuable history, which has not descended whole to modern times, is by Crevier, 1735, 6 vols. 4to. It has been translated into English by Mr. Baker, in 6 vols. 8vo.

LLOYD, William, an English prelate, born 1627, at Tilehurst, Berks, where his father was rector. He was educated under his father, and in 1638 entered at Oriel college, Oxford, and the next year removed to a scholarship at Jesus, where he became fellow, 1646. He was afterwards, for some years tutor to the children of sir John Backhouse, and at the restoration was made prebendary of Rippon, Yorkshire. In 1666 he was made king's chaplain, and successively promoted to a prebend of Salisbury, the vicarage of St. Mary's, Reading, ing, the archdeaconry of Merioneth, deanery of Bangor, prebend of St. Paul's, and the vicarage of St. Martin in the fields. In 1680 he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the tower in 1688, for refusing to permit the publication of the royal declaration for liberty of conscience. He was a zealous promoter of the revolution, and in 1692 was translated to Lichfield and Coventry, and 1699 to Worcester. He died at Hartlebury castle, Aug. 30th, 1717, aged 91, and was buried in Fladbury church, near Evesham, where his son was rector. His publications were numerous, they consist of Tracts against Popery — Sermons — the History of the Government of the Church of Great Britain — a Dissertation on Daniel's 70 Weeks — a System of Chronology — a Harmony of the Gospel — a Chronological Account of the Life of Pythagoras, and other theological works.

LLOYD, Robert, an English poet educated at Westminster school, where his father, Dr. Pierfon Lloyd, was second master, and from thence elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was for some time usher of Westminster school, and during that time published "the Actor" 1760. a poem of great merit. His irregularities, however, obliged him to resign his situation in the school and he now depended for subsistence on the exertions of his pen. At last his imprudence and his debts lodged him in the Fleet prison, where he lived supported chiefly by the bounty of his steadfast friend the poet Churchill. The death of this liberal benefactor overwhelmed him with sorrow, and in less than a month he followed him to the grave. He died 15th Dec. 1764. He was the author of the "Capricious Lover" a comic opera, 8vo. and four other dramatic works. A partial collection of his works by Dr. Kenrick, appeared 2 vols. 8vo. 1774. His imitation of Theocritus has been much admired.

LLOYD, Nicholas, an English divine, author of an Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary, printed Oxford, 1670, folio. and in 4to. 1695. a work to which Hoffman, Moreri, other succeeding lexicographers are much indebted. This active and indefatigable scholar died 1680, aged 49, and was buried at St. Mary's, Newington, Surrey, where he was rector.

LLYWARCH AP LLYWELYN, a Welsh bard whose poetical effusions possessing merit are preserved in the Welsh Archæologia. He flourished from 1160 to 1220.

LLYWARCH HEN, a Welsh poet, distinguished also as an able defender of his country against the Saxon invasion, in which it is said he lost 24 sons. He flourished about 630, and died in a cell at Llanvor, near Bala, aged 150. His poems, &c. have been collected by Mr. Owen.

LLYWELYN AP GRUFYDD, a Welsh prince who heroically resisted the invasion of Edward I., of England, but at last fell under the power of his superior antagonist, 1282, after a reign of 28 years. The independence of his country perished with him.

LLYWELYN AP JORWERTH, king of North Wales, after the deposition of his tyrannical uncle David Owen. He was a wise, active, and warlike prince, and died 1240 after a reign of 46 years.

LLYWELYN AP SITSYLT, a Welch prince, sovereign of South Wales and Powys, 998. He fell bravely fighting in battle 1021, after defeating Aulaff the Scotch invader, supported by the treacherous assistance of Hywil and Meredydd, sons of Edwian ap Einion.

LLYWELYN VARDD, a Welch poet, son of Cywyrd. Some of his pieces are preserved in the Welsh Archæologia. He flourished between 1130 and 1180.

LLYWELYN O LANGEWYDD or LLYWELYN SION, a Welsh bard of Glamorgan, who died 1616. His collections of the System of Bardism are valuable, as he was not only eminent himself, but frequently presided at the meetings of the bards.

LLYWELYN, Thomas, author of an History of the different editions of the Welsh Bible, in which he evinced great learning as a divine, and much judgment as a critic, died 1796.

LOBB, Theophilus, a native of London, where his father was a dissenting minister. He was eminent as a physician, and wrote some medical as well as theological tracts, and died 1763, aged 87.

LOBEL, Matthias, a native of Lisse, who studied at Montpellier, and devoted himself attentively to botany. After travelling through Switzerland, Germany, Italy, &c. he came to England about 1570, and afterwards was nominated physician and botanist to James I. In the cultivation of his art he superintended lord Zouch's botanical garden at Hackney, and he wrote Stirpium Adversaria, London, 1570. — Observationes, seu Stirpium Historiæ, &c. fol. 1576. — Dilucidæ Simplicium Medicament. Explicationes, &c. He died 1616, aged 78.

LOBINEAU, Guy Alexis, a French Benedictine monk, born at Rennes 1667. He is eminently known by his works, the History of Britany, 2 vols. folio. — of the Conquest of Spain by the Moors, 12mo. — a History of Paris, 5 vols. folio. — the Saints of Britany, folio. — a translation of Polybius. He died 1727. He also translated some of the plays of Aristophanes.

LOBKOWITZ, Boleslaus de Hassenstein, baron de, a Bohemian nobleman, who after visiting various countries and distinguishing himself as a negotiator and as a warrior, entered the ecclesiastical profession, and died 1510. His Latin poems appeared at Prague, 1563 and 1570, and possess merit.

LOBO, Jerome, a jesuit of Lisbon, who went as a missionary to the east. He wrote a very interesting account of his travels into Abyssinia, in Portuguese, translated into French by Le Grand, and from French into English by Dr. Johnson. Lobo at his return was made rector of the college of Coimbra, Portugal, and died 1678, aged 85.

LOBO, Rodrigues Francis, a Portuguese poet, born at Leiric, in Estremadura. His "Euphrosyne" a comedy is very popular in Portugal. He wrote besides other poems, printed 1721 in folio.

LOCKART, Alexander, a lawyer born at Carnwath, near Edinburgh. He was a member of the Scotch parliament, and violently opposed the union, and also the Hanoverian succession, after which he retired to his country house and wrote his Memoirs of Scotland, published 1714, London. He fell in a duel 1732, aged 57.

LOCKE, John, an illustrious philosopher, born 1632 at Wrington, near Bristol, of a respectable family. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1651 was elected to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took regularly his degrees in arts. Already distinguished by his great proficiency in polite literature, he now applied himself to physic, but though he obtained some reputation at Oxford, he soon found his constitution inadequate to the fatigues of the profession and gladly accepted the office of secretary to sir William Swan, sent envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, 1664. Two years after he became acquainted with lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, and not only by curing him of a dangerous abscess in the breast, but by the intelligence of his conversation, and the great powers of his mind, he deserved and obtained his lasting friendship. At the recommendation of this noble patron he relinquished medicine for the study of politics, and of civil and ecclesiastical history, and soon after employed himself in drawing up constitutions for the government of Carolina, of which his friend, now chancellor of the exchequer, and other lords, had obtained a grant from the crown. In 1672 on the elevation of Shaftesbury to the office of lord chancellor, Locke was made his secretary of the presentations, but on the disgrace of his patron the next year he lost his appointment, though he still continued secretary to the board of trade, where the earl was a commissioner, and enjoyed it with an annexed salary of 500l. per year till the dissolution of the commission in 1674. Soon after he went to Montpellier, for the benefit of his health as he was apprehensive of a consumptive attack, and here he devoted himself partly to medical pursuits, and to the composition of his Essay on Human Understanding, till in 1679 his patron raised to be president of the council recalled him home. His prospects of preferment were transitory, the earl in six months was disgraced and imprisoned, and, in 1682 escaped for fear of being prosecuted for high treason, to Holland, where Locke, equally faithful to him in adversity as in prosperity, followed him. There, by his intercourse with some suspected person after the death of his patron, the exiled philosopher drew upon himself the resentment of the government; he was not only removed from his studentship at Christ-church, which he had hitherto kept as an honorable literary retreat, but he was accused by the English envoy before the States General, and his person claimed as guilty of treasonable correspondence in favor of Monmouth's invasion. Thus persecuted Locke concealed himself for 12 months, devoting his time to literary labors, and two years after, when he returned to England in consequence of the revolution, he published his celebrated essay which had engaged him nine years in the composition. As he was considered a sufferer for political opinions, he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals, worth 200l. a-year, and he was offered the honorable office of envoy to some foreign courts, but this he declined, ambitious only after that tranquillity and retirement, which he found in the friendly invitations of sir Francis and lady Masham at Oates. In 1695 he was prevailed upon to accept the place of commissioner of trade and plantations, for which he was so well qualified by information and knowledge, but this he resigned five years after, on account of the delicate state of his health, which did not permit him with safety to breathe the air of the capital. The latter part of life was usefully employed in the exertion of his talents on political subjects, and also in reading and commenting with all the zeal and humility of a true christian on the holy scriptures. With nothing to disturb the serenity of his mind he found himself happy in the retirement which he had chosen, and in the society of lady Masham, a woman of superior virtue, of great information, and of contemplative habits of mind, whose son had the happiness to be educated and improved under the eye, and in the principles of her illustrious friend. Thus situated in the hospitable mansion of Oates, as if in his own house, he saw the gradual approach of death with calmness and resignation. Seeing his legs swell he became sensible that dissolution was not distant, and after receiving the sacrament with fervor and piety, he told his sorrowing friend, lady Masham, that he had lived long enough, that he thanked God for having passed his days so happily, and that life appeared to him mere vanity. He expired with little pain, 28th Oct. 1704, in his 73d year, and was buried in the church at Oates, where a decent monument, with an inscription written by himself, marks the spot. His works are, besides the Essay in 2 vols. 8vo. — Letters on Toleration, 4to. — treatise on Civil Government, 8vo. — Thoughts concerning Education, 12mo. — Considerations on lowering the Interest, and raising the Value of Money — Reasonableness of Christianity, 8vo. — Posthumous works, &c. — Paraphrase on St. Paul's Epistles, 4to. — letters, &c. all which have been edited together, 3 vols. folio, and 9 vols. 8vo. On the character of this great and good man little need be said. The virtues and the charities of human nature he possessed in the highest degree, and as a philosopher, a christian, a politician, and a man, he claims the first rank in the admiration and in the homage of posterity. With judicious taste and becoming simplicity, queen Caroline erected in her pavilion at Richmond, his bust with those of Bacon, Newton, and Clarke, as the four principal philosophers of which England may boast with real pride and satisfaction when she enumerates her departed heroes.

LOCKER, John, an English gentleman of a respectable family in Middlesex. He was educated at Merchant Taylors', and Merton college, Oxford, and then entered at Gray's Inn, where he occupied the same chambers which lord Bacon once had. When called to the bar he became a commissioner of bankrupts, and held other offices. He devoted much of his time to the cultivation of literature, and he was a perfect master of the Greek, and also of the modern Greek, which he acquired by the conversation of a poor native of the Morea, whom he found by accident destitute and begging in the streets of London, and whom he and Dr. Mead liberally patronised. He was an enthusiastic admirer of lord Bacon, some of whose papers he carefully collected for publication, which he communicated to Dr. Birch, and Mr. Mallet. He wrote a preface to Voltaire's Charles XII. and translated the two first books, and Dr. Jebb the rest. He died much regretted, May, 1760, nearly a year after the death of his lady, a descendant of bishop Stillingfleet, by whom he had nine children.

LOCKMAN, John, author of Rosalinda, a musical drama, 1740, and of David's Lamentations, an oratorio, was one of the compilers of the General Dictionary, and also concerned in "Blainville's Travels." He died 2d Feb. 1771, much respected.

LOCKYER, Nicholas, a native of Somersetshire, chaplain to Cromwell, and provost of Eton under his usurpation. As he was a nonjuror he was ejected at the restoration from this provostship, and the livings of St. Benet's Sheerhog, and St. Pancras, Soperlane. He wrote some theological tracts, and died 1684.

LODEROG, Regner, a celebrated king of Denmark, at the beginning of the 9th century. He was a warrior, and also a poet, but his poems breathe nothing but wild fanaticism, and religious phrenzy.

LODGE, Thomas, a learned physician, educated at Oxford, according to Wood. He afterwards studied medicine at Avignon where he took his doctor's degree, and at his return was incorporated at Cambridge. He settled in London where he acquired an extensive practice, especially among the Roman catholics, of whose persuasion he was. He died 1625, much respected. He wrote Wounds of Civil War, a tragedy 1594, 4to. — Looking Glass for London, and for England, a tragicomedy 1598. in which and in other pieces attributed to him, he is said to have been assisted by Robert Green.

LOEWENDAL, Ulric Frederic Woldemar, count de, a native of Hamburgh, distinguished as an officer in the service of Poland, and afterwards of Denmark against Sweden. He next entered into the imperial army, and displayed his bravery at the battle of Peterwaradin, the sieges of Temeswar, and Belgrade, and in the other exploits of that celebrated war. Augustus king of Poland, sensible of his merits, made him field marshal, and inspector general of the Saxon infantry, and he afterwards obtained the chief command of the Russian forces. From Russia he passed into the French service, and was particularly distinguished at the battle of Fontenoy, 1745, and at the taking of Bergen-op-Zoom, 16th Sep. 1747, hitherto regarded as impregnable. The French king acknowledged his meritorious services by raising him to the rank of field marshal. He died 1755, aged 55.

LOGAN, Frederic, baron de, a German poet of considerable merit, whose epigrams and other pieces have been edited by Lessing, and Ramler. He died 1655, aged 51.

LOGAN, John, a native of Mid-Lothian, in Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, and made minister of South Leith 1770. He distinguished himself as a writer, and as a poet, and died in London 1788, aged about 40. His works are the Philosophy of History from his lectures delivered at Edinburgh 1781 — Runnede, a tragedy, refused at Covent-garden, on account of some political allusions to the times, but acted with great applause at Edinburgh — Poems, of which the second edition appeared in 1782. — and Review of the Principal Charges against Mr. Hastings, for which his publisher in London, Stockdale, was tried and acquitted.

LOGES, Mary Bruneau, a French lady of the protestant persuasion. She was much admired for her wit and genius, not only by Balzac, Malherbe, and other learned men; but the king of Sweden, the duke of Orleans, &c. She had by her husband, who was a gentleman of the king's bed-chamber, nine children, but though called the tenth muse, and a divinity on earth, she left none of her poetical productions behind her.

LOHENSTEIN, Daniel Gaspard de, a learned German, born at Nimptsch, Silesia. He wrote some dramatic pieces — Arminius, a historical romance, 2 vols. 4to. — Poetical Reflections on Isaiah's 53d chapter, &c. He died 1683, aged 45.

LOIR, Nicholas, a painter born at Paris 1624. He was disciple to Le Brun, but though possessed of genius, he did not excel in any particular branch. He painted landscapes, figures, &c. and assisted in the completion of the paintings of the palace of the Thuilleries. He died professor of the academy of painting. His son Alexis, was an able engraver.

LOKMAN, an Abyssinian prophet, said to have been sold as a slave among the Israelites in the reign of David and Solomon. His wisdom, and the good sense, and striking morality of his fables are so like those of Æsop, that he is considered by some authors as the same personage. He has been esteemed by the ancients as an extraordinary character, so that Mahomet has inserted a chapter in the Koran, with his name, where he introduces God saying, we heretofore bestowed wisdom on Lokman. He is said to have lived 300 years, and to have been buried near Jerusalem. A translation of his fables was published by Galland, at Paris, 1724.

LOLLARD, Walter, the founder of the sect of the Lollards, was according to some an Englishman. His opinions were first disseminated in Germany, 1315, and afterwards were preached by him in Piedmont, and in England. He was burnt as a heretic at Cologne, 1322. The followers of Lollard believed that mass, baptism, and extreme unction were superfluous, they renounced obedience to civil and ecclesiastical magistrates, and persuaded themselves that god did not punish faults committed on the earth.

Lom, Jossu Van, a physician, born at Buren, Guelderland 1500. He practised at Tournay, and Bruges, and died 1562. His works written in elegant and polished Latin, all on medical subjects, were published at Amsterdam, 3 vols. 12mo. 1745.

LOMAZZO, John Paul, a native of Milan, known as an ingenious landscape and portrait painter. He also wrote an Italian treatise on Painting, 4to. 1585. — and Idea del Tempio della Pittura, 1590, 4to. and died 1598, aged 40.

LOMBARD, Peter, called Master of the Sentences, was born at Novara, in Lombardy, and educated at Paris. He was for some time tutor to Philip son of Lewis le Gros, king of France, and so universally respected, that upon the death of the archbishop of Paris he was placed in his room. He died four years after 1164. His work of the Sentences is divided into four books, and has been ably commented upon by succeeding divines. He wrote also Commentaries on the Psalms, and on St. Paul's epistles.

LOMBARD, John Lewis, a native of Strasburg, bred up to the law, but by nature formed for military affairs. He became, in 1748 professor of artillery, at the military school school of Metz, and afterwards in 1759, at Auxonne, and died 1st April, 1794, aged 71. He wrote Table du Tir des Canons & des Obusiers, 8vo. — Memoire a l'Usage des Officiers d'Artillerie de France, 2 vols. 8vo. — Traité du Mouvement des Projectiles, 8vo. — Instruction sur la Manœuvre & le Tir du Cannon de Bataille, 8vo. — besides Robins' Principles of Gunnery translated into French.

LOMBART, Lambert, a native of Liege, who studied painting in Germany, France, and Italy, and afterwards settled in his native country, where he acquired reputation, and died 1565, aged 59. He excelled also as an architect. His life was published by Hubert Goltzius.

LOMENIE, Henry Augustus, count de Brienne, son of Anthony Lomenie, for some time French ambassador in England, and secretary of state, who died 1638, succeeded to the honors of his father in the service of Lewis XIV. He died 1666, aged 71, and his memoirs were published at Amsterdam, 1719, 3 vols. 12mo.

LOMENIE, Henry Lewis, count de Brienne, son of the above, was also his successor in his high offices. The loss of his wife whom he tenderly loved, had such effect upon his understanding that, to the prudence and sagacity of the statesman unhappily succeeded the extravagance of a deranged lunatic. He was consequently dismissed from power and confined. During his confinement and lucid intervals, he wrote Memoirs of his own Life, 3 vols. folio, — Satires and Odes — an account of his Travels, and other things. He died much respected and lamented 1698, aged 56.

LOMENIE DE BRIENNE, Stephen Charles de, a French prelate of the same family, born at Paris 1727. He was in 1760 made bishop of Condom, archbishop of Toulouse 1764, and then removed to Sens. Respected as a prelate, hostile to abuses, and friendly to reform, he became by the intrigues of Vermont, whom he had recommended as confessor to the queen, a cardinal, and the prime minister of Lewis XVI. but the expectations formed of his abilities were unhappily disappointed. He caused the disgrace of Calonne, but followed his steps of government, and politics, and his weakness, and his impotent disputes with the parliament of Paris, rapidly contributed to the French revolution. He quitted, at last, a station to which he was unequal, and by sending back his cardinal's hat to the pope, at the beginning of the revolution, he acquired a little popularity. He died at Sens, 16th Feb. 1798.

LOMONOZOF, a Russian poet of merit, born 1711. He was son of a fishmonger, at Kolmogori, but despising this humble occupation, and inflamed with the love of literature by reading the Song of Solomon, in the translation of Pototski, he fled from the protection of his father, to a monastery of Moscow, where he studied the learned languages. He so distinguished himself, that he was in 1736 sent at the expence of the imperial academy of sciences, to Marburg, in Hesse Cassel, where for four years he applied himself to grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy, under Wolf, and afterwards studied chemistry, under Henckel, at Freyberg. In 1741 he returned to Russia, and became professor of chemistry in the imperial academy. In 1744 he was raised by the emperors to the rank of counsellor of state, but unfortunately died that year, April 4th, aged 54. As a writer, Lomonozof is deservedly esteemed by his countrymen, as the polisher of their language. His poetical compositions are particularly valuable for their originality, sublimity of sentiment, and their animated diction. As the respectable imitator of Pindar, he ranks very high, and the appellation of father of Russian poetry is becomingly bestowed upon him. His works have been published in 3 vols. containing 10 sacred, and 19 panegyric odes, and other poetical pieces, idyls, tragedies, &c. besides passages translated from Cicero, Lucian, Erasmus, Ælian, Homer, Ovid, Virgil, and others, besides treatises on philosophical subjects. He published also, "Annals of the Russian Sovereigns," and Ancient History of Russia, from the origin of the nation to 1504.

LONGDE, Francis Richard de la, a French poet of considerable merit, born at Caen. He wrote also some pieces on history, morals, and antiquity, and died 1765, aged 80.

LONG, James le, a priest of the oratory, born at Paris, 1665. He was professor in several colleges, and was elected librarian of St. Honoré, at Paris, where he died 1721. He was well skilled in ancient and modern languages, and in mathematics and philosophy. His chief works are Bibliotheca Sacra, 2 vols. folio, 1723 — Bibliothèque Historique de la France, folio — a Historical Discourse on the Polyglott Bibles, 8vo.

LONG, Roger, D. D. master of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, Lowndes' professor of astronomy, and rector of Cherry Hinton, Huntingdonshire, and Bradwell, Essex, was a native of Norfolk. He is celebrated as an able astronomer, as his "Treatise on Astronomy," 2 vols. 4to. fully proves. He wrote besides, an answer to Dr. Gally's pamphlet on "Greek Accents," and some sermons. He also invented a curious machine, which represented the zodiac, the meridians, and other circles, and all the constellations and stars visible at Cambridge, on plates of iron. The machine is in the form of a globe, 18 feet in diameter, in which 30 persons may conveniently sit, and is easily turned by means of a winch. Dr. Long, equally known as a pleasant and facetious companion, died Dec. 16th, 1770, aged 91. He was vice-chancellor of Cambridge, 1737.

LONG, Thomas, B. D. an able divine, born at Exeter, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He was author of an history of Donatists, 8vo. — Examination of Hale's Treatise on Schism, 8vo. — History of Popish and Fanatical Plots and Conspiracies, 8vo. — Life of Julian, 8vo. — Vindication of Charles's Claim to be the Author of the Eikon Basilice, &c. He obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, but lost it at the revolution, for refusing to take the oaths to king William. He died 1700, aged about 79.

LONGBEARD, William, a priest of great abilities, which he employed against the government. By his eloquence he assembled a large mob in the reign of Richard I. and by calling himself the saviour of the poor, he threatened the royal authority with destruction. After for some time heading a lawless populace, he fled for refuge, into St. Mary-le-bonne church, where he was at last overpowered, and then, with nine of his associates, torn to pieces by horses, and hung on a gallows, 1196.

LON

LONGPIERRE, Hilary Bernard de, a learned Frenchman, born at Dijon, 1658. He translated into verse, Anacreon, Theocritus, Sappho, Bion & Moschus, and was author of some idylls, and of tragedies after the Greek model, such as Medea, Electra & Sesostris, the two first of which appeared on the stage. He died 1727.

LONGINUS, Dionysius, a native of Athens, celebrated as a philosopher and critic. After teaching philosophy and rhetoric at Athens, he was invited to become tutor to the children of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra. When the fortunes of Zenobia were ruined, the conqueror Aurelian cruelly ordered the philosopher to be put to death, 273 A. D. His valuable treatise on the Sublime was best edited by Toup, 1778, and translated by Dr. Smith.

LONGLAND, John, a native of Henley, Oxfordshire, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He was in 1505 appointed principal of Magdalen hall, in 1514 made dean of Salisbury, and seven years after bishop of Lincoln. It is said that he recommended and enforced the necessity of a divorce between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon. He died 1547. His works appeared in fol. 1532.

LONGOMONTANUS, Christian, the son of a poor laborer, who became an eminent astronomer, and was born at Longomontanum, in Denmark, 1562. His genius was seen and fostered by the minister of his parish, and after spending his time in deep study, and in following the plough, he went without the knowledge of his friends, to Wiburg, at the age of 15, and there maintained himself by his labor, that he might enjoy more independently the opportunity of study. He was afterwards at Copenhagen, and then became the companion, and the friend of Tycho Brahe for eight years. In 1600 he left this beloved master, and after visiting the spots where Copernicus had made his observations on the stars, he came to Copenhagen, and was in 1605 nominated professor of mathematics in the university, where he died, 1647. He published "Astronomia Danica," folio — Systema Mathematicum, 8vo. — Problemata Geometrica, 4to. — Disputatio Ethica, de Animæ Humanæ Morbis, 4to.

LONGUEIL, Gilbert de, a physician of Utrecht. He wrote Remarks on Plautus, Ovid, Nepos, Cicero, Val-la, &c. 4 vols. 8vo. — a Greek and Latin Lexicon — a Dialogue on Birds, with their Greek, Latin, and German Names — besides translations of some of Plutarch's lesser works. He died 1543, aged 36.

LONGUEIL, Christopher de, an able scholar, born at Malines, 1490. He was highly favored by Lewis XII. of France, and by pope Leo X. who engaged him to write against Luther. He wrote besides Latin Commentaries on Pliny's Plants, Observations on the Civil Law, &c. He died at Padua, 1522, aged 34.

LONGUERUE, Lewis Dufour de, a French abbé, born at Charleville, 1652. He was so early distinguished for application, that at the age of four he was seen and admired by Lewis XIV. as he passed through Charleville. This very learned and amiable man died 1732, aged 80. He wrote a Latin Dissertation on Tatian, 8vo. 1700 — an Historical Description of France, folio, 1719 — Annales Arfacidarum, 4to. 1732 — Remarks on Wolfey's Life — a Dissertation on Transubstantiation, &c.

LOR

LONGUEVAL, James, a French jesuit, born at Peronne. He studied at Amiens and Paris, and wrote History of the French Church, 10 vols. — Dissertation on Miracles — a Treatise on Schism, &c. He died at Paris, 1735, aged 55.

LONGUS, a Greek sophist, author of four pastorals, and of the Loves of Daphnis and Chloe, edited 1660, 4to.

LONI, Alexander, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. He imitated with success the style of his master Carlo Dolce, and died 1702, aged 47.

LONICERUS, John, a learned German, born at Orlern, Germany. He was professor of languages at Marburg, where he died 1569, aged 70. He compiled a Greek and Latin Lexicon, begun by Melancthon and Camerarius, and published Dioscorides, and other Greek writers.

LONICERUS, Adam, son of the above, was a sagacious physician, who died at Frankfort, 1586. He was author of Methodus Rei Herbariæ, 4to. — Historia Naturalis Plantarum, Animalium & Metallorum, 2 vols. folio — Explicatio Corporis Humani Affectuum — Hortus Sanitatis, &c.

LOON, Theodore Van, a native of Brussels, whose excellent paintings adorn the churches and public buildings of Rome, and of Venice. He was born 1630.

LOREDANO, John Francis, a senator of Venice; learned and ingenious, author of a Life of Adam — History of the Kings of Cyprus — some comedies, &c. collected in 6 vols. 12mo. He was born 1606, but the time of his death is not known.

LORENZETTI, Ambrogio, a painter of Siena, disciple to Giotto, and the first who painted with success, rain, storms, and the effect of winds. He died 1350, aged 83.

LORENZINI, Lawrence, a native of Florence, eminent as a mathematician. He was the pupil of Viviani, and was recommended for his abilities to the service of Ferdinand, son of the grand duke Cosmo III; but some unfortunate circumstance in his conduct, procured his imprisonment in the tower of Volterra. During his confinement of 20 years, he devoted himself to his mathematical studies, and wrote his 12 books on conical and cylindrical sections, in Latin. He died 1721, aged 69.

LORIT, Henry, or GLAREANUS, from Glaris in Switzerland, where he was born, studied at Cologne, Basil, and Paris. He was the friend of Erasmus, and labored much for the advancement of literature. He died 1563, aged 75. He wrote various dissertations; notes, &c. on classical subjects, and on ancient authors.

LORME, Philibert de, master of the works to the French king, was born at Lyons. He is the architect of the palaces of the Thuilleries and Le Louvre, and other public buildings, which he adorned with great taste and judgment. Though exposed to the satire of the poet Ronsard, he long enjoyed the patronage of the French court, and died 1557. He wrote ten books of architecture, folio, &c.

LORME, John de, a French physician, born at Moulins, 1544. He studied at Montpellier, where he took his degrees, and practised at Forez, and afterwards became physician to Louisa of Lorraine, wife of Henry III. and to Mary de Medicis, and other branches of the the royal family. He was universally esteemed, and in his old age, retired to his native place, where he died, 1634, aged 90.

LORME, Charles de, son of the above, was born 1587, and became physician to Lewis XIII. He was fond of literature, which he cultivated with success, and he spared no expence to discover the truth in his experiments and researches. He acquired great celebrity and equal opulence, and died much respected, 1678, aged 91. He was the promoter of a particular ptisan, called "red broth" which proved of great service to thousands. He published "Laureæ Apollinaris," 8vo.

LORRAINE, Robert le, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris, Nov. 1666. His chef d'œuvre, is his Galatea which he composed when admitted into the academy of sculpture, 1701. He died governor of the academy, June 1st, 1743. He was the intimate friend of the learned of his time, and his statues adorned the gardens of Versailles, Marli, &c.

LORRAINE, Charles of, cardinal and archbishop of Rheims, son of the first duke of Guise, was born 1525. His great abilities were meanly prostituted to the worst purposes of ambition, the love of power and of money. His influence in the reigns of Henry II. and of Francis II. was almost unlimited, and to his intrigues the war of Italy is totally attributed. He was a man of great eloquence, which he displayed at the council of Trent, and at the conference at Poissy. He died 1574.

LORRIS, William de, author of the "Romance of the Rose," in imitation of Ovid's Art of Love, and other things, was a poet of considerable merit. He died about 1620. The best edition of the Romance is Lenglet's, Amsterdam, 1736, 3 vols. 12mo.

LORRY, Anne Charles, a French physician, born at Crofne, near Paris. He is well known for his Latin Treatises on Melancholy, and its Affections, 2 vols. 8vo. and on the Use of Aliments. He wrote besides a treatise on Cutaneous Diseases, 4to. and edited Dr. Mead's works, &c. He died 1783, aged 58.

LOSA, Isabella, a native of Cordova, so illustrious for her knowledge of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, that she was honored with the degree of D. D. When she became a widow she took the habit of St. Clair, and went to Italy, and founded there the hospital of Loretto, where she ended her days in the bosom of devotion and benevolence, 5th March, 1546, aged 73.

LOT, son of Haran, was the nephew of Abraham, with whom he was brought up, and from whom he separated on account of the number of their respective flocks, and the quarrels which arose between their shepherds. He settled at Sodom, from whence he was carried away captive by the king of Edom, till Abraham set him and all his possessions at liberty. When Sodom was about to be destroyed, God, out of mercy to Abraham, spared Lot, and sent an angel to remove him from the sinful city. Lot, with his wife and two daughters, left Sodom before it was destroyed, but his wife, by looking back contrary to the command of God, was changed into a pillar of salt. His two daughters, by intoxicating him in a cave, where they had taken refuge, defiled him, and from this incestuous intercourse they had the one, Moab, and the other, Ammon, the progenitors of those two nations which proved so inimical to the Israelites.

LOTEN, John, a Dutch painter, who lived in England. His landscapes were much admired, especially where he represented storms and showers of rain, with trees torn up, and cattle running for shelter. His Views of the Alps, and his craggy rocks, had also great beauty. He died in London, 1681.

LOTHAIRE I. son of Lewis the Debonnaire, was partner on the throne of Germany with his father, 817, and made king of Lombardy three years after. Ungrateful for the confidence and kindness of his father, he revolted against him, and seizing his person, confined him in a monastery at Soissons. This cruel conduct roused against him his brothers, Charles and Lewis, but though a reconciliation took place after the death of the old emperor, the three brothers appeared in arms against each other. The bloody battle of Fontenai, 841, in which 100,000 men are said to have perished, seemed indecisive, but at last a truce was effected between the unnatural brothers, and the treaty of Verdun, in 843, settled their respective rights. Lothaire obtained the empire, Italy, and the provinces between the Rhine, the Rhone, the Saone, the Maese, and the Scheldt, whilst the rest of the French dominions was partitioned between Lewis and Charles. Ten years after this settlement, Lothaire, dissatisfied with the cares of government, abdicated the crown to retire to a monastery in Ardennes, where he died, six days after his assumption of the monkish habit, 28th Sept. 885. He was buried at Prum. He left three sons, Lewis, Charles, and Lothaire, among whom he divided his possessions.

LOTHAIRE II. duke of Saxony, son of Gerhard, count of Supplemberg, was elected king of Germany, 1125, after the death of Henry IV. and crowned emperor at Rome, 1135. As he killed the feet of Innocent II. who crowned him, the popes assumed in consequence, a sovereign right over the German empire. He died 4th Dec. 1137, at Bretten, near Trent, leaving no issue.

LOTHAIRE, king of France, son of Lewis IV. succeeded his father 954. He made war against the emperor Otho II. and permitted him to hold Lorraine as a fief of the French crown. He died at Compiègne, 2d March, 986, in consequence of poison, said to be administered by his wife Emma, daughter of Lothaire, king of Italy.

LOTHAIRE, king of Lorraine, son of the emperor Lothaire I. abandoned his wife Thietberga, to marry his mistress, Valdrade. Though this measure was countenanced and approved by the councils of Metz and of Aix la Chapelle, yet the pope Nicholas I. had the spirit to interfere in favor of the injured queen, and compelled, by the influence of his spiritual power, the obedient Lothaire to quit his favorite mistress, for his lawful wife. Lothaire afterwards assisted his brother Lewis I. and pope Adrian II. against the Saracens in Italy, in hopes of obtaining a divorce from his wife, but he was unsuccessful. He died at Placentia, of a violent fever, 7th Aug. 869.

LOUIS I. surnamed the Debonnaire or Feeble, son of Charlemagne and Hildegard, was born 778, and proclaimed king of France and emperor of the West 814. Instead of strengthening his power by union, he he weakened it by division, and by making his eldest son Lothaire his associate in the empire, and the two others Pepin and Louis kings of Aquitaine and Bavaria, he permitted different interests to prevail in his dominions. Bernard king of Italy, the illegitimate son of Pepin, eldest son of Charlemagne, displeased with the elevation of Lothaire to the throne, took up arms in 818, and was immediately met in the field by Louis, but instead of fighting, the Italian troops fled, and their unfortunate leader threw himself at the feet of his conqueror. Louis refused to spare his suppliant, and he caused his eyes to be put out, an operation which proved fatal. This cruel punishment, inflicted also on some of the partizans of the unhappy Bernard, so offended the clergy and the people, that Louis was restored to the good opinion of his subjects only by doing public penance. His sons afterwards, too sensible of his weakness, rebelled against him and succeeded in withdrawing all his troops from his standard, so that the deserted monarch threw himself into the power of his unnatural children in the plains of Rotleub. Here, instead of compassion, he met with indignity; he was not only imprisoned in a monastery, but obliged to perform public penance at Soissons as a most atrocious delinquent. In sharing the spoils, however, the new kings quarrelled, and Louis by another revolution was drawn from his confinement again to fill the throne, but he died soon after in an island of the Rhine, above Mentz, 20th June, 840, aged 62.

LOUIS II. the Young, eldest son of Lothaire I. was made king of Italy 844, and in 855 succeeded to the imperial throne. He was a virtuous and benevolent monarch, brave, yet not fond of war, and only anxious to maintain the dignity of the throne, the public prosperity, and the due execution of the laws. He died without male issue, 13th Aug. 875.

LOUIS III. surnamed the Blind, was son of Boson king of Provence, by Ermengarde daughter of Louis the Younger, and he succeeded to the throne of his father 890, at the age of 10. He twice defeated Berenger, who disputed with him the succession to the empire, and was crowned at Rome by Benedict IV. but soon after he suffered himself to be surprized by his rival at Verona, who cruelly put out his eyes, and sent him to Provence, where he died 934.

LOUIS IV. called the Child, succeeded his father the emperor Arnold in 900, though only seven years old. His reign was a scene of desolation and civil war. His dominions were invaded by the Hungarians whose violence, though repeatedly repressed by large sums of money, at last obliged the timid monarch to fly. He died at Ratibon, 21st Jan. 911. He was the last emperor of Germany of the Carolingian race, and though the laws had settled the succession in the descendants of Charlemagne, such is the effect of revolutions, the imperial crown afterwards became elective.

LOUIS V. called the Fourth by those who exclude the short reign of the infant Louis, from the list of emperors, was son of Louis the Severe, duke of Bavaria, by Matilda daughter of Rodolphus I. and he was elected emperor at Frankfort 1314. His elevation was disputed by some of the electors, who declared Frederic the Fair, son of Albert I. emperor, and consecrated him at Cologne, and this unhappy division produced a civil war. After various skirmishes however, Louis proved victorious, and Frederic, after an imprisonment of three years, renounced his claims to the throne, to recover his liberty. This decision displeased the pope, John XXII. who declared the empire vacant, but Louis no way intimidated, appealed from the pontiff to a general council, and at last retorting injury for injury, he caused Peter de Corbiere to be elected pope in the room of his enemy. These divisions were still fomented by the conduct of five of the electors who at the instigation of Clement VI. the new pope, chose Charles of Luxemburg, marquis of Moravia, to fill the throne; but when a new civil war threatened the happiness of Germany, Louis was killed by a fall from his horse in hunting, 11th Oct. 1347.

LOUIS I. king of France, vid. LOUIS I. the Debonnaire.

LOUIS II. the Stammerer, was son of Charles the Bald, and succeeded as king of Aquitaine in 867, and to his father as king of France 877. He was a weak prince, and to ensure tranquillity he yielded up Provence to Boson who created himself king. He died at Compiègne, 10th April, 879, aged 35, leaving three sons, Louis and Carloman who divided his kingdom among themselves, and Charles a posthumous son, called afterwards Charles the Simple.

LOUIS III. son of Louis II. shared the kingdom with his brother Carloman, with whom he lived in perfect union, and ably defended himself against the attacks of his enemies. Hugh the Bastard, son of Lothaire was defeated, Boson was checked in his plans of aggrandizement, and the Normans were routed in the famous battle of Vimeu. Louis died 4th Aug. 882, without children, and Carloman became sole monarch.

LOUIS IV. surnamed Transmarine because he resided 13 years in England, was son of Charles the Simple and succeeded Raoul as king of France 936. He was engaged in war with Richard duke of Normandy, and was taken prisoner, but the year after restored to liberty on condition of leaving his antagonist in peaceful possession of Normandy, and of yielding Laon to Hugh le Blanc. In a subsequent war Laon was recovered, but the king soon after was killed by a fall from his horse while hunting. He died 10th Sep. 954, aged 38, and was succeeded by his son Lothaire.

LOUIS V. surnamed the Lazy, succeeded his father Lothaire 986. He seized upon Rheims, and was vigorously preparing to march against the Saracens, to the relief of the count of Barcelona when he was perfidiously poisoned by his queen Blanche, 21st May, 987. He was the last of the second race of the Carolingian kings, and though the crown at his decease belonged to his uncle Charles duke of Lower Lorraine, he was on account of his unpopularity among the French rudely dispossessed, and Hugh Capet the most powerful of the French dukes was elected king.

LOUIS VI. called the Big, son of Philip I. and Bertha, succeeded to the throne 1108. His reign was disturbed by war, and not only foreign enemies invaded his dominions, but he had much to dread from the ambition ambition and the factious spirit of his nobles who each wished to establish themselves into independent princes. His quarrels with Henry I. of England were numerous and frequent, about the possession of Normandy, but these differences did not prevent his attention to the interests of his kingdom. He died at Paris 1st Aug. 1137, aged 57. He was a wise and popular monarch, benevolent as a man, and impartial as a public magistrate. His judicious and humane regulations in the government of the people were suggested and improved by the advice of his faithful minister Suger.

LOUIS VII. the Young, son and successor of the preceding, was early engaged in a quarrel with the pope, about the investiture to French bishoprics, for which he was excommunicated by the incensed pontiff Innocent II. and his kingdom laid under an interdict. Regardless of the papal thunders, Louis turned his arms against Theobald III. count of Champagne who favored the cause of the pope, and in 1141 he laid one of his towns Vitri in ashes. This violence was represented by St. Bernard in such odious colors before the eyes of the superstitious monarch, that he was persuaded to take up the cross, and with an army of 80,000 men, he, accompanied by his wife Eleanor, marched into Palestine. He was defeated by the Saracens, and in 1147 obliged to raise the siege of Damascus, and on his return to Europe he had the misfortune to be seized by the Greeks and delivered into the hands of Roger king of Sicily. Restored to liberty he found his domestic happiness destroyed, by the conduct of his queen who had disgraced herself by an illicit amour with her uncle Raymond of Antioch, and with Saladin a young Turk, and to wipe away the dishonor he obtained a divorce, and married Alice the daughter of Theobald his ancient enemy. Eleanor six weeks after took for her husband Henry II. of England, and as she was the heiress of Poitou and Guienne, her dominions became the property of her new lord, and created great dissensions and long wars between the English and the French. Louis died at Paris 18th Sep. 1180, aged 60.

LOUIS VIII. surnamed the Lion, son of Philip Augustus and of Isabella, succeeded his father 1223. He was distinguished by his valor in his father's life time, and when he ascended the throne he waged successful war against the English from whom he conquered Limousin, Perigord, Aunis, &c. and afterwards he turned his arms against the Albigenes and laid siege to Avignon. Though successful he lost the greatest part of his army by disease, and he himself was attacked by the contagious complaint, and died soon after at Montpensier in Auvergne, 8th Nov. 1226, aged 39. By his wife the beautiful Blanche of Castile he had 11 children, of whom only five sons and one daughter survived him.

LOUIS IX. called Saint, was son of Louis VIII. and Blanche, and succeeded in 1226. His minority was protected by his mother, with wisdom and vigor, and when he attained the age of manhood he pursued the same course of prudent government, eager to maintain the dignity of the crown and ensure the happiness of the subject. He made war against Henry III. of England who supported his revolted nobles, and he twice defeated their confederated forces, and at last made an honorable and advantageous peace. During an illness with which he was attacked in 1244, Louis made a vow that if he recovered he would undertake a crusade, and after a vigorous preparation of four years he set out on this romantic expedition, leaving the reins of government in the hands of his mother. He landed in Egypt, took Damietta, and crossed the Nile in fight of the Saracens, but though victorious, disease and famine came to thin his ranks. As he attempted to retreat to Damietta in hopes of supplies he was defeated in a terrible battle, and fell into the hands of the enemy. In his prison he agreed to ransom his army with a large sum of money, and to give up Damietta in exchange for his person, after which he passed into Palestine and remained there four years. On his return to France he devoted himself to the happiness of his people, justice was administered with impartiality, profaneness and immorality were repressed, and honest industry encouraged. The rights of the church were confirmed in 1269 by a pragmatic sanction, and religion supported by the wisest decrees. After thus promoting the public good, Louis again embarked in 1270 for another crusade, and laid siege to Tunis in Africa, but the contagious disorder which was so fatal to his troops proved equally fatal to himself. This great and good man died in his camp, 25th Aug. 1270. His remains were conveyed to Paris, and he was canonized by Boniface VIII. 1297.

LOUIS X. called Hutin, was king of Navarre, in right of his mother Jane, and he succeeded his father Philip the Fair 1314 as king of France. He recalled the Jews into his kingdom, and made war against the count of Flanders, but was unsuccessful. He died at Vincennes, 8th June, 1316, aged 26. He was twice married, by his first wife he left one daughter who succeeded to the throne of Navarre, and his posthumous son by the second wife died soon after his birth. He was succeeded in France by Philip the Long.

LOUIS XI. son of Charles VII. and Mary of Anjou, was born at Bourges 1423. In his youth he displayed his valor against the English, whom he obliged to retire from the siege of Dieppe 1443, but his conduct towards his father tarnished all his glory. He not only rebelled against him, but showed such animosity, that the aged monarch, afraid of being poisoned by his son, starved himself, and Louis, on his death, ascended the throne in 1461. So ungrateful a child did not promise a virtuous monarch. Louis regarded his subjects as conquered slaves, and provided he could command their obedience he little regarded their hatred. His oppressions therefore excited the people against his government, and a league was formed against him, supported by the dukes of Berry, Brittany, Calabria and other dissatisfied nobles, and an indecisive battle was fought at Montheri 1465. Louis purchased peace by granting to the insurgents all their demands, by the treaty of Conflans, but with the intention of not executing his part. Another war now threatened the country, but Louis by artifice averted the blow, and he caused his own brother, the duke of Berry, whom he had lately made duke of Guienne, to be poisoned. The unsuspecting pecting prince, while courting the daughter of the duke of Burgundy, was presented with a beautiful peach, by his almoner, and in sharing the fruit with his intended bride he prepared his own destruction. The princess died almost immediately, and the duke survived six months. The duke of Burgundy, who some time before had compelled Louis to make a very disadvantageous treaty, now determined to avenge the death of his daughter, and he ravaged by fire and sword the provinces of Picardy and Normandy. Though for a few months the treaty of Bouvines stopped the carnage, a new alliance between the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, and Edward IV. of England threatened to encrease the miseries of France. Louis, however, had the art to intrigue with his formidable enemies; he gained the king of England by bribing his ministers, and promising him a pension; the duke of Brittany was reconciled by similar means, and the duke of Burgundy, left without protectors, joined in the general peace, at Amiens and Vervins. The death of the duke at the siege of Nancy, 1477, might have stopped all further differences, but Louis imprudently refused to marry his own son to the heiress, whose subsequent union with Maximilian of Austria, son of Frederic III. laid the foundation of war between the French and the Austrians. This new dispute, after some battles, was settled by the peace of Arras, 1482, and cemented by the marriage of the Dauphin with Margaret, daughter of Mary of Burgundy. Soon after the ambitious monarch was seized with a deep melancholy, and afraid of death he retired to the castle of Plessis-les-tours, where none was permitted access to him. Death at last delivered him from the horrors of his terrified imagination, 30th Aug. 1483, in his 60th year. Louis has been deservedly called the Tiberius of France, as in cruelty, malice, and perfidy he equalled the Roman tyrant.

LOUIS XII. surnamed the Just, was son of Charles, duke of Orleans, and Mary of Cleves, and he succeeded Charles VIII. on the throne of France. He took up arms during the weak reign of Charles VIII. supported by other dissatisfied nobles; but the battle of St. Aubin, in 1488, proved fatal to his hopes, and he was made prisoner, and confined with tyrannical severity. The tears and entreaties of his wife Jane, at last procured his deliverance, and in 1498, he obtained the crown, and with heroic magnanimity forgave all the persecutors and enemies of his former privacy. After wife regulations at home, he directed his arms to foreign conquests, and rapidly subdued the Milanese, Genoa, and Naples, and made the king of Naples prisoner; but the successes of Gonzalvo of Corduba turned the tide of affairs and effected the expulsion of the French from Italy, 1503. He afterwards rallied his forces, and again defeated the Genoese and the Venetians; and took possession of Cremona, Padua, and other towns; yet victory again declared against him, and in three months his conquests vanished, and the battle of Novaro, 1513, ruined the French influence in Italy. Instead now of conquering abroad, Louis had to defend his own dominions, as Maximilian the emperor, Henry VIII. and the Swiss, confederated together against him, and in various encounters obliged him to sue for disadvantageous terms of peace. This amiable monarch who, though unfortunate in his foreign expeditions, was beloved by his subjects, and revered as a father, died 1st Jan. 1515, aged 53.

LOUIS XIII. surnamed the Just, son of Henry IV. and Mary de Medicis, ascended the throne 1610, in the ninth year of his age, under the guardianship of his mother. The kingdom weakened by the imprudent measures of the queen regent, saw little prospect of better times when the young king took the reins in his own hands. He was governed by the counsels of Marechal d'Ancre, a proud and ambitious favorite; but after his death, which happened 1617, he showed more vigilance, and was reconciled to his mother who had been banished. This was, however, but a momentary calm, the queen took up arms against her son, while on the other hand the Huguenots were leagued on pretence of religion against the throne. Guided now by the advice of the bishop of Luçon, the celebrated Richelieu, Louis evinced vigor in his measures, and Rochelle, though relieved by the English and defended by the heroic conduct of the brave mother of the duke of Rohan, at last yielded and ruined the hopes of the protestant insurgents. From Rochelle Louis marched to the assistance of the duke of Mantua, and by a successful campaign, and the treaty of Susa, 1631, he established him in the possession of his dominions. On his return to France, Louis found himself exposed to the intrigues of his brother Gaston of Orleans, who was jealous of the influence of Richelieu, but the projects of this powerful subject were defeated at Castelnaudary, and Montmorency the governor of Languedoc who had supported him was tried and beheaded at Toulouse. A new war soon after broke out against Spain, and the emperor, and for many years desolated the kingdom without enriching the monarch, or enlarging his dominions. But while Richelieu excited discontent and discord in Europe more for views of ambition than to serve his master, a sudden attack hurried him and Louis to their grave. The cardinal died on the 4th Dec. 1642, and Louis, 4th May following, aged 42.

LOUIS XIV. surnamed the Great, was son of Louis XIII. by Anne of Austria, and was born 5th Sep. 1638, after the sterility of the queen for 22 years. He was only four years old when he succeeded his father, and his minority was governed by his mother, who received all her advice and instructions from her favorite cardinal Mazarin. The war was continued against the emperor, and the Spaniards, and Louis saw his arms victorious at Rocroy, under the duke of Enghein, and in Catalonia under la Mothe. The campaign of 1644 added Thionville, Barlemont, Philipsburg, Mayence, Worms, Mannheim, and other towns to the French dominions, and in 1645, fresh conquests awaited Louis in Flanders, Artois, Lorraine and Catalonia. The Swedish general Tortenson in alliance with France defeated the Imperialists in Bohemia, Turenne took Treves, and d'Enghein after the battle of Nortlingen made himself master of Furnes, Dunkirk, and Ypres, and defeated the archduke in 1648, in the plains of Lens. These glorious events, crowned by the defeat of the Spanish fleet on the coast of Italy were stopped by the peace of Munster, between France, the emperor, the Swedes, and the German states, and Louis saw added to his domains by this treaty, Metz, Toul, Verdun, Alsace, Brisach and Pignerol. Though victorious abroad, however, Louis was unpopular at home, in consequence of the general odium excited against the queen mother and Mazarin, and he was obliged to fly from the capital to avoid that factious spirit which the arts of the duke of Beaufort and Condé had kindled. The Spaniards in the mean time profiting by this dissension invaded Champagne, Lorraine and Catalonia, though repulsed by the arms of the French. In 1651, Louis declared himself of age, and the flight of Mazarin seemed to promise the restoration of tranquillity, but his return to power the next year again raised a ferment in the kingdom, and his enemy Condé ventured to attack the royal army which he defeated under d'Hocquincourt at Bleneau, though soon after he was taken prisoner. In the midst of these civil broils the archduke Leopold took Gravelines and Dunkirk, John of Austria seized Barcelona, and the duke of Mantua Casal, but the restoration of internal tranquillity soon tended to the recovery of these places, and in 1654, Turenne defeated the Spaniards at Quefnoy, and raised the siege of Arras. Success continued to attend the French arms, and Bourbourg, Mardick, Dixmude, and other towns were conquered, till at last in 1659, the treaty of the Pyrenees restored peace to the two nations, and as one of the articles of the reconciliation made the infant Maria Theresa queen of France. The death of Mazarin in 1661, now changed the face of affairs; and Louis, who had hitherto paid little attention to business, took the reins into his own hands. A new order of things began therefore to appear; the superintendent Fouquet was banished for peculation, and Colbert, a man of vast powers of mind, was called to direct the destinies of France. Under his administration commerce began to flourish, the arts were patronized, industry every where was encouraged, and the academies of painting, of sculpture, and of the sciences, were erected to improve the taste of the nation. Colonies were planted in Madagascar and at Cayenne; and while discipline was restored to the armies, and subordination in the marine, the extremities of the world were visited by men of talents in search of science; and the learned of foreign nations found in Louis and in his virtuous minister a patron and a friend. In the war between England and Holland Louis supported the cause of his allies the Dutch, but the peace of Breda in 1667 restored tranquillity to the continent. On the death of Philip IV. father of his queen, Louis laid claim to his dominions, and especially to the Low Countries, which he invaded with an army. The chief places of the Netherlands soon submitted to his power, but the rapidity of his conquests alarmed the powers of Europe, and England, Sweden, and Holland soon combined to oppose his career. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1668 gave to Spain Franche Comté, but assured to France her conquests in the Low Countries. Though employed in fortifying his frontier towns, as well as in encouraging learning and industry among all his subjects, Louis did not lay aside the plans of his ambitious heart. In 1672 he attacked Holland, and after taking above 40 places on the Rhine he crossed that river, and seized upon Gueldres and Utrecht, but his conquests were stopped by the inundation with which the terrified Dutch overwhelmed their country. The states of Europe too were indignant at his gigantic schemes, and the empire, Prussia, and Spain, united to arrest his progress; but the treaty of Nimeguen checked the victories of the great Turenne, and restored peace to the continent. Proud of his triumphs, and flattered by the title of Great, which his subjects bestowed on him in 1680, Louis again directed his attention to the improvement of his kingdom; the canal of Languedoc was completed, the ports of Toulon, Brest, Dunkirk, Havre-de-Grace, and Rochefort, were enlarged and beautified; and by the establishment of cadets, the foundations of future military glory were laid. Algiers, whose corsairs had insulted the French commerce, was bombarded in 1684, by du Quesne, and reduced to submission; and the Genoese, who had sold powder to the pirates and supported them, claimed forgiveness by sending their doge and four senators to Versailles. But these glorious measures were tarnished by the imprudence and cruelty of the monarch, who in a thoughtless hour revoked the edict of Nantes, by which Henry IV. had granted toleration to protestants; and thus by one stroke of the pen he banished 50,000 families from his kingdom into foreign countries, and with them the arts, the manufactures, and the treasures of France. The league of Augsburg in 1687 was formed between the duke of Savoy, the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg, and the prince of Orange, to which the emperor and the king of Spain were soon united. Though Louis opposed this formidable confederacy by a powerful army under the dauphin, his son, who took Philipsburg, and reduced every place between Basil and Coblenz, yet the enemy soon poured superior numbers into the field, and made the French retreat. The campaign of 1690 was more successful for Louis. Marshal Luxembourg defeated the prince of Waldeck at Fleurus, Catinat conquered Nice, Susa, and Villefranche, and routed the troops of Savoy, and the following year Mons, Valencia, Carnagnole, and Montmelian were added to the French conquests. In 1692 the defeat of the French fleet under Tourville, off Cape la Hogue, by admiral Russel, was counterbalanced on land by the fall of Namur, which Louis took in person. Luxembourg afterwards gained the battle of Steinkerke, and the next year that of Nerwinde. In 1695 Casal fell, and the next year the duke of Savoy, tired of the war, and terrified at the approach of Catinat, who was only six miles from Turin, made peace with France; and the following year hostilities ceased among all the confederates, by the treaty of Ryfswick. The death of Charles II. of Spain without children, unhappily renewed again hostilities; and when the duke of Anjou, grandson of the French monarch, assumed the title of king, agreeable to the will of the Spanish prince, under the name of Philip V. the powers of Europe rose up to defend the claims of the archduke Charles to the vacant throne. Eugene, at the head of the imperial forces in Italy in 1702, conquered the country between the Adige and the Adda; and in the North, Marlborough in 1704 gained the great battle battle of Hochstet, and totally cut in pieces the French army under Tallard and Marchin. In 1705 France conquered Nice and Villefranche, and defeated Eugene at Cassano, while on the other hand Barcelona and Gironne submitted to the allies. Villeroi lost the battle of Ramilies against Marlborough, and Ghent, Ostend, Antwerp, and other towns were snatched from the French dominions. Success continued to attend the allies; Alcantara and Madrid fell into their hands, and the Milanese and Modena were subdued; but in 1707 the battle of Almanza was gained by the French, and the squadrons of Forbin and Duguay Trouin were successful at sea. The campaigns of 1708 and 1709 were disastrous to the French arms; the victory of Oudenarde was followed by the fall of Tournay, and the battle of Malplaquet; and Louis, disheartened by his misfortunes, sued for peace, and even offered money to the allies to enable them to dethrone his grandson. The pride of the allies continued the war, and the success of Villars, who forced the camp of Denain, and the taking of Douay, Quefnoy, and Bouchain, reanimated the French monarch, whose spirits domestic calamities, as well as public disasters, had broken down. The treaty of Utrecht was at last signed 1713 with the allies, and proved more favorable to France than she expected; and the following year peace was concluded with the empire at Rastadt. Louis died soon after, 1st Sept. 1715, aged 77, in the 73d year of his reign; during which he had seen four kings in Sweden, four in Denmark, five in Poland, five in Portugal, three in Spain, four in England, three emperors, and nine popes. Louis, by his first wife, had one son, the dauphin, who died 1711, leaving three sons, Louis, Philip, and Gaston, and by his mistresses he had several natural children. The character of this monarch is entitled to praise. Though fond of military glory, and too often awake to the voice of flattery, he yet had the sagacity to discern merit, and to patronize virtue. His reign is as illustrious for great names in literary pursuits and in science, as for able characters in the field and in the cabinet. Though unhappily too much given to sensual pleasures in the midst of a voluptuous court, yet Louis sought for friendship, and the reciprocity of kindness; and in the last part of his life he became penitent, serious, and devout, by the influence of his mistress, Madame de Maintenon, whom, it is said, he privately married.

Louis XV. son of the duke of Burgundy, was born 15th Feb. 1710, and in 1715 succeeded his great-grandfather, Louis XIV. as king of France. Philip, duke of Orleans, was appointed his guardian, and he labored earnestly to restore the impaired finances of the kingdom, but the schemes of Law, and the Mississippi projects brought desolation and ruin upon above 100,000 families in France. In 1723 the king was declared of age, and the affairs of the kingdom, after passing into the hands of Dubois, were entrusted, after Orleans' death, to the care of the duke of Bourbon, as prime minister. In 1725 the king married Mary, the daughter of Stanislaus, nominal king of Poland, and cardinal Fleury succeeded to the disgraced and unpopular Bourbon in the management of public affairs. The death of Augustus, king of Poland, in 1733, was fatal to the peace of Europe; Louis supported the pretensions of his father-in-law, and was opposed by the emperor of Germany, who upheld the claims of the elector of Saxony. The French troops were successful in Italy, but in 1738 a treaty restored tranquillity; and while Stanislaus renounced the throne of Poland, he was permitted to retain the title of king, and to become duke of Lorraine and Bar, which, after his death, were to descend to France. On the death of the emperor Charles VI. in 1740, new dissensions arose, and Louis, who had guaranteed the pragmatic sanction, and the succession of Maria Theresa, very dishonorably united with Prussia and Poland to place the duke of Bavaria, Charles Albert, on the imperial throne. Thus protected, the new monarch quickly seized Passau and Prague, and caused himself to be crowned king of Bohemia, and emperor; but his triumph was of short duration; the conquered towns were recaptured, and the battle of Dettingen in 1743, gained by the allies, shattered all his hopes. Though Louis appeared at the head of his armies in 1744, and took Courtray, Menin, Ypres, and Friburg, and witnessed the defeats of Fontenoy and Lawfeld, and the conquests of Ghent, Ostend, Brussels, Brabant, Bergen-op-Zoom, and other places, yet he found reverses in Italy and Provence. His commerce was ruined by the English, and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748 was welcomed by all the powers of Europe. In 1755 a new war was kindled between England and France about their possessions in Canada, and while Prussia supported the English, the emperor declared himself in favor of Louis. At the first the French were very successful; Portmahon surrendered to their arms, Galissonniere obtained some advantage over the English fleet, the duke of Cumberland was defeated at Hastenback, and the English army submitted to a disgraceful capitulation at Closter-seven. The conquest of Hanover, however, was followed by the defeat of the French forces at Rossbach, by the king of Prussia, in 1757, and they experienced another loss at the battle of Crevelt in 1758. The next year Broglie defeated the allies at Bergen, near Frankfurt; but after various disasters on both sides, the rival powers grew tired of the war; and though the famous family compact joining in one bond of union all the branches of the house of Bourbon, seemed to promise much, it contributed little to the glory of France; and Spain lost Havannah, Cuba, and the Philippines. At last a treaty of peace was signed in 1763, by which England acquired great additions to her colonies; and the succeeding years presented little interesting in the history of France, except the conquest of Corsica, and the final banishment of the Jesuits from the country. In May 1774 Louis was attacked a second time by the small-pox, which proved fatal on the 10th of that month. He was then 65 years old, and had reigned upwards of 59. Louis was a weak character, and though possessed of some good qualities of heart, he suffered himself too patiently to be governed by his favorites and his mistresses.

He

He wrote a book on the Course of the principal Rivers of Europe, 8vo. He had two sons and eight daughters by his wife.

LOUIS XVI. son of the dauphin, and of Mary Josephine, of Saxony, the daughter of Frederic Augustus, king of Poland, was born 23d Aug. 1754, and in consequence of the death of his father 1765, he exchanged the title of duke of Berry for that of dauphin, and ascended the throne of France on the death of his grandfather, 1774. His union with Marie Antoinette, of Austria, in 1770, was attended by the unfortunate death of above 4000 persons, who had assembled to behold the public rejoicings at Paris. On the day of his elevation to the crown, the young monarch, as if foreboding the miseries which awaited him, exclaimed, O my God, how unfortunate for me! Nevertheless, to repair the misconduct of his predecessors, and to meet the exigencies of an exhausted treasury, a ruined commerce, a shattered marine, and the discontents of a nation loaded with taxes, the new king called around him ministers of credit and ability. Vergennes took the charge of foreign affairs, Turgot presided over the finances, Maleherbes became counsellor of state, Sartine directed the affairs of the marine, and Maurepas was made prime minister. The first act of his reign endeared Louis to his people, and he nobly remitted the tribute which was expected on the accession of a new monarch. Already abuses began to be redressed, the exiled parliament was recalled, and commerce and industry began to recover their usual activity, but unfortunately the American war broke out. Eager to humble England by assisting her revolted colonies, the ministers of Louis pursued a course which was to prove fatal to their master and disastrous to Europe. By supporting the Americans they kindled a dreadful war against England, which, while it separated the colonies from the mother country, increased, in a more intolerable degree, the debts of France, and the miseries of her subjects. To repair the ruined finances proved too mighty a labor for the abilities of Calonne, and the cardinal de Brienne, wishing to gain by violence what his predecessor sought by persuasion, laid severe imposts, which the poverty of the people and the dissatisfaction of the great, could not discharge. The parliament of Paris was exiled to Troyes, for refusing to register these unpopular taxes; and when recalled by the fatal moderation of the monarch, they, instead of complying, called for the meeting of the states general of the kingdom, to assist in the difficulties of the government. Obedient to the general voice of the people, Louis convoked the states general, which met at Versailles, 5th May, 1789. But while the three orders, the nobles, the clergy, and the commons, disputed which should be exempted from contributing to the burdens of the state, dissension arose between them, and instead of laboring earnestly all for the public good, each sought the aggrandisement of his own order, and listened to the voice of the factious and the intriguing. The troops which surrounded Paris gave offence to the deputies; and at the voice of the hypocritical democrat, Mirabeau, the people of Paris arose, and on the 14th July, 1789, they seized the Bastille, and after the most atrocious barbarities, bid defiance to the government. Though the mild character of the monarch, and the hesitating measures of his ministers, seemed to promise every concession, the factious leaders of the populace determined to attempt new crimes. On the 5th of October following, an armed multitude, with women of the most abandoned and ferocious character, set out from Paris for Versailles. The guards of the palace were murdered, the doors of the apartments were broken open, and the bed, from which the unhappy queen scarce could escape, was pierced through with a thousand stabs. The monarch, surrounded by his terrified family, was with difficulty spared, but it was to suffer new indignities. He was immediately hurried to Paris, preceded by the insulting cavalcade; while around his carriage were presented on pikes, with the grossest exclamations, the heads of his faithful servants who had been murdered in defence of his person. Placed as a prisoner in the palace of the Thuilleries, he made every sacrifice which could restore tranquillity; and on the 14th Feb. 1790, he gave his assent to the new constitution, which reduced his power to a mere shadow. Notwithstanding these humiliating concessions, he was still insulted; murder and insurrection still continued, or rather were encouraged; and at the last, tired of a situation which left him no prospect of liberty, the monarch escaped privately from Paris, 21st June, 1791, and nearly reached the frontiers of France. His person, however, was recognized at Varennes, and he was brought back to Paris to endure fresh indignities. Though treated with seeming respect by the national assembly, the insults of the populace were not checked, and on the 20th June, 1792, a ferocious mob forced its way to the palace, and threatened the destruction of the royal family. Louis, undismayed, presented himself to these barbarians, and for two hours, disarmed them of their murderous fury, till Petion, with hypocritical marks of respect, came to liberate the monarch from this perilous situation. The events of this day warned Louis of his approaching fate, and it is said that now he began to write his will, and to prepare himself for death. The declaration of war by the emperor and Prussia against France, and the threats of the duke of Brunswick, and his invasion of Champagne, roused more powerfully the resentment of the mob, as they were taught, by their flagitious leaders, that these measures were dictated by their imprisoned monarch. In the midst of these events, with a victorious enemy approaching the capital, and an ungovernable multitude, thirsting for blood, the 10th of August, still more terrible than all others, came; the tocsin was sounded, the Thuilleries attacked, and the faithful Swiss guards murdered in every avenue of the palace. Already the cannon was pointed against the apartments of the monarch, when he was persuaded to fly for safety to the hall of the assembly, and though often interrupted by the sight of heaps of slain, by the shrieks of the dying, and by the outrageous insults of the mob, he reached this spot, where he heard his name treated with studied indignity, his power suspended, and his sentence of imprisonment pronounced. Confined in one of the towers of the Temple, he for some time was permitted to enjoy the soothing company of his family; but as his tyrants increased in power, they decreased in compassion and humanity. The convention succeeded the assembly, and they not only decreed the abolition of royalty in France, but they proclaimed the necessity of trying their fallen monarch. Depicted, in the speeches of this vile assembly, as a tyrant and a traitor, Louis had no mercy to expect from such perjured judges. Though deprived of pen and paper, and of every means by which he might have prepared himself, he appeared with his usual serenity before this murderous tribunal, and in his answers to interrogatories, he maintained the dignity of the monarch, and the firmness of the Christian. Though thus insulted, yet an apparent show of candor in the convention, permitted his faithful ministers, Maleherbes, Tronchet, and Deseze, to appear at their bar as his defenders; but neither the tears nor the venerable appearance of these aged and illustrious men, nor the present misfortunes, the past greatness, and the well-known innocence of Louis, could avail. On the 17th Jan. 1793, he was condemned to death, but only by a majority of five voices. He heard of his fate with composure and resignation; but his parting with the queen and with his family, was tender and affecting beyond the power of description. On the 21st he was conveyed to the scaffold, attended by M. Edgeworth, a catholic priest, and on the fatal spot he attempted to address the multitude which surrounded him, but the beating of drums drowned his voice. As he placed himself on the machine, his confessor fervently exclaimed, O son of St. Louis ascend to heaven, and that moment his head was severed from his body. His remains were conveyed to the church-yard of St. Magdalen, and immediately consumed in quicklime. He left a son, who in history bears the name of Louis XVII. and as if to offer new indignity to a throne that had crumbled to the dust, this young prince, aged eight, was entrusted to the care of Simon, a shoe-maker, and died soon after from the rude treatment he received, or as some suppose, from poison. His daughter, after seeing the murder of her parents, and of her aunt, was exchanged with Austria for the deputies detained by the imperialists, and she married her cousin, the duke of Angoulême. Louis, regarded as a monarch, but not contemplated with the misfortunes which closed his life, must be acknowledged to be a virtuous and amiable man. His letters display the goodness of a benevolent heart, attached to religion, anxious to do good, and eager to maintain integrity and uprightness. If as a monarch he had possessed greater resolution, and more firm consistency of character, he might have averted the miseries which awaited him; and instead of marching to a scaffold, he might have upheld the honor of the throne, repressed insurrection, and restored the kingdom to tranquillity, happiness, and prosperity.

LOUIS I. called the Pious, king of Germany, was third son of Louis the Debonnaire, and was proclaimed king of Bavaria, 817. He joined his brother Charles the Bald, and at the battle of Fontenai defeated his half brother Lothaire, 841, and rendered himself powerful and formidable to his neighbours. He died at Frankfort, 28th Aug. 876, aged 70.

LOV

LOUIS II. son of the preceding, and his successor on the throne of Germany, defeated his uncle, Charles the Bald, and died at Frankfort, 20th Jan. 882.

LOUIS III. king of Germany, vid. LOUIS III. emperor.

LOUIS I. of Anjou, king of Hungary and Poland, succeeded Charles II. 1342, and after expelling the Jews from his kingdom, he made war against the Transylvanians, the Croats, Tartars, and Venetians, and was elected king of Poland, after his uncle Casimir, 1370. He died at Tirnau, 12th Sept. 1382, aged 57, leaving two daughters, one of whom, Mary, inherited Hungary, and the other, Hedwige, married Ladislaus, king of Poland.

LOUIS II. was king of Hungary after his father Ladislaus, 1516, and was defeated by the Turks under Solymán, at Mohatz, 1526. He was drowned in a marsh, as he fled from the field of battle, 29th Aug. aged 22.

LOUIS, prince of Tarentum, nephew of Robert, king of Sicily, married Jane, the queen of Naples, and after the invasion, and the defeat of the Hungarians, was crowned king of Naples, 1352. He died 25th May, 1362.

LOUIS I. duke of Anjou, second son of John, king of France, was regent of the kingdom during the minority of his nephew Charles VI. He afterwards attempted to gain possession of the kingdom of Naples, left him by the will of queen Jane, but could not succeed. He died of a broken heart in consequence of the ill success of his measures, at Paris, 20th Sep. 1384.

LOUIS, Antony, secretary of the academy of surgeons at Paris, and member of that of sciences, became one of the most intelligent anatomists of Europe. He was born at Metz, and died of a dropsy, 20th May, 1792, aged 69. He was a man of great integrity, as well as of extensive knowledge in the medical profession. He wrote a Course of Practical Surgery on Gunshot Wounds, 4to. — Essay on the Nature of the Soul and its Union with the Body, 12mo. — Observations on Electricity, and its Effects on the Animal Economy, 12mo. — Observations on the Effects of the Cancerous Virus, 12mo. — Refutations of Combalusier — Positiones Anatomico-chirurgicæ de Capite, 4to. — de Partium Externarum Generatione in Mulieribus, 4to. — Eloges de Bassuel, Molaval, & Verdier — Dissertatio de Apoplexia curanda, and other medical works.

LOVE, James, an actor, whose real name was Dance, the son of Mr. Dance, the city surveyor, and the ungraceful architect of the London mansion-house. He was educated at Westminster school, and Cambridge, but took no degree. He expected patronage from Walpole, in consequence of his answering an attack against the minister, but was disappointed, and at last turned his thoughts to the stage. He was on the Dublin and Edinburgh theatres, and appeared at Drury-lane, 1762. His Falstaff was much admired, till eclipsed by the better acting of Henderson. He died 1774. He wrote Pamela, a comedy, 1742, and some other dramatic pieces.

LOVE, Christopher, rector of St. Anne's, Aldersgate, and St. Laurence, Jewry, and author of 3 vols. of sermons, was accused of correspondence with the king against Cromwell's government. He was condemned, and and lost his head, July, 1651, though several parishes, and 54 ministers interested themselves in his behalf.

LOVELACE, Richard, an English poet, born at Woolridge, in Kent, 1618, and educated at the Charter-house, and Gloucester hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1636. He embraced the cause of the king during the civil wars, and was a great sufferer for his loyalty. The persecutions which he endured, and the poverty to which he was reduced, at last brought on melancholy, and produced a consumption. He died in a very poor lodging, Gunpowder-alley, Shoe-lane, 1658, and was buried in St. Bride's church. His poetry was very spirited and elegant. He wrote, besides poems, two plays, the Scholar, a comedy — and the Soldier, a tragedy.

LOVIBOND, Edward, an English poet, born in Middlesex, and educated at Kingston school. Besides an elegant collection of poems, published 1785, he contributed several papers to the periodical newspaper, called the World; and he died at his house near Hampton, 1775.

LOUPIERE, John Charles de Relongue de la, of the Arcadian academy at Rome, was born at Louptiere, in the diocese of Sens, and died 1784, aged 57. He wrote a collection of poems, 2 vols. 8vo. which possess spirit, ease, and delicacy; besides the six first parts of the journal des Dames, 1761.

LOUVET, Peter, a native of Reinville, near Beauvais, was master of requests to queen Margaret, and died 1646. He wrote, the History and Antiquities of Beauvais, 2 vols. 8vo. — Nomenclatura & Chronologia Rerum Ecclesiast. Dioc. Bellovac, 8vo. — Remarques sur la Noblesse Beauvoisine & plusieurs Familles de la France, 8vo. in a style not very elegant. — A physician of Beauvais bore also that name, and was professor at Montpellier, 1680. He wrote various works on the history of Provence and Languedoc, &c. possessing little merit.

LOUVET DE COUVRAY, John Baptist, a native of Poitou, author of a licentious work, the Amours of Faublas. During the revolution he was an active member of the convention, and though proscribed in 1793, he had the art to escape the guillotine. As the editor of the Sentinel, he acquired popularity with the vulgar; and he soon had the boldness to accuse Robespierre, surrounded with his satellites, and by his firmness to overturn the tyrant. He is praised for the steadiness of his principles; and Madame Roland says of him, that he was courageous as a lion, and simple as a child. He died at Paris, 25th Aug. 1797, of an asthmatic disorder, as he was going consul to Palermo. Besides his Faublas, and his Sentinel, he wrote, Paris justifié, 8vo. 1789 — Emilie de Varmont, ou le Divorce nécessaire, 3 vols. 12mo. 1794 — Notice pour le Recit de mes Dangers, 1795, 8vo.

LOUVILLE, Eugene d'Allonville, Chevalier de, a native of Beauce, of a noble family, who served, as colonel of dragoons, Philip V. of Spain. At the peace of Utrecht he devoted himself to mathematics and astronomy, and after making observations at Marseilles, he came to London, 1715, to see with greater effect, the total eclipse of the sun. While in England he was made member of the royal society of London, as he had before been of the academy of sciences, at Paris. He afterwards fixed his residence near Orleans, and devoted himself to astronomical pursuits. He died there, of a fever, at the end of 1732, aged 61. He wrote various curious dissertations, inserted in the memoirs of the academy, &c.

LOWE, Peter, a Scotch surgeon, who for 22 years was in foreign service, in Flanders and France. He afterwards settled at Glasgow, 1612, and was empowered by the king to examine all persons who wished to practise surgery in the western parts of the kingdom. He wrote some books on his profession.

LOWEN, John Frederic, a native of Klansthal, who wrote a collection of poems, printed at Hamburg, 1765 — Romances, printed at Leipzig, 1774, a valuable work. He died at Rostock, 1773, aged 44.

LOWER, sir William, a loyalist, under Charles I. born at Tremare, in Cornwall. When his master's affairs were ruined, he retired to Holland, and applied himself to literature. He formed the plan of the four of the six plays which he has written in the manner of Corneille and Quinault, his favorite authors. He died 1662.

LOWER, Richard, son to the above, was a physician, educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, and instructed in medical and anatomical knowledge, by Dr. Willis. He settled in London, and practised with great reputation. His books, "De Corde" "Et de Motu & Colore Sanguinis, & Chyli in Eum Transitu" are much admired. He practised the transfusion of blood from one animal to another. He died 1691. Some of his papers appear in the philosophical transactions.

LOWMAN, Moses, for upwards of 40 years dissenting minister of a congregation at Clapham, Surrey, was well skilled in Jewish history and antiquities. He died 1752, aged 72. He wrote a valuable book on Revelations — a tract, now scarce, proving mathematically the Unity and Perfection of God a priori — and after his death appeared his three treatises on the Shechinah and Logos.

LOWTH, William B. D. a learned divine, born in St. Martin's parish, Ludgate, London, 11th Sept. 1661. He was first educated under his grandfather, the rector of Tilehurst, Berks, and then sent to Merchant Taylors' school, where he so distinguished himself, that at 14 he was elected to St. John's, Oxford. His great merit recommended him to bishop Mew, of Winchester, who made him his chaplain, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral, and the rectory of Buriton, with the chapel of Petersfield, Hants. This worthy and exemplary clergyman died 1732, and was buried in the church-yard, Buriton, leaving three daughters, and two sons. He is the author of Commentaries on all the Prophets, first published 4to. afterwards folio — a Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments, 12mo. in answer to Le Clerc — Directions for the profitable reading of the Scriptures — sermons, &c. — the Character of an Apostolical Church, &c. which engaged him in a controversy with a dissenting minister of Portsmouth, called Norman.

LOWTH, Robert, a learned prelate, son of the above, above, born in the Close, Winchester, 8th Dec. 1710. He was educated at Winchester school, and passed to New college, Oxford, where he soon began to display the native powers of his ardent mind. In 1741 he was elected Hebrew professor of poetry, and in that character delivered his admirable lectures, "De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum," published 4to. afterwards in 8vo. and edited with additions, by Michaelis, in Germany. His great reputation recommended him to the duke of Devonshire, who appointed him tutor to his son, marquis Hartington, and with him he made the tour of Europe. In 1750 he was appointed archdeacon of Winchester, by bishop Hoadly, and in 1754 he was honorably created by diploma, D. D. by the university of Oxford. In 1755 he went as chaplain to his pupil, now lord lieutenant of Ireland, and there soon obtained the bishopric of Limerick, which he afterwards exchanged for a prebend of Durham. His "Life of William of Wykeham," appeared in 1758. In 1766 he was made bishop of St. David's, two months after translated to Oxford, and in 1777 to London. On the death of Cornwallis the primate, 1783, he was offered the archiepiscopal chair, which his infirmities obliged him to decline. His domestic peace had been deeply wounded by the death of his eldest daughter, in 1768, on whose grave at Cuddesdon, he inscribed those beautiful and pathetic verses, beginning with "Cara, vale," &c. and his other daughter died suddenly, 1783, while presiding at his tea table, and in conversation with bishop Newton. This truly venerable prelate, and most amiable man, died 3d Nov. 1787, aged nearly 77. He published besides "Isaiah," translated from the Hebrew, a most masterly performance — an English Grammar, universally esteemed — a Poem on the Genealogy of Christ — some Controversial Papers with Warburton — Occasional Sermons, &c. — His father's life, for the Biogr. Britan.

LOYER, Peter le, a native of Anjou, author of a curious History of Spectres, 4to. — Edom, or the Idumæan Colonies in Europe and Asia, 8vo. and other works, in verse and prose. He died at Angers, 1634, aged 84.

LOYOLA, Ignatius of, the founder of the order of Jesuits, was born of a respectable family at Loyola in the province of Guipuscoa, in Spain, 1491. The early part of his life was spent in the military service, and in a conspicuous manner, but when his leg was broken by a cannon ball, at the siege of Pampeluna, 1521, he made a vow to renounce the world, to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and to devote himself to the service of God. He dedicated his arms to the Virgin at Montserrat, and hanged them on her altar, and began his career of devotion by the most severe mortifications. He embarked at Barcelona, and after obtaining the pope's blessing at Rome, he proceeded to Jerusalem, and after many extraordinary visions, and miraculous adventures, he returned to Barcelona. In 1524, he, it is said, began to study the rudiments of Latin grammar, but the wise rules contained in the Enchiridion of Erasmus, were soon laid aside for the reveries of Thomas à Kempis. He now became so popular among his followers, that he was thrown into the prison of the inquisition, and escaped only upon promise of not publishing his opinions for four years. From Spain he passed to Paris, 1528, and there gained some converts, but the number of those who wished to bind themselves to the austerities of a new mode of life, amounted only to seven, and afterwards to ten. These religious men at last met one another from various quarters, at Venice, 1537, and there bound themselves by five rules, which inculcated the duties of self mortification, and of charity, and enforced the precepts and practice of virtue, and labored assiduously, without the hope of reward, for the glory of God. They called themselves therefore the society of Jesus, and soon their zeal was increased by the sanction of Paul III. who confirmed the order in 1540, on condition that their members should not exceed 60, and in 1543, without restriction. Loyola was deservedly created general of this new order, and his companions quickly spread themselves over the world to convert infidels and heretics and to promote the cause of virtue and piety. His order was again confirmed 1550 by Julius III. and he then wished to resign his office as general, but was prevented by the affection of his followers. He died 31st July, 1556, aged 66, 35 years after his conversion, and 16 after the foundation of his society. Before his death he had the satisfaction to know that his zealous associates were respected all over the world, and gave laws wherever they appeared. He was canonized 1609, and then all the miracles of the apostolic ages were said to have been wrought by the influence of his superior sanctity. In 1622 his name was inserted by Gregory XV. among the saints, and greater honors were decreed to his memory by Innocent X. and Clement IX. The jesuits, so inconsiderable in their origin, grew to an astonishing number; at the death of their founder, 1556, they amounted to 10,581, and in 1679 to 17,655. The causes which contributed to their increase were, besides the great patronage of Rome, of Spain and Portugal, the wish to convert the newly discovered territories of America to the christian faith, and in Europe, to oppose the progress of Lutheranism, and no order of men for zeal, for ability, for perseverance, were more capable of undertaking the arduous task. After, however, long giving secret laws to the world, and influencing the affections of men, by their external piety and discipline, the jesuits have fallen into disrepute. They not only promoted the cause of religion, but they frequently encouraged plots and machinations against existing governments, and therefore in 1773 Clement XIV. was obliged to yield to the representations of the house of Bourbon, and on the 21st July, to issue a bull for the suppression of this famous order. Their last general was L. Ricci, who died in confinement that same year. The jesuits of late years have again met encouragement, they are tolerated in Russia, and maintain a secret influence in other countries.

LUBIENETSKI, Theodore, a native of Cracow, eminent as a painter in portraits, and in history. He died 1716, aged 63. His brother Christopher was equally known as an able artist.

LUBIENIETSKI, Stanislaus Lubienieciur, a Socinian divine, born at Cracow, in Poland, of a noble family, 1623. He studied at Thorn, and afterwards visited France and Holland, as a travelling tutor, and in 1648, on the death of his father, returned to Poland. He was highly favored by the king of Sweden, while he was in Poland, but he exerted his influence in vain with that monarch, that the Unitarians might be included in the general amnesty granted to all those who dissembled from popery. In consequence of this disappointment he went to Copenhagen, 1660, and was there honorably received by the Danish king, who granted him a pension. The Lutheran divines, however, saw with jealousy, the influence he had acquired, and the new favorite yielding to the general odium, retired to Hamburg, 1662, where he held a conference with queen Christina. In 1667 he again returned to Copenhagen, and from thence to Fredericksburg, but persecution followed him every where, and another time he attempted to find an asylum at Hamburg. Here he did not long enjoy tranquillity, he was ordered by the magistrates to leave the city, but before he removed, the unfortunate man was poisoned by his maid servant, May 18th, 1675. His two daughters had fallen victims, two days before, to the same diabolical measures, and his wife with difficulty recovered from the effects of the poison. His death prevented his completion of the History of the Reformation in Poland. Of the many books which he wrote, a few have been printed. He is regarded by the Sociinians, as a martyr to their tenets. The best known of his works is "Theatrum Cometicum," 1667, folio, which contains an account of comets, from the flood to 1665.

LUBIN, Eilhard, a learned protestant, born at Westersted, in Oldenburg, 24th March, 1556. He studied at Leipzig and Cologne, and other universities, and in 1595 was made professor of poetry at Rostock, and ten years after raised to the divinity chair. He died of a tertian ague, June, 1621. To his extensive knowledge of Greek and Latin, he added the graces of poetry and oratory, and was also a good mathematician and divine. His publications are 13, containing notes on Anacreon, Juvenal, and Persius — a Translation of the Anthologia — Clavis Græcæ Linguae, &c. besides a curious Treatise, called "Phosphorus, &c." in which he maintained two co-eternal principles, God and Nothing, of which he considered God as the good principle, and Nothing, as the evil principle. He supposed that sin was only a tendency towards nothing, and that sin was necessary to make known the nature of good. By his first wife he had no children, by his second, nine.

LUBIN, Augustin, an Augustine friar, geographer to the French king, was born at Paris 29th Jan. 1624. He applied himself to ecclesiastical history and wrote the Geographical Mercury — Present State of Abbies in France, and in Italy — a Description of Lapland, — Notes on Plutarch's Lives, and other works. He died at Paris 17th March, 1695.

LUCA, John Baptist, a native of Venosa, in the Neapolitan territory. He quitted the profession of the law for the church, and became a cardinal. He died 1683, aged 66. The best known of his numerous works is an Analysis of the Civil Law, 4 vols. 4to. — a composition of great merit, and properly called the Philosophy of Jurisprudence.

LUCAN, Marcus Anneus, a Latin poet born at Cordova, A. D. 39. He was the favorite of Nero, but afterwards offended and joined Piso's conspiracy against the tyrant. He was obliged to destroy himself and was suffocated in a bath, 65. The best edition of his Pharsalia is that of Strawberry hill, 1760, 4to.

LUCAS, Tudensis, bishop of Tudæ or Tuy in Galicia, in the 13th century, was author of an History of Spain, from Adam to the year 1236. — the Life of Isidorus of Seville — a work against the Albigenes, 1612.

LUCAS, Van Leyden, a painter and engraver, born in 1494. His works procured him celebrity, and Albert Durer visited Holland merely to see him. The last six years of his life he spent in his bed, pretending that he had been poisoned. His time, however, was devoted to his pencil, and he said that his bed should still be a bed of honor. He died 1533. Though his figures abound in expression, yet the whole wants correctness.

LUCAS BRUGENSIS, Francis, dean of St. Omer, was a learned orientalist, and the author of Critical Notes on the Scriptures — Commentaries on the New Testament, 3 vols. folio. — Concordances of the Bible, &c. He died 1619, aged 67.

LUCAS, Richard, a learned divine born at Presteign, Radnorshire, 1648. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of D. D. He was for some time master of Abergavenny free school, but afterwards obtained the vicarage of St. Stephen, Coleman street, and the lectureship of St. Olave, Southwark, and in 1696 became prebendary of Westminster. He died June 1715, after being afflicted for some years with blindness, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He was author of some valuable compositions — Practical Christianity — an Enquiry after Happiness, 2 vols 8vo. — 5 vols. of sermons, 8vo. — the Morality of the Gospel, &c.

LUCAS, Paul, a French traveller, born at Rouen 1664. He several times visited the Levant, Egypt, Turkey, and other countries, where he made a valuable collection of curiosities, which he presented to the French king, who in 1714 appointed him his antiquary. He extended his travels to Spain, and died, after an illness of eight months, at Madrid, 1737. His travels though not very accurate, are yet interesting. They have appeared in 7 vols. 12mo.

LUCAS, Charles, an Irishman who from an apothecary became a physician, and afterwards obtained a seat in the House of Commons where he displayed his zeal in his opposition to the measures of government. He died 1771, aged 58, and his remains were honored by the attendance of the Dublin corporation who liberally conferred a pension on his widow. He published some Medical Tracts, &c.

LUCCHESINI, John Vincent, an historian born of a noble family at Lucca. He was educated at Sienna and at Pisa universities, and became secretary to the pope, and canon of St. Peter's at Rome. He died 1744, aged 84. Besides a Latin translation of Demosthenes, 1712, much and deservedly commended by Rollin, he wrote Historia sui Temporis, published 1738, 3 vols. 4to. a work of merit.

LUCIAN, a Greek writer born at Samosata. He left the business of sculptor for the life of an author, and became the favorite of M. Aurelius, who appointed him registrar of Egypt. His satires are very severe on heathen religion, but often obscene and profane.

He

He died 180 A. D. aged 90. His works were well edited by Reitzius, Amsterd. 4 vols. 4to. 1743.

LUCIFER, bishop Cagliari, in Sardinia, refused to admit the apostate Arian bishops to communion, according to the decree of the council of Alexandria, 362. Rather than to yield in opinion he resigned his see, and became the author of a new schism whose supporters were called Luciferians. He died 370. His works appeared at Venice 1779.

LUCILIUS, Caius, a Roman satirist who was with Scipio in his expedition against Numantia. He died 103 B. C. Fragments of his poetry remain.

LUCIUS I. pope and saint, was elected 253, after Cornelius, and the next year suffered martyrdom.

LUCIUS II. Gerard de Caccianemici, a native of Bologna, elected pope after Celestinus II. 1144. He died 25th Feb. the next year in consequence of a blow from a stone in a popular commotion.

LUCIUS III. Humbaldo Allineigoli, a native of Lucca, succeeded pope Alexander III. 1181. He was obliged in a popular tumult to fly from Rome to Verona, but he afterwards returned supported by the princes of Italy, and he punished the seditious disturbers of the public peace. Another commotion afterwards occasioned again his flight, and he died at Verona 25th Nov. 1185. He established with the emperor Frederic, constitutions for the punishment of heresies, which may be considered as the origin of the inquisition.

LUCRETIA, a celebrated Roman lady, wife of Collatinus. Violence was offered to her person by Sextus the son of Tarquin, and in consequence of this she stabbed herself after she had related the horrid indignity to her father and husband. Her death was avenged by the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, and the establishment of the consular government, A. U. C. 244.

LUCRETIUS, Titus Carus, a Roman poet educated in the epicurean school of Zeno and Phædrus. He wrote a beautiful poem, De Rerum Natura, founded however on the atheistical doctrine of Atoms. It is supposed that he became mad by drinking a philter given him by his mistress Lucilia. He died B. C. 54, aged 42. The best edition is that of Wakefield, 4 vols. 4to. The work has been translated into English verse by Creech.

LUCULLUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman general celebrated for his conquests over Mithridates in Bithynia, and Armenia. After the honors of a triumph he retired to privacy, and patronized learned men. He died aged 68.

LUDLOW, Edmund, a republican chief in the civil wars, born at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, 1620. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he took his first degree in 1636, and then removed to the Temple to study the law, but on the breaking out of the civil war, by the advice of his father who was representative in the long parliament, for Wiltshire, he became a volunteer in lord Essex's life guards. He distinguished himself at the battle of Edge hill, and in the siege of Wardour castle, of which he was made governor, and afterwards he was made by the parliament high sheriff of his native county. He was at the second battle of Newbury, and in 1643 succeeded, on his father's death, as representative for Wiltshire, but while he opposed on the one hand the dark designs of Cromwell, he on the other voted for the abolition of royalty, and for the establishment of a pure commonwealth. With these principles it is not to be wondered at that he was one of the unfortunate king's judges, and that he concurred in voting the house of peers not only useless but dangerous. He was employed by Cromwell as lieutenant general of horse in Ireland, and on Ireton's death he succeeded him in the chief command of the island. The elevation of Cromwell to the protectorate was particularly displeasing to him, but his attempts to oppose it rendered him suspected to the tyrant who at last injured his tranquillity, by seizing his person, and then obliging him to give a security not to act against the government. Thus bound to inactivity he lived in Essex till the death of the usurper, and then under Richard appeared in parliament, and was violent in the disturbed state of affairs for the restoration of the rump parliament. By the influence of the Wallingford house party he was prevailed upon to resume the chief command in Ireland, but here he met with some opposition, and on his return to England soon after he found himself accused of various misdemeanors. Sensible that the nation, and the army headed by Monk, had determined to restore the king, he left the kingdom, by the advice of his friends, and retired to Dieppe. A reward of 300l. was offered by proclamation for his apprehension, but he escaped his pursuers, and flying to Geneva, he at last settled at Vevay in Switzerland. At the revolution he ventured to return to London, but though he was regarded as a proper person to reduce Ireland from the power of the papists, some of the commons moved an address to William to seize him, in consequence of which he retired again to Vevay, where he died 1693, aged 73. A monument was erected over his body by his widow. After his death appeared his "Memoirs" in 2 vols. 8vo. 1698, to which another was added on the following year. This work is curious and valuable, and in communicating important particulars concerning the civil wars, exhibits the author as a stern unshaken republican, not like Cromwell turning every accident to his own views and interest, but regarding the democratical government, pure and uncorrupted, as the most perfect system of political union.

LUDOLPH, Job, the well known Ethiopic historian, was born at Erfurt in Thuringia, 15th June, 1624. Though his countrymen were unfortunately engaged in military affairs he devoted himself to studious pursuits, and at the age of 20 was a perfect master of Hebrew, Greek and Latin, and then employed himself assiduously in the study of the Ethiopic language, of which he wrote a grammar. He studied also the law under the famous professor Muller, and after spending about six years in travelling, and visiting France, Holland, Rome, and the residence of Christina the celebrated patroness of learning in Sweden, he returned to Erfurt, and gained applause in the office of counsellor of state. After 18 years devoted to the public service he returned to Frankfort with the intention of cultivating literature, but the elector palatine placed him at the head of his administration, and twice employed his abilities as a negotiator in France. The last years, however, of his life were spent in the perfecting of his works. He died universally lamented 8th April, 1704, nearly 80 years old. It is said that he was well versed in 25 languages. His character in private life was as respectable as his public fame as a scholar and a politician. He wrote Historia Ethiopica, fol. 1681 — Commentaries in Hist. Ethiop. folio. — Dissertatio de Locustis, folio. — Grammatica Amharicæ Linguae, &c. fol. — Grammatica Linguae Ethiop. folio. and other learned publications.

LUDOLPH, Henry William, nephew to the preceding, was born at Erfurt 1655. He was secretary to the Danish envoy in London, and afterwards filled the same office near the person of George of Denmark, who married queen Anne. He visited Russia, and was presented to the Czar who expressed astonishment at his great knowledge of music and of various languages, and in gratitude for the civilities which he had received, he wrote a grammar of the Russian language, which was printed at Oxford 1696. In 1698 he determined to travel into the East to see the state of the christian church in those remote regions. He visited Smyrna, Jaffa, Jerusalem, Cairo, Alexandria, and returned well acquainted with the laws, manners, and religion of those countries. He wished the establishment of a christian college at Jerusalem, and to disseminate the knowledge of pure christianity, he zealously undertook the impression of the New Testament into modern Greek, which was happily completed by the assistance of the bishop of Worcester, and other learned and charitable persons. This benevolent man died 25th Jan. 1710, aged 54. His other works are Meditations on Retirement from the World — Reflections on the Present State of the Church, &c.

LUDWIG, John Peter, professor of law, chancellor of Magdeburg, and privy counsellor to the king of Prussia, died 1743, aged 73. He wrote Scriptor. Rerum Germanicarum, 2 vols. — Manuscripta Omnis Aevi, Diplomata & Monumenta inedita, 12 vols. 8vo. — Lives of Justinian and Tribonian — Miscellaneous Works, 2 vols. &c.

LUGO, John, a Spanish jesuit, born at Madrid 28th Nov. 1583. He studied at Pampeluna, Salamanca, and Seville, and taught divinity at Valladolid. He afterwards went to Rome, where he filled the theological chair for 20 years, with great popularity, and was in 1643 made a cardinal by pope Urban VIII. This honor he was willing to decline; he regarded the coach sent for him as his coffin, and consented at last in submission to the pope's commands. In this new dignity, he did not display the pomp or pride of a cardinal, he was meek in his conduct, and charitable in the highest degree. He died at Rome 20th Aug. 1660, and was buried at the feet of Loyola the founder of his order. He was the first who introduced bark into general use in France, in 1650. He was not only an able divine, but an expert philosopher and mathematician. His works are on theological subjects, and fill up 7 vols. folio.

LUGO, Francis, elder brother to the preceding, was born at Madrid 1580, and became a jesuit at Salamanca, 1600. He went as missionary to the Indies, and was promoted to the divinity chair at Mexico, and Santa Fe. He returned to Spain, and was afterwards employed on ecclesiastical affairs at Rome. He was made rector of two colleges in Spain, and died 1652. He wrote commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, 2 vols. folio. — On the Sacraments, &c.

LUISINO, or LUISINI, Francis, an eminent scholar of Udine in the Venetian states. He taught Greek and Latin at Reggio, and was afterwards secretary to the duke of Parma, and died 1568, aged 45. He wrote Illustrations of Obscure Passages in Ancient Authors, found also in Gruter's Fax Artium — a Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry — a treatise de Compendis Animi Affectibus, 8vo.

LUISINUS, Aloysius, a Venetian physician, who published "de Morbo Gallico," &c. 1566, republished by Boerhaave, 1728, folio. — the Aphorisms of Hippocrates in Latin verse, 8vo.

LUITPRAND, a king of Lombardy after his father Ansprand 712. He is known for his conquests in Italy, and for the code of laws which he digested for his kingdom. He died 744.

LUITPRANDUS, a Lombard historian, born at Pavia. He was bred up at the court of the Italian kings, and was in 948 sent by Berengarius II. as ambassador to Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He was afterwards disgraced by his master, and fled to the emperor Otho, who avenged his cause by dethroning Berengarius, and making him bishop of Cremona. In 968 he went again as ambassador to Constantinople from Otho, but he was rudely treated by Nicephorus Phocas the emperor of the East, and thrown into prison because he defended the right of his master to the title of emperor of the West. The time of his death is unknown. He wrote, in a harsh but vehement style, the History of his own Times, in six books, printed Antwerp, fol. 1640. a valuable work, found among Muratori's Rerum Italicarum Scriptores.

LUKE, St. the evangelist, was a physician of Antioch in Syria, converted to the christian faith by Paul, of whom he afterwards became the faithful associate. Besides his gospel which is composed in very pure language, he wrote the Acts of the Apostles. He lived according to Jerome to his 83d year. Some have called him false-ly a painter.

LULLE, Raymond, a learned native of Majorca, called, on account of his great abilities, Doctor Illuminatus. After excelling as a divine he applied himself to physic and chemistry that he might be enabled to cure the cancer of a young woman, of whom he was enamoured. He afterwards went as a missionary to Mauritania where the barbarian natives stoned him to death, March, 1315, at the age of 80. His remains were brought back to Majorca, where he was regarded as a martyr. His works on theology, history, medicine, law, philosophy, were collected together and lately published at Mentz, but they are very obscure, and in a barbarous style.

LULLI, John Baptist, an eminent musician, born at Florence 1634. At the age of 10 he became page to Mad. de Montpensier, niece to Lewis XIV. but from the meanness of his appearance, he was removed to be under scullion in the kitchen. His fondness for music, however, soon distinguished him, he received instructions tions from a master, and was soon so great a proficient on the violin that the king noticed him and made him superintendant of music in the royal chamber. He became now eminent as a composer, and was employed, on the recovery of Lewis, from his indisposition, to compose a Te Deum, which in the performance proved fatal to him, as he struck the end of his foot, and thus produced a gangrene, of which he died 22d March, 1687. He is deservedly esteemed as the master who brought French music to perfection. His great operas, in five acts, such as Cadmus, Alceste, Theseus, Psyche, &c. are highly admired, as well as his pastorals, ballets, &c. He composed also the music for Moliere's plays, and was in his private character a witty and facetious companion.

LUMLEY, Joanna lady, eldest daughter of Henry Fitz-Allan, earl Arundel, married John lord Lumley. She was very learned and translated into Latin, from the Greek, three of the orations of Isocrates, of which the MS. is still preserved in Westminster library. She also translated into English Euripides' Iphigenia, and died 1620 about 11 years after her husband.

LUNEAU DE BOISJERMAIN, Peter Joseph Francis, a voluminous French writer, who died suddenly at the end of 1802. He wrote a course of History and Geography, 2 vols. 12mo. — True Principles of Reading and Orthography, 4 vols. 8vo. — Course of the Italian Language — Course of the English Language, 2 vols. 8vo. — Racine's Works, edited 7 vols. 8vo. — Musical Almanac, &c.

LUSIGNAN, Guy, a celebrated French warrior, during the crusades. He espoused, in the Holy Land, Sibylla, daughter of Amaury king of Jerusalem, whom he succeeded in the kingdom. He afterwards resigned his regal honors to Richard I. of England, and assumed in return the title of king of Cyprus. He died 1194.

LUSSAN, Margaret de, a female writer, born 1682. Her father was coachman to cardinal Fleury. Her abilities were early seen and improved by bishop Huet, and she in consequence excelled as a writer of history and of romances. She wrote for her support, and therefore wrote much, yet though often in want, her character was charitable, virtuous and benevolent. She died 1758, aged 75. Her works are very numerous. The best known are Anecdotes of the Court of Philip Augustus, 6 vols. 12mo. — les Veillées de la Thessalie, 4 vols. &c.

LUTHER, Martin, the celebrated reformer, was born at Isleben in Saxony, 10th Nov. 1483. Though but the son of a miner he rose from obscurity, and received a good education at Magdeburg, and at Eysenach in Thuringia, which he quitted in 1501, for the university of Erfurt, where he studied logic and philosophy, and paid particular attention to the writings of Cicero, Virgil, Livy, and other illustrious classics. His parents wished him to devote himself to the labors of the bar, but an extraordinary accident diverted his purpose. As he walked one day in the fields with a fellow student he was struck down by lightning, and his companion killed by his side, and this had such effect upon his mind that without consulting his friends he retired from the world, into the order of the Augustines. In this seclusion he found by accident a Latin bible, which he never before had seen, and in perusing it he was astonished at the little knowledge of scripture and of christianity which the clergy then imparted to the people. From the convent of Erfurt he was removed to Wittenberg university, just founded by Frederic the elector of Saxony, and here he read lectures on philosophy for three years to numerous and applauding audiences. In 1512, he went to Rome to settle some disputes which seven convents of his order had with their vicar general, and on his return he was created D. D. at the request of the elector of Saxony. Employed as professor of divinity he explained with clearness and ease the psalms and the epistles to the Romans, and supported his celebrity by the most rigid morality, and the most exemplary conduct. The completion of St. Peter's church at Rome at this time required extraordinary sums, and the pope, Leo X. to fill his coffers with greater facility, published general indulgences for the forgiveness of sins to such as would contribute to the pious work. The Dominicans were entrusted with the selling of these indulgences in Germany, and in paying their money the good friar Tetzel informed the superstitious people that they might release themselves not only from past, but also future sins. This pious imposition did not escape the discerning eye of Luther, he published in 1517 a thesis, containing 95 propositions on indulgences, and challenged opposition. Tetzel was not silent on the occasion, but while he with the voice of authority called his opponent a damnable heretic, and whilst he burnt the thesis with all possible ignominy, Luther asserted boldly the inefficacy of indulgences, and regarded penitence and works of mercy and charity alone capable of forming a reconciliation with heaven. This seemingly trifling dispute between two obscure monks led to great events, and created a revolution in the religious opinions of mankind. Though attacked by numbers, Luther had the satisfaction to see his sentiments embraced with eagerness by the body of the people; and when summoned by the pope to appear at Rome to answer for his conduct, he had the firmness to refuse, though he at the same time in the most submissive manner exculpated himself, and deprecated the resentment of the supreme pontiff. Maximilian the emperor was anxious to support the cause of Rome, but Luther happily found a protector and a friend in the elector of Saxony, and upon an assurance of personal safety he did not refuse to appear at Augsburg before the papal legate Cajetan. Here, when exhorted in three propositions to retract his errors, and to submit to the authority of the pope, he declared that he was not guilty of any errors, and that while he paid deference to the head of the church, he yet asserted that he had advanced nothing which was contrary to the scriptures, or to the doctrines of the fathers. The conference thus ended by the refusal of Luther to submit implicitly to the pleasure of the papal see; but when the pope in a brief declared himself as the vicar of Christ, authorized to forgive sins by the power of indulgences, and that whosoever opposed this doctrine was excommunicated as a heretic, the reformer published an appeal from the prejudiced pontiff to a general council. The pope, however, finding finding that violence could not destroy the obstinacy of Luther, had recourse to milder means, and his agent Miltitius was employed to visit the reformer to argue with him, and to offer terms of reconciliation. Luther was struck with the civilities and the temper of the papal missionary, but instead of making submission he was roused to greater opposition by the exhortations of the Bohemians, and the able support of Melancthon, Carlostadius, and other learned men. In 1519 he was engaged in a personal controversy at Leipsic with Eccius, divinity professor at Ingolstadt, but it tended only to sow greater enmity and deeper variance between the disputants. The same year his book against indulgences was censured by the divines of Louvain and Cologne, but Luther disregarded their opinions, and appealed for protection to the new emperor Charles V. Though he had written, at the suggestion of Miltitius a letter to the pope, not indeed of submission, but rather of exculpation, in language bold and energetic, he was in 1520 formally condemned by a bull from Rome, which after enumerating 41 of his heretical opinions, denounces against him the vengeance of the church, and excommunication, if within sixty days he did not make a due submission. This violent conduct Luther answered by "the captivity of Babylon," a book in which he inveighed bitterly against the abuses of Rome, and then calling the students of Wittemberg together he flung into the fire the offensive decree which he called the execrable bull of antichrist. In 1521 he was summoned to appear before the emperor at the diet of Worms, with a promise of protection, and though his friends dissuaded him and told him that as his opponents had burned his writings, so they would treat him, after the manner of Huss, he declared with fearless voice, If I knew there were as many devils at Worms, as tiles on the houses, I would go. At Worms he was required by Eccius to retract his opinions, but he declared that except what he advanced could be proved contrary to scripture he neither could nor would recant. His obstinacy proved offensive to the emperor, but as he had promised him his protection he permitted him to depart. On his return to Wittemberg, however, the reformer was attacked in a wood by a number of horsemen and violently taken away, and what became of him remained unknown to the public. In the mean time Charles published his edict against him, and his adherents, and placed him under the ban of the empire. Luther, however, remained secure under the protection of the elector, who had thus effected his deliverance, and in the castle of Wittemberg which he denominated his hermitage and his Patmos, he held a secret correspondence with his friend, or composed books in defence of his opinions. At the end of 10 months, when the emperor was departed for Flanders he again appeared publicly at Wittemberg, and had the satisfaction to find that instead of being checked, his doctrines had gained ground, and were universally embraced through Germany. He next attacked Henry VIII. who had defended the seven sacraments, and he treated his book and his person with such contempt, that the monarch complained of it to the princes of Germany. In 1522 he published in conjunction with Melancthon, a Latin translation of the New Testament, and the work was read with avidity by the German nation. In 1524 he had to contend with Erasmus, a man who had apparently adopted his sentiments, though he had not the manliness to acknowledge them, and he now found in him an able antagonist enlisted in defence of the pope. The subject of their dispute was free will, and it is to be lamented that it was attended with great asperity of language, between men who respected and admired each other. In 1524 Luther threw aside the monastic habit, and the next year he married Catherine de Bore, a nun who had escaped from a convent, and though he was ridiculed by his enemies, and censured as incontinent for taking a young wife of 26, when he himself had reached his 42d year, he defended his conduct by scriptural texts, and again set at nought the authority of Rome and the cavils of her advocates. In 1525 the emperor called a diet at Spire, in consequence of the war with the Turks, as well as the troubled state of Germany in consequence of religious disputes, and in the sitting of the next year he proposed that the edict of Worms should be duly enforced, the catholic religion supported, and heretics punished. The new doctrines though thus openly attacked by the head of the empire were ably defended by the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, the prince of Anhalt, and others; and in another diet held again at Spire, these dissentient princes protested against the measures of the empire, and were consequently called Protestants. This celebrated union, published 19th April, 1529, was joined by 14 cities, Strasburg, Ulm, Constance, Nuremberg, Retlingen, &c. In the midst of the confusion of Germany, a confession of faith was drawn up by Melancthon, the mildest and most moderate of Luther's followers, and as it was presented to the emperor at Augsburg, it has been called the Augsburg confession. Thus the opposition raised against the mighty empire of spiritual Rome by an obscure monk, was supported by intelligent princes and powerful nations, and Luther now regarded as the champion of the faith through Germany, had nothing to apprehend from his persecutors, but had only to labor earnestly to confirm what had been so happily established. His German translation of the bible appeared in 1535, and was received with grateful raptures by the Germans. In 1537 he and Melancthon were present at the assembly held at Smalkald on religious matters, and it was here that he was attacked with a severe disorder and a stoppage of urine, which seemed for 11 days to threaten his life; but by travelling he recovered. He was again attacked in 1546, as he was visiting his native country, where he was received with much honor, and he died at Isleben, 18th Feb. 1546, aged 63, and his body, which his friends wished to deposit in his native town, was conveyed by order of the elector of Saxony to Wittemberg, and interred with great ceremony. This illustrious man, engaged, as Atterbury has observed, against the united forces of the papal world, stood the shock with bravery and success. He was a man of high endowments of mind, and great virtues, he had a vast understanding, which raised him to a pitch of learning unknown in the age in which he lived. His knowledge of scripture was admirable, his elocution manly, manly, and his way of reasoning was argumentative, powerful and convincing. He had no ambition but in the service of God; he was of a temper averse to covetousness, or any base sin, and charitable even to a fault. When religion was concerned, he regarded not whose love or hatred he incurred. He treated the pope's bulls and the emperor's edicts with equal harshness, and while he labored to restore religion to its original purity, he spared neither friends nor foes. His works collected after his death appeared at Wittemberg, in 7 vols. fol. By his wife who survived him till 20th Dec. 1552, and was buried at Torgau, he had three sons, whose descendants are still respected in Germany.

LUTTI, Benedetto, an Italian painter, born at Florence 1666. He studied at Rome, and acquired such celebrity that the emperor knighted him, and the elector of Mentz sent him a cross set with diamonds. He was slow in his work, but his touch was tender and delicate, and his pieces exhibited harmony and correctness in the highest degree. The best of his paintings is his miracle of St. Pio, in the Albani palace at Rome. His Magdalen, at Naples, his Isaiah, and his Anthony of Padua, at Rome, are also much admired. He died at Rome 1724, aged 58, of chagrin, in consequence of a dispute about finishing a picture of Eusebius bishop of Vercelli, for the people of Turin.

LUXEMBOURG, Francis Henry de Montmorency duke of, a famous general and marshal of France, the posthumous son of Montmorency count of Bouteville, who was beheaded for fighting a duel, under Lewis XIII. He was, though but 15, at the battle of Rocroi, 1643, under the famous Condé whose fortunes he followed, and whose genius, abilities, coolness and ardor he seemed to possess. He distinguished himself at the conquest of Franche Comté, 1668, and in the Dutch campaigns of 1672, and completed the expedition by a bold and unprecedented retreat with 20,000 men, in face of an army of 70,000. In 1675 he was raised to the dignity of marshal, and in the war against the allied powers, again rendered his name illustrious by the battle of Fleurus, over prince Waldeck, 1690. In 1691 he gained the battles of Leufen, Steinkirk and Nerwinde, and continued to distinguish himself in the field though opposed by William III. He performed another famous retreat to Tournay, 1694, and died the next year, aged 67.

LUYKEN, John, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam. His plates illustrative of the scriptures, and a theatre of martyrs are among the rest of his works particularly admired. He died 1712, aged 63.

LUYTS, John, a native of North Holland, professor of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht, where he died 1721, aged 66. His works are Astronomia Institutio, 4to. in which he refused to admit the Copernican System—Introductio ad Geographiam Novam & Veterem, 4to.

LYCOPHRON, son of Periander of Corinth, B. C. 628, resented the fate of his mother Melissa, who had been cruelly put to death by his father, and he refused to speak to him. The father afterwards wished to be reconciled to his son, whom he had banished into Corcyra, and offered to resign his crown to him; but the Corcyreans afraid of changing masters murdered the young prince.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek poet of Chalcis in Eubœa, author of Alexandra, a very obscure poem which has been rendered more intelligible by the learned notes of Tzetzes. Lycophron was slain by an arrow, B. C. 304.

LYCURGUS, a celebrated lawgiver of Sparta. He refused to take possession of the kingdom, at the invitation of his sister-in-law, and preferred the character of a faithful guardian to his nephew the young king. During the popular tumults which agitated his country where the monarchs and the people each aspired to unlimited power, he was called upon by the general voice to establish a system of laws to restrain the violence of each order of the state. After the institution of his salutary but severe laws, Lycurgus retired from Sparta, and is supposed to have died in Crete in a good old age, B. C. 870.

LUCURGUS, an Athenian orator, B. C. 408. He studied under Plato and Isocrates, and was the friend of Demosthenes. One of his orations is preserved.

LYDE, Vid. JOINER.

LYDGATE, John, an Augustine monk of St. Edmund's-bury, Suffolk, in the reign of Henry VI. He was the disciple of Chaucer, whom he excelled, according to some, in the graces of versification. He travelled abroad, and died 1440, aged 60, and was buried in his convent, Bury. He was also a philosopher and divine; but he is chiefly known as a poet, and his eclogues, odes, satires, &c. are said to possess merit, and to have been written in such smooth style that his wit as his contemporaries observed, was fashioned by the muses.

LYDIAT, Thomas, an English chronologer, born at Okerton, Oxfordshire, 1572, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow, 1591. He devoted himself early to literature, and was cosmographer and chronologer to Henry, son of James I.; and, in 1609, went to Ireland, and was two years at the college of Dublin, under the patronage of Usher. On his return to England, he accepted, in 1612, the rectory of Okerton, which some years before he had refused in consequence of his difficulty of utterance. His engagement to pay the debts of a near relation brought him afterwards into great difficulties, and he was for some time imprisoned at Oxford, and in the king's bench, till liberated by the contributions of his friends. He petitioned the king to be permitted to travel into Turkey, Ethiopia, and Abyssinia, in search of MSS. but was unsuccessful; and in the civil wars which desolated the country, he was a severe sufferer for his loyalty. He died very poor, 3d April, 1646, and was buried in his church, Okerton. He was an able scholar and deservedly esteemed by the learned of the times, Usher, Newton, Briggs, Turner, &c. He wrote de Variis Annorum Formis, 1605, 8vo. which he afterwards defended against Scaliger and Clavius—On the Origin of Fountains, 8vo.—Various treatises on philosophical and astronomical subjects, &c.

LYE, Edward, a learned linguist, born at Totness, Devonshire, 1704, and educated under his father, and afterwards at Hart-hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. A. 1732. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, and published the Etymologicum Angli-

Anglicanum of Francis Junius from the MS. in the Bodleian. He afterwards employed himself in the compilation of his great work, the Anglo Saxon and Gothic Dictionary, which received the finishing hand of its author before his death; but was published in 1772, by the Rev. Owen Manning, 2 vols. folio, with a grammar of the two languages. Lye was in 1750, presented by lord Northampton, to the living of Yardley Hastings, where he died 1767.

LYLLY, or LILLY, John, Vid. LILLY.

LYNDE, fr Humphrey, an English writer, born in Dorsetshire 1579. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford. In 1613 he was knighted by James I. and was member of the house of commons in several parliaments. He died 14th June, 1636, and was buried in Cobham church, Surrey. He wrote various books against popery, the best known of which is "Via Tuta," often reprinted, and translated into Dutch, French and Latin.

LYONNET, Peter, a native of Maestricht, born 22d July, 1707. He possessed great abilities and was not only acquainted with nine languages, but well skilled in music, in painting, in sculpture and engraving. He quitted the study of divinity for the law, and was appointed secretary to the States of Holland, and also interpreter for the French and Latin languages. He afterwards turned his attention to natural history, and examined the insects in the neighbourhood of the Hague, and made a collection of curious shells. His abilities and reputation procured him admission to the learned academies of London, Rouen, Berlin, Vienna, Petersburg, &c. After a life devoted to science, this learned man, equally respectable in private life, died at the Hague 10th Jan. 1789, aged 81. He wrote Observations on Insects — Theologie des Insectes, &c.

LYONS, Israel, son of a Polish Jew, who was a silversmith, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge, was born at Cambridge 1739. He early displayed great abilities, and distinguished himself as a mathematician and botanist. In 1758 he published a treatise on Fluxions, inscribed to his friend and patron, Dr. Smith, master of Trinity college, and in 1763, appeared his Fasciculus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam Nascentium, 8vo. About 1762 he read lectures on botany, at Oxford, at the request of Mr. Banks, and afterwards received a salary of 100l. per ann. for calculating the Nautical almanack. In 1773 he was sent by the board of longitude with captain Phipps, now lord Mulgrave, to the north pole, and after his return he married, but died about 1775, of the measles. His father was the author of a Hebrew Grammar — and of Observations and Enquiries on Various Parts of Scripture History, 1761.

LYSANDER, a famous Spartan general, who made an alliance with Cyrus the younger, and defeated the Athenian fleet at the battle of Ægospotamos, which put an end to the Peloponnesian war, after a duration of 27 years. He aimed at the sovereignty at home and became unpopular. He fell in battle at Haliartus, B. C. 396.

LYSERUS, Polycarp, an able theologian, born at Winendeen in Wittenberg, 1552. He was educated at Tubingen, and became minister of Wittenberg 1577. He died minister of Dresden 1601. He is author of several learned Commentaries on the Scriptures, &c.

LYSERUS, John, a protestant divine of the same family as the preceding. He was a man of great learning, but deformed in his person, thin and pale. He wrote some books under fictitious names, and was famous for his works in defence of polygamy. He died at Paris 1684.

LYSIAS, an Athenian orator, known for his eloquence and integrity. He died B. C. 378, aged 81. Of his orations 34 are extant, best edited by Taylor, 8vo. 1740.

LYSIMACHUS, one of Alexander's generals, who after his master's death obtained Thrace, and afterwards Macedonia. He was killed in battle by Seleucus, 281 B. C.

LYSIPPUS, a Grecian sculptor of Sicyon, who alone had the privilege of making a statue of Alexander. His best piece was the representation of a man wiping himself after bathing.

LYSIS, a Pythagorean philosopher, the master of Epaminondas. The golden verses of Pythagoras are attributed to him, B. C. 388.

LYSONS, Daniel, gentleman commoner of Magdalen college, Oxford, became fellow of All-Souls, and took his degree of LL. B. 1755, and that of doctor four years after. He afterwards studied medicine and took his doctor's degree 1764. He settled at Gloucester, and afterwards went to Bath, where he acquired considerable eminence and where he died 1800. He was author of an Essay on the Effects of Camphire and Calomel in Fevers, 8vo. — Practical Essays on Intermitting Fevers, Dropsies, Diseases of the Liver, Epilepsies, Cholice, Dysenteric Fluxes, and the Operation of Calomel, 8vo. — Further Considerations on Camphire and Calomel, 8vo. &c.

LYTE, Henry, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oxford. He travelled abroad to improve his knowledge of botany, and at his return he settled on his estate and established one of the most valuable and best arranged gardens of botany in England. He was author of a translation of Dodoen's Herbage, Antwerp, 4to. 1578, with additions and figures, afterwards reprinted in England, but without plates. He died 1607, aged 78. His son formed a genealogy for James I. with which the king was so pleased that he presented him his picture in gold set with diamonds.

LYTTELTON, Edward, keeper of the great seal under Charles I. was the descendant of judge Littleton, by a collateral branch. Vid. LITTLETON.

LYTTELTON George lord, an able writer, eldest son of sir Thomas Lyttelton, of Hagley, Worcestershire, was born 1699. He was educated at Eton and Christ-church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself as a polite scholar, and a good poet. In 1728 he began his travels, and visited Italy and France. On his return home he obtained a seat in parliament, and became a popular opponent of sir Robert Walpole. In 1737 he was made secretary to the prince of Wales, who now extended his patronage to opposition, and by his means the heir apparent acquired popularity in his protection of Pope, Mallet, Thomson, and other learned men. In 1741 he married Lucy, sister of lord Fortescue, rescue, whom after a few years of connubial felicity, he lost in child bed 1747. He lamented her loss in a pathetic "Monody," and in 1749 fought again the happiness which he had lost, but it is said unsuccessfully, by marrying the daughter of sir Robert Rich. In 1744, on the fall of Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the treasury, in 1754 was appointed cofferer and privy counsellor, and the next year chancellor of the exchequer, a responsible situation for which his abilities were not fully calculated. In 1757, when his friends were turned out of power, he was raised to the peerage, and thus retired from political turbulence. In his honorable retirement his time was usefully employed. In 1764, he published his elaborate History of Henry II. which had engaged his attention for 20 years. The work came from the press with the character of great accuracy, so that the whole was printed twice, some of the sheets four or five times, and for this affectation of correctness his lordship lost above 1000*l.* as the printer paid only for the first impression which was destroyed. The work was begun 1755; 3 vols. appeared 1764, a second edition 1767, a third next year, and the conclusion 1771. When the third edition appeared, Reid, who corrected and printed the first, was dead, and his place was so ill supplied by Dr. Saunders, originally a comb maker, that a list of errata of 19 pages was annexed to the work. Lyttelton in the former part of life had been a sceptic, but his mature age viewed with concern the levities and dangerous tenets of dissolute companions, and after a studious application, he produced, in 1747, Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul, a valuable book, which infidelity will never be able to answer. His father whom he succeeded in 1751, read the book, and in the overflowings of a pious heart called down for blessings on his head, and thanking God that he had given him so good a son, prayed that he might but be found worthy to be eye witness of that happiness no doubt reserved for so able an advocate for christianity. His lordship died Aug. 22d, 1773, aged 64. On his death bed he displayed all the calmness and resignation of a great mind. He again reminded his physician, Dr. Johnson, that he died a sincere christian, and with composure giving his blessings to those around him, he told lord Valentia, who with his lady was at his bedside, with a voice of solemn affection, "be good, be virtuous, my lord, you must come to this." He was buried at Hagley by the remains of his lady. This great and worthy peer wrote besides, "Dialogues of the Dead," — Persian Letters — poems, &c. By his first wife he had a son and two daughters.

LYTTELTON, Thomas lord, son of the preceding, was remarkable for his dissipated conduct which unhappily obscured his great powers of mind. His death, which happened in 1779, when he was 35 years old, is said to have been very extraordinary. He supposed that he saw in a dream a vision of a young woman dressed in white, who told him that his dissolution would take place in three days. The third day arrived, and his lordship engaged in a convivial party of friends, observed jocularly that he thought he should jockey the ghost, a few minutes after which he was seized with a sudden faintness, and being removed to his bed, never rose again.

LYTTELTON, Charles, an English prelate, third son of sir Thomas, and brother to George lord Lyttelton. He was educated at Eton, and University college, and afterwards went to the Inner Temple, where he became a barrister. He soon, however, relinquished law for divinity, and was collated to Alvechurch rectory, Worcesterhire, by bishop Hough. In 1745 he took the degree of LL. D. in 1747 became king's chaplain, the next year dean of Exeter, and in 1762 he was raised to the see of Carlisle. In 1765 he succeeded lord Willoughby of Parham as president of the Antiquarian society, to whose learned memoirs he made some valuable contributions, and whose useful labors in historical research he in some degree rewarded by the bequest of choice printed books and of MSS. This good man much respected in private life, and deservedly praised by his learned successor dean Milles, died unmarried 22d Dec. 1768.

MAAS, Dirk, a Dutch painter whose battles and landscapes were much admired. He was born at Haerlem, 1656.

MAAS, Arnold, a Dutch painter whose abilities were displayed in the happiest representation of conversations.

MAAS, Nicholas, a Dutch portrait painter of eminence, who died 1693, aged 61.

MABILLON, John, a learned Frenchman, born 23d Nov. 1632, at Pierre-mont on the frontiers of Champagne. He was educated at Rheims, and took the Benedictine habit at St. Remi 1653. He was for one year employed in showing to the public the treasures and the monuments of the king of France at St. Denis, and afterwards assisted father d'Acheri, in the completion of his "Spicilegium." He next was engaged by the congregation of St. Maur in publishing the works of St. Bernard which appeared in 1667, 2 vols. fol. and nine 8vo. and afterwards he undertook an edition of the "Acta Sanctorum" of the Benedictine order, 9 vols. folio, a work which displayed great merit in learned notes and valuable disquisitions. In 1682 he went, by the direction of Colbert, into Burgundy, and the year following to Germany, to make researches about the history of the church, and of the French monarchy.

monarchy. Of this employment he published an interesting account. In 1685 he visited Italy in the same historical research, and enriched the king's library with above 3000 valuable and rare books, printed and in MS. This truly learned but very modest man, to whom, says Du Pin, it would be difficult to give all the praises he deserves, died Dec. 1707, of a suppression of urine. His other works were Analecta, 4 vols. 8vo. — de Re Diplomatica, 2 vols. folio. a most valuable work — Musæum Italicum, 2 vols. 4to.

MABLY, Bonnot de, a French ecclesiastic, born 1709 at Grenoble. He lived chiefly at Paris where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He died 1785 much respected. He wrote a Parallel between the Romans and the French, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Public Rights of Europe, 2 vols. — Entertainments of Phocion, &c. 2 vols. a work which obtained a prize at Berne — Observations on the Greeks — on the Romans — on the History of France, &c. — Discourses on History, translated into English.

MABOUL, James, a native of Paris, who distinguished himself as an eloquent preacher, and on account of his merit, was raised to the see of Aeth, where he died 21st May, 1723. His Oraisons Funebres have been published in 12mo. and display his powers of oratory to great advantage.

MABUSE, John, a Hungarian painter, so called from the place of his birth. He travelled into Italy, and died 1562. He was in the latter part of life much addicted to wine. Some of his pictures are preserved at Amsterdam, the best of which is said to be the decapitation of St. John.

MAC ARDELL, James, an English mezzotinto engraver. His portraits exhibit great correctness, ease, and expression. He also executed some fine prints after Rembrandt, and other masters, and died 1765.

MACARIUS, St. the elder, a native of Alexandria, who from a baker became a hermit, and passed sixty years of his life in a monastery on mount Sceta. He died 391. Fifty of his homilies in Greek were published 2 vols. 8vo. Leipzig, 1698.

MACARIUS, St. the younger, a friend of the former, born also at Alexandria. He presided over 5000 monks, and died 394. He was banished by the Arians to a heathen island, all whose inhabitants he converted to christianity.

MACARTNEY, George, earl, only son of George Macartney, of Auchinleck, in Scotland, was born in Ireland, 1737. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, where he took the degree of M. A. 1759, and afterwards he attended the two sons of the late lord Holland, in their European travels. He went in 1764 as envoy extraordinary to the empress of Russia, and three years after he was named ambassador extraordinary, and in 1766 he was made knight of the white eagle, by the king of Poland. In 1769 he was secretary to lord Townshend, in Ireland, in 1772 he was made knight of the bath, and three years after appointed governor of Grenada, Tobago, and their dependencies. On the capture of those islands by the French, in 1779, he was taken prisoner, and conveyed to France; but the next year he was nominated governor of fort St. George, and in 1785, declared governor general of Bengal, a high office, which he modestly declined, though he accepted from the company, a pension of 1500l. per annum, in reward for his meritorious services. In 1792 he was selected as the ambassador extraordinary of Great Britain to the emperor of China, and this mission, which engaged much of the attention of the world, was completed in about three years, but brought little advantage to the commercial interests of the country. Sir George sat in the English parliament in 1767, for Cockermouth, and in the Irish for Armagh, and again in the English for Ayr, &c. 1774, and in 1776 he was created an Irish baron, and in 1792 advanced to the dignity of an earl. He married in 1768, lord Bute's daughter, and died 31st March, 1806, leaving no issue. His remains were interred privately, at Chiswick, and a cenotaph, with an elegant Latin epitaph, by the pen of Mr. Glasse, perpetuates his memory in Liffanoure church, in the county of Leitrim. An interesting account of his embassy was published in 1797, in 3 vols. 4to. with plates, by sir George Staunton. For the distinction which he held in the world, lord Macartney was principally indebted to his connection with the family of lord Holland, though it must be acknowledged that he possessed virtues which qualified him for the most eminent situation in the service of his country.

MACAULAY, Catherine, a female historian, and political writer, daughter of John Sawbridge, esq. of Ollantigh, in Kent. In 1760 she married Dr. George Macaulay, a physician of some reputation, and after his death she took for her second husband 1778, the Rev. Mr. Graham, brother to the celebrated empiric of that name. Her conduct was often romantic, so that in 1785 she passed over to America, to become acquainted with the great Washington, who continued one of her regular correspondents. She died 23d June, 1791. She published the History of England from James I. to the Brunswick line, 8 vols. 8vo. once a popular work, but now acknowledged a virulent attack on the Stuarts, and sinking fast into oblivion. — Remarks on Hobbes' Rudiments of Government, &c. 8vo. — Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discontents, 1770. — a Modest Plea for the Property of Copy Right, 8vo. 1774. — History of England from the Revolution, to the present Time, in a series of letters to Dr. Wilson, prebendary of Westminster, 8vo. — Address to the People of England — Letters on Education, 8vo. — Observations on Mr. Burke's Pamphlet on the French Revolution — a treatise on the Immutability of Moral Truth, 8vo. &c. Her friend Dr. Wilson so much admired her enthusiasm in favor of liberty, that he set up a statue to her in that character, in the chancel of his parish church of Walbrook, which unbecoming mark of homage was properly removed by the next incumbent.

MACBETH, a tyrannical usurper of Scotland in the 11th century, who obtained the kingdom by the murder of his relation Duncan at Inverness. Banquo and Mac Gill shared the fate of their sovereign, and Mac Duff, another powerful baron, escaped only by flying into England; but his wife and his children suffered all the vengeance of the tyrant, and were murdered. Macbeth afterwards retired into the Highlands, upon the invasion of the English, headed by Malcolm, son of the murdered Duncan, and at last fell in battle by the hand of Mac Duff. His history is become very familiar and interesting to Englishmen by the sublime delineations of Shakespeare's tragic muse.

MACBRIDE, David, a native of Ballymony, in Ireland, descended from an ancient Scotch family. He studied medicine at Glasgow, and for some years was employed as a surgeon in the navy. He settled in 1749, in Dublin, and acquired celebrity as a practitioner, and as a man of letters, and of general information. He turned his thoughts also to chemical and philosophical subjects, and regardless of private emolument, he nobly communicated to the public the result of his important discoveries. He published a valuable Treatise on the Sea Scurvy; and a Methodical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine, a work of singular merit; and he made some ingenious improvements in the mode of tanning leather. This respectable man, amiable in his private character, and deservedly beloved by his relatives and friends, fell a prey to a nervous fever, which proved fatal, Dec. 1788, in his 62d year.

MACCABEES, seven brothers, Jews, who were cruelly put to death one after the other, with their mother and the aged Eleazar, at Antioch, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, B. C. 168. There were chief men among the Jews of the same name who bravely supported the honor of their country. Their names were Judas, Simon, Matthias Maccabæus.

MACE, Francis, a writer of the Sorbonne, who died at Paris 1721. His best works are Chronological Abridgment of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. 4to. — a Moral History, called Melania — the History of the four Ciceros, 12mo. a curious work — an Analysis of St. Augustine's works.

MACE, Thomas, an English musician, born 1613. He was one of the clerks of Trinity college, Cambridge, and is known by his work called "Music's Monument" or a Remembrancer of the best practical Music, &c. The book was printed 1676, when he was 63. The time of his death is unknown. He had a wife and children.

MACEO, Francis, a jesuit born at Coimbra, in Portugal, 1596. He quitted his order for that of the Cordeliers, and went in the employment of his patron, the duke of Braganza, to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Alexander VII. After being promoted to offices of trust and importance he fell out with the pope and retired to Venice, and afterwards became professor of moral philosophy at Padua. By his interference in the state affairs of Venice, he offended the magistrates, and was thrown into prison, where he died 1681, aged 85. It is said in the "Bibliothèque Portugaise" that he published 109 different works, most of which are now forgotten. He possessed abilities and a very great memory, as he boasts some where that he had written or pronounced 150,000 verses extemporaneously. His brother Anthony was also a jesuit, in the confidence of Christina queen of Sweden, as to him were entrusted her intentions of renouncing the protestant faith. Among other things he wrote Lusitania Insulata & Purpurata, 4to.

MACEDONIUS, Arian, bishop of Constantinople in 341, in opposition to Paul. He was deposed by a council 359, after causing great troubles in his diocese by his ambition as well as his opinions. In consequence of his disgrace he became the founder of a new sect which supported that the Holy Ghost was a mere creature, only a little superior to the angels.

MACER, Æmilius a Latin poet of Verona in the age of Augustus. He wrote poems on birds, herbs, serpents — on the Ruin of Troy, &c. now lost.

MACER, Lucius Claudius, a proprætor of Africa, who declared himself emperor on Nero's death. He was put to death by Galba's order, A. D. 68.

MACFARLANE, Henry, a Scotch writer, educated at Edinburgh. He came to London early in life, and acquired some celebrity as an accurate reporter of the parliamentary speeches. He was afterwards engaged in the care of a school at Walthamstow, and died 1804. He wrote a History of the Reign of George III. in 4 vols. 8vo. and also published a Translation of Ossian's Poems into Latin.

MACHAM, Robert, an Englishman, in the age of Edward III. It is said that he eloped for France with his mistress Anne Dorset, a lady of quality, against the consent of her parents, and that the ship in which they were, long driven out by unfavorable winds, stopped at an island, which was called Madeira. The crew escaped to the coast of Morrocco, where in a state of slavery they related their adventures to Morales, a Spaniard, and after his return to Europe, ships were sent to the newly discovered island, where the remains of the unfortunate Macham and his mistress were found buried at the foot of a tree.

MACHAULT, John de, a jesuit, rector of the jesuits' college, at Rouen, and afterwards of that of Clermont at Paris. He died 1619, aged 58. He wrote Latin notes on the History of Thuanus, which were pronounced seditious, and burned by the hands of the hangman. Two other jesuits bore his name, and were able writers, John Baptist, who died 1640, and James, who died 1680, and was author of de Missionibus Paraguaviæ & Americæ. &c. — de Rebus Japonicis — de Provinciis Goannæ — de Regno Cochinchinæ — de Missionibus Religioforum, &c.

MACHET, Gerard, a native of Blois, distinguished as an ecclesiastic. He became principal of the college of Navarre, confessor to Charles VII. and bishop of Castres. He died at Tours 1448, aged 68. He was one of those who revised the trial of the maid of Orleans, and declared in favor of that unfortunate heroine.

MACHIAVEL, Nicholas, a celebrated writer, born of a noble family at Florence 1469. His first efforts were a comedy called Nicias, which proved so popular on account of its satire at Florence, that Leo X. sent for the actors to exhibit it to a Roman audience. Machiavel acquired, however, greater fame by his political writings. By the influence of the Medicis, and to recompence the sufferings which he endured on the rack on suspicion of conspiracy with the Soderini, against Julius, afterwards Clement VII. he was made secretary and historiographer to the republic of Florence. He died in 1530, of a medicine which he had taken by way of prevention. The latter part of his life, it is said was spent in poverty in the character of a profane scoffer and atheist. He declared, it is said, that he would rather be sent into hell after death, than to paradise, because he should find nothing in heaven but beggars, poor monks, hermits, and apostles; but in hell he should live with popes, cardinals, kings, and princes. Besides Nicias, he wrote, Mandragola and Clitia, two plays — the Golden Ass, in imitation of Apuleius and Lucian — a History of Florence, 4to. — a Discourse on the first Decade of Livy — a treatise on the Military Art — the Life of Castruccio Castracani — a treatise on the Emigration of the Northern Nations, — but of all his works his treatise called “the Prince” is the most famous. This book, which describes the arts of government, as usually exercised by wicked governors and by tyrants, is still a cause of dispute, and while some suppose that he merely exposed the arts of politicians to excite abhorrence of tyranny, and a love for genuine liberty, others imagine that he prescribed rules for governing, and the only method by which mankind could be managed, so that Machiavelism and tyranny are synonymous expressions. It is remarkable, however, that among those who commend him, he has Bacon, Clarendon, and Harrington, who consider him as an able and ingenious writer, and an enemy to tyranny and injustice, and as frankly warning us against what men do, that we may be the better able to guard against their insidious conduct. The book, first published 1515, and long patronized by popes and great men, to whom it was dedicated, was at last censured under the pontificate of Clement VIII. by the insinuations of the jesuit Possevin, and of Bozius. His works were translated into English, with notes, &c. by Mr. Farnsworth, 1761, 2 vols. 4to. and re-published 1775, 8vo.

MACKENZIE, sir George, a Scotch advocate of eminence, born at Dundee, 1636, and educated at the universities of St. Andrew's, and Aberdeen. He travelled abroad, and studied at Bourges; and in 1656 was called to the bar, where he soon acquired celebrity. In 1661 he was reprimanded by the court for dropping some unwary expressions while defending the cause of the marquis of Argyle, impeached for high treason, upon which he quickly and smartly replied that, “it was impossible to plead for a traitor without speaking treason.” He was afterwards made a judge in the criminal court, king's advocate in 1674, and one of the lords of the privy council for Scotland. On the abrogation of the penal laws by James II. sir George resigned his office, but was soon after reinstated by the king. At the revolution, however, he again quitted his situation, and unable to approve public measures, he retired to Oxford, 1689, where he proposed to end his days in literary ease and tranquillity. He died in London, May 2d, 1691, and was carried to Edinburgh, where he was buried with great pomp and solemnity. As a writer sir George was very respectable. He wrote, Aretino, a serious romance — Religio Stoici — Moral Essays, &c. — a Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Race of Scotland — Cælia's Country House and Closet, a poem — some pieces on the Laws of Scotland, &c. Though censured by Burnet as a superficial man, and though blamed by some as a severe judge, sir George is represented by Wood, as a man of great abilities, of unshaken integrity, the friend of his country, and of religion, and virtue. He founded the advocates' library in Edinburgh.

MACKAY, John, an Englishman, who followed the fortunes of James II. in his exile. He proved, however, unworthy of his master's confidence, as he dishonorably betrayed all his secrets to William III. He wrote, Picture of the Court of St. Germain, 1691 — Memoirs of the Court of England in the reigns of William and Anne, published at the Hague 1733, works curious and interesting, and he died at Rotterdam, 1726.

MACKLIN, Charles, a dramatic writer, and comedian, born in the North of Ireland, May, 1690. He altered his name of Mac Laughlin to the more agreeable sound of Macklin; and after various adventures in Ireland, appeared on the Lincoln's inn theatre 1725, as Alcander in Œdipus. Nature, it seems, had been unfriendly to the actor, as Quin, with his usual humor, observed at the sight of his harsh forbidding features, “if God writes a legible hand, that fellow is a villain.” He was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with a fellow comedian, whom he killed in the heat of passion, for which he was tried, and found guilty of manslaughter. He became by degrees a popular actor; but his chief character was Shylock, which he performed to such advantage, that Pope honored his exertions with these two quaint lines;

This is the Jew,
That Shakespeare drew.

Macklin, long a favorite with the public, at last retired from the stage; but to improve a little more his narrow income, and to take a last farewell of the public, he was prevailed upon to appear once more, for his benefit, 10th Jan. 1790, at Covent-garden. The character was his favorite Shylock, but the efforts required were too great for the powers of an exhausted old man. He found his memory fail him, and unable to support his part, he retired amid the plaudits of a commiserating audience. He died in a very great age, 11th July, 1797. He is author of two comedies, Love a-la-mode — and the Man of the World, which are still favorites with the town, but which reflect with severity upon the conduct of courtiers, and particularly of Scotch sycophants.

MACLAINE, Archibald, an able divine, born at Monaghan, where his father was a dissenting minister. He was intended for his father's profession, and was therefore sent to Glasgow university, after which he went to Holland, as assistant minister to his uncle Milling, the pastor of the English church at the Hague. He succeeded his uncle, and married at the Hague, the daughter of Mr. Chais, the minister of the French protestant church, by whom he had four children. He continued the zealous and active pastor of his church, till the troubles of 1796, when he came over to England, and retired to Bath, where he died, 1804. He is known not only as an exemplary and pious minister, but as the intelligent author of Letters to Soame Jenyns, on his View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity. He also published some sermons, and gave to the public a valuable translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History.

MACLAURIN, Colin, an able mathematician and philosopher, born at Kilmoddan, in Scotland, Feb. 1698. He was educated at Glasgow, where he early distinguished himself by his genius, and by his great applica-application; and in 1717 he honorably obtained the professorship of mathematics in the Mareschal college of Aberdeen. In 1719 he came to London, where he became acquainted with the great literary characters of the age, bishop Hoadly, Newton, Clarke, and sir Martin Folkes; and in 1722, he went abroad, as tutor to the eldest son of lord Polwarth. On the death of his pupil at Montpellier, he returned to his professorship at Aberdeen, and was soon after, by the interest of his friends, and the recommendation of sir Isaac Newton, elected assistant professor of mathematics in Edinburgh, to James Gregory, whose infirmities rendered him incapable of lecturing. In 1745 he was very active in fortifying Edinburgh against the rebels, and this rendered him, for some time, unpopular, so that he fled to England, and found an honorable asylum with Herring, archbishop of York. The fatigues, the troubles, and uneasiness which he had endured, however, proved too strong for his delicate constitution, and laid the foundation of a dropsy in the abdomen, of which he died 14th June 1746, aged 48. The best known of his works are, System of Fluxions, 2 vols. 4to. 1742 — Geometria Organica, or the Percussion of Bodies, which obtained the prize of the Royal academy of sciences, 1724 — a treatise of Algebra — an Account of sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries, 4to. and 8vo. — and various valuable communications, published in the philosophical transactions. His abilities were very great and universal, and in the perfecting of machines, the working of mines, the improving of manufactures, and in hydraulic experiments, and in all public works of utility and science, he was ever willing to lend his ingenious and powerful assistance. If his life had been longer, he would have favored the world with a course of practical mathematics. Of seven children, two sons and three daughters, with his widow, survived him.

MACON, Anthony le, a native of Dauphiny, who translated the Decameron of Boccaccio, to please Margaret of Valois, queen of Naples, to whom he was private secretary. He wrote also, the Loves of Phydias and Gelafine.

MACPHERSON, James, a Scotch writer, born in 1738. He first claimed general notice 1762, by the publication of some poems, attributed to Ossian, the son of Fingal, which, though beautiful and deservedly admired, soon excited a violent controversy about their authenticity. Dr. Johnson, with forcible arguments, attacked them, and when censured in an angry and menacing letter by Macpherson, he returned that celebrated reply preserved by Boswell. The poems, however, were ably defended by Dr. Hugh Blair, and though for some time it appeared rather a national question, in favor of Scotland, Mr. Whitaker, among the English writers, has warmly espoused the cause of their authenticity. In 1773 Macpherson published a translation of the Iliad, in heroic prose, which is no longer held in esteem. His introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, appeared in 1771, and his History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the Accession of the house of Hanover, was published 1773, in 2 vols. 4to. In 1775 he supported the measures of lord North, by his "Rights of Great Britain over her Colonies asserted," and was rewarded by the minister with a seat in the House of Commons in 1780, and the lucrative office of agent to the nabob of Arcot. He died in Scotland, 17th Feb. 1796, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

MACQUART, James Henry, a native of Rheims, eminent as a physician. He translated into French, Haller's Medical Theses, 5 vols. 12mo. and died universally respected, at Paris, 1768, aged 46.

MACQUER, Philip, a French lawyer, descended from a Scotch family, who followed the fortunes of the house of Stuart. He wrote an abridgment of Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. 8vo. — Roman Annals, 8vo. — Abridgment of the History of Spain and Portugal, 2 vols. 8vo. all after the manner of Henault. He died at Paris, 27th Jan. 1770, aged 50.

MACQUER, Peter Joseph, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, 9th Oct. 1718, and was made professor of physic in the royal gardens, and member of the academy of sciences. He published, Elements of Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical, 3 vols. — a Dictionary of Chemistry, 2 vols. — Formulae Medicament. Magistral. — and other works, and died at Paris, 16th Feb. 1784.

MACRET, Charles Francis Adrian, an engraver of eminence, born at Abbeville. He died of a slow fever, Dec. 1783, aged 33, in consequence of the lamented death of an amiable wife. His engravings are highly esteemed.

MACRIANUS, Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian, who, from a private soldier, became a general; and on the captivity of Valerian, declared himself emperor, 258. He was defeated and put to death by Gallienus, 262.

MACRINUS, Marcus Opilius Severus, an African, who rose from the obscurest situation to the dignity of emperor on the death of Caracalla, 217. He was put to death by his soldiers, 218.

MACRINUS, John, a Latin poet, whose real name was Salmon. He died 1557, at an advanced age, at Loudon, his native place. His hymns, Næniæ, and other pieces, were much admired; so that he was called the French Horace. His son Charles, was equally eminent as a poet. After assisting in the education of Catherine of Navarre, sister to Henry IV. he was sacrificed at the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

MACROBIUS, Ambrosius Aurel. Theodos. a Latin writer in the fourth century, author of a Commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis — and of Saturnalia, or Miscellanies, best edited 1694, 8vo.

MADAN, Martin, an eminent preacher, born about 1726. He was brought up to the bar, but through the conversation of Jones and Romaine, two ministers of influence among the Methodists, he took orders. He had the care of the patients of the Lock hospital, and by his strenuous exertions, a chapel was built for the institution, and opened in 1761, with a sermon from him. In 1767 he exposed himself to much obloquy by advising his friend Mr. Haweis, to retain the rectory of Aldwinckle, against his solemn engagements. He was, in his opinions, a strong Calvinist, and and published some occasional sermons — a Comment on the 39 Articles — Letters to Dr. Priestley — a translation of Juvenal and Persius, 2 vols. 8vo. — Thoughts on Executive Justice. His work, however, in 3 vols. 8vo. 1781, called Thelyphthora, excited universal attention, and drew upon him severe animadversions. In this book the author, by some acute argumentation, supports polygamy; and considering the first cohabitation with a woman a virtual marriage, he thus wishes to remove or lessen the causes of seduction. He died after a short illness, May 1790, aged 64.

MADDEN, Samuel, D. D. a name which, according to Dr. Johnson, "Ireland ought to honor," was of French extraction, and was educated at Dublin. In 1731 he appeared as a benefactor to Dublin college, by offering premiums for the promotion of learning; and in 1740 he appropriated the yearly sum of 100*l.* as a proffered premium to such natives of Ireland as improved arts and manufactures, or excelled in painting and in sculpture; a noble example, which was copied by the English nation in the establishment of the society for the encouragement of arts and sciences in London. This truly worthy, benevolent, and virtuous man, after thus proving himself the benefactor of Ireland, died there 30th Dec. 1765. He had some valuable church preferment, and was a man of property. He wrote 1732, Memoirs of the twentieth century, being original letters of state under George VI. &c. 6 vols. 8vo. which it appears was printed with great dispatch by three printers, and four days after the publication, of the 1000 copies issued out, 890 were recalled and suppressed by the author. He published also in 1743 or 4, a long poem, called, Boulter's Monument.

MADDERSTEG, Michael, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter. He was the pupil of Ludolph Backhuysen, and his sea pieces were deservedly admired. He died 1709, aged 50.

MADDOX, Isaac, an English prelate, born in London, 27th July, 1697. His parents were very humble, and he lost them both early, upon which he was placed by an aunt with a pastry-cook, who refused to keep him because he paid more attention to his books than his business. He afterwards was sent to a Scotch university, but disliking their tenets he entered Queen's college, Cambridge, under the patronage of bishop Gibson, and obtained a doctor's degree at Lambeth. He obtained the rectory of St. Vedast, Foster-lane, London, and in 1729 was appointed clerk of the closet to the queen, in 1733 dean of Wales, bishop of St. Asaph 1736, and translated to Worcester 1743. In 1733 he published a Vindication of the Church of England, against Neal's history of the puritans; and published besides, 14 single sermons, preached on various occasions. He was a great benefactor to several hospitals; he encouraged the British fisheries, and promoted the erection of the Worcester infirmary. He died 27th Sept. 1759, and of one son and two daughters, only one daughter survived him.

MADOG, son of Owen Gwynedd, a Welsh prince, who is said to have sailed with 10 ships and 300 men, about the year 1170, and never to have returned. Some authors imagine that he went to the American continent, as they report that a tribe of White Indians, speaking the Welsh language, now inhabit the country about the northern branches of the Mississippi.

MADOX, Thomas, a famous antiquarian, and historiographer-royal. He was most indefatigable in the study of the laws and constitutions of the country, and in 1702 distinguished himself under the patronage of lord Somers, by the publication of his "Collection of Antique Charters and Instruments of divers kinds, taken from the originals, from the Norman conquest, to the end of the reign of Henry VIII." In 1711 he published the History and Antiquities of the Exchequer, from the Norman conquest to the end of the reign of Edward II. folio, dedicated to queen Anne, and reprinted 1769, 4to. His last work was, Firma Burgi, or Historical Essay concerning the cities, towns, and boroughs of England, inscribed to George I. This most active and laborious historian was prevented by death from completing other valuable works. His Collection of Transcripts in 94 folio and quarto volumes, the labor of 30 years, was presented by his widow, to the British Museum.

MÆCENAS, Caius Cilnius, the friend of Augustus, is particularly known as the patron of Virgil and Horace, and of the other learned men of his age. From this liberal protection afforded to learning, all patrons of literature have deservedly received the name of Mæcenas. This illustrious Roman was distinguished at the battles of Mutina and Philippi, and in the civil government of Rome; but his chief pleasure was literary retirement, in the company of his learned friends. He died eight years B. C.

MAES, Godfrey, a native of Antwerp, 1660, eminent as an historical painter. He was director of the academy of painting at Antwerp.

MÆSTLINUS, Michael, a German astronomer, born in the duchy of Wirtemberg, and educated in Italy. He became professor of mathematics at Tubingen, and had among his pupils the great Kepler. He published several very valuable works in astronomy and mathematics, and deserved for his learning and genius, the unreserved commendations of Tycho Brahe and Kepler. He died 1590, aged 48.

MAFFEI, Vegio, a Latin poet, born at Lodi, in Lombardy, 1407. He studied jurisprudence, and was professor of law at Pavia, after which he went to Rome, where he was made chancellor under Martin V. where he died 1459. His prose works are, Dialogus de Miseria & Felicitate — de Educatione Liberiorum, 4to. — Disputatio inter Solem, Terram, &c. — de Perseverantia Religionis — besides many admired poetical pieces, and epigrams, and the 13th book, or continuation of the Æneid, translated into English burlesque by Mr. John Ellis. Jul. Scaliger and Ger. Vossius highly commend him.

MAFFEI, Bernardin, author of a Commentary on Cicero's Epistles — and a treatise on Medals and Inscriptions, was a cardinal, and died at Rome 1558, aged 40.

MAFFEI, Raphael, a learned author, who died at Volaterra, 1521, very old.

MAFFEI,

MAFFEI, John Peter, a jesuit, born at Bergamo, 1536. He wrote, the Life of Ignatius Loyola — History of the Indies — translation of some letters, &c. in Latin, and died at Tivoli, 1603, much esteemed by the pope.

MAFFEI, Francis Scipio, marquis, an Italian nobleman, born at Verona, 1675. He distinguished himself at Verona, on a thesis on love, where the umpires were ladies, and afterwards displayed great valor in the army at the battle of Donawert, 1704. He returned, however, to literature; wrote an able treatise "on Duelling," and then produced "Merope," a tragedy, and "Ceremonia," a comedy, which were represented with applause, and by their delicacy, and purified language, seemed to correct and reform the licentious extravagance of the stage. In 1732 he travelled through France, and after visiting England, Holland, and Germany, and receiving every where the respect and attentions due to his rank, his merits, and his virtues, he returned to Italy, to the cultivation of his favorite studies. He died 1755, and carried with him the regret and the affections of the Veronese, who honored his remains with the most solemn obsequies, and pronounced an oration over him in their cathedral. This amiable writer published besides, History of the Diplomatic Science — Musæum Veronense, folio — Verona Illustrata, folio — a translation of the first book of the Iliad — a selection of Italian tragedies, 3 vols. 8vo. and other works.

MAGALOTTI, Lorenzo, count, a native of Florence, member of the academies of Crusca and Cimento. He was an elegant poet, and possessed merit as a curious naturalist. He died 1712, aged 75. The best known of his works is, Canzonette Anacreontiche, 8vo. published under his Arcadian name of Lindoro Elateo.

MAGANZA, John Baptist, an historical painter of Vicenza, in Italy, who died 1617, aged 40.

MAGELHAENS, John Hyacinth de, a Portuguese ecclesiastic, member of the royal London society, and other learned bodies. He was author of some valuable works in natural and experimental philosophy, and died 1790, in London, where he had been settled for many years.

MAGELLAN, Ferdinand, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who served with distinction under Albuquerque, in the conquest of the Indies. On his return home, his services were neglected, and his active mind therefore sought protection and employment at the court of Charles V. who sent him in 1519, with a fleet, on a voyage of discovery. Magellan passed, in his expedition, through those streights at the southern extremity of America which still bear his name, and advanced through the south seas to the Ladrone islands, of which he took possession in the name of the Spanish monarch. Here he was slain in 1520, either by the natives, or, as some accounts say, by his own rebellious crew. One of his ships only, with 18 men, escaped, and after sailing round the world, reached Seville, 8th Sept. 1521.

MAGGI, Charles Maria, an Italian poet, born at Milan 1630. He was secretary to the senate of his native town, and died there 1699. He may be styled one of the most active restorers of elegant taste in Italy, after the frivolities and barbarisms of the school of Marini. His works have been published, with an account of his life, by Muratori, 4 vols. 12mo. Milan, 1700.

MAGINUS, John Anthony, a native of Padua, mathematical professor at Bologna, and author of Astronomical tables — Ephemerides — and other works. He died 1617, and it is reported that he ascertained the time of his death by the accuracy of his astrological calculations.

MAGISTRIS, Simon de, a native of Serra, who died at Rome, 6th Oct. 1802, aged 75. He was well known for his deep acquaintance with the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and his services to literature were liberally rewarded by Pius VI. who made him bishop of Cyrene. He published a Greek edition of Daniel, folio, 1772 — and also edited Acta Martyrum, &c. — and Dionysii Alexandr. quæ supersunt, &c.

MAGIUS, or MAGGI, Jerome, a learned Italian, born at Anghiari, in Tuscany. He was eminent in the circle of the sciences, and was sent by the Venetians as judge-martial to the isle of Cyprus, where he distinguished himself as an active engineer, in the defence of the town of Famagusta against the Turks. When at last his efforts failed, he was in 1571 thrown ignominiously into prison, where, however, his mental resources soothed his sufferings, and enabled him to write two treatises, upon bells, and upon the wooden horse, which he dedicated to the ambassadors of the emperor, and of the French king. These learned labors, however, hastened his end; for no sooner did the ambassadors interfere for his release, than the bashaw Mahomet, ordered him to be strangled in prison, 1572 or 3. Magius wrote besides, de Mundi Exitio per Exultionem, Libri quinque, 1562, folio — Vitæ Illustrum Virorum, Æmilio Auctore, cum Commentariis — Commentarii in quatuor Institutionum Civilium Libros, 8vo. — Miscellanea, &c.

MAGIUS, Bartholomew, brother to the above, was a physician, and died at Bologna, 1552. He was author of a treatise on Gun-shot Wounds, 4to.

MAGLIABECCHI, Antony, a learned Italian, born at Florence, 1663. He was bound apprentice to a goldsmith at Florence, but his fondness for books prevailed over the attentions of manual labor, and at the death of his mother, he, as his own master, devoted himself totally to learning. He soon distinguished himself amongst the learned, by a strong, and incredibly astonishing memory; and became known to Cosmo III. duke of Florence, who appointed him his librarian. Simple in his manners of life, he disregarded the luxuries and conveniences provided for him by his patron, and remained satisfied with an humble habitation, containing a straw chair for his table, and another for his bed, while an old cloak served him for a gown by day, and for a covering by night. The liberal offers of preferment made by the pope, and by the emperor, were rejected with similar indifference, and he showed that the company of his books to him was greater gratification than the most elevated situation. Though leading a sedentary life, he lived to the great age of 81, and at his death left the valuable library which he had collected, for the public use, with a decent fund for its maintenance. Though he published published no work himself, he encouraged the publication of others, and to him we are indebted for the Latin poems of Settimello — the dialogue of Benedict Aretin, and other works. A collection of letters, written to him by various learned men, was published at Florence, 1745, 8vo.

MAGNENTIUS, a German, who from a private soldier, became emperor of Rome, after the murder of his benefactor Constant, 350. He was defeated by Constantius, the brother of the murdered Constant, and was put to death at Lyons 353.

MAGNI, Valerian, a native of Milan, employed in the service of Urban VIII. as a missionary in the north of Europe. The jesuits, with whom he was engaged in controversial disputes, prevented his obtaining a cardinal's hat. He died at Saltzburg, 1661, aged 75. He wrote some controversial works, and was a zealous defender of Des Cartes' philosophy.

MAGNON, John, a French poet, who for some time was an advocate at Lyons, and then became a dramatic writer. His pieces were very indifferent; the best is Artaxerxes, a tragedy. He formed the plan of writing an Encyclopedia, in verse, but was prevented, as he was murdered by thieves in the streets of Paris, 1662. He was the friend of Moliere.

MAGNUS, John, archbishop of Upsal, was born at Lincoping, 1488. He warmly opposed the reformation in Sweden, and when he found himself exposed to persecution in consequence, he retired to Rome, where he died 1544. He wrote a History of Sweden in 24 books, folio — a History of the Archbishops of Upsal to 1544, folio.

MAGNUS, Olaus, brother of the preceding, and his successor as archbishop. He was at the council of Trent, and distinguished himself also by his opposition to the protestants. He died at Rome 1560. He is author of a History of the Manners, Customs, and Wars of the People of the North, folio, 1555.

MAHMED, Aga, a noble Persian, made eunuch by Kouli-Khan, who had murdered his father and his brothers. He became a warrior of renown, and waged successful war against the Russians. He made himself master of the best part of Persia, and already prepared to seize Astracan, and to shut the Caspian sea against the Russian commerce, when death stopped the progress of his conquests, 1788.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED, the celebrated impostor, was born 571 A. D. at Mecca, in Arabia, and was of the tribe of the Korashites, the noblest and the most powerful of the country. He lost his father before he was two years old, and his mother before he was eight; but their affectionate attention was supplied by the care of his uncle, Abu Taleb, a merchant. In the family of this friendly protector, he was employed to travel with his camels between Mecca and Syria, till his twenty-fifth year, when he entered into the service of Cadiga, a rich widow, whom, though 12 years older than himself, he married three years after. Thus suddenly raised to affluence and consequence above his countrymen, he formed the secret plan of obtaining for himself the sovereign power. In his frequent journeys through the deserts of Arabia, he had observed the various sects which divided the opinions of the Eastern christians; and in the ardent pursuits of ambition, he considered, that nothing could so firmly secure to him the respect and the attachment of the world as laying the foundation of a new religion. The plan was bold, but it was pursued with vigor, and executed with slow and cautious steps. Withdrawing himself, therefore, from the society of the dissipated and licentious, he assumed the imposing character of superior sanctity, and every morning retiring to a solitary cave near Mecca, he devoted the day to prayer, abstemiousness, and holy meditation. Well tutored in the arts of imposture and hypocrisy, he, in his 40th year, assumed the title of the apostle of God, and gradually increased his fame and his followers by perseverance, and by the aid of pretended visions. Though his doctrines were embraced at first only by his wife Cadiga, and eight other dependants, yet in the fifth year of his assumed mission, he found his followers increased to the number of 39, among whom were men of rank and of consequence. Enemies, however, were not wanting to oppose the self-delegated prophet of God; and while some heaped on him the odious appellations of an impostor, a liar, and magician, others suspected his designs, and foresaw his bold and rapid strides to the sovereign power. Mahomet, notwithstanding, overcame all opposition: in proclaiming himself the favorite prophet appointed by God, to propagate a new religion, he flattered the passions and prejudices of his nation; and among a people whose climate is exposed to the dry heats of a scorching sun, he allured the imagination by painting rivers of cooling waters, shaded retreats, luxurious fruits, and all the sensual delights of the immaculate hours, for the happy proselytes of his doctrine; while he denounced against his enemies, not only temporal punishments, and dreadful visitations in the present life, and exclusion from Paradise, but the most excruciating torments, a habitation in a continual fire, surrounded with a black hot salt smoke, without the ability of breathing any but the most noxious heated air, and of drinking the most foul and nauseous water. These promises and threatenings were not announced as the figurative language of an impostor, but the prophet delivered them as the command of God, and produced occasionally various chapters, which had been copied from the archives of heaven, and were brought down to him by the angel Gabriel. Whatever difficulties arose, either from the doubts or the suspicion of the new converts, were quickly removed by the condescension of the obedient angel, and a fresh revelation was sent down from heaven on every trying occasion, to support the character and maintain the sanctity of Mahomet. When the wavering proselytes seemed to demand miracles from a prophet who called himself superior to Moses and to Christ, the impostor, with an air of authority, declared, that God had sent Moses and Jesus with miracles, and yet that men would not be obedient to their word, and that therefore he had sent Mahomet in the last place, without miracles, to force them by the power of the sword to do his will. Thus commissioned by heaven to enforce his religion by the sword, he refused longer to answer questions, questions, and to indulge disputes, and when he found himself exposed to danger at Mecca, he left the city, and retired to Medina, where his doctrines had found a more friendly reception. This event, which happened about the 16th July, 622, forms the celebrated era of the Mahometans, called the Hegira, or flight from Mecca. At Medina, the prophet erected his standard; and as for the preceding 13 years he had endeavoured to spread his doctrines by persuasion, he now determined to propagate them by the sword. The two first years after his flight were employed in predatory excursions against the travelling caravans, and those of his neighbours who refused to embrace his tenets; but after subduing and exterminating several of the tribes of Arabia, he at last marched against Mecca, and after fighting a battle, granted a truce to his enemies, by which he not only confirmed his power as a prophet, but established his authority in assuming the title of independent sovereign over his nation. Thus formidable by his conquests, and dreaded for his cruelty, he next turned his arms against Caibar, a city inhabited by Jewish Arabs; and after he had taken it by storm, he fixed his abode in the house of one of the principal men of the place, whose daughter placed before him a poisoned shoulder of mutton, which she had prepared for his supper. The poison was so powerful, that Basher, one of the attendants of the prophet, died immediately; but the impostor himself, though he only tasted the meat, never fully recovered his strength, and perished three years after in consequence of the fatal food. The accident might have shaken the faith of his followers, as the woman declared, that if he were a prophet, he would have known that the meat was poisoned; but Mahomet enforced the tenets of predestination in his favor, and converted even his misfortunes into an engine of punishment against his enemies. His next expedition was against Mecca, which, as he pretended, had broken the truce, and though defeated in one battle, he had the good fortune to secure the victory; and at last, so to exert his power over the neighbouring tribes, that in the 10th year of the Hegira, his empire and his religion had enslaved the whole of Arabia. As he had recommended to his followers a pilgrimage to Mecca, he himself performed it, whilst his lieutenants and officers were employed around in the destruction of heathen temples, and the abolition of idolatry; and after instructing the various devotees which flocked to him from all parts of Arabia, he returned to Medina. It was his last journey; he soon after fell sick, the poison which three years before he had taken, began to operate more powerfully, and after a confinement of 13 days, the prophet died, A. D. 632, aged 62. He was buried in the same place where he died, in the chamber of the most beloved of his wives, at Medina, where his remains are still preserved, and not in an iron coffin suspended in the air, between two loadstones, as is vulgarly reported. By Cadiga, Mahomet had six children, one of whom only grew up, Fatima, but survived him only 60 days. After the death of Cadiga, the prophet, who had hitherto been satisfied with one wife, married several, and kept besides a great number of concubines. By none of his wives, who, according to some, were 15, and according to others, 21, he left no issue; but of the ten who survived him, Ayeshah, the daughter of Abubeker, his successor, was the most beloved. So great was the influence of this celebrated female among the faithful, that she prevented Ali, the husband of Fatima, from succeeding to the throne of his father-in-law, because he had revealed her incontinence to the prophet. The success of Mahomet's imposture during his life time, is not more astonishing than the permanent establishment which his doctrines have maintained over one of the fairest portions of the globe, during near 1200 years. The Koran, in which are contained the tenets of his religion, is a compound of sublime truths, of incredible tales, and ludicrous events, but the whole is delivered in a pleasing, elegant, and nervous style. That Mahomet, who was rude and illiterate, should compose a book, deservedly esteemed the standard of elegance among the Arabians, without divine assistance, was considered as impossible among his followers, and therefore they believed the sublime composition to be the work of God, as the prophet informed them. Those, however, who were acquainted with the retreat of Mahomet before he assumed his prophetic character, know that he was assisted in the framing of his work by a Persian Jew, who was well versed in the learning of his country, and the laws of Moses; and by a Christian monk of the Nestorian sect. To the labors of these two men the prophet was indebted for the composition of the Koran, and hence we trace the frequent allusions to the Mosaic institutions, and the history of Christ. By the help of these associates, the artful Arabian was enabled to impose upon his followers, by interpreting various passages of the scriptures in his own favor, and by accusing the Jews and Christians of mutilation and interpolation, where he thought he found his character obscurely delineated. By calling himself the comforter whom Christ, at his ascension, had promised to his disciples, he mightily prevailed with the credulous; and every true Mussulman believes, that several copies of the New Testament, still contain an original text, which expressly foretells the future coming of a prophet of the name of Mahomet. As Mahomet was subject to the falling sickness, he had the art to persuade his disciples, that in those moments of suspended animation, he accompanied the angel Gabriel in various journeys; and that borne by the celestial beast Alborak, he ascended up into the highest heavens, where he conversed familiarly with the Almighty, and received friendly communications with respect to the laws and the religion with which he was to bless the earth. In these spiritual conferences, he saw the most renowned prophets of old; he spoke to Elijah, Moses, and Christ, and was honored by the creator himself, with privileges above the rest of mankind. The Koran has been elegantly translated into English, by Sale, in 2 vols. 4to. and 2 vols. 8vo. There are also French translations by Du Ruyter, and by Savary. The best edition of the original in Arabic and Latin, is by Maracci, at Padua, 2 vols. folio, 1698.

MAHOMET I. emperor of the Turks, was son of Bajazet I. and succeeded his brother Moses, whom he put to death, 1413. He was a brave, just, and politic monarch. He restored to its ancient glory, the power of the Ottomans, which civil war, and the ravages of Tamerlane, had enfeebled and disgraced, and he conquered Cappadocia, Servia, Wallachia, and other provinces, and fixed his residence at Adrianople. He was at peace with the emperor Manuel Palæologus, to whom he restored some of his provinces. He died at Adrianople, of a bloody flux, 1421, aged 47.

MAHOMET II. emperor of the Turks, was born at Adrianople, 24th March, 1430, and succeeded his father Amurath, 1451. His reign was begun with the most active preparations for war, Constantinople was besieged, and the indefatigable Turk, not satisfied to insult the walls with his numerous soldiery, conveyed at great expence and labor, over the land, some of his galleys into the harbour, which the Greeks had shut up by strong iron chains against the attacks of their invaders. Constantinople yielded to the conqueror, 1453, and in her fall poured forth her fugitive philosophers and learned men to propagate and to revive literature in the western world. Afterwards Mahomet extended his arms against the neighbouring nations, and by his victories, deserved the name of great, and the appellation of grand signior, which he assumed, and which has descended to his less worthy successors. Greece and Asia had already submitted to the conqueror, who after subduing two empires, 12 tributary kingdoms, and 200 towns, was preparing the subjugation of Italy, and the destruction of the papal throne, when a colic proved fatal to this formidable hero, 3d May, 1481, after a reign of 31 years. His death was the cause of universal rejoicing over the christian world, whose religion he had sworn to exterminate, to enforce the tenets of Mahomet. Though a great warrior, Mahomet was cruel and tyrannical, and that he might glut his rage, his lust, and his ambition, neither rank, nor sex, nor age were spared. Though by habit and religion hostile to the christians, he yet admired the arts and the languages of polished Europe, and read with great rapture, the history of her heroes. Some of his letters were collected by a knight of Rhodes, and translated into Latin, from the Syriac, Greek, and Turkish originals.

MAHOMET III. succeeded his father Amurath III. 1595. He began his reign by ordering 19 of his brothers to be strangled, and 10 of his father's wives to be drowned. He made war against Rodolphus II. and invaded Hungary with an army of 200,000 men, and after taking Agria, he basely murdered the garrison which he had pledged himself to spare. His progress was checked by the opposition of Maximilian, the emperor's brother, who would have obtained a most decisive victory, had not his troops abandoned themselves to pillage, and thus given the Turks the opportunity to rally, and to overwhelm their whole army. Other battles proved less favorable to Mahomet, who was obliged to retire from Hungary, Moldavia, and the neighbouring provinces, and after suing in vain for peace from the christian princes, he buried himself in the indolence, and the licentiousness of his seraglio, regardless of the murmurs of his people, and the threats of his enemies. He died of the plague, 20th Dec. 1603, aged 39.

MAHOMET IV. succeeded to the throne at the age of seven, 1649, on the death of his father Ibrahim I. who had been strangled by his janissaries. He pursued with vigor the war with the Venetians, and after reducing Candia, with the loss of 200,000 men, he invaded Poland. His arms proved here victorious, he not only subdued the provinces, 1672, but imposed on the kingdom an annual tribute of 20,000 crowns. This disgrace, however, was wiped off by the valor of Sobieski, who the next year pursued his enemies, and totally routed them at the fatal battle of Choczim. Though peace was re-established in 1676, the restless ambition of the Turks again invaded the Austrian dominions, and Vienna would have fallen, 1683, if the great Sobieski had not hastened to its relief, and destroyed the numerous army of Mustapha, the Turkish general. The decisive blow was followed by the union of the emperor, the king of Poland, and the Venetians, and Mahomet every where defeated, found his people dissatisfied, and his soldiers rebellious. The calamities of the state were attributed to him by his janissaries, who deposed him 8th Oct. 1687, and sent him to the prison, from which they drew his brother Solyman III. to place him on the throne. He died in his confinement, 22d June, 1691.

MAHOMET V. son of Mustapha II. succeeded in 1730, on the deposition of his uncle, Achmet III. His janissaries expected from his exertions, the recovery of the provinces conquered by the imperialists, but the insurrections in the east, and the war with Persia, prevented his success against the European powers. He lost Georgia and Armenia, which were conquered by the arms of Kouli Khan. Mahomet was more respectable for his pacific disposition, than his military exploits. He died after a mild reign, in 1754.

MAHUDEL, Nicholas, a native of Langres, who from a jesuit, became a monk of La Trappe, and then a physician. He was author of an Historical Dissertation on the ancient Spanish Money — a Letter on a Medal of the city of Carthage, &c. He practised physic at Paris, but was for some time confined in the Bastille. He died 1747, aged 74.

MAIER, Michael, a celebrated German alchymist, and rosycrucian of the 17th century, who ruined his health and his fortune in the pursuit of absurdities. He wrote ten different treatises on his profession, and on his favorite pursuits.

MAIGNAN, Emanuel, a philosopher and ecclesiastic, born at Toulouse, 1601. He was educated among the jesuits, and from his early youth showed great fondness for learning, and at the age of 18 he took the habit of a Minim. He warmly opposed the doctrines of Aristotle, and his reputation as a philosopher and mathematician was so widely extended, that he was called, in 1636, to fill a professor's chair at Rome. In 1650 he returned to Toulouse, from Rome, and was honorably received by his countrymen; but when the French king and his minister Mazarine, admiring his learning, and the various machines and curiosities contained in his cell, expressed a desire to draw him out of his obscurity, and patronize him in Paris, he modestly, but firmly declined their offer. This worthy man, so much above the temptations of the world, whose sole employment was to be useful to mankind, died at Toulouse, much respected, 1676. Father Sagueni published, in 1697, an account of his life and writings. He published "De Perspectivâ Hororariâ," 1648 — a Course of Philosophy, 4 vols. 8vo. 1652, republished in folio, 1673, &c.

MAIGROT, Charles, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, bishop of Conon, and vicar apostolic. He went as missionary to China, where he opposed the jesuits, who permitted the Chinese converts to pay homage and adoration before the sepulchres of their forefathers. He wrote an Examination of the Chinese worship, &c. and died at Rome, 1720, universally respected.

MAILLA, Joseph Anne Maria de Moyrice de, a jesuit, born in the province of Bugey, on the borders of Savoy, 1670. He applied himself so assiduously to the Chinese, that his great knowledge of the language recommended him as a missionary to China, in 1703. The emperor Kam-Hi esteemed him so much, that he employed his abilities in the construction of a map of China, and of Chinese Tartary, which was engraved in France, 1732. He also translated the Great Annals of China, which he transmitted to Europe, and which were to comprehend 12 vols. 4to. the first of which was published in 1777, under the care of Grosier. This amiable man died at Pekin, 1748, after a residence of 45 years there.

MAILLARD, Oliver, a French cordelier, and doctor in divinity, eminent as a preacher. He was in the service of Innocent VIII. Charles VIII. and Ferdinand of Arragon. He died at Toulouse, June 13th, 1502. His Latin sermons, in 3 vols. 8vo. were published 1730.

MAILLE DE BREZE, Simon de, bishop of Viviers, and archbishop of Tours, was at the council of Trent, and distinguished himself by his learning and devotion. He translated some of Basil's homilies into Latin, and died 1597, aged 82.

MAILLE, Urban de, marquis de Brezé, was known as a warrior. He gained the battle of Avein, 1635, and was afterwards ambassador of France, to Sweden, and Holland. He died 1650, aged 53. His son Armand was duke of Fronsac and Caumont, and distinguished himself as a naval officer in the service of France. He defeated the Spanish fleet near Cadiz, 1640, but after some other important advantages at sea, in the following years, he suffered a defeat before Tarragona. He was killed by a cannon shot, 14th June, 1646, at the siege of Orbitello, aged 27.

MAILLE, Francis, a native of Pontevéz, in Provence, celebrated for his longevity, and his gallantries in old age. He died 1709, aged 119.

MAILLEBOIS, N. count de, lieutenant-general in the French armies, distinguished himself in the German wars, and was in 1784 sent to Holland, to resist the attempts of Prussia against the Dutch patriots. At the revolution he left France, and died at Maestricht, 1792.

MAILLEBOIS, John Baptist Desmarets, marquis of, son of Nicolas Desmarets, the comptroller general, first distinguished himself in the wars of the Spanish succession, and in Italy, and by the conquest of Corsica, for which he was made marshal of France. In the war of 1741 he again signalized himself, but was defeated by count Brown, at the battle of Placentia, 1746. He died Feb. 1762, aged 80. His Campaigns in Italy, were published, 3 vols. 4to. 1775, by marquis de Pezay.

MAILLET, Benedi^t de, a learned Frenchman, born in Lorraine, 1659. He was sixteen years consul general in Egypt, and was removed to the same honorable appointment at Leghorn. He retired on a pension in 1716, and died at Marseilles, 1738, aged 79. From his papers were afterwards published, a Description of Egypt, in 4to. 1743, and also in 2 vols. 12mo. and a work on the Origin of the Globe, in the form of a Dialogue, 1 vol. 8vo. by Telliamed, the name of De Maillet reversed.

MAIMBOURG, Lewis, a learned native of Nancy, in Lorraine, born 1610. He became a jesuit, 1626, but was expelled from the society by Innocent XI. for his bold opposition to Rome in favor of the Gallican church. The French king comforted him in his disgrace by an honorable pension, and he retired to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died 1686. He was eminent as a preacher, but more as a writer. He published Histories of Arianism, of the Iconoclasts, of the Crusades, of the Schism of the West, of the Schism of the Greeks, of the Decay of the Empire, of the League, of Lutheranism, of Calvinism, of the Pontificate of St. Leo. He had many enemies as a writer, but Bayle commends him as a candid, learned, and well informed historian.

MAIMONIDES, Moses, or Moses son of Maimon, commonly called Moses Egyptianus, because physician to the sultan of Egypt, was a Jewish rabbi, born at Cordova, in Spain, 1131. He opened a school in Egypt, and as his skill, not only in languages, but in all branches of science and of philosophy was very great, his instructions were attended by numerous and respectable pupils. Thus eminently distinguished as a scholar, as a physician, and also as a divine, so as to be called inferior only to the legislator Moses; he beheld with indifference, and even contempt, the fables and traditions of his countrymen, and applied all the powers of learning, and the vast resources of his mind, in the cause of truth, virtue, and philosophy. Some of his works were written in Arabic, but are extant now in Hebrew only. The most famous of these are his Commentaries on the Mishna — Jad, a complete pandect of the Jewish law — More Nevochim, a valuable work, explaining the difficult passages, phrases, parables and allegories in scripture, and several other works. This great and learned man died in Egypt at the age of 70, and was buried with his nation in the land of Upper Galilee. His death was mourned for three whole days by Jews and Egyptians, and the year in which he died, in respect of his great virtues and learning, was called Lamentum Lamentabile.

MAINFROY, prince of Tarento, was natural son of the emperor Frederic II. After the death of Conrad IV. of Sicily, in 1254, he was made guardian of the minority of his son Conradin; but his ambition soon prompted him to ascend the throne, and he was crowned king of Sicily, at Palermo. A quarrel with Innocent IV. kindled a war, in which the papal troops were defeated, and Rome besieged; but the next successor, Urban IV. undismayed, excommunicated his enemy, and bestowed his crown of Naples and Sicily, on Charles of Anjou, the brother of Lewis of France. The new king attacked the usurper, and in a battle at Benevento, 26th Feb. 1266, Mainfroy was defeated and slain, and his body was cast indignantly into a ditch, as he was excommunicated. Though an usurper, Mainfroy possessed many virtues, he patronized literature and the arts, and was an able warrior. His "Chasse aux Oiseaux," appeared 1696.

MAINTENON, Frances d' Aubigné, Madame de, a famous French lady, was born Nov. 27th, 1635, in the prison of Niort, where her father was confined for some ill conduct against Richelieu. The father, after his enlargement took all his family, 1639, to America, and settled at Martiniquo, where he might have become respectable and independent, had he not ruined himself by gaming. On his death, in 1646, the widow returned to France, leaving her daughter as a pledge in the hands of her creditors, but the child was soon after sent after the mother, and taken under the hospitable protection of her aunt, Madame Villette, at Poictou. As, however, she was brought up in the principles of the protestants, an order from the court was obtained to remove her, and by artifice and persuasion, she was converted to the Roman catholic religion, by her bigoted relation, Madame de Neuillant. In 1651 she preferred, to this irksome confinement, an union with the abbé Scarron, who was old and deformed, but witty, and the favorite of the court. On the death of her husband, in 1660, her distresses returned, and though for a while supported at the Hospitalers' convent at Paris, she solicited in vain for a small pension from the court. In 1671 however, she had the good fortune to be appointed over the education of the young duke De Maine, the king's son, by his mistress, Madam de Montespan, and from this situation arose her greatness. The king saw her, and was captivated with her manners and person, and in 1679 he purchased for her the estate of Maintenon, ten leagues from Versailles, from which she derived her new title. In this dangerous elevation, Madame Maintenon conducted herself with great propriety; she never interfered with the politics or intrigues of the court, her sole wish was to please and amuse the king, and in this she so happily succeeded, that though she was two years older than himself, he married her privately, 1685. Now raised from a mistress to the honorable rank of a wife, a secret, however, which was never revealed, she applied herself more frequently to acts of religion and of piety, and she founded an abbey for women of quality, afterwards called St. Cyr, of which she called herself the superior, and for the government of which, she, together with Desmarets, bishop of Chartres, formed good and strict regulations. She also prevailed upon Racine, who was now become a courtier, to write a tragedy upon some striking subject from the bible, and in consequence of this he produced his Esther, and also his Athaliah, which were originally acted by the religious devotees of St. Cyr. Upon the king's death, in 1715, she retired to privacy at St. Cyr, and long fatigued with the splendor of intolerable greatness, she acknowledged the emptiness of human distinction, and ended her days in penitence and devotion. Though the king had made no particular provision for her, yet she refused to accept from the bounty of the duke of Orleans, more than 80,000 livres. She died 15th April, 1719. Some have accused her of causing the revocation of the edict of Nantes, but it is certain that she extended her protection and liberality, to those who suffered persecution for their religion. She was generally the friend of virtue and merit, and she treated with particular attention and favor, Madame de Guyon, and also the great Fenelon, though afterwards she was weak enough to join his persecutors. The happiest part of her life was spent, says Voltaire, in the company of the buffoon Scarron, and in a letter to her friend, Madame de la Maifonfort, she declares that her grandeur was productive only of melancholy, and that though courted, flattered, and admired, she felt in her mind a dismal vacuity. Some of her letters have been published.

MAJOR, John, a divine, born 1469, at Gleghorn, near North Berwick, and not at Haddington. He studied at Oxford, and Cambridge, and also at Paris, under Boulac and Standouk, and on his return to Scotland, became divinity professor at St. Andrew's, and afterwards provost of the university. He died about 1550. He was a very learned man, and wrote in a barbarous style, "De Historia Gentis Scotorum," 4to. — Commentarius in Physica Aristotelis, &c. — Literalis in Matthæum Expositio, &c.

MAJOR, John Daniel, a native of Breslaw, was medical professor at Kiel, where he founded a botanical garden. He wrote Lithologia Curiosa, five de Animal. & Plantis in Lapidem conversis, 4to. — De Caneris & Serpente. Petrefact. 4to. — Historia Anatomia, fol. &c. and died at Stockholm, 1693, aged 59.

MAJORAGIUS, Mark Antony, so named from a village near Milan, where he was born, 1514, taught belles lettres at Milan with great reputation, and died, 1555. He was author of learned Commentaries on Aristotle's Rhetoric — on Cicero's Oratory — on Virgil, folio, besides some other tracts.

MAJORIANUS, Julius Valerius, emperor of the West, was successful in his war against the Vandals. He was murdered by his general, Ricimer, 461, universally respected for his virtues.

MAIRAN, John James d' Ortons de, a French philosopher, born at Beziers, 1678. He succeeded, in 1741, Fontenelle, as secretary to the academy of sciences, and displayed in that situation, great abilities. He died at Paris, 20th Feb. 1771. He wrote Dissertation on the Cause of Phosphoric Light — on the Aurora Borealis — on Ice — Letters concerning China, and other things, published in the memoirs of the academy, &c.

MAIRE, John le, a French poet, born at Bavai, in Hainault, 1473. He wrote an allegorical poem, called Three Tales of Cupid and of Atropos, and other poems, in which he too often offended against delicacy. He died 1524, or according to others, 1548.

MAIRE, James le, a Dutch navigator. With two vessels he sailed 14th June, in 1615, from the Texel, and discovered in 1616, the straits to which he gave his name, in South America, and after touching at New Guinea, he reached Batavia. Here, though among his countrymen, he was seized as a spy, as violating the rights of the Dutch East India company, and his ship was confiscated. He died in his return to Europe, 22d Jan. 1617. His voyage is published in a Latin collection, Amsterdam, 1622, folio.

MAIRE, N. le, a surgeon of Lyons, who acquired eminence by his Treatises on the Nervous Fluid, and on Magnetism. He died at Lyons, Aug. 1787.

MAIRET, John, a French poet, born at Besançon, 1604. He was page to the duke of Montmorency, and distinguished himself against the Huguenots, and as a negotiator. He received a pension from the duke, and was patronized by cardinals Richelieu, and La Valette, and the count of Soissons. He died 1686. He wrote some some poems and miscellanies, besides twelve tragedies of no great merit.

MAISIERES, Philip de, a native of Maisieres, in the diocese of Amiens. He served in the army in Sicily and Arragon, and afterwards he went to the Holy Land, and was among the forces of the infidels, that he might ascertain their number and discipline. After being employed by Peter, king of Cyprus, he returned to France, in 1372, and was made by Charles V. counsellor of state, and governor to the dauphin. Disgusted with the world, he retired among the Celestines, in 1380, and died 1405. He wrote some devotional tracts, &c.

MAISTRE, Anthony le, born at Paris, 1608, from a pleader, became a member of the port royal society, and led a life of austerity. He died 1658. He wrote a Life of St. Bernard — a Translation of Chrysostom de Sacerdotio, &c. and other works.

MAISTRE, Lewis Isaac le, better known by the name of Sacy, was brother to the preceding, and was born at Paris, 1613. He took orders, but on suspicion of Jansenism, he was in 1666, thrown into the Bastille. During his confinement of two years, he composed several works, and translated the bible, with annotations, in 32 vols. 8vo. He translated besides, some of Chrysostom's Homilies, three of Terence's Plays — Kempis, on the Imitation of Christ — an Attack on the Jesuits — Letters of Piety, 2 vols. &c. He died at Pompona, 1684, aged 71.

MAITLAND, John, lord of Thyrlestane, was born 1545. He was educated in Scotland, and studied the law afterwards in France, and practised with such success that James VI. made him his secretary of state, 1584, and the next year lord chancellor of the kingdom. He attended his master to Denmark in 1589, where the princess his bride was detained by contrary winds. He died much regretted, 1595. He wrote Epigrammata Latina, published in the Deliciae Scotorum Poetarum, Amst. 1637.

MAITLAND, William, a Scotch antiquarian, born at Brechin, Forfarshire, 1693. From a hair merchant, he became a man of letters, and settled in London, where he published his History of London, folio, 1739. In 1753, appeared his History of Edinburgh, folio, and in 1757, his History and Antiquities of Scotland, 3 vols. fol. He died at Montrose, aged 64, and left behind him a fortune, it is said, of 10,000l.

MAITTAIRE, Michael, a learned writer, born in London, 1668. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ church, Oxford, where he was made student, by the friendship of Dr. South, the canon. He was appointed second master of Westminster school, 1695, and continued four years in that office. He distinguished himself as a writer by two pamphlets against Whiston, in 1711, and by his Stephanorum Historia, &c. — Annales Typographici, 5 vols. 1719-1741 — Opera Veterum Poetarum, 2 vols. folio — the Greek Testament, edited, 2 vols. 1714 — Editions of Justin, Lucretius, Paternus, Catullus, Terence, Virgil, Ovid, Martial, and other Latin classics — Græcæ Linguae Dialecti, 8vo. — Anacreon — Miscellanea Græcorum, &c. He was patronized by the first and second lords Oxford, and was Latin tutor to lord Chesterfield's favorite son. He died greatly respected, 7th Aug. 1747. His valuable library, the collection of 50 years, was sold after his death, during 44 nights by auction, by Cock and Langford.

MAIUS, John Henry, or MAY, a Lutheran divine, born 1653, at Pfortzheim, in Baden-Dourlach. He was professor of oriental languages in several universities, and lastly at Gießen where he died 1719. He wrote Historia Animalium Scripturæ Sacræ, 8vo. — Vita Johannis Reuchlini, 8vo. — Synopsis Theologiæ Symbolicæ, 4to. — Historia Reformationis Lutheri, 4to. &c.

MALACHI, the last of the 12 minor prophets, prophesied after Haggai and Zechariah, under Nehemiah. Some doubt whether there was such a prophet. He was supposed to have died young. He foretold chiefly the coming of John the Baptist.

MALACHY, St. a native of Armagh, successively abbot of Benetor, bishop of Connor, and archbishop of Armagh, which he resigned 1135. He died at Clairvaux in the arms of his friend St. Bernard, 1148. He was a very learned man, and introduced some wise regulations in his diocese. The predictions attributed to him are properly considered as impositions.

MALAGRIDA, Gabriel, an Italian jesuit, sent by his superiors into Portugal as a missionary. His zeal and his eloquence soon rendered him popular, and he became so ambitious that, it is said, he, with Alexander and Mathos, joined the duke d'Aveiro in his conspiracy against the king of Portugal. When the jesuits were banished, he and his two companions were permitted to continue to reside in the kingdom, and there he became soon known as a violent enthusiast; he declared himself the ambassador and immediate prophet of God, and even pretended to work miracles. His extravagant conduct and his writings were at last noticed by the inquisition, and when he declared that the king's death had been revealed to him, he was condemned by the arbitrary tribunal, and was burnt alive, 21st Sep. 1761, aged 75, as a false prophet.

MALAVAL, Francis, a native of Marseilles, who though he lost his sight at the age of nine months, acquired some celebrity as a mystical writer on quietism. He published Spiritual Poetry re-edited Amsterdam, 1714 — Lives of Saints — Life of Philip Benizzi. He died at Marseilles 15th May, 1719, aged 92.

MALAVAL, John, a native of Pezan near Nismes, who came early to Paris and gained eminence as a surgeon. He contributed some valuable observations to the memoirs of the academy of surgery, and died 1758, aged 89, after surviving for some years the sound use of his faculties.

MALCOLM IV. grandson of David king of Scotland, 1153. He was a liberal and benevolent prince, and founded several monasteries, and died 1165.

MALDONAT, John, a Spanish jesuit, born at Fuente del Maestro, in Estramadura, 1534. He was an able scholar and distinguished himself at the universities of Salamanca and Rome, and became a popular professor in 1563 at Paris, and afterwards in 1570 at Poitiers. He was also in the Jesuits' college, at Bourges, and then went to Rome, by order of Gregory XIII. to superintend the publication of the Septuagint. He there finished his Commentary on the Gospels, and died 1583. He wrote besides Commentaries on Jeremiah, Baruch, Ezekiel and Daniel — Various treatises on Grace — on Justice — Original Sin, &c. He is deservedly servedly respected as an acute critic, an excellent theologian, well skilled in the learned languages, and he possessed moreover, says Thuanus, singular piety, and purity of manners.

MALEBRANCHE, Nicolas, a French philosopher, born at Paris 6th Aug. 1638. He studied at the colleges of la Marche, and Sorbonne, and in 1660, was admitted into the congregation of the oratory. He applied himself at first to ecclesiastical history, and afterwards to rabbinical learning, but found these pursuits not congenial to his mind, till in the perusal of Descartes' treatise upon Man, he discovered that philosophy was the science in which he was destined to be illustrious. He now devoted himself to serious meditation, and even closed his windows not to be interrupted by the light. His first and greatest work is "de la Recherche de la Verité," or Search after Truth, printed at Paris 1674. In this celebrated work the author proves that our senses and passions lead us to error, and that truth can be discovered only by thinking in God. Of human knowledge he speaks with contempt, but pays adoration to that sublime light which proceeds from the ideal world. In this, and in his other works he shows himself, says Locke, an acute and ingenious author, abounding in fine thoughts, judicious reasonings, and uncommon reflections. His other works are all on the same metaphysical subjects, and are nothing but explanations of the principles laid down in his "search," with much depth of reasoning, and force of genius. He died 1715, aged 55.

MALEGUZZI-VALERI, Veronica, a learned lady, born at Reggio. She supported in public in a very satisfactory manner two theses on the liberal arts, which have been published, besides Innocence Recognized, a drama, and she died 1690, in the convent of Modena, where she had retired.

MALEDAS, John, author of a chronicle from the creation, to the reign of Justinian, taught rhetoric at Antioch about 900. His works appeared at Oxford, 1691.

MALERMI, or MALERBI, Nicholas, a Venetian monk, who translated into Italian the bible, printed at Venice, 2 vols. fol. 1471. He also wrote "the Legends of the Saints," 1474, fol.

MALESHERBES, Christian William Lamoignon, a celebrated Frenchman, son of the chancellor of France. He was born at Paris 16th Dec. 1721, and brought up to the bar. He gradually rose to the office of first president of the court of Aides, 1750, and for 25 years was thus zealously engaged in the service of his country, in supporting and invigorating the industry of her inhabitants. After he had retired from this laborious duty to his estate, he was recalled in 1775, by Louis XVI. to become the minister of the interior, and in this high situation he conducted himself with the humanity and attention of a great and a good man. The prisons were visited, and no longer contained any but criminals who had violated the law; various employments were introduced to recommend habits of industry, and the apartments were rendered more commodious for the unfortunate captives. The retirement of Turgot from office was attended by that of his friend Malesherbes, who now employed himself in travelling under an assumed name and in a plain dress over France, Switzerland and Holland, and in examining the various manufactures, curiosities, and arts of each province. He hailed the revolution as the forerunner of blessing to France, but soon saw his hopes vanish; yet while others fled from the field of danger, he boldly appeared before the convention; and actuated by gratitude to humanity, he no sooner saw his sovereign dragged a criminal before his subjects, than he demanded the privilege and the honor of being his defender. The heroic conduct of this venerable man, while it drew admiration from all, had no effect on the bloody convention. His appeals in favor of Louis and of virtue were of no avail, and he was the first to announce to the unfortunate monarch the ill success of his defence. So much goodness it might have been expected ought to have met respect among a civilized nation, but it proved otherwise. No sooner was his daughter, the wife of the president Rosambo, accused of treason and hurried to prison, than the aged father requested he might accompany his beloved child. The request was granted, and in a few days, alas, he appeared with her and her child before the revolutionary tribunal, and with her and her innocent child he ascended the scaffold. These illustrious victims suffered, 22d April, 1793. He was author of a treatise on Rural Economy—Thoughts and Maxims—Two Memoirs on the Civil State of the Protestants.

MALEZIEU, Nicolas de, a French author, born at Paris 1650. He was tutor to the dukes of Maine and Burgundy, and the distinguished friend of Bossuet, and of Montausier. He was involved in the disgrace of his patron the duke of Orleans, and died 4th March, 1727, aged 77. He published Elements of Geography, 8vo.—several pieces in prose, &c. He was member of the French academy, and of that of sciences.

MALFILLASTRE, James Charles Lewis, a French poet, born 8th Oct. 1732, at St. John de Caen. He died at Paris 6th March, 1767. He was patronised by count Lauraguais, and his poem on Narcissus in the life of Venus, acquired him celebrity. He wrote besides, odes, sonnets, &c. and in the midst of that retirement which he preferred to public life, he rendered himself amiable and respected by the benevolence of his heart, and the innocence and simplicity of his manners.

MALHERBE, Francis de, a French poet, who according to Bayle, Balzac and Boileau formed the taste and judgment of his countrymen in matters of polite literature, and introduced, with purity of language, harmonious numbers and a just cadence. He was born at Caen about 1555, and died at Paris 1628. He was patronized by Henry the Great, and Mary de Medicis, and the particulars of his life were written by his friend and companion Racan. Though an elegant writer, he composed verses with great labor. His poetical works, divided into six books, consist of paraphrases on the psalms, odes, sonnets, and epigrams, published 1666, with the notes of Menage, and 1757, 8vo. He also translated some of Seneca's works, and some of Livy's decades.

MALINGRE, Claude, a French historian, born at Sens. His best work is said to be the History of the Honorary Dignities of France, 8vo. His other compositions, which are numerous on historical subjects, are far from respectable. He died 1655.

MALAPIERRA, Olympia, a Venetian lady of noble birth, who wrote poems of some merit, inserted in Buisson's collection, published at Naples, and died 1559.

MALLEMANS, Claude, a native of Beaune, member of the congregation of the oratory, and professor of philosophy at Paris, where he died 1723, aged 77. He is author of a New Philosophical System of the World, 12mo. — the Famous Problem of the Quadrature of the Circle, 12mo, &c.

MALLEMANS, John, brother to the preceding, took orders after being captain of dragoons. Besides a translation of Virgil into French, he wrote a History of Religion, from the Creation to the Reign of Jovian — Dissertations on Difficult Passages in the Scriptures, &c. He died 1740, aged 91.

MALLET, David, or MALLOCH, an English poet, born in Scotland about 1700, and educated at Edinburgh. He was recommended by his college to become tutor to the sons of the duke of Montrose, and after travelling with his pupils, he settled in London, where he was the companion of the great, the learned, and the witty. In 1724, he commenced author, and in 1733, paid his court to Pope in his "Verbal Criticism," a work of little merit. In 1740, appeared his life of lord Bacon, displaying more knowledge of history than of sciences, and soon after he undertook the life of the duke of Marlborough, at the request of the duchess; but, says his biographer, many were apprehensive that as he had forgotten Bacon was a philosopher, he might not recollect that Marlborough was a general. The work never appeared. Mallet afterwards became secretary to the prince of Wales with a salary of 200l. a year, and assisted Thomson in the composition of his Masque of Alfred, which was repeatedly acted before the prince at Chisden, 1740, and also at Drury lane, 1751. The poet died 1765. His works have been collected in 3 vols. 12mo. but possess little poetical merit. He published lord Bolingbroke's works, 5 vols. 4to. as his lordship had left the care of them to him as his property.

MALLET, Edmund, a French divine, born at Melun 1713. He was in 1751, made professor of divinity in the college of Navarre at Paris, where he died 1755. He was one of the writers of the Encyclopedia, on the articles of divinity, and belles lettres, and composed besides several works on the principles of poetry and eloquence — Essay on the best Orators — a History of the Civil Wars under Francis II. Charles IX. &c. from the Italian of Davila.

MALLET, Henry, a writer of Geneva, author of a History of Denmark, of Northern Antiquities, &c.

MALLET DU PAN, James, a native of Geneva, educated under the patronage of Voltaire, at Cassel, where he became professor of belles lettres. Afterwards as the continuator of the annals of Linguet, and the conductor of the Mercure de France, he acquired celebrity, but when the French revolution broke out, his attachment to the royal cause exposed him to the severest persecutions of the republicans. After being 115 times denounced as a dangerous man, and finding no safe asylum either in France, or in Switzerland, or at Geneva, he came to London, where he conducted the Mercure Britannique. In this periodical work, by wishing to please every party he offended all: the jacobins were disgusted with the details which recalled to mind their cruel excesses, and the emigrants were displeased that opinions were entertained which discouraged the introduction of the ancient government of France. Notwithstanding these jarring opinions it was evident that he possessed great powers of mind, independence of sentiment, and integrity of character. This learned but persecuted man died at Richmond 15th May, 1800, in the house of his friend Lalli-Tollendal, leaving a wife and five children, for whose maintenance a handsome subscription was raised. He wrote besides the Influence of Philosophy on Literature, 8vo. — Discourse on Eloquence and Political Systems, 12mo. — Considerations on the French Revolution, 8vo. — Correspondence for an History of French Republicanism, 8vo. &c.

MALLINKROTT, Bernard, dean of the cathedral of Munster, was very learned but very turbulent. He was nominated to two bishoprics, but his ambition was to be bishop of Munster; yet he was defeated in his intrigues, and 1650, in consequence of his seditious conduct he was degraded, and afterwards imprisoned by his rival in the castle of Ottinheim, where he died 1664. He wrote de Natura et Usu Literarum, 4to. — de Ortu & Progressu Artis Typographicæ, 4to. — Paralipomenon de Historicis Græcis, 4to. and other works.

MALOUIN, Paul James, a native of Caen, professor of medicine in the royal college at Paris, and physician to the queen. He wrote a treatise on Chemistry — on Medical Chemistry — and the Chemical Articles in the Encyclopedie. He died at Paris 1777, aged 76. Another of the same name and family was author of a treatise on Solid and Fluid Bodies, and practised as a physician. He died 1718.

MALPIGHI, Marcello, an Italian physician, born 10th March, 1628, at Crevalcuore, near Bologna. He studied anatomy and physic at Bologna, under Massari and Mariano, and took there his doctor's degree 1653. In 1656, he was appointed professor, by the senate of Bologna, but soon left it by the invitation of the grand duke of Tuscany to settle at Pisa, where his curious experiments were assisted by his friend Borelli. In 1659, as the air of Pisa did not agree with him, he returned to Bologna, where he practised with great popularity. In 1662, he was prevailed upon to go to Messina as professor, and in 1691, the new pope Innocent XII. sent for him to Rome, and made him his physician. He died 29th Nov. 1694, in consequence of a paralytic stroke. His discoveries in anatomy were curious and important. By his delicate dissections he found out the lobules of the liver, and the nature of the formation and mechanism of the kidneys, and of the reins, and of the heart. His works were printed together, London, 1697, folio, and reprinted more correctly Amst. 1698, in 4to.

MALVASIA, Charles Caesar, a native of Bologna, author of an Italian History of the Painters of Bologna, 2 vols. — and Marmora Felsinea, 4to. 1660. He was canon of Bologna cathedral.

MALVEZZI, Virgilio, marquis of, an Italian writer, born at Bologna 1599. He studied the law and took his doctor's degree 1616, but afterwards he applied himself to arms, and was employed by Philip IV. of Spain, Spain, and admitted into his council of war. He died at Bologna 11th Aug. 1654. He wrote various works in Spanish and Italian, and was author of a discourse on Tacitus' first book of Annals translated into English.

MAMBRUN, Peter, a French jesuit, born at Clermont, 1581. He has written some elegant Latin eclogues, and georgics in the style of Virgil, besides a heroic poem in 12 books, called Constantine, and a valuable "Peripatetic Dissertation." He died 1661.

MAMMEA, Julia, mother of the emperor Severus, is known for her virtues, and the judicious conduct which she displayed during the minority of her son. She was assassinated by the rebellious soldiers with her son, at Mayence, 235.

MAN, Cornelius de, a native of Delft, who after studying painting in Italy and France nine years, returned to his country where he settled, and acquired celebrity by his representation of historical pieces, conversations, &c. He died 1706, aged 85.

MANASSEH, succeeded his father Hezekiah, at the age of 12. Disgraced by his ill conduct he was 677 B. C. carried by Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, a captive to Babylon. His misfortunes and his captivity produced reflection and repentance, and when restored to his kingdom he became an exemplary monarch, and re-established the worship of the God of his fathers. There is an excellent prayer by him preserved in the apocrypha. He died B. C. 643.

MANCINELLI, Antonio, an Italian poet and orator, born at Velitri 1452. He published a poem, "Silva Vitæ Suæ," and other pieces, and died 1506.

MANCO-CAPAC, founder of the Peruvian empire, declared himself to be the descendant of the sun. After civilizing his subjects, and uniting their scattered tribes under one monarchy he was regarded and worshipped as a deity after his death.

MANDEVILLE, John, a famous English traveller, born at St. Alban's 1300. He left England 1332, and during an absence of 34 years he visited the various countries of Scythia, Armenia, Egypt, Arabia, Media, Persia, Chaldea, Greece, &c. and made himself well acquainted with their language and manners. At his return he wrote an "Itinerary," or account of his travels, in English, French and Latin, which is interesting and curious, but abounds with the marvellous and the fictitious. He died at Liege 17th Nov. 1372.

MANDEVILLE, Bernard de, M. D. a Dutch physician, born at Dort 1670. After studying in Holland, he came over to England in the beginning of the 18th century, where he wrote several books. His "Virgin Unmasked," a most licentious performance, was published 1709, and in 1711, his "treatise of the Hypochondria and Hysterical Passions," a work of some merit. In 1723, he published his poem with notes, called "the Fables of the Bees, or Private Vices made Public Benefits," a work which was reprehended by the grand jury of Middlesex, and attacked from various quarters. The author took no notice of his opponents till 1728, when he published another volume, called the second part of the Fables of the Bees. It has been observed that he improperly confounds superfluities and faults, and by representing human nature as low and vicious, and men as knaves and libertines, he destroys all the noble incentives to virtue. In 1720, he published "Free Thoughts on Religion," and in 1732, an Inquiry into the Origin of Honor, &c. He died Jan. 1733. The literary opponents of Dr. Mandeville, were Dr. Fiddes, J. Dennis, W. Law, Bluet, Hutcheson, A. Campbell, and Berkeley, bishop of Cloyne.

MANDRILLON, J. a native of Bourg-en-Bresse, who embraced the mercantile profession, and travelled in America and Holland. He settled in Holland, but his opposition to the Stadtholder made him unpopular, and he returned to France, where the independance of his character rendered him suspected to Robespierre, who ordered him to the guillotine, 1793. He wrote the American Spectator, 8vo. a work of merit, and other things.

MANES, the founder of the sect of the Manichees. He began to propagate about the year 277, his doctrines which indeed he had derived from others, especially one Scythianus, whose works had fallen into his hands. Mingling the pure doctrines of christianity with the fables of paganism, he taught that there were two principles of all things, coeternal and coeval, that is God and the devil, that from the former all good, and from the latter all evil proceeded. The good being he called the author of the New Testament, the bad of the Old. God, he added, created the soul, the devil the body. The followers of these superstitious and incongruous notions were at one time very numerous. Manes pretended also to work miracles, and he was therefore sent for by Sapor king of Persia to cure his son, but his pretended power failed him, the child died in his arms, and the disappointed father ordered the prophet to be slead alive, and his skin stuffed with chaff, to be hung up at the gates of the capital, where Epiphanius who refuted his doctrines and exposed his follies, saw it.

MANETHO, an Egyptian historian, author of a Greek history of his country, B. C. 304. His works are lost, except a poem on the influence of the stars, published Leyden, 1698.

MANETTI, Gianozzo, a native of Florence, illustrious as one of those active men to whom the revival of literature may be attributed. He studied under Chrysoloras, and read lectures at Florence, on the philosophy of Aristotle, and assisted in the affairs of the government. He afterwards retired to Rome, where he became secretary to pope Nicholas V. and next went into the service of Alphonso king of Naples, where he died 1459, aged 63. Besides a Latin translation of the Greek testament, he wrote the lives of Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Nicholas V. — a treatise against the Jews — on the Dignity of Man — on the Works of Aristotle, &c.

MANETTI, Rutilio, a native of Siena, eminent as a painter. His works adorn the palaces of Florence and Pisa. He died 1639, aged 68.

MANETTI, Xavier, professor of botany and medicine at Florence, was keeper of the imperial garden, and author of Catalogus Horti Academici Florent. — Viridarium Florent. 8vo. — Ornithologiae Tomus Quintus & Ultimus, fol. 1775. He died 1785 at Florence.

MANFREDI, Eustachio, an Italian mathematician, born 1674, at Bologna, where he became mathematical professor professor. He was member of several learned societies, and died 1739. He wrote Ephemerides, 4 vols. 4to. — de Transitu Mercurii per Solem, 1723 — de Annis Stellarum Aberrationibus, 4to. and also sonnets and canzonets, edited 1713.

MANFREDI, Bartholomew, a painter, born at Mantua 1574. He successfully imitated his master Michael Angelo, of Caravaggio, and in his representation of soldiers, sailors, peasants, and drunken scenes, &c. was much admired.

MANGEART, Thomas, a learned Benedictine, greatly honored by the duke of Lorraine, to whom he was antiquary, librarian and counsellor. He died 1763. His great work is "Introduction to the Science of Medals," folio, besides sermons, &c.

MANGENOT, Lewis, a native of Paris, author of eclogues, fables, tales, and madrigals, &c. published Amsterdam 1776. He was an ecclesiastic, and died at Paris 1768, aged 74.

MANGET, John James, an eminent physician, born at Geneva 1652. He was physician to the elector of Brandenburg, and died at Geneva 1742, aged 90. He published Bibliotheca Anatomica-Pharmaceutica-Medica — Chirurgica — Scriptorum Medicorum — Chemica et Pharmacopeia, works of more labor than genius, and comprehended in 14 folio vols.

MANGEY, Thomas, fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, and D. D. became rector of St. Mildred's Breadstreet, vicar of Yealing, and prebendary of London. He published an edition of Philo-Judæus, 2 vols. folio. — Remarks upon Nazareus, against Toland, 8vo. — and Practical Discourses on the Lord's Prayer, preached at Lincoln's Inn, of which the third edition appeared 1721. He died 11th March, 1755.

MANILIUS, Marcus, a poet in the reign of Tiberius. His Astronomicon, which was discovered by the learned Poggio in the 16th century, is best edited 1787, at Straßburg, 8vo.

MANLEY, Mary, an English writer, born at Guernsey, where her father sir Roger was governor. She lost, when very young, her mother, and her father some time after, and in this distressing situation she was enticed into a marriage with a relation of the same name, to whose care her unprotected innocence had been entrusted by her dying parents. The new husband, who had already another wife, took his bride to London, and soon after cruelly deserted her. She afterwards became acquainted with the duchess of Cleveland, one of the king's mistresses, but upon being dismissed by her, she determined to spend the rest of her life in retirement and obscurity. This might have succeeded, but her "Royal Mischiefs," a tragedy, when represented at Lincoln's Inn-fields theatre, proved so popular that she was now courted and flattered by men of wit and gallantry, and she in an evil hour yielded her virtue to the lure of temptation. But though engaged in intrigues, she still continued to be an author, and her "Memoirs of the New Atalantis," a romance in 4 vols. in which she described in wanton language the amours of some distinguished characters, but in feigned names, drew upon her a prosecution. Her printer and publisher were apprehended, but she nobly appeared before the king's bench to take the blame upon herself, and after answering with spirit various interrogatories before the privy council, and being held in strict confinement, she was at last admitted to bail, and finally liberated. She afterwards wrote in favor of queen Anne's ministry, and died the mistress of alderman Barber of London, 11th June, 1724. She was author of Lucius king of Britain, a tragedy, acted 1717 — Lost Lover, or the Jealous Husband, acted 1696, besides letters, &c.

MANLIUS, a famous Roman, who derived the name of Torquatus from his conquest, in single combat, of a gigantic Gaul whose collar, torquis, he carried away in triumph. When dictator he cruelly put his son to death for fighting without his orders, a circumstance which rendered him odious to his countrymen, B. C. 340.

MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, Marcus, a Roman consul, who being suddenly awakened by the cackling of geese, preserved the capitol when besieged by the Gauls. He afterwards aspired to the sovereignty of Rome, and was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, 384 B. C.

MANNERS, John, marquis of Granby, son of the duke of Rutland, was born, Jan. 1721. He distinguished himself as a soldier, and went to the German wars, under Ferdinand of Brunswick, as general of the British forces; and during the campaigns on the continent, obtained great and deserved popularity by his conduct in the battles of Minden, Warburg, Kirk-Denkern, Græbstein, and Homburg. He died 1770, highly respected by the nation and by the government.

MANNINGHAM, Thomas, D. D. a learned prelate, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He became rector of East Tystead, Hants, preacher of the Rolls, 1684, rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, 1691, the next year canon, and afterwards dean of Windsor, and 1709, bishop of Chichester. He published some occasional sermons, and died 25th Aug. 1722, and was buried in St. Andrew's church.

MANNORI, Lewis, author of Memoirs and Pleadings, in 18 vols. 12mo. a work curious and interesting, was an advocate of the parliament of Paris, and died in that city, 1778, aged 82. He exposed himself to the satire of Voltaire, for being engaged in a cause against him.

MANNOZZI, John, a painter, born at St. John, a village near Florence. He was patronized by Lorenzo de Medicis, whose palace he adorned by the labors of his art, particularly in fresco. He was a man of capricious and irascible character. He died 1636, aged 46.

MANSARD, Francis, a French architect, born 1598. His genius was displayed in the erection of the gate of the church of the Feuillans, of the church of les Filles Ste. Marie, the hotels de Bouillon, Toulouse, and Jars, and other edifices in Paris, and in the provinces. He was first architect to the king, and superintendant of the royal buildings, in which he was succeeded by his nephew, of the same name, also an ingenious man, who was honored with the order of St. Michael. He died 1666, and his nephew 1708, aged 69.

MANSFELD, Peter Ernest, count de, an able statesman man in the service of the emperor of Germany. He was made prisoner at Ivoy, 1552, and when restored to liberty, he obtained the government of Luxembourg, where his administration was conducted with prudence and ability, to the maintenance of tranquillity, in the midst of the troubles of Brabant. His services were considered as so meritorious, that he was appointed governor of the whole country. He died 1604, aged 87.

MANSFELD, Ernest de, natural son of count Mansfeld, distinguished himself so much that he was legitimated by the emperor Rodolphus II. He was refused the succession of his father's honors and possessions, in consequence of which he joined the protestants in 1610, and showed himself a vigorous enemy of the house of Austria. He died at a village in the territory of Venice, Nov. 1626, aged 46.

MANSFIELD, earl of, Vid. MURRAY.

MANSTEIN, Christopher Herman de, a Russian writer, born at Petersburg, 1711. He was a brave officer, and distinguished in the service of the Russian and Prussian monarchs. He was shot in the war of 1757, while serving as major-general at the head of a Prussian regiment, leaving two sons and four daughters. He wrote a valuable work, Memoirs of Russia, 2 vols. 8vo. printed at Lyons, 1772, and Leipzig, 1781, and published in English, in 2 vols. 4to. under the care of Mr. Hume.

MANTEGNA, Andrea, an Italian painter, born at a village near Padua, 1451. He was originally a shepherd, but the rough drawings which he made for his amusement, were seen and admired: he was placed under a master, and improved so much, that at the age of 17 he painted the altar piece of the church of St. Sophia, in Padua. He painted also another celebrated piece for the duke of Mantua, the triumphs of Julius Cæsar, which have been placed in the collection of Hampton-court. He died at Mantua, 1517.

MANTICA, Francis, a native of Udina, professor of law at Padua. He afterwards went to Rome under the patronage of Sixtus VI. and of Clement VIII. who made him a cardinal. He wrote, de Conjunctionis Ultimæ Voluntatum, folio — Lucubrationes Vaticanæ — Decisiones Rotæ Rom. &c. and died 1614, aged 80.

MANTINUS, James, author of a book on the Republic of Plato, and translator of the works of Avicenna and Averroes into Latin, was a Spanish physician in the 16th century, who practised with great reputation at Venice.

MANTON, Thomas, D. D. a native of Lawrence Lydiard, Somersetshire, educated at Wadham college, Oxford. He was ordained by bishop Hall, and had first the cure of Colyton, Devonshire, after which he settled at Stoke Newington, and became a popular preacher in London, and before the parliament. He was, at the restoration, chaplain to the king, but lost his preferment in 1662, for non-conformity, and in 1671 was imprisoned for officiating in a conventicle. He died 1677, aged 57, and was buried in Stoke Newington church. His works, consisting of Sermons, and other Calvinistic tracts, were edited in 5 vols. folio.

MANTUAN, Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Mantua, 1448, the natural son of Peter Spagnolo, a man of distinction. He was affectionately educated by his father, and afterwards entered among the Carmelites, of whose order he became general. He, however, quitted them in disgust, 1515, and devoted himself to literature. He died the next year. His works, which possess not much animation, were printed at Paris, 1513, 3 vols. folio. A more perfect edition appeared at Antwerp, 1576, in 4 vols. 8vo.

MANUEL, Comnenus, emperor of the east, after his father John, 1143, and to the prejudice of his elder brother Isaac, whom his father had disinherited. After repelling the invasion of Roger, king of Sicily, he made war against Dalmatia, Hungary, and Egypt, which he might have conquered, if not perfidiously abandoned by Amaury, king of Jerusalem, on whose assistance he too strongly relied. He died 1180.

MANUEL, Paleologus, son and successor of John, on the throne of Constantinople, took the monastic habit, and retired to a monastery, after resigning his dignity to his son, John VII. whom he considered as more capable than himself to repel the invasion of the Turks. He died 1425, aged 75.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, a celebrated printer, born at Bassano. He was the first who printed Greek with correctness and elegance; and he introduced that form of letters still in use, called Italics. His editions of the classics were held in high estimation. He died at Venice, where he had long exercised his profession with much success, 1516. One copy of his capital works was always printed on vellum.

MANUTIUS, Paul, son of Aldus, was of the same profession. He was librarian to Pius IV. and seconded his attempts to print all the Fathers in a new and elegant manner. He was far more learned than his father, and acquired, by the frequent reading of Cicero, such facility of elegant composition, that Scaliger says, a Roman could not have written better. He wrote epistles, very labored — and Commentaries on Cicero, 4 vols. folio. He wrote besides, other works, the best of which is perhaps, his book de Legibus Romanorum. He died 1574; and it is said his days were shortened in consequence of youthful follies, and of domestic calamities.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, the younger, son of Paul, was also a printer. He promised in his youth to obtain greater celebrity than his father and grandfather; but he proved unfortunate. Negligence produced distress, and he at last became so indigent, that he sold the excellent library of 80,000 volumes, collected by his ancestors, to maintain himself. Pope Clement VIII. made him director of the Vatican press. He died very poor 1597, at Rome. He wrote Commentaries on Cicero — a treatise on Orthography — Notes on Ancient Writers — three books of Epistles — the Lives of Cosmo de Medicis, and of Castruccio Castracani, &c.

MANZO, John Baptist, marquis de Villa, an Italian, who after serving with credit in the Spanish army, devoted himself to literature at Naples, where he assisted in the foundation of the Degli Otiosi academy. He wrote a Life of Tasso, 12mo — Del Amore Dialogi, 8vo.

8vo. — Rime, 12mo. and died at Naples, 1645, aged 84.

MANZOULI, Tomaso, an Italian painter, whose historical pieces, landscapes, &c. were much admired. He died 1570, aged 39.

MAPES, Walter, a poet, chaplain to Henry II. Under John he was made canon of Salisbury, precentor of Lincoln, and archdeacon of Oxford. He wrote in Latin, in a satirical style, and some of his verses are still read and admired. He was a facetious companion.

MAPLETOFT, John M. D. an English divine, born June, 1631, at Margaret-Inge, in Huntingdonshire, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He travelled with the sons of the earl of Northumberland, and at his return he took his degrees in medicine, and settled as a practitioner in London. Here he was distinguished as the friend of Willis, Sydenham, and Locke, of Tillotson, Patrick, Sherlock, and other learned men, and in 1670, he went with lord Essex, the ambassador to the court of Denmark. In 1675 he was chosen professor of physic of Gresham college, and 1676 attended the ambassador Montague, to France. He married in 1679, and then abandoning medicine, applied himself to divinity; took orders, 1682, and obtained the rectory of Braybrook, Northamptonshire, and some other preferment. When William was at Cambridge 1689, he took his degree of D. D. and in 1707, was president of Sion college. He continued to preach in his church of St. Lawrence, Jewry, till he was turned of 80, and died 1721, at Westminster, aged 91. He translated Sydenham's Medical Observations into Latin, and wrote besides, the Principles and Duties of the Christian Religion, 8vo. — and other things.

MARACCI, Lewis, vid. MARRACCI.

MARACCI, John, a painter, born at Lucca. His historical pieces exhibited great taste and judgment. He died 1704, aged 67.

MARAIS, Marin, a celebrated musician, born at Paris, 1656. He composed some admired pieces for the theatres, especially Alcides — Ariadne and Bacchus — Semele and Alcyone, the last of which is his best performance. He died 15th Aug. 1728, aged 72, leaving nine children, some of whom inherited part of his great musical talents.

MARALDI, James Philip, a mathematician, born at Perinaldo, near Nice, 1665. He studied in France, and was engaged with Cassini, in constructing the great meridian line through France. He died 1729, aged 64, leaving behind him a catalogue of the fixed stars, and curious observations, printed in the memoirs of the academy of sciences, and pieces on bees, and petrefactions.

MARANA, John Paul, author of the Turkish Spy, a work once read with great avidity, and considered as authentic, but now regarded as half fictitious, was born at Genoa. He resided for some time at Paris, and again returned to his own country, where he died 1693, aged 51. The Turkish Spy was first published in 6 vols. 12mo. and in 1742, when the last edition appeared, another volume was added.

MARAT, John Paul, one of the atrocious leaders of the French revolution, was born at Beaudry, near Neuchâtel, in Switzerland, 1744. He studied medicine, but with little knowledge of it, he acquired public notice by passing as an empiric, and by selling at a high price, a water which he pretended could cure all diseases. After visiting England, he returned to Paris, at the time that the revolution broke out, and with all the ardor of a man who wishes to profit by the miseries of the public, he began to attack the character of the ministers, especially Necker, in his Publiciste Parisien. To this vile, but popular publication, succeeded L'Ami du Peuple, in which he recommended in seditious language, revolt, pillage, and murder; he excited the soldiers to assassinate their generals, the poor to seize the property of the rich, and the profligate to cut off their enemies. Though the assembly viewed his conduct with detestation, and seized his papers, he continued his periodical labors, under the patronage of the jacobins, and when elected deputy to the convention, he appeared in the hall, armed with pistols. Delighting in blood, he promoted the murders of September, and never satisfied with carnage, he, by repeated accusations, carried the most virtuous of the citizens, and the bravest of the generals, to the guillotine, and declared with exultation, that the happiness of France required for its consolidation, the sacrifice of 300,000 more lives. This execrable wretch might still have added to the number of his victims, but a heroine arose to rid the world of the blood thirsty tyrant. Charlotte Corday obtained access to him while he was in his bath, and with a blow of a dagger she laid the monster dead at her feet, 14th July, 1793. His remains were honored by his sanguinary accomplices, with all the distinction due only to a hero, and were deposited in great pomp, in the pantheon. But though prejudice or fear exalted this monster to the rank of a god, and dedicated busts, pyramids, and temples to his honor, the public opinion soon changed, his memory was insulted, and his very body dug up, and thrown into a common sink. This worthless tyrant was, in his person, disagreeable and ferocious; he spoke with animation, but his looks betrayed the black purposes of his heart, and the words of an ancient author have been properly applied to him;

Corpore cum fædo, species est fædior oris,

Fædum pectus habet, fædus ingenium.

He wrote Man, or the Principles of the Influence of the Soul on the Body, and of the Body on the Soul, 1775, 2 vols. 12mo. a work severely criticized by Voltaire — Discoveries on Fire, Electricity, and Light, 8vo. 1779 — Discovery on Light, 8vo. in which he attacks Newton's System — Memoirs on Electricity, &c.

MARATTI, Carlo, an Italian painter, born 1625, at Camerino, in the march of Ancona. His fondness for painting was early discovered, and he was sent to Rome, where he became pupil to Andrea Sacchi, and soon acquired celebrity by the grace and beauty of his figures. He was knighted, and received a pension from Clement XI. and was appointed painter in ordinary to Lewis XIV. He studied the pieces of Raphael, the Caraccis, and Guido, with astonishing success, and chiefly excelled as the painter of female saints, and madonnas. He died at Rome, loaded with honors and opulence, 1713, aged 88.

MARBACH, John, a protestant divine, native of Lindau, author of a curious book, called Fides Jesu et Jesuitarum, in which he compared the doctrines of Jefus with those of the jesuits. He died at Strasburg, 1581, aged 60.

MARBODUS, or MARBODÆUS, surnamed Gallus, a monk of Angers, bishop of Rennes, an honor which he resigned some time before his death. He wrote a book, "De Gemmis" — the Life of Magnoboldus, bishop of Angers — some sacred poems, &c. and died 1123.

MARCA, Peter de, an eminent French writer and prelate, born 1594, at Gart, in Bearn. He studied the law, and in 1621 was made president of the parliament of Bearn, and in 1639, counsellor of state at Paris. He published in 1640, "the History of Bearn" which widely established his reputation as an elegant writer, and a good politician, and was then engaged to defend and explain the liberties of the Gallican church, which some enemies of cardinal Richelieu represented as desirous of separating in an independent patriarchate from the see of Rome. His book, "De Concordiâ Sacerdotii & Imperii," 1641, though written with moderation, and at the command of the French king, gave some offence to the pope, and when the author in consequence of his services, was nominated to the see of Conferans, his consecration was delayed till he had made his peace with his ecclesiastical master, by the publication of another treatise, De Singulari Primatu Petri, in which he asserted the supremacy of the pope. He was sent in 1644, as visitor general to Catalonia, and executed his office with such popularity, that when ill the public prayers of the province were offered for his recovery. He took possession of his bishopric in 1648, and soon after was raised to the see of Toulouse, where he was admitted in 1655. He afterwards distinguished himself in the general assembly of the clergy, in opposition to the jansenists, and in 1658 was made minister of state. In 1660 he was engaged at Rouffillon, on determining the boundaries of the French and Spanish territories in the Pyrenees, in which he was greatly assisted by his classical knowledge. He obtained in 1662 the high dignity of archbishop of Paris, but died there in June, on the same day that the bulls arrived from Rome to confirm his elevation. De Marca was a man of extraordinary talents, which he had assiduously cultivated at Toulouse. He was married, and had several children, but of the death of his wife, 1632, he became an ecclesiastic, and rose to the dignities we have mentioned.

MARCEL, N. a painter of Frankfort. His vases, filled with fruits and flowers, his shells, &c. were finished in a pleasing style. He died 1683, aged 55.

MARCEL, William, author of a History of the Origin of the French monarchy, 4 vols. 12mo. — Chronological Tables of Ancient History, sacred and profane, was a French advocate, and died commissary at Arles, 1708, aged 61.

MARCELLI, Benedict, the prince of music, according to the flattery of the Italians, was a noble Venetian, who excelled not only in music, but also in philosophy, and in poetry. His "Fashionable Stage," in Italian, in which he ridicules modern operas, is his best prose composition, and his chief poetical work is the comedy Toscanismo, &c. He died 1739, aged 53.

MARCELLINUS, succeeded Caius in the popedom, 296, and died eight years after. He is vindicated by Augustine against the Donatists, who accuse him of offering sacrifices to idols.

MARCELLUS, a physician of Side, in Pamphylia whence he is surnamed Sidetes. He flourished under Adrian and the Antonines, and wrote a poem on medicine, now lost. — A physician of Bourdeaux, author of some medical works, lived about 381 A. D.

MARCELLUS I. pope after Marcellinus, 308, was banished by Maxentius, the emperor, for excommunicating a worthless apostate, and he died 310.

MARCELLUS II. pope after Julius III. died a few weeks after his elevation, 1555. He was a native of Montepulciano, and was secretary to Paul III. who created him a cardinal, and made him president of the council of Trent.

MARCH, Ausias, a poet of Valencia in the 15th century. He wrote amatory verses in praise of his fair countrywoman, Theresa Bon, as Petrarch celebrated his Laura, and in consequence of the similarity of their poetry they have been accused of stealing one from the other, though it is probable that they both borrowed from some earlier poet.

MARCHAND, Prosper, a French writer, who quitted France to profess the protestant religion in Holland. He published there, "the Literary Journal," and died at a great age, 1756. He published besides, "the History of Printing," — Dictionnaire Historique, two small folio vols. and a new edition of the dictionary and letters of Bayle.

MARCHE, Oliver de la, a French writer, gentleman to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, and afterwards in the service of Charles the Rash, who was slain at the battle of Nancy, 1477, and next in the employment of Maximilian of Austria, and of the archduke Philip. He died at Brussels, 1501. His works are "Memoirs or Chronicles," 4to. 1610 — a Treatise on Duels, 8vo. — the Triumph of Virtuous Women, 8vo. 1529, &c.

MARCHETTI, Alexander, a physician and poet, born at Pontormo, near Pisa, 1633. He succeeded his friend Borelli, as professor of mathematics at Pisa, and in his lectures preferred reason and experiment to authority, and to Aristotle. He died 1714. He wrote poems in 4to. — treatises on philosophical subjects — a translation of Lucretius, in Italian verse, 4to. — a translation of Anacreon.

MARCHIN, Ferdinand count, a native of Liege, who signalized himself in the French armies at the battles of Fleurus and Nerwinde, and at the siege of Charleroi. He was sent in 1701, as ambassador from Lewis XV. to the king of Spain, and behaved with great disinterestedness in refusing the rank of nobility from the Spanish court. He was afterwards in the army in Germany, and commanded the retreat at the fatal battle of Hockstet. He was wounded at the battle of Turin, which had been fought against his advice, 7th Sept. 1706, and he died soon after the amputation of his thigh.

MARCIANUS, an obscure Thracian, raised to the imperial dignity on the death of Theodosius II. His virtues were many, and the expectations of Rome were great, but he unfortunately died while preparing to repel the barbarians, who had invaded Africa, 457, aged 69.

MARCILIUS, Theodore, a learned German critic, born at Arnheim, in Gueldres, 1548. He was educated under his father, a man of learning, and afterwards at Deventer and Louvain. He visited Paris, and taught belles lettres there, and in 1602 was made royal professor for of the Latin tongue. He died 1617. Though abused by Scaliger, he was a learned man, and published Pythagoras' Golden Verses, with annotations, besides Historia Stenarum, 8vo. — some poems and orations, &c.

MARCION, a heretic of the second century. He was born at Sinope, in Paphlagonia, where his father was bishop, and devoted himself to a life of mortification. Breaking, however, his vows of continence, he was excommunicated by his father, who never would again re-admit him within the pale of the church, in consequence of which he went to Rome, where his disgrace followed him. Unable to be reconciled to the church, he embraced the heretical opinion of Cerdo, to which he afterwards added the wild principles of Manes, with some incoherent doctrines of his own. It is said, that before his death he wished to renounce all his errors. The time of his death is unknown.

MARDONIUS, son-in-law of Darius, was at the head of the army of Xerxes, in his invasion of Greece, and he was killed at the battle of Platæa, B. C. 479.

MARDUEL, John, a native of Lyons, who studied for the ecclesiastical profession at Villefranche, Beaujolais, and Paris. He became minister of St. Roch, where his conduct as a pastor, as a peace maker, and as a man, was most exemplary. He died universally respected, 1787, aged 88.

MARE, William de la, or MAR, a Latin poet, of noble birth in the Cotentin. Disgusted with the court, where he was secretary to the chancellor, he retired to Caen, where he became rector of the university, and in 1510 treasurer and canon of Coutances. He wrote two poems, Chimæra, 1514, 4to. — De tribus fugiendis, Ventre & Pluma, 1512, 4to.

MARE, Philibert de la, counsellor in the parliament of Dijon, was an elegant Latin writer, and died 1687. He wrote commentaries, De Bello Burgundico, 4to. — Historicorum Burgund. Conspectus, &c.

MARE, Nicolas de la, principal magistrate of the Chatelet, under Lewis XIV. with whom he was in great favor, died 1723, aged 82. He was author of a valuable Treatise on the Police, 3 vols. folio, to which a fourth was added after his death.

MARECHAL, George, a native of Calais, son of a poor officer. His skill in surgical operations was very great, especially in lithotomy, and his attention to Lewis XIV. when attacked by an abscess in the neck, 1696, was rewarded with the appointment of surgeon to the royal household, in 1703 he was made maître d'hotel, and received a patent of nobility. He died at his seat at Bievre, 1736, aged 78. The memoirs of the academy of surgery at Paris were enriched by some of his papers.

MARECHAL, Peter Sylvan, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and afterwards became a periodical writer at the revolution. He wrote nineteen different things, some of which were very profane and indecent, among which were, a book escaped from the Deluge — the Pantheon — Dictionary of Atheists — Voyage of Pythagoras, 6 vols. 8vo. a weak imitation of Barthelemy's Anarcharis, &c. He died at Paris, 18th Jan. 1803.

MARETS, Roland des, a native of Paris, author of Latin philological letters of great merit. He died 1653, aged 59.

MARETS, John des, a French writer, very debauched in his youth. He afterwards became a great saint, and a fanatic, and prophesied as from divine revelation, that the French king would destroy the Turkish empire, and the religion of Mahomet, after uniting all the princes of Europe in one common cause to profess and support the catholic tenets of the see of Rome. He wrote some dramatic pieces, of which "Les Visionnaires," particularly was acted with great applause, besides a Paraphrase of David's Psalms — the Christian Virtues, a poem in eight cantos — Clovis, an epic poem, in 26 books — Les Delices de l'Esprit, a wild performance — some romances, &c. He was a great enemy of the Janseists, and died 1676, aged 81.

MARETS, Samuel des, a protestant divine, born at Oismond, in Picardy, 1599. He studied belles lettres at Paris, and divinity at Saumur and Geneva. He took orders in 1620, though he was of small stature, and went by the name of the little preacher; but he grew up to his 25th year, and attained nearly the full size. He was minister successively at Laon, Falaise, Sedan, and in 1642 became professor at Groningen, where his abilities were displayed to the great advantage and celebrity of that university. He was afterwards invited to Lausanne, and in 1663 to Leyden, but as he prepared to remove to this place, he died at Groningen, May 18th, the same year. In his literary labors he was engaged in controversies for 18 years, with Boetius, and for a little time with Daille. He also attacked Grotius, for his explanations about Antichrist, and also waged a paper war with Comenius and Labadie and Peter Serrarius, among those enthusiasts who in favor of their reveries consider the striking events of human governments as influenced by the position or motion of the stars. His works were very numerous, and on various subjects, and showed astonishing marks of knowledge and erudition. He had formed a plan for their republication, and had collected materials for four folio volumes, when he died. He left two sons, Henry, who published a French edition of the bible, with notes, 3 vols. folio — Latin Catechism on Grace — and Daniel.

MARGARET, sister of Edgar Atheling, fled to Scotland on the invasion of William the Conqueror, and married Malcolm, king of the country. She was a very amiable and benevolent princess. Her three sons, Edgar, Alexander, and David, successively filled the throne of Scotland, and her daughter Matilda married Henry I. of England. She died 16th Nov. 1093, aged 47.

MARGARET, daughter of Waldemar III. king of Denmark, and wife of Haquin, king of Norway, ascended in 1387, the throne of Denmark, and that of Norway, on the death of her son, Olaus. When the Swedes, dissatisfied with the conduct of Albert, their king, offered her the crown of the country, she accepted the conditions, and after a bloody war of seven years, she placed it on her own head, 1394, and by her valor and heroic deeds deserved and obtained the surname of the Semiramis of the north. Thus mistress of three kingdoms, she took measures to render their connection indissoluble by the celebrated law called the union of Calmar, but unfortunately for herself and her successors, she regarded little the solemnity of agreements, and by violating the laws which she had enacted, and by oppressing her subjects, she she rendered herself unpopular, and her government odious. She died little lamented, 1412, aged 59, after a reign of 26 years. She was succeeded by her nephew, Eric, duke of Pomerania.

MARGARET, daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, married St. Lewis, 1254, and attended him in his wars in the Holy Land, against the Saracens, where on his captivity, she behaved with heroic intrepidity in the defence of Damiatta. She died at Paris, 1285, aged 76.

MARGARET, daughter of Robert, duke of Burgundy, married Lewis Hutin, king of France, 1305. She possessed great personal charms, but unfortunately disgraced herself by the grossest sensuality. Her lover was condemned to be flead alive, and she herself was strangled to death, 1315.

MARGARET, daughter of the emperor Maximilian I. was betrothed to the dauphin of France, afterwards Charles VIII. but did not marry him. She was afterwards married to the infant of Spain, and after his death she took for her next husband, Philibert, duke of Savoy. She was governess of the Netherlands, and displayed her religious zeal against the Lutherans. She died 1st Dec. 1530, aged 50.

MARGARET of Valois, sister of Francis I. married, 1509, the duke of Alençon, and afterwards, in 1526, Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, by whom she had Jane, mother of the celebrated Henry IV. She was a great princess, and paid particular attention to the encouragement of commerce, of agriculture, and of the arts, among her subjects. Her partiality for the protestants was so great, that she wrote the Mirror of a Sinful Soul, which was censured and condemned by the Sorbonne. She died at the castle of Odois, 2d Dec. 1549, aged 57, of a catarrh, which it is said she caught in making observations on a comet. She was not only the patroness of learning, but herself learned. She wrote Hep-tameron, after the manner of Boccaccio, a work which, however, though in a pleasing style, is dangerous, from the licentious sentiments and indelicate expressions with which it occasionally abounds. She wrote besides, poetical pieces, called Les Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses, published 1547, &c. the Triumph of the Lamb, &c.

MARGARET, daughter of Francis I. of France, married Emmanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, and died highly respected, 14th Sept. 1574, aged 51.

MARGARET of France, daughter of Henry II. married Henry IV. but unhappily disgraced herself by the levity and licentiousness of her character, which the inconstancy of her husband, perhaps tended to increase. She was afterwards divorced, 1599, and devoted the rest of her life to literary pursuits and religious exercises. She died at Paris, 27th March, 1613, aged 65. She wrote poetical pieces — Memoirs from 1565 to 1582, &c.

MARGARET, daughter of Florent, count of Holland, is reported to have refused alms to a beggar, who implored the punishment of heaven upon her head, in consequence of which, it is said, she gave birth to 365 children, all of which were baptized. This ridiculous story has been gravely related by some authors.

MARGARET of Anjou, daughter of René, king of Sicily, married Henry VI. of England. She was a woman of masculine character, but her heroism was unhappily tainted with cruelty, as she inhumanly caused to be strangled, the duke of Gloucester, who had opposed her marriage. More calculated to govern than to obey, she guided the counsels of her weak and pusillanimous husband during the wars of York and Lancaster, and when he fell a captive into the hands of the duke of York, in 1455, she levied an army to rescue him, and after defeating her enemies, entered triumphantly into the submissive capital. In 1460 she had the mortification to see her troops routed by Warwick, at Northampton, and her husband again a captive; but undismayed, she traversed the kingdom, and every where collecting her adherents, gave battle to her opponents at Wakefield, and left the duke of York dead in the field. Warwick was next defeated near St. Alban's, but another battle at Santon, in Yorkshire, proved fatal to her cause, and she fled from the kingdom to implore the assistance of her brother, Lewis XI. Though unsuccessful in her request, she returned to England again, to lose the battle of Hexham. Other encounters proved equally unfortunate, and at last Margaret was taken prisoner in the field of battle, 1471, but recovered her liberty four years after, by paying a ransom of 50,000 crowns. After thus defending the cause of her husband in 12 battles, she retired to France, where she died 25th Aug. 1482, aged 59.

MARGARET of York, sister of Edward IV. married Charles the Rash, duke of Burgundy. She rendered herself known by the opposition which she made to the elevation of Henry VII. to the throne of England, and the impostures which she supported to disturb the government, and undermine the popularity of that respectable monarch.

MARGARET, countess of Richmond and Derby, was born at Bletsoe, Bedfordshire, 1441. She married Edmund, earl of Richmond, half brother to Henry VI. and by him had Henry VII. After her husband's death she married sir Henry Stafford, and for her third husband, in 1482, took Thomas Stanley, created earl of Derby, who died 1504. To all the virtues of private and domestic life, she united great intelligence, and a deep regard for learning. She not only founded two colleges at Cambridge, St. John's and Christ's, but also established there, and at Oxford, a theological professorship. She also endowed a school at Torrington, and at Wymborn. She died at Westminster, 29th June, 1509, surviving only three months, her son, the king. She is described by bishop Fisher, who preached her funeral sermon, as allied to 30 kings and queens, &c. Her will, which is very curious, is preserved in the collection of noble works, 1780, 4to. She translated from the French, the Mirror of Gold for the sinful Soul, besides the fourth book of Gerfon's, or Kempis' Treatise on imitating the Life of Christ, printed 1504, &c.

MARGARITONE, a native of Arezzo, eminent as a painter. It is said that he invented the mode of gilding with leaf gold on Armenian bole, and he displayed great taste in his representation of historical subjects, in fresco and in distemper. He died 1275, aged 77.

MARGON, William Plantavit de la Pause de, a French

French author and journalist, born at Languedoc. He published at Paris, such severe reflections in favor of the jesuits, against the jansenists, that the court banished him to the isle of Lerins, but restored him to liberty, 1740, provided he removed to the monastery of the Bernardines, where he died 1760. He wrote Memoirs of Marshall Villars, 3 vols. 12mo. — Memoirs of the duke of Berwick, 2 vols. — 12mo. — Memoirs of Tourville, 3 vols. — Letters of Fitz Moritz, and other tracts.

MARGRAAF, Andrew Sigismund, a native of Berlin, who studied chemistry under Newman, Juncker, and Henckel, and acquired celebrity by his many ingenious experiments. In his mineralogical researches he discovered that semi-metal, called manganese, and by his assiduity and labors, he rendered more easy and plain, the various operations of the chemical system. This able and indefatigable man died in his native city of Berlin, director of the academy, 1782, aged 73.

MARGUNIO, Massimo, son of a marshal of Candia, established in 1547, a printing office at Venice, and devoted himself to the printing of Greek books. When his house and property were destroyed by the villainy of an incendiary, he returned to Candia, and became an ecclesiastic and bishop of Cerigo. He died 1602, aged 80. He wrote Greek Anacreontic odes, Augsburg, 1592, 8vo. — poems preserved in the Corpus Poetarum Græcorum, Geneva, 2 vols. fol. 1606.

MARIA THERESA, empress, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, daughter of the emperor Charles VI. and Elizabeth Christina of Brunswick Wolfenbittel, was born 13th May, 1717. On the death of her brother she was destined by her father to succeed to all his honors as the famous pragmatic sanction in 1713 had declared that in failure of issue male the eldest of his daughters was to ascend the throne. In 1736 Maria Theresa married Francis Stephen of Lorraine, and on her father's death in 1740 she was raised to the throne. Her elevation was attended with the most disastrous effects of war, the king of Prussia immediately seized Silesia, and subdued Moravia, and on the other side Charles Albert duke of Bavaria, supported by France made rapid conquests in the imperial dominions, and was crowned king of Bohemia at Prague, and emperor by the title of Charles VII. at Frankfort 1742. Maria in the midst of these disasters quitted Vienna, and throwing herself with her infant son in her arms in the midst of the assembled states of the Hungarian nation, she addressed them in these pathetic words in Latin: "Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, attacked by my nearest relations, I have no resource left but in your fidelity, courage and constancy: I entrust into your hands the children of your kings, they depend on you for life and safety." The appeal was received with shouts of applause. Let us die for our queen Maria Theresa was the general reply, and soon after, Maria, who had lately scarce a town where to give birth in security to her child, saw her faithful Hungarians headed by the brave Kevenhuller advance to her aid. Lintz, Passau, Munich, opened their gates to the conqueror, and by a treaty with England, Maria obtained succours in money, and in troops, and was enabled to defeat the king of Sardinia, and to detach the king of Prussia from the general alliance, by ceding to him the provinces of Silesia, and of Glatz. Flushed with success, Maria was crowned queen of Bohemia at Prague, on 11th May 1743, and the following 11th of June she had the happiness to see the king of England in person obtain in her cause the famous victory of Dettingen over the allied forces. But though she gained to her side the king of Sardinia, she had the mortification to see the king of Prussia again in arms, and while she cemented an alliance with the king of Poland, she was informed that Bohemia, and the Low Countries were invaded by her powerful enemies. The battles of Fontenoy, Rocoux, and la Feldt, were fought; but though victory might seem doubtful she had the satisfaction to place the imperial crown on the head of her husband at Frankfort, 4th Oct. 1745, and she again detached from the number of her enemies the king of Prussia by the treaty of Dresden. At last after a war of eight years the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 18th Oct. 1748 settled the dissensions of the continent, and Maria Theresa, now delivered from enemies who had once meditated her destruction, devoted herself to repair the ravages of war among her oppressed subjects. But while the ports of the Mediterranean and of the North were open to commerce, and while arts were every where munificently encouraged, the empress did not forget that power is best protected by vigilance, and therefore her armies continued to be well disciplined and military institutions encouraged with particular attention. Not only fortifications were built in the most impregnable places, but observatories for the encouragement of science and astronomy were erected at Vienna, Gratz, and Tyrbau. Hospitals were opened for the friendly reception of those brave men who had fought and bled for their country, and the relations of the infirm and meritorious soldier were rewarded with all the munificence which became a great, a patriotic and humane princeess. These days of happiness were unfortunately clouded by the irruption of the king of Prussia into Saxony 1756. Brown checked his career by the undecided battle of Lowositz; but the following year Frederic renewed his attack, and under the walls of Prague obtained some advantage over Brown, who was wounded in the fight. Daun succeeded to the command, and by the successful battle of Chotzemitz, obliged the Prussians to retreat, and delivered Bohemia from her invaders in so masterly a manner, that Maria Theresa, to commemorate the heroic exploit, established the military order of her name 1737. The battles of Hock-kirchen, Kunnersdorf, Maxen, Landshut, and Siplitz, were favorable to the cause of the empress, and though her forces were defeated at Lissa, and Breslaw, she maintained her superiority, and at the peace of Hubertsburg in 1763, she kept possession of the same territories which she held before the war. In 1764 she caused her son Joseph to be crowned king of the Romans; but the death of her husband the next year plunged her into the deepest sorrow. In 1772 she joined Prussia and Russia in the dismemberment of Poland, and made Lemberg the capital of these new dominions. The death of Maximilian Joseph, elector of Bavaria, rekindled war between her and Prussia; but the peace of Teschen two years after restored tranquillity to the empire, and gave her a small portion of the Bavarian dominions.

dominions: After a long reign, checkered by prosperity and adversity, Maria Theresa met the approach of death with the same fortitude with which she had viewed the accidents of life. She died at Vienna 29th Nov. 1780, aged 63. She had the singular felicity, if it deserve the name of felicity, of seeing all her children, at her decease, placed on thrones, or allied to crowned heads. Of her daughters Antoinette was queen of France; Charlotte queen of Naples; Mary Amelia allied to the duke of Parma; Joseph her son was king of the Romans, and of Hungary; Leopold was grand duke of Tuscany; Ferdinand was governor of Lombardy; Maximilian grand master of the Teutonic order; and coadjutor of Cologne and Munster; and Maria Christina, the wife of the duke of Saxe-Teschen, was governor of the Low Countries. Such was the glorious situation of this illustrious character when she died. She deserved and received the appellation of mother of her country, and the purest virtues of charity and benevolence profusely exercised, rendered her dear and esteemed among all ranks of her subjects.

MARIA ANTOINETTE, queen of France, archduchess of Austria, daughter of the emperor Francis I. and of Maria Theresa, was born at Vienna 2d Nov. 1755. On the 16th May 1770 she married the dauphin of France, afterwards Lewis XVI. and her arrival in France was celebrated with every demonstration of public joy. On that remarkable occasion, however, it was observed by those who seek for calamitous events in the fortuitous accidents of time, that the two tempestuous storms of thunder and rain which prevailed, forbode her future misfortunes, and on the festivities of the city of Paris on the 30th of the same month, more than 1200 persons were crushed to death by the falling of a temporary building erected on the occasion, and numbers perished in the waters of the Seine by being precipitated from the Pont royal. These melancholy accidents were alleviated as much as possible by the humanity of the foreign princes, who sent all her money to the lieutenant of police, for the relief of the unfortunate sufferers, and every where conciliated the affection and the esteem of the people. Other acts of charity have been recorded to her honor, and form some of the most pleasing subjects which employed the pencil of Dagot, and on the death of Lewis XV., when according to ancient usage a tax is contributed by the people for the girdle of the new queen, as it is called, Maria nobly declined the compliment. In the severe frost of 1788 she contributed much to the relief of the suffering poor, and her munificence was acknowledged by the gratitude of the Parisians who erected a pyramid of snow in the street of St. Honoré to her honor. These marks of respect were nearly as transitory as the snowy pyramid; Antoinette unfortunately surrounded by flatterers who fanned her pleasures, and gratified her inclinations, was represented as voluptuous and criminal, and the celebrated trial concerning the necklace, served in some degree to raise the indignation of the public against her conduct. The poverty of the treasury was invidiously attributed to her extravagance; but though she was too liberal in her expences, nothing criminal could be proved against her. As if foreseeing the calamities of the state, she opposed with all her influence the convocation of the states which were to lead her and her husband to the scaffold; but though calumniated and insulted, she maintained her dignity, and made the happiness of her husband the first wish of her heart. The ferocious events of the revolution, brought on the 6th of October, when the sanguinary cannibals of Paris, appeared at Versailles, threatening aloud that they would tear her to pieces. The doors of her apartment were battered down, and the bed from which she had just escaped was pierced through with a thousand stabs; yet in the midst of this dreadful attack Antoinette exhibited her usual serenity, and presenting herself alone on the balcony, she changed, by her noble demeanor, the fury of the populace into admiration and shouts of applause. Forced to accompany the king to Paris, in a journey of six hours, while the heads of two of her murdered body guards were raised on pikes by the side of her carriage, and while insults, threats and blasphemies every moment rent the air, she preserved the same undaunted courage. After the flight to Varennes, her magnanimity did not desert her, and when questioned by the insidious deputies, she replied with becoming dignity. On the 20th June, and the 10th August, 1792, those days of horror and anarchy, she again saw herself insulted and with difficulty saved from the hands of assassins, and in the assembly she heard unmoved the decrees which robbed the monarch of his throne, and which called on the most worthless of his subjects to try him as a criminal. She no sooner heard of the condemnation of her husband than she congratulated him on the termination of his sufferings, and after parting from him in an agony of grief, her only request to his murderers was to give her a suit of mourning, which she wore till her own fate was decided. That she might not feel the comforts of the afflicted in sharing her sorrows with her family, she was torn from her son 4th July, 1793, and a month after, an armed force entered her cell in the middle of the night, and forced her from her bed of straw to a low and damp dungeon. On the 3d of October she was carried before the revolutionary tribunal, and accused of squandering the public money, and of exhausting the treasury to enrich her brother the emperor, and of holding a traitorous correspondence with the enemies of her country; but the crimination could not be proved, and her sufferings failed not to excite interest in her favor even among her prejudiced judges. It was then that the miscreants charged the unhappy queen with attempts to corrupt the morals of her own son; a scandalous imputation which roused all her feelings; I appeal, exclaimed she in a burst of noble indignation, I appeal to all mothers, whether an action so odious is possible. Nothing, however, could avail, she retired fatigued to her dungeon, after being detained 18 hours before her cruel judges, and the following morning at 11 she was summoned to ascend the cart which was to conduct her to the scaffold. She obeyed with dignity, and in profound silence, and after viewing with unusual attention as she passed the palace of the Thuilleries, the former scene of her greatness and of her pleasures, she mounted the scaffold with precipitation, and falling on her knees prayed for forgiveness on her murderers, and bidding adieu to her absent children, to whose father she

she was again to be united, she laid down her head on the fatal machine, and lifting up her eyes to heaven, closed them in death 16th Oct. 1793. She was then near 38, but it is remarkable that her misfortunes had changed the color of her hair to a silvery white, and her countenance which, with every feature of beauty once beamed benignity and love, had assumed an aspect of dejection and settled melancholy, and she had nearly lost the use of one of her eyes from the damp and unwholesome air to which she was exposed. Her body was thrown into the Magdalen church-yard and immediately consumed with quick lime. In the powers of her mind Antoinette had been carefully cultivated, she spoke French with purity, and the Italian as her native tongue, and she was so well acquainted with Latin that when twice addressed in that language, she made an immediate extemporaneous reply in the same language and with elegance. She was well versed in geography, and had bestowed also much time on the reading of history. She had four children, Maria Theresia Charlotte, born 1778, who married her cousin the duke of Angoulême, Louis born 1781, who died 1789, Charles Louis born 1785, who died 1793, and a daughter who died an infant. Her life has been published by various authors, but that of Mad. Guenard, 3 vols. 12mo. is recommended by the French biographers.

MARIAMNE, wife of Herod the Great, and mother of Alexander and Aristobulus, and of two daughters, was cruelly put to death by her husband, B. C. 28.

MARIANA, John, a Spanish historian, born at Talavera, in Castille, 1537. He entered into the society of the jesuits, and was a most able divine; he was professor of divinity four years at Rome, two in Sicily, and five at Paris, after which he returned to Spain, and spent the remainder of his life at Toledo. He made himself particularly known by his tract, "de Rege & de Regis Institutione," in which he defended the assassination of Henry III. of France, and supported, that the authority of the people was superior to that of the prince. This work, which, it is said, inspired Ravallac with the diabolical scheme of murdering Henry IV. was burnt at Paris by order of the parliament, and drew upon the author and the jesuits, very severe censures. His greatest performance is, the History of Spain, in 30 books, originally written by him in Latin, but also published in Spanish. In this work, he brought the history to the end of Ferdinand's reign, as he dreaded to treat about more modern times. He, however, afterwards wrote a supplement, and came down to the year 1621, when Philip IV. succeeded to the crown; and the work was, after his death, continued by Salcedo, and after him, by Voren de Soto, to the year 1669. This excellent history, commended by Rapin, and by others, for the greatness of the design, and the nobleness of the style, every where sublime and interesting, has, like all other works of genius, met with cavillers. Mariana died at Toledo, 1624, aged 87. He wrote also, a treatise on Weights and Measures—Notes on the Old Testament, a very valuable work, and after his death appeared in Latin, French, and Italian—a treatise on the Faults of the Government of the society of the Jesuits. The best edition of his "History" in Spanish, is that of Ibarra, Madrid, 1780, 2 vols. folio; and in Latin, that of the Hague, 1722, 4 vols. folio.

MARIANUS, Scotus, a Scotch monk, related to the venerable Bede, and author of a Chronicle from Jesus Christ to 1083, continued by some other author to 1200. He died 1086, aged 58.

MARIETTE, Peter John, son of a Paris bookseller and engraver, was secretary to the French king, and chancery comptroller, and died 1774. He wrote, Traité des Pierres Gravées, 2 vols. folio—Lettres sur la Fontaine de la Rue Grenelle—Lettres à Caylus—besides a catalogue of M. Bafan's Plates, 8vo.—and an Account of the Engravings from M. Crozat's pictures, 2 vols. folio. His collection of engravings was said to be very valuable.

MARIGNAN, John James Medichino, marquis de, a native of Milan, who by his valor was recommended to the favor of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan. Sforza prevailed upon him, and upon another of his officers, to become the murderers of Visconti, a Milanese noble, and after this horrid deed, took measures to destroy both of them, that the suspicion might never attach to him. One fell, but Marignan escaped, and was made governor of Musso, on the lake Como, which he in 1528 exchanged for the service of the emperor, and the command of Marignan, of which he assumed the title. He was successful in 1554 against the French troops under Strozzi, whom he defeated in Tuscany, and he took Sienna, where he permitted his troops to commit horrid cruelties. He died at Milan, 1555, aged 60.

MARIGNY, James Carpentier de, an ecclesiastic, born at Marigny, near Nevers. He became the friend of cardinal de Retz, and was severely satirical against Mazarine. He died of an apoplexy, 1670, distinguished more for his wit, than the purity of his morals. His letters appeared at the Hague, 1678. He wrote also, some poems, and according to some, he is author of "Alleyn's book," in which the killing of a tyrant, after the example of Moses, is defended as lawful. The author of the History of the 12th Century—and of the History of the Arabs, and their Revolutions, in 8 vols. was an ecclesiastic, who bore this name, and died at Paris 1762.

MARIKOWSKY, Martin, a native of Rosenau in Hungary, eminent as a physician. He was actively employed in examining the causes and the progress of the epidemic diseases which proved so fatal to the Hungarian and Turkish armies; in consequence of which he published his Observations in the Ephemerides Sirmienfes, 1763. He translated Tissot's Advice on Health, into the Hungarian language; and died at Sirmich in Slavonia, 1772, aged 44.

MARILLAC, Louis de, a French officer, patronized by Henry IV. and raised under Louis XIII. to the rank of marshal of France. Though he owed much of his good fortune to the favor of Richelieu, it is said, that he conspired with his brother Michael, against that powerful minister. The cardinal was informed of the machinations of his enemies, and the two brothers were brought to a severe trial, and on pretence of being guilty of various acts of extortion and peculation, they were condemned. Louis was beheaded beheaded at Paris, 10th May, 1632, and the other died in a dungeon soon after.

MARIN, Michael Angelo, a novel writer, born at Marfeilles. He became an ecclesiastic, and obtained the confidence and patronage of pope Clement XIII. by whose advice he began to publish the Acts of Martyrs, which, however, he did not finish. His romances are esteemed, and they greatly promote the cause of virtue and religion. This amiable character died of a dropy in the heart, April, 1767, in his 70th year.

MARINARI, Honorio, an Italian painter, the pupil and happy imitator of Carlo Dolce. His portraits and historical pieces were much admired. He died 1715, aged 88.

MARINELLA, Lucretia, a Venetian lady, who in 1601, wrote a book, in which she asserted the superiority of the female sex above the male. She also published, "La Colomba Sacra" — the Life of the Holy Virgin — and of St. Francis, &c.

MARINI, John Ambrose, a native of Genoa, author of il Caloandre Fidelle, 1641, 8vo. an romance, translated by Scuderi and Caylus into French — Nuova Gare de Disperati, ten times edited, also translated into French. These romances were popular, and were the first to describe the manners, dangers, and heroic deeds of ancient chivalry.

MARINO, John Baptist, an Italian poet, born at Naples, 1569. His father, who was a lawyer, intended him for his own profession, but the youth had imbibed such fondness for literature, that he sold his law books to purchase poetry. This so exasperated his father, that he turned him away from his protection, but he found, by the brilliancy of his genius, patronage with the duke of Bovino, the prince of Conca and Crescentio, and at last with cardinal Aldobrandini, nephew to the pope. With this patron he visited Turin, and gained there the friendship of the duke, Charles Emmanuel; but in the midst of his prosperity, he excited the jealousy of Murtola, the duke's secretary, who, as a poet, viewed with envy the honors heaped on him. From abusive language, and satirical sonnets, little mischief could be expected, but Murtola at last discharged a pistol at his rival, and nearly killed him. After this Marino went to Paris, at the invitation of queen Margaret; and found after her death, a liberal patroness in Mary de Medicis. He returned to Rome 1622, and went afterwards to Naples, where he died of a retention of urine, 1625. His works are numerous. He wrote, Strage degli Innocenti, a poem, 1633 — Rime, in three parts — la Murtolide, 4to. — Letters — but the best of his works is, "Adone," a heroic poem, which ranks with the Aminto of Tasso, and the Pastor Fido of Guarini. The best edition is the Elzevir, 4 vols. 16mo. 1678.

MARIO NUZZI, or MARIO DE FIORI, an eminent painter, whose flowers and landscapes were deservedly admired. He died at Rome, 1673, aged 70.

MARIOTTE, Edme, a native of Dijon, member of the Paris academy of sciences, and known as an able mathematician, and a learned ecclesiastic. He wrote a treatise on the Motion of Waters — on the Movement of Pendulums — on Philosophy — on Levels —

Experiments on Colors, &c. published together at Leyden, 1717, 2 vols. 4to. His experiments on hydraulics were very ingenious. He died 1684.

MARIVAUX, Peter Carlet de Chamblain de, a learned dramatic writer, born at Paris, 1688. He was very successful in his theatrical pieces, as well as his romances; and as he conveyed an useful moral under the veil of wit and sentiment, he wished, as he said, to make men more just and more humane. He joined de la Motte in the well-known dispute about the superiority of the ancients over the moderns. This amiable author, so strenuously the advocate of religion and virtue, died at Paris 11th Feb. 1763, aged 75. His works are, Pieces de Theatre, 5 vols. 12mo — Homere Travesti, an indifferent performance — the French Spectator, 2 vols. 12mo. — Vie de Marianne, 4 vols. 12mo. left unfinished, but one of the best French romances — le Payfan Parvenu, 12mo. a much admired composition — New Don Quixote — the Poor Philosopher, 2 vols. 12mo. &c.

MARIUS CAIUS, a celebrated Roman, seven times consul. He first distinguished himself in Africa against Jugurtha, and by a series of heroic exploits against the Cimbri and Teutones, and the other enemies of his country, he became the most popular commander of Rome. His disputes with Sylla proved fatal to the Roman people. He died 86 B. C. His son inherited his ferocious character, and at last slew himself when defeated at Praeneste, 82 B. C.

MARIUS, Marcus Aurelius, a common soldier, who rose to the imperial purple after Victorinus. He was a man of astonishing strength. He was slain by a soldier soon after his elevation.

MARR, St. an evangelist, the disciple of Peter, by whose directions he is supposed to have written his gospel for the use of the Roman christians, A. D. 72. Some imagine that he is the person to whose mother's house Peter, when released from prison by an angel, went. The foundation of the church of Alexandria is attributed to him.

MARR, pope, after Silvester I. 335, died the same year, 7th Oct. An epistle, addressed to Athanasius, is ascribed to him.

MARKHAM, Gerwase, an English author, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. born at Gotham, Nottinghamshire. He was captain under Charles in the civil wars, and distinguished himself for his valor as well as learning. He wrote, "Herod and Antipater," a tragedy — some books on Husbandry — on Horsemanship — on Military Discipline — on the Art of Fowling, &c. and was well skilled in French, Italian, and Spanish.

MARKLAND, Jeremiah, a learned critic, born 29th Oct. 1693, one of the 12 children of the Rev. Ralph M. the author of the Art of Shooting flying. He was educated at Christ's hospital, London, and Peterhouse, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He was first distinguished by his Epistola Critica, 1723, addressed to bishop Hare; and his literary fame was afterwards supported by the publication of Statius Sylva — and of Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero — and a Dissertation on the four Orations ascribed to Cicero. In 1761 he published published his excellent little treatise de Græcorum quintâ Declinatione Impari Syllabicâ & inde Formatâ Latinorum Tertiâ, Quæstio Grammatica, of which only 40 copies were printed; but it appeared at the end of Euripides' Supplices Mulieres, 1763. After being an active tutor at Cambridge, Markland retired to Twyford; but though his finances were scanty, he refused to take orders, and thus lost the preferment which his friend, bishop Hare, was ready to bestow upon him. From the year 1744 to 52, he resided at Uckfield, Sussex, and afterwards boarded in a farmhouse, at Milton, near Dorking, in Surrey, where he died of a severe attack of the gout, attended with fever, 7th July, 1776, in his 83d year. He was buried in Dorking church. Some of his learned notes on the two Iphigeniæ, were printed by Dr. Heberden, his friend, 1771. He wrote some other things, and was very liberal of his assistance to his literary friends, especially Dr. Taylor, in his Lylias and Demosthenes, Dr. Musgrave in Hippolytus, Bowyer in Sophocles, and Arnold, in the Commentary on the book of Wisdom, &c.

MARLOE, Christopher, a dramatic writer, in the reign of Edward VI. educated at Cambridge. He afterwards became a player, and trod the stage with Shakespeare. In his opinions and conduct he was an atheist, therefore deservedly exposed to the satirical reflections and abhorrence of the world. It is said by Wood, that he was fond of some vulgar female, but that he found a rival in his footman, and when full of jealousy, he attempted to stab him, his opponent wrested the dagger from his hand, and plunged it into his heart. He died of the wound, 1693. His plays were seven in number, and he wrote besides, some poetical pieces, &c.

MARLORAT, Augustin, an Augustine monk of Lorraine. He embraced the tenets of the protestants, and distinguished himself at the conference of Poissy, 1561. He was murdered at Rouen, when the place was taken by the king, 1562. His works, which possess great merit, are, Thesaurus Locorum Commun. S. Scripture, 1574, London, folio, Geneva, 1624 — Commentaries on the Bible.

MARMION, Shakerley, a dramatic writer, born at Aynhoe, Northamptonshire, Jan. 1602. He was educated at Thame school, and Wadham college, Oxford, where he took his master's degree. He squandered his property, which amounted, says Wood, to 700l. a-year; and afterwards served in the army in the Netherlands, and against Scotland under Charles I. He died in London, 1639. He wrote four comedies, much esteemed in his time; Holland's Leaguer — a Fine Companion — the Antiquary — the Crafty Merchant, or the Soldiered Citizen — besides Cupid and Psyche, an epic poem, &c.

MARMOL, Lewis, a native of Grenada, taken prisoner at the siege of Tunis, and detained in slavery for eight years. He wrote, a General Description of Africa, Grenada, 1573, 3 vols. folio, &c.

MARMONTEL, John Francis, an eminent French writer, born at Bort, in Limousin, in 1719. Though but the son of a taylor, he was well educated at the college of Toulouse, where he obtained some poetical prizes, and afterwards in 1745, he came to Paris, in the habit of an abbé. The friendship of Voltaire, and his own merits, soon procured him the favor of the great; he was rewarded with a small pension, and obtained the place of historiographer to the king's buildings, and was for two years conductor of the periodical journal, called Mercury. A severe parody from one of Cinna's scenes, in which he satirized a courtier of influence, drew upon him the displeasure of the government, and he was sent to the Bastille. His literary fame was established by his tragedies and his operas, but his Contes Moraux, procured him greater celebrity, and more advantage. He was honored for his meritorious labors, with the place of perpetual secretary to the French academy; but the revolution, which proved fatal to so many men of character and of merit, spared his life. He retired into obscurity from the observations of the world; and though reduced by the national bankruptcy to indigence, he bore his misfortunes with great composure, and in the enjoyment of undisturbed domestic tranquillity. He was in 1797, elected to be a member of the council of ancients, and as a politician he showed himself firm, correct in his opinions, and the friend of virtue and religion. He died of an apoplexy, 1798, at Abbeville, near Gailon, where he had retired, when his colleagues in the assembly had disputed the regularity of his election. His other works are, Belisarius, a romance — the Charms of Study — the Literary Observer — Lucan's Pharsalia translated — the Incas, or Destruction of Peru, 2 vols. — Poétique Française, 3 vols. 8vo. — Essay on the Revolutions of Music, 8vo. — Elements of Literature, 6 vols. — besides some articles in the French Encyclopedie. His literary character chiefly depends on his Contes Moraux, 3 vols. 12mo. which have been translated into every European language, and are known to every reader as full of agreeable and pleasing delineations of character, but too often artfully fascinating and immoral in their tendency. His works have been published altogether, in 17 vols. 8vo.

MARNEZIA, N. de Lezia, a native of Besançon, who from a soldier became a statesman during the revolution. As a member of the national assembly, he reprobated the violent measures of his colleagues, and retired in disgust to America. On his return in 1793, he fell under the displeasure of the ruling tyrants, and was sent to prison; but though he had the good fortune to survive the fall of Robespierre, he never recovered his health. He died 1797. He wrote, le Bonheur dans les Campagnes — la Nature Champêtre, a poem — Plan of Education for a young Lady — Essay on the Mineralogy of Orgelet in Franche Compté — the Virtuous Family, a romance, &c.

MARNIX, Philip de, a native of Brussels, who warmly embraced the tenets of Calvin. He became consul of Antwerp, and ably defended that city against the attacks of the duke of Parma, 1584. He died at Leyden, 1598, aged 60. He wrote, Controversial Theses — Apiarium Romanum — and other tracts.

MAROLLES, Michael de, a French writer, born 1600. He employed his learning chiefly in translations from the classics; and Terence, Plautus, Lucretius, Horace, Virgil, Juvenal, Persius, &c. appeared in a French dress under his hands, but not always with success. He also collected prints, one hundred thousand of which afterwards adorned the king's cabinet. He wrote also, Memoirs of his own Life, edited by Goujet, 1775, 3 vols. 12mo. besides some indifferent poetry. He died 1681.

MAROT, John, a French poet, born near Caen, in Normandy, 1463. His abilities recommended him to Anne of Bretagne, queen of France, and he attended Lewis XII. to Genoa, and was in the service of Francis I. He died 1523. His poems are preserved with those of his son Clement.

MAROT, Clement, son of the above, was born at Cahors, in Querci, 1496, and became valet-de-chambre to Francis I. He was wounded at the battle of Pavia, where his master was taken prisoner; and as he had embraced the opinions of the protestants, he found his residence at the court of Francis not very safe. He therefore retired to Geneva, where it is said by Cayet, that his licentious conduct exposed him to much danger, and even drew upon him the punishment of public whipping in all the cross ways of the city. From Geneva Marot went to Piedmont, and died at Turin, 1544, aged 49, very poor. His poetical powers were so highly esteemed, that he was called in France, the poet of princes, and the prince of poets. To his fertile invention the French poets are indebted for the rondeau, and also for the modern form of the sonnet, the madrigal, &c. Though licentious in his character and opinions, Marot undertook to translate the Psalms of David into French verse, dedicated to Francis I. The version, though elegantly and faithfully completed, met with much censure and abuse, as the work of a libertine poet; but it was recommended by a preface written by Calvin himself, at Geneva, 1543. His works, consisting of epigrams, sonnets, elegies, and ballads, were published with those of his father, and those of his son Michael, who was also a poet, but of inferior merit, at the Hague, 1731, 6 vols. 12mo.

MAROT, Francis, a French painter, the pupil of la Fosse. He was associate and professor in the French academy of painting, and died at Paris, 1719, aged 52. There was also an architect of that name, whose designs have appeared engraved, in 4to.

MARQUARD-FREHER, a native of Augsbürg, who studied law and belles lettres under Cujas, at Bourges, and became counsellor of state to the elector palatine, and professor of civil law at Heidelberg. He died at Heidelberg, universally respected, 13th May, 1614, aged 49. He wrote, Origines Palatinæ, folio — de Inquisitionis Processus — de Re Monetaria Romanæ, &c. — Rerum Bohemiæ Scriptores — Rerum German. Scriptores, 3 vols. folio, &c.

MARQUET, Francis Nicholas, a native of Nancy, eminent as a physician and a botanist. He wrote, an Account of Plants in Lorraine, 10 vols. 8vo. — Observations on the Cure of several Diseases, 2 vols. 12mo. — Method to learn the State of the Pulse by the Musical Notes, 12mo. — He died 1759, aged 72.

MARRIER, D. Martin, an ecclesiastic of Cluni, who died at Paris, his native town, 1644, aged 72. He made a curious collection of ancient ecclesiastical writers, which he published under the title of Bibliotheca Cluniacensis.

MARRACCI, Luigi, a learned Italian, born at Lucca 1612. He was professor of rhetoric, and applied himself to the study of ancient and eastern languages. He was confessor to pope Innocent XI. and died at Rome, 1700. He became known as the editor of the Koran, printed at Padua, in Latin and Arabic, 2 vols. folio, 1698, with learned notes. He also assisted in the publication of the Arabic bible, 3 vols. folio, Rome, 1671.

MARSAIS, Cesar Chesneau du, a French grammarian, born at Marseilles, 1676. He was of the congregation of the oratory, which he quitted and went to Paris, where he practised as an advocate. He afterwards maintained himself by being tutor in noble families, and by keeping a school, till, after many adverse accidents, he received from the count de Lauragais, an annuity of 1000 livres. He was engaged in the Encyclopedie, and his Articles on Grammar, &c. are drawn up with great precision, correctness, and judgment. He was at first a sceptic, but in the latter part of life became strictly religious. He died 1756, aged 80. He wrote, an Explanation of the Doctrines of the Gallican Church, with respect to the Pretences of the Court of Rome, 12mo. — a Rational Method of learning the Latin Language, 12mo. — a treatise on Tropes, 8vo. — the True Principles of Grammar, 4to. — Logic, or Reflections on the Operations of the Mind, 12mo. — Abridgment of Jouvenci's Mythology, 12mo.

MARSH, Narcissus, an Irish prelate, born at Hannington, Wiltshire, 1638. He was admitted at Magdalen hall, Oxford, 1654, was elected fellow of Exeter, 1658, took his degree of D. D. 1671, and in 1673 was made principal of St. Alban's hall. His patron the duke of Ormond, in 1678, appointed him provost of Dublin college, and in 1682 he was made bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, in 1690 translated to Cashel, to Dublin 1699, and in 1703 to Armagh. In the midst of these high promotions, the bishop was very charitable. He built a noble library at Dublin, which he enriched with valuable books; he repaired several churches and alms-houses in his dioceses, and erected and endowed an alms-house for 12 clergymen's widows, at Drogheda. He died 2d Nov. 1713, aged 75, and was buried in a vault in St. Patrick's church-yard. He was an able scholar, a good orientalist, and a well-informed philosopher. He published Institutiones Logicæ in Usum Juventutis Academicæ, Dublin, 1681 — an Introduction to the Doctrine of Sounds, with Proposals for the Improvement of Acoustics — Manuductio ad Logicam, &c.

MARSHAL, Walter, an English divine, educated at Winchester and New college, of which he was made fellow, and also of Winchester. He was ejected from his living at Hursley, Hants, for non-conformity, 1662, and afterwards took the care of a dissenting congregation at Gosport, where he died, 1690. He wrote, the Gospel Mystery of Sanctification, 1692, 8vo. reprinted by Hervey, the author of Meditations, in 12mo.

MARSHALL, Thomas, D. D. an English divine, born

born at Barkly, Leicestershire, 1621. He was admitted of Lincoln college, Oxford, and bore arms in the defence of king Charles, but afterwards he left the university, and went to Rotterdam, where he became minister to the merchants there and at Dordt. He returned to England in 1661, and in 1668 was chosen fellow, and in 1672, rector of his college. In 1681 he was made dean of Gloucester, and died at Lincoln college, 1685. He was a learned man, well skilled in the Saxon and in the Oriental languages. He published, Observationes in Evangeliorum Versiones per Antiquas duas, scilicet Gothicas & Anglo-Saxonicas — an Explanation of the Catechism — Epistle, prefixed to Dr. Hyde's translation into the Malay language, of the four Gospels and the Acts — besides which he completed archbishop Usher's Life, published by Dr. Parr.

MARSHALL, Nathanael, D. D. an English divine, appointed chaplain to George II. at the recommendation of the princess of Wales. He held some preferment in London, and was canon of Windsor. He published the works of St. Cyprian, folio, 1717 — a Defence of our Constitution in Church and State, 8vo. 1717 — Sermons on several occasions, 3 vols. 8vo. 1730. These were posthumous, and inscribed to queen Caroline, by his widow, who was left with eight children.

MARSHAM, John, a learned author, born 1602, in London, and educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Oxford. In 1625 he went to France, and afterwards again visited that kingdom, Italy, and Germany, and was in 1629, at the siege of Boileduc. He studied the law at the Middle Temple, and in 1638 was one of the six clerks in chancery. During the civil wars he followed the king to Oxford, and was a great sufferer by the plunder of the republicans; but in 1660, after leading a life of retirement and solitude under the usurpation, he was elected member for the city of Rochester, and was knighted, and made a baronet by Charles II. He died at Bushy-hall, Herts, May, 1685, and was buried at Cuckstone, near Rochester. He is celebrated in literature for his excellent work, called Diatriba Chronologica, or a Chronological Dissertation, wherein he examines the principal difficulties which occur in the chronology of the Old Testament, 4to. 1649. The work was afterwards altered in his Canon Chronicus, Aegyptiacus, Ebraicus, Græcus, & Disquisitiones, London, 1652, folio, reprinted Leipzig, 1676, and at Franeker, 1696, 4to. Sir John left two sons, John, his successor in the title, who collected materials for an History of England, never published, and wrote an History of English Boroughs; and Robert, created a baronet by queen Anne, also a learned man, whose son was made lord Romney, 1716.

MARSIGLI, Lewis Ferdinand, an Italian author, born of a noble family at Bologna, 1658. He was carefully educated, and then visited Constantinople, 1679, with the eyes of a philosopher and of a military man, and at his return, offered his services to the emperor of Germany against the Turks. He distinguished himself greatly in the field, but in 1683 he was taken by the Tartars, who sold him to the Turks. The next year he obtained his ransom, and immediately repaired to Vienna, where the emperor made him a colonel, and afterwards advanced him to the rank of marshal. In the war about the Spanish succession, he was however unfortunate. Brisac surrendered in 1703, after a siege of 13 days, when a longer and more effectual resistance was expected, and the count D'Arco, the governor, was condemned to lose his head, and Marigli, the next in command, was stripped of his honors, and had his sword broke over him. He attempted in vain to justify his conduct before the emperor, and even published a memorial to defend himself; but finding the tide of unpopularity against him, he returned to privacy. He went to Paris and Marseilles, and then retired to Bologna, where he founded 1712, with the consent of the senate, as patrons, an academy of arts and sciences, with a museum for the advancement of knowledge, and of the arts. He also erected a printing house, where the memoirs and writings of the academy were to be published, which he entrusted to the care of the Dominicans. He died 1st Nov. 1730. His learning recommended him to the academies of Paris, Montpellier and London, of which he was elected a member. He wrote a Philosophical Essay on the Sea, translated into French by Le Clerc, published fol. Amst. 1725 — a Description of the Danube, 6 vols. fol. — a Latin Treatise on Coffee 12mo. — on Mushrooms, folio — on the Bosphorus, 4to. — on the Ottoman Forces, folio.

MARSOLLIER, James, a French historian, born at Paris, 1647. He was archdeacon of Uzez, and died there, 1724. His works, though occasionally incorrect, are still read with applause. He is author of a History of Cardinal Ximenes, 2 vols. 12mo. — History of Henry VII. of England, 2 vols. 12mo. — History of the Inquisition, 12mo. — Life of Sir Francis de Sales, 2 vols. 12mo. — Life of Madame de Chantal, 2 vols. — Life of Dom Rancé of La Trappe, 2 vols. — Dialogues on the Duties of Civil Life — History of Henry de la Tour D'Auvergne — an Apology for Erasmus, to prove that he was a good Catholic — a History of the Tenth and Goods of the Church.

MARSTON, John, an English dramatic author. He wrote eight plays, which were acted with applause at the Black-friars theatre. He was of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and was the friend of Ben Jonson, but the time of his death is unknown, though he was living in 1633. He wrote besides three books of satires, called the Scourge of Villainy, and reprinted 1764.

MARSY, Francis Marie de, distinguished among the jessuits, from whose society he was expelled, was born at Paris. His "Analysis of Bayle," 4 vols. 12mo. was proscribed by the parliament of Paris, and produced his confinement in the bastille. He died suddenly, December, 1763. He is author of the History of Mary Stuart, 3 vols. 12mo. — Memoirs de Melville, from the English, 3 vols. 12mo. — Abridged Dictionary of Painting and Architecture, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Rabelais Moderne, 8 vols. 12mo. — the Prince, from Father Paul — Pictura, an elegant poem — Modern History, as a continuation of Rollin, 26 vols. 12mo.

MARSY, Balthazar, a native of Cambray, eminent as a sculptor. He died 1674, aged 54. His brother Gaspard, who died 1681, aged 56, was also an able sculptor. The vase, with a representation of Latona and and her children, in the gardens of Versailles, is by the chisel of these two brothers.

MARTEL, Francis, surgeon in the service of Henry IV. of France, was author of an Apology for Surgeons — of Paradoxes on the Practice of Surgery, and other works, printed at Paris, together, 1635, 12mo.

MARTELIERE, Peter de la, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who distinguished himself in the celebrated trial between the university of Paris and the jésuits. The speech which he made on the occasion, was published, and much applauded. He died 1631.

MARTELLI, Lewis, an Italian, whose poems, serious and grotesque, and dramatic pieces, were published at Florence. He was born at Florence, and died at Salerno, 1527, aged 28. His brother Vincent was also a poet, whose pieces appeared at Florence, 1607, 8vo.

MARTELLI, Peter James, author of seven volumes of prose and verse, was secretary to the senate of Bologna, and professor of belles lettres there. He died 1729. His poems, according to Maffei, possessed great merit.

MARTENNE, Edmund, a Benedictine monk of St. Maur, born 1654, at St. Jean de Laune, Langres. He was author of a Commentary on the Rules of St. Benedict — de Antiquis Monachorum Ritibus, 2 vols. 4to. — Thesaurus Anecdotorum Novus, and other works. He died of an apoplexy, 1739.

MARTIAL, D'Auvergne, a French poet, author of Arrets de L'Amour — an Historical Poem on Charles VII. — L'Amant Rendu Cordelier — Devotes Louanges à la Vierge Marie, &c. reprinted at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. 1724. He was procurator of the parliament, and notary of the chatelet at Paris, and died there, 1508, much beloved.

MARTIALIS, Marcus Valerius, a Spaniard, celebrated as a great Latin epigrammatist, in the reign of the emperor Domitian. He died in his native country, 104 A. D. His epigrams are severe, and often licentious, best edited 1701, Amst. 8vo.

MARTIANAY, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, who ably edited the works of Jerome, 5 vols. folio, with a life of that father, 4to. 1706, and published also other works. He was born at St. Sever, in Gascony, and read lectures at Arles, Avignon, and Bourdeaux. He died of an apoplexy, 1717, aged 70.

MARTIGNAC, Stephen Algai lord of, a French writer, who published the Lives of the Bishops of Paris, in the 17th century, 4to. and translated besides into prose, Horace, Terence, Juvenal, Persius, Ovid, Virgil, in 9 vols. 12mo. He died 1698, aged 70.

MARTIN, St. a native of Sabaria, in Pannonia, who, from a soldier became a convert to christianity at Amiens, and in 374 was made bishop of Tours. He founded the monastery of Marmontier, and is regarded as the apostle of Gaul. His confession of faith with respect to the Trinity, is still extant. He died 397.

MARTIN I. pope after Theodore, 649, caused the doctrines of the Monothelites to be condemned in a synod at Rome. He was sent by Constantius to the Crimea, where he died through ill treatment, 16th Sept. 655.

MARTIN II. pope after John VIII. 882, died two years after, in Feb. 884. Under him Photius, patriarch of Constantinople was condemned.

MARTIN III. a native of Rome, pope after Stephen VIII. 942. He was a benevolent pontiff, and founded several churches, &c. He died 4th August, 946.

MARTIN IV. a Frenchman, made pope after Nicholas III. 1281. He passed a sentence of excommunication against the emperor Michael Palaeologus, and against Peter III. of Arragon, whose kingdom he bestowed on Charles Valois, son of Philip the Hardy of France. He died at Perouse, 28th March, 1285.

MARTIN V. Otho Colonna, an illustrious Roman, made pope after the abdication of Gregory XII. 1417. The emperor and the elector palatine, with the deference of subjects, attended upon him at his inauguration, and he knew well how to improve the submissive conduct of catholic potentates. He persecuted the adherents of Hufs in Bohemia, and presided in person at the council of Constance, 1418. He died of an apoplexy, 20th Feb. 1431, aged 63.

MARTIN, David, a protestant divine, born at Revel, in Languedoc, 1639. He left his country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled at Utrecht, where he gave lectures, and acted as pastor. On the second edition of the dictionary of the French academy he communicated to the publishers, some valuable remarks, and died at Utrecht, of a violent fever, 1721. He was a most amiable character. He published a History of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. folio, with 424 plates — Eight Sermons, 8vo. — a treatise on Natural Religion — Two Dissertations, which have been translated into English, one on the disputed passage of St. John I, c. 5. v. 7. and the other on the testimony of Josephus to the character of Christ — a Treatise on Revealed Religion, 2 vols. 8vo. — a Bible, with notes.

MARTIN, Dom James, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Tanjaux, Upper Languedoc. After teaching the languages in his native province, he removed to Paris where he died a martyr to agonizing sufferings from the gout and gravel 1751 in his 70th year. He wrote a treatise on the Religion of the Antient Gauls, 2 vols. — a History of the Gauls, 2 vols. — Explication of difficult Texts of Scripture, 2 vols. 4to. — Explanation of Ancient Monuments — a Project for an Alphabetical Library.

MARTIN, Thomas, an antiquarian, born at Thetford, 8th March, 1697; the seventh of nine children. He was for some time with his brother, as an attorney, but disliked the employment, and wished for a Cambridge education, in which, however, he was not gratified, as he in 1722 married at Thetford. By his wife who died 1731, he had eight children, and by the widow of Peter le Neve, Norroy king at arms, whom he soon after took for his second wife, he had as many children, nine of all whom reached the years of manhood. By his second marriage he obtained a large collection of English antiquities, pictures, &c. which have since his death passed into the hands of private families. He died 7th March, 1771, and was buried in Palgrave church, where many of his family were interred before him. He wrote Monumenta Anglicana — the History of his Native Town, 4to. — and contributed much to the Fasti of Le Neve.

MARTIN,

MARTIN, Benjamin, an optician and globe maker of Fleet-street, and the publisher of a Scientific Magazine, was originally a schoolmaster at Chichester, and was born in 1704. He acquired afterwards some reputation as a travelling lecturer in experimental philosophy, and then settled in London, where he made some improvements in philosophical and mathematical experiments. In his old age he was afflicted with domestic losses in consequence of trusting too much to false friends, and though he had more than sufficient to discharge his debts, he became a bankrupt. In a fit of delirious despair he attempted his life; the wound, though not mortal, hastened his death. He died 9th Feb. 1782. His fossils and curiosities were sold for little after his death. He published a Philosophical Grammar—Young Gentleman and Lady's Philosophy, 2 vols. 8vo.—Philosophia Britannica, 3 vols. 8vo.—treatises on Decimal Arithmetic, 8vo.—on Optics, 8vo.—on Trigonometry, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mathematical Institutes, 2 vols.—Natural History of England, 2 vols.—Biographia Philosophica, 8vo. and other miscellanies all useful and ingenious.

MARTIN, Claude, a native of Lyons, of mean parentage. He had happily the advantage of a good mathematical education, and at the age of 20 he embraced the profession of arms, and embarked for India with his brother under general Lally. In the war of 1756 he conducted himself with great valor, but ill treatment disgusted him with the service, and he at the siege of Pondicherry deserted to the English, in whose forces he obtained the rank of colonel. Assiduous and intelligent, he was now employed to make a map of the territories of the Nabob of Oude, and under his patronage he introduced the arts and commercial institutions of Europe, and opened a bank, which proved highly productive. He afterwards settled at Lucknow where he built a magnificent edifice for his residence, and another also on the banks of the Ganges, and then devoting his time to the natural productions of the country, he formed in his museum a very curious and valuable collection. His garden was also enriched with all the beautiful productions and varieties of the climate; his observatory was provided with the most useful and the best instruments for making observations on the heavens, and he exhibited the first balloon that ever floated in the atmosphere of Asia. This remarkable character died in 1799, and with the most benevolent intentions divided his immense property among his children, and for charitable purposes in the towns of Lyons, of Calcutta, and of Lucknow.

MARTINDALE, Adam, a mathematician and divine, master of a mathematical school at Warrington, and then at Dunham, was ejected from the living of Rosthorne, Cheshire, for non-conformity 1662. He afterwards lived as chaplain in the family of lord Delaware, and died 1700. He is author of the Land Meter's Vade Mecum, 12mo.—two County Almanacks—12 Problems about Interest—Divinity Knots unloosed 1649, 8vo.—Truth and Peace promoted, 12mo. 1682, &c.

MARTINEAU, Isaac, a jesuit of Angers who died 1720, aged 80. He was patronized by the court, and became confessor and friend to the duke of Burgundy. He wrote Pfalms of Penitence—Meditations on Retirement, &c.

MARTINI, Raymond, a Dominican friar, born at Sobirat in Catalonia. He was one of those who were laboriously engaged in the study of Arabic and Hebrew to confute the Jews and Mahometans in their own language on religious subjects, and he was sent by the king of Arragon as a missionary to Tunis in 1268. He died 1286. His excellent treatise against the Jews, called Pugio Fidei Christianæ was brought to light by Bosquet bishop of Montpellier, and published 1651 at Paris, and the best edition at Leipzig, 1687.

MARTINI, Martin, a jesuit, long resident in China, where he wrote some valuable books. He returned to Europe in 1651, and again, as some suppose, revisited China, where he died aged 74. He published "Sinicæ Historiæ Decas prima a gentis Origine ad Christum Natum, 4to.—China Illustrata, folio.—a Latin History of the Wars of the Tartars against China, 8vo.—a Relation of the Number and Quality of the Chinese Christians.

MARTINIERE, vid. BRUZEN.

MARTINIUS, Matthias, a native of Waldeck, the disciple of Piscator, became a respectable divinity professor at Paderborn and Bremen, and distinguished himself at the synod of Dordt. He wrote Lexicon Philologicum, 2 vols. fol. and died 1630, aged 58.

MARTINUSIUS, George, or VTISINOVISCH, a native of Croatia, who from a lighter of stoves became a learned ecclesiastic, bishop of Great Waradin, and at last the minister and friend of John Zapol king of Hungary. At his death, 1540, the king left him guardian of his son John Sigismund, but a quarrel with Isabella the queen mother obliged him to leave the kingdom, and he retired to the court of the emperor Ferdinand I. who obtained for him a cardinal's hat from pope Julius III. He was afterwards suspected of plotting with the Turks against his benefactor, and in consequence of this probably false accusation he was meanly assassinated in his castle of Vints 1551.

MARTIRELLI, a landscape painter of great eminence born at Naples, where he died 1720, aged 50.

MARTYN, John, an English botanist, born in London 1699. He early showed a fondness for botanical pursuits, and by the friendship of Dr. Sherard, his attention was directed to literary and not to mercantile concerns. By publishing in 1720, Tournefort's History of the Plants in the neighbourhood of Paris, he formed the plan of composing a catalogue of those near London. The society of botanists in London, which continued in its original form till 1726, was established by him and Dillenius; but afterwards he left the metropolis, where he had given some lectures, to succeed Bradley as botanical professor of Cambridge. He acquired some reputation as a physician in London and Chelsea, but retiring to Streatham in 1752, he abandoned the more laborious parts of his profession. He resigned in 1761, his Cambridge professorship, in which he was succeeded by his son Thomas Martyn, B. D. and he died at Chelsea 1768. Dr. Martyn had been elected member of the royal society, in 1727, and was so useful in the regulations made to complete the library and the museum, that his bond for annual payment was honorably cancelled by the council of that learned body. His works are Tabule Synoptica Plantarum Official. ad method. Ray. fol.—Methodus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiæ. Nascant.

Nascent. 12mo. — Historia Plantarum Rariorum, Decad. 5, fol. — first Lecture of a Course of Botany, Introductory, 8vo. — Virgil's Bucolics and Georgics translated with notes, 2 vols. 8vo. and 4to. a valuable and entertaining work — Dissertations on the Æneid, 12mo. — Abridgement of Philosophical Transactions — translation of Harris on the Diseases of Infants — do. of Boerhaave's treatise on the Powers of Medicine — Philosophical Papers of the Memoirs of the Paris Academy of Sciences, abridged, 5 vols. 8vo. — Various Curious Papers in the Philosophical Transactions — some Articles in the General Dictionary, &c.

MARTYR, Peter, a native of Anghiera in the Milanese, employed as an able negociator by Ferdinand V. of Castille and Arragon, and also engaged in the education of the princes his children. In consequence of his services he obtained some ecclesiastical honors, and died 1525, aged 70. He was author of an History of the Discovery of America, under the name of de Navigatione et Terris de Novo Repertis, 1587 — Letters respecting the History of Spain, Amsterdam, 1670, fol. — an interesting Relation of his Embassy to Egypt, 1500, in fol.

MARTYR, Peter, a most eminent divine, born at Florence 1500. His family name was Hermilus, but he received from his parents that of Martyr from Peter, a martyr, whose church was near the house in which he was born. He became an Augustine monk at Fiesoli, and afterwards studied at Padua, and at the age of 26 was admitted public preacher. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the pulpit, and as a professor of philosophy and divinity, at Brixia, Rome, Venice, Mantua, and other cities; but the writings of Zuinglius and of Bucer, and the conversation of Valdes shook his faith in the papal infallibility, and after preaching the doctrines of the protestants in secret, he found it dangerous to continue south of the Alps, and therefore removed to Zurich. He next visited Basil, and then Strasburg where he married a nun who like himself had escaped from the superstitions of a convent. From Strasburg, Martyr was invited by Cranmer to England, and honorably appointed divinity professor at Oxford by Edward VI. in 1549. Though insulted and ridiculed by the papists, he boldly continued his lectures, and in approbation of his zeal the king made him canon of Christ-church. At the accession of Mary, however, the learned professor found it unsafe to remain at Oxford, and he therefore privately retired to Strasburg, and to Zurich, where for seven years he became a popular divinity professor. He had liberal offers afterwards to settle at Geneva, and his friend Jewel solicited him with zealous affection to return to England after Mary's death, but he declined those honorable testimonies of respect, and continued at Zurich, where he died 1562, aged 63. His wife died at Oxford during his residence there. On Mary's accession, such was the impotent virulence of the papists, her bones were dug up and buried in a dunghill by cardinal Pole, till the happier days of Elizabeth restored them to consecrated ground in the cathedral. On his return to Zurich, Martyr took a second wife, by whom he had three children, the youngest of which only survived him. Martyr as a writer was learned and well informed, as a disputant he was acute, sensible, and penetrating, and much admired by the protestants as he was dreaded by the papists. He was zealous as a reformer, but sincere and in his greatest triumphs over superstition and error wisely moderate and humble. He wrote several books against the papists, or in explanation of the Scriptures, but his "Defence of the Orthodox Doctrine of the Lord's Supper," against Gardiner, is particularly famous. He is, however, accused by father Simon of making a vain and unnecessary display of his learning in his commentaries, though it must be confessed in the words of bishop Jewel, that he is a man never to be named without the highest respect and honor.

MARUCELLI, John Stephen, an Italian painter of eminence, who died 1706, aged 60. One of his best pieces is Abraham entertaining the Angels.

MARVELL, Andrew, an ingenious writer, born 1620, at Kingstons upon Hull, where his father was minister and master of the school. The strong powers of his mind were so early displayed, that at 13 he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, but here unexperienced and thoughtless he fell into the hands of the jesuits, till his father interfered and restored him to the whole some tenets of the university. He took his bachelor's degree 1638, and about that time lost his father, who was drowned in crossing the Humber, while attending a female friend's daughter. The afflicted mother being now childless, bestowed all her property on the son of her deceased friend, and Marvell was thus enabled to travel and improve himself in visiting foreign countries. He passed through France, visited Rome, and extended his travels to Constantinople. About 1653 he returned home, and was made assistant to Milton, the Latin secretary of Cromwell. He was chosen member of parliament for his native town in 1660, and continued to represent it, and with the honorable grant of a pension from his approving electors, till his death, and though he seldom spoke in the house, his opinion was respected out of doors, and often influenced prince Rupert, and other independent members. He claimed the public attention as a writer, by a severe anonymous attack on Dr. Parker, who was virulent in favor of arbitrary government, and by another pamphlet against bishop Croft's "Naked Truth," but his most violent composition was "an Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England, &c." for the discovery of the author of which the offended ministry offered a reward. These tracts were written not only with severity, but in a strain of humor and sarcasm, which rendered them very popular and exposed to derision those against whom the satire was directed. Though an enemy to the ministry, Marvell was courted and admired, and even the king himself was pleased with his conversation and conduct, and endeavoured by all means in his power to gain him to espouse the measures of the court. After enjoying the company of this facetious subject, Charles the next morning sent to him his minister Danby, who with difficulty found his obscure lodging, up two pair of stairs in one of the courts of the Strand. Marvell supposed his visitor had lost his way, but when informed that Danby came from the king who wished to know what he could do to serve him, he answered that it was not in his majesty's power to serve serve him. When pressed farther to accept any office the court could give, Marvell answered, that he could not with honor accept the offer, since if he did, he must prove either ungrateful to the king in voting against him, or false to his country in giving into the measures of the court. To conquer this obstinate integrity Danby declared that he was the bearer to him of 1000*l.* from the king as a mark of his respect, but this the unshaken patriot rejected, though after the courtier was gone he was obliged to borrow a guinea of a friend. This great man died 1678, aged 58, not without strong suspicions of being poisoned, and he was buried in St. Giles's church, in the fields. His friends afterwards wished to erect a monument to his memory in the church of his native town, but the minister of the parish refused his consent. Some papers were afterwards imposed upon the public as his, by a woman with whom he lodged, and who impudently asserted those papers to have been in the hand-writing of her late dear husband. His poems and letters were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols. 12mo. with an account of his life by Mr. Cooke, and since a handsome edition has appeared by Captain Thompson, 3 vols. 4to. Some of his commendatory verses generally appear before the great work of his friend Milton.

MARVIELLES, N. de, a French officer, better known as the author of some poetical pieces of merit, in Latin and in French, consisting of stories well told, epigrams, &c. He died about 1775.

MARULLUS, Tacitus, a poet of the fifth century, who wrote a panegyric on Attila king of the Huns, and waited upon him at Padua in expectation of a liberal reward. The fierce barbarian rewarded his flattery by throwing the poem and the writer into the flames.

MARULLUS, Michael Tarchanitis, a learned Greek who left his native town, Constantinople, when it fell under the power of the Turks. He distinguished himself as a soldier, as well as a poet in Italy, but in his principles he was an impious blasphemer and atheist. He was drowned on horseback in the river Cæcina near Volaterra 1500. His poems and epigrams both in Greek and Latin were printed at Florence 1497, 4to. and Paris 1561. They are elegant, but very licentious. He was a great admirer of Lucretius, and used to say that other poets were to be read, but Lucretius and Virgil to be got by heart.

MARY, the mother of our blessed Saviour, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal race of David. She was betrothed to Joseph, and her miraculous conception was announced to her by the angel Gabriel. From Bethlehem where the Saviour was born, she went to Egypt, and afterwards returned to Nazareth where she saw her son grow up in stature and in wisdom. Little is mentioned of her in the gospels, but that she was present at the crucifixion, when Jesus recommended her to his favorite disciple John, who took her to his own house. The papists assert, that she continued immaculate, and on the supposition that she was taken up to heaven without dying, they celebrate a feast called the assumption of the virgin.

MARY, wife of Cleophas, is called in scripture the sister of the virgin, and the mother of the apostles James the less, Simon, and Jude, and Joseph. She early believed in the miracles, and the mission of our Saviour, she attended his crucifixion, and the burial of his body, and she was one of the women to whom his resurrection was announced at the sepulchre by a vision of angels, and she immediately after met him, and falling at his feet paid him adoration.

MARY, queen of England, eldest daughter of Henry VIII. by Catharine of Arragon, was born at Greenwich 18th Feb. 1517. She was educated under the care of the celebrated Linacer and Vives, and she acquired so perfect a knowledge of Latin that she undertook to translate Erasmus's Paraphrase of St. John's Gospel, which was finished by her chaplain Mallet. The treatment of her mother by her father totally alienated her heart from filial duties, and so exasperated was the monarch at her violent and obstinate conduct, that he would have publicly put her to death had not the virtuous Cranmer interfered. Bred up in the bigoted principles of the Romish church, she refused to join the protestant communion, as well under her brother as under her father, and in consequence of this obstinacy the young king, at the persuasion of the duke of Northumberland set her aside in the succession, and appointed the lady Jane Gray for his successor. Though Jane was proclaimed on Edward's death, yet Mary's interest prevailed, and in a few days she entered London in triumph. The partialities which she had shown for the popish tenets in a private station, now displayed themselves on the throne, and, guided by the counsels of the sanguinary Gardiner, she assented to those horrible excesses which have so deservedly fixed upon her the appellation of the bloody Mary. The fagot and the stake were the instruments used to make converts to the church of Rome, and not only the innocent lady Jane and her husband were sacrificed to the mean jealousy of the queen, but the great Cranmer who had saved her from destruction was condemned to the flames. In 1554 she married Philip of Spain, son of Charles V. but the happiness which she expected from this union was destroyed by the coldness of her phlegmatic husband, and her disappointment in child-bearing added to the studied absence of Philip, and the disgraceful loss of Calais so preyed upon her spirits, that she fell a sacrifice to the attacks of a fever, 7th Nov. 1558. In her character Mary was violent, superstitious and bigoted, she thought it her duty to sacrifice the calls of humanity to her zeal for what she considered the interests of true religion, and from the influence of her popish advisers she was often prevailed to commit what was dishonorable, flagitious, and oppressive. Three books of devotion are mentioned by Strype as written by her.

MARY, queen of England, wife of William III. was daughter of the second James, by the daughter of lord Clarendon. She married at the age of 15 William prince of Orange, and at the revolution when her father had abdicated the throne, she accompanied her husband, and was crowned queen. Mary is represented as of a meek inoffensive character, little inclined to meddle with public affairs except when party influenced her, or the absence of her husband rendered it necessary. She died 28th Dec. in 1694, at the age of 32, of the small pox, leaving no issue. She was in her character benevolent and humane, exhibiting in her conduct great gravity and little attachment to the feminine trifles and levities which fashion or caprice too often recommend.

MARY, daughter of Henry III. duke of Brabant, married Philip the Bold of France 1274. She was accused of poisoning the eldest of her husband's sons by a former marriage, but her innocence was proved by a knight sent by her brother, in those days of chivalry, to challenge her accusers. She died 1321, 36 years after the death of her husband.

MARY, of Anjou, daughter of Lewis II. and wife of Charles VII. of France. She was a woman of a very heroic character, and though insulted and despised by her husband, she applied all the powers of her great mind to secure the crown to him. She died 1463, aged 59.

MARY, daughter of Henry VII. of England, married Lewis XII. of France. After his death she took for her second husband, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, by whom she had a daughter, who was the mother of the unfortunate lady Jane Gray. She died 1534, aged 37.

MARY DE MEDICIS, daughter of Francis II. duke of Tuscany, was born 1573, and married in 1600, Henry IV. of France. After her husband's death she was declared regent of the kingdom, but weakness marked her administration, and her partiality for the worthless marshal D'Ancre, excited against her the indignation of the people, and the opposition of her son Lewis XIII. Though a reconciliation was effected between her and her son, by the means of cardinal Richelieu, she afterwards conceived so great a hatred against this her former favorite, that all her powers and influence were directed to seek revenge. Lewis at last supported the cardinal as the best means of consolidating his government, and Mary was banished, and her attendants and favorites, and even her physician, were sent out of the kingdom, or confined in the bastille. From Compiègne, where she was exiled, she retired to Brussels, and died in poverty at Cologne, 3d July, 1642, aged 69. Though obstinate and revengeful, Mary was on some occasions very humane and benevolent, she patronized the arts, and by her munificence Paris was adorned by the splendid palace of Luxembourg, and some religious establishments.

MARY THERESA, of Austria, daughter of Philip IV. of Spain, married in 1660, Lewis XIV. of France, and died 1683, aged 45.

MARY LECZINSKA, daughter of Stanislaus of Poland, married Lewis XV. king of France, 1725. She is represented as a very amiable and virtuous princess. She bore to Lewis XV. two sons and eight daughters. She died universally regretted, 24th June, 1768, aged 65.

MARY of Cleves, married Henry I. prince of Condé. She was loved with such ardour by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. that when called to the throne of Poland, he wrote to her with all the warmth of affection, and signed his name with his blood. When raised to the French throne, he formed the design of annulling Mary's marriage with his rival, but Catharine de Medicis opposed it, and the sudden death of Mary, 30th Oct. 1574, at the age of 18, as is supposed by poison, left him disconsolate and wretched.

MARY of Arragon, daughter of Sancho III. wife of Otho, is said to have been put to death, 998, for causing the destruction of the count of Modena, whom she falsely accused of attempts on her virtue.

MARY, daughter of Charles, duke of Burgundy, married Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederic, and thus transferred the dominions of Burgundy to the house of Austria. She died at Bruges, 1482, in consequence of a fall from her horse.

MARY of Austria, daughter of Philip, king of Spain, married 1521 Lewis king of Hungary, who was slain five years after, at the battle of Mohats. She was made governess of the Netherlands, by her brother Charles V. where she behaved with great courage, and opposed with success the arms of Henry II. of France. She was the friend of the protestants, and a great patroness of literature. Her fondness for the sports of the field procured her the name of Diana, and from her military prowess, she was called by the Spaniards, the mother of the camp. She left her government in 1555, and died three years after, in Spain.

MARY STUART, queen of Scots, daughter of James V. of Scotland and Mary of Lorraine, was born 1552, and eight days after her birth inherited the throne by the death of her father. Henry VIII. of England solicited her hand for his son Edward, and when refused he invaded Scotland and plundered Edinburgh. Uninfluenced by the momentary successes of the English, the Scotch regency betrothed their young queen in 1558 to Francis the dauphin of France, and she was educated there, and imbibed those principles of bigotry and foolish levity which afterwards embittered her life. The marriage was celebrated in 1558, but two years after the youthful widowed queen left with tears of regret, that country where some of the happiest of her days had been passed. Returned to Scotland, she found her subjects agitated by party zeal and civil dissension, and she discovered a powerful rival and secret enemy in her neighbour Elizabeth of England, whom she had seriously offended by assuming in France the empty title of queen of England, on an ill-founded pretence of Elizabeth's illegitimacy. To distracted councils was added religious animosity, and by publicly celebrating the mass in her chapel, Mary offended the feelings of her subjects, who were stern and rigid presbyterians, and who in their zeal in favor of the reformation, had spared neither cathedrals, nor abbeys, nor monuments which bore the marks of popish superstition. Thus exposed to fanatical violence, and even insulted by the followers of Knox, the celebrated reformer, Mary could pursue no better step than to call to share her throne, a man of sagacity, firmness, and virtue. In this she was unfortunate; in marrying Henry lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lennox, a youth of engaging appearance, but of weak intellects, and impetuous passions, she is accused of consulting her licentious desires. Fondness and rapture soon gave way to indifference and disgust. Darnley became disagreeable in the eyes of the queen, and their mutual discontents were kindled and increased by the insidious arts of their respective respective flatterers. As Mary had placed her confidence on an Italian musician of the name of David Rizzio, whom she had appointed her secretary, Darnley was easily persuaded that her attachment was criminal. Determined on revenge, he abruptly entered her apartments with some assassins, and seizing the terrified favorite, plunged a dagger into his heart, though the queen, then far advanced in her pregnancy, implored in vain for mercy. Mary felt the indignity offered to her person and dignity, and instead of reconciliation, she looked with horror on the murderer, and failed not on every occasion to manifest her displeasure and abhorrence. Darnley despised at court, retired to his country house near Edinburgh, where his life was terminated by a most fatal catastrophe. The house was blown up in the night by gunpowder, and the unfortunate monarch's body was found in the garden adjoining, but without any marks of violence upon it. This foul deed was fixed with some degree of truth, upon James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, who had succeeded Rizzio in the favor of the queen, and Mary herself escaped not the imputation of accessory guilt. Bothwell was tried and acquitted, but as if rejoicing in the iniquity of his conduct, he seized the person of the queen, 24th April, 1567, and prevailed upon her at the castle of Dunbar, to marry him. This violent proceeding, which some historians assert, but with little probability of truth, to have been with the consent of Mary, roused the indignation of the Scotch nobles, and Bothwell, unable to stem the torrent of popular fury, left the kingdom, and fled to Denmark, where he died wretched and destitute. Mary in the meantime had fallen into the hands of her enemies, and was compelled by Murray, the regent, her greatest enemy, to resign the crown in favor of her infant son, James VI. who was crowned king at Dunbar. To render these measures agreeable to the nation, and to make the unfortunate Mary odious, she was now publicly accused of being the murderer of her husband, and letters were produced, which if true would have proved most fully her guilt. Time, however, has shown these to be gross forgeries, in the hands of those who had suffered the real murderer Bothwell to escape, and had punished with death some inferior characters, who were arraigned as accessories. Mary, a prisoner in Lochleven island, under the care of Murray's mother, who had been the concubine of James V. found means to escape to Hamilton, where she declared the acts extorted from her to be illegal. Though here joined by above 6000 men, she found herself unable to cope with the regent who dispersed her raw troops, and obliged her to fly. Unknowing where to retire, she came towards England, and landed at Workington in Cumberland, 17th May, 1568, and implored the friendship and protection of Elizabeth of England. Elizabeth with hypocritical condolence welcomed her on her escape, but after drawing her to Carlisle for greater security, she refused to see her till she had cleared herself of the imputations cast upon her character. Mary who expected to be respected as a sovereign, found unfortunately too late she was to be treated as a criminal; but after she had submitted to a trial which was to investigate her innocence, and had heard Elizabeth declare that nothing had appeared which could impeach the good character of her sister, she still felt that she was a prisoner in England. Her innocence and misfortunes roused the general feelings of the nation towards her, but while she hoped for deliverance from the offers of the duke of Norfolk to marry her, she had the mortification to know that Elizabeth not only wantonly opposed the union, but imprisoned her suitor, and afterwards on some trifling accusation put him to death. Not satisfied with the degradation of her rival, Elizabeth assumed now the part of a tyrant, and had her arraigned on pretence of conspiring against her life. Forty-two members of parliament and five judges were sent to Fotheringay castle, Northamptonshire, where the unhappy princess was imprisoned, and though she refused to acknowledge the authority of her judges, and asserted her innocence, the matter was removed to Westminster, where she was declared guilty. Mary, who had lingered more than 18 years in confinement, heard of the sentence with pleasure, and rejoiced at an event which was to terminate her sufferings and her misfortunes. Though some foreign powers interfered, and though James with noble and ardent indignation protested against the tyranny of Elizabeth's conduct, the bloody sentence was carried into execution. Mary in her last moments behaved with great dignity, and becoming composure, and though her persecutors wished to insult her attachment to the popish faith, she asserted her devotion to the church in whose tenets she had been educated. She suffered in Fotheringay castle, 8th Feb. 1587, imploring forgiveness on her murderers. Her remains were interred in Peterborough cathedral, but afterwards removed to Westminster abbey by her son when raised to the English throne. Mary, distinguished by all those superior charms of person which command and secure admiration, possessed high qualities of mind. She was well acquainted with Latin, French, and Italian, and besides her letters, many of which are still extant, she wrote some poems not devoid of merit. Her character has been attacked by various writers, but ably vindicated by Whitaker and others, who recommend her to the notice of posterity more as unfortunate than guilty, and more the victim of dangerous times, than the licentious and profligate culprit.

MARY, a French poetess, who resided in England in the 13th century. Her poems on chivalry, &c. are still preserved in the British museum. She wrote besides in French verse, a tale on St. Patrick's purgatory, and fables in French prose, published by le Grand.

MAS, Lewis du, Vid. DUMAS.

MASACCIO, Thomas, an eminent Italian painter. He was regarded as the chief artist of the second age of modern painting, since the revival of the art by Cimabue. He died 1443, aged 26.

MASCARDI, Augustine, a learned Italian, born at Sarzane, in the city of Genoa, 1591. He was early connected with the jesuits, and became chamberlain to Urban VIII. who founded a professorship of rhetoric in the college of Sapienza, for the exercise of his great talents. He was author of the History of the Conspiracy of de Fiesque—and of an able work, called "Dell'Arte Historica," besides some poems, &c. He was so fond of studious pursuits, and so negligent of his affairs, that he was always poor and in debt. He died in his native town 1640.

MASCARON, Julius, a French bishop, born at Marfeilles, 1634. He was member of the oratory, and in his ecclesiastical duties as preacher, displayed so much eloquence, that the court, in admiration of his abilities, gave him the bishopric of Tulle, 1671, from which he was translated to Agen. He died in his diocese, of a dropsy in the chest, 16th Dec. 1703. His eloquence was so powerful, that, it is said, he converted 28,000 out of 30 thousand, of the Huguenots whom he found in his diocese. His funeral orations on the queen mother — on Turenne — Seguiet, &c. were published, and are admired.

MASCHERONI, Laurent, a native of Bergamo, eminent as a mathematician, and the well-known author of Geometria del Compasso, or Compass Geometry. He assisted in the various experiments made by the academy of Bologna, to ascertain the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. He published also, some notes on the Calculus Integer of Euler, and died at Paris 1800; aged 50.

MASCLÉF, Francis, a French theologian, made canon of Amiens by bishop de Bron. He was removed from this office by the next bishop, who accused him of being a jansenist. He died Nov. 1728, aged 66. He wrote, a Hebrew Grammar, improved by de la Bletterie, 1730, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Catechism of Amiens — Conferences of the Diocese of Amiens, &c.

MASCRIER, John Baptist de, a French writer. He was born at Caen, and died at Paris, 1760, aged 63. He wrote, a Description of Egypt from Mallet's Memoirs, 4to. — an Idea of the Ancient and Modern Government of Egypt, 12mo. — Christian Reflections on the Truths of Faith — Cæsar's Commentaries translated, &c.

MASENIUS, James, a jesuit, born at Dalen, duchy of Juliers, 1606. He was professor of eloquence and poetry at Cologne, and wrote good poetry. He was author of Sarcothea, a Latin poem, on the Fall of Man, from which Lauder supposed that Milton had drawn the subject of his celebrated poem — Palæstra Eloquentiæ Ligatæ, 4 vols. 12mo. — Palæstra Styli Romani — Anima Historiæ, seu Vita Caroli V. & Ferdinandi, 4to. — Notes, &c. on the Annales Trevirensium, folio — and Epitome Annal. Trevirensium, 8vo. He died 1681.

MASHAM, lady Damaris, daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, and second wife of sir Francis Masham, of Oates, bart. was a most learned lady, born at Cambridge, 18th Jan. 1658. Her knowledge of history, geography, and philosophy, was greatly enlarged by the attention of Mr. Locke, who lived several years in her family, and died in her house at Oates. She wrote, a Discourse concerning the Love of God, 8vo. — Occasional Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous and Christian Life, 8vo. and was deservedly respected not only for learning, but for every virtue. Much of her time and attention was employed in the education of her only son. She died at Bath, 20th April, 1708, and was buried in the abbey church, where a monument records her virtues.

MASIUS, Andrew, counsellor to the duke of Cleves, was born at Linnich, near Brussels, and died, April, 1573, aged 57. He wrote, a collection of various pieces, translated from the Syriac — a Syriac Lexicon — Grammatica Linguae Syriacæ, folio — a Commentary on the Book of Joshua, and on some Chapters of Deuteronomy — Disputatio de Cœnâ Domini, &c. He was a most learned orientalist.

MASO, Thomas, or FINIGUERRA a goldsmith of Florence, who is said to have invented, by accident, the art of taking impressions from engravings on copper. He flourished about 1480.

MASON, Francis, a native of Durham, educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Merton. In 1599, he obtained the living of Orford, Suffolk, and was afterwards made chaplain to James I. and archdeacon of Norwich. He died on his living, 1621, aged 55. His Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, a work of great merit and authenticity, has been translated by Lindfay, with valuable notes.

MASON, sir John, a statesman of eminence in the reign of Henry VIII. and of his successors. Though but of obscure origin at Abingdon, in Berkshire, he received a good education under his uncle, who was one of the monks of the Abingdon abbey; and after being at All Souls', Oxford, he rose in the service of the king, who employed him in several embassies abroad, and made him a privy counsellor. He maintained his influence at court under Edward and Mary, and Elizabeth appointed him treasurer of her chamber. He was also made chancellor of the university of Oxford, and died 1566. His favorite maxim was, do, and say nothing. In gratitude for the blessings of the education which he had received at Abingdon, he was a munificent benefactor to this his native town, and left a handsome estate for the endowment of an hospital, which still shelters under its roof, the infirm, the aged, and the indigent.

MASON, John, a dissenting minister, author of some works of merit. He was honored with the degree of M. A. from a Scotch university, and died 1763. He wrote Self Knowledge, a valuable ethical work — Essay on Elocution, 8vo. — Fifty-two Practical Discourses for the Use of Families, 2 vols. 8vo. — the Power of Poetical and Prosaic Numbers, 8vo. — Plain and Modest Plea for Christianity, 8vo. — Student and Pastor, or directions to attain to eminence in those characters, 12mo. &c. There was a fanatic of that name, of Water Stratford, near Buckingham, who in the wildness of his calvinistical reveries, believed himself to be Elias, the forerunner of Christ, &c. He died 1695.

MASON, William, an English poet of eminence, He was son of a Yorkshire clergyman, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and in 1749, by the interest of his friend Gray he was elected fellow of Pembroke hall. He was admitted into orders in 1754, and became chaplain to the king, and obtained the valuable living of Aston, in Yorkshire, and afterwards the precentorship of York cathedral. During the American war, he showed himself a zealous advocate for the liberties of the subject, and his conduct was so offensive to the government, that his name was erased from the list of king's chaplains. The censure was was too severe; Mafon was the friend of political freedom and rational government; but that he was the enemy of fanciful and violent innovations, is abundantly proved by the abhorrence which he expressed against the wild theories of the supporters of the French revolution. He died in 1797, in consequence of a wound which he had accidentally received in getting out of his carriage, and which, from being neglected, became gangrenous and fatal. The abilities of Mafon as a poet, are highly respectable. He first attracted the public attention in 1748, by his Isis, a poem, which the Oxonians considered as an attack on their Alma Mater, and which therefore was answered in a very spirited and beautiful poem, by Thomas Warton, called the Triumphs of Isis. His Elfrida, and Caractacus, on the model of the Greeks, possess great merit, for boldness of conception, nervous language, and sublime description. He wrote besides, the English Garden, a poem — Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, translated into English verse, with learned notes from sir Joshua Reynolds — a Book on Psalmody, &c. As the friend of Gray, Mafon was one of his executors, and he evinced his respect for the departed bard, by publishing his letters, with his life, and by writing the epitaph which records his virtues in Westminster abbey.

MASON, George, an English writer, known as the author of an essay on Designs in Gardening, 1796, with appendix — Answer to T. Paine — Supplement to Johnson's English Dictionary, 4to. — Life of lord Howe, 1803, &c. He made a valuable collection of English and foreign literature, and died at Aldenham lodge, Herts, of a fit of apoplexy, 4th Nov. 1806, aged 71.

MASQUE DE FER, or IRON MASK, a person confined in the castle of Pignerol, and afterwards in the isles of St. Margaret, and always disguised in a mask with steel springs, which concealed his features, without incommoding him in receiving his nourishment. He died in the Bastille, 1703, and was privately buried under the name of Marchiali. Though no person ever could discover who he was, it is certain that he was a man of high birth, as he was treated with singular respect by his keepers, and as infinite pains were taken to prevent his holding communication with any other person.

MASSAC, John Baptiste, an eminent French painter, born at Paris, Dec. 1687. He died, Sept. 1767. He was a protestant, and a man of great integrity. The pictures of Le Brun at Versailles, were copied by him, and the engravings published, 1753.

MASSANIELLO, or ANELLO, Thomas, a Neapolitan fisherman, Vid. ANELLO.

MASSARI, Lucio, a native of Bologna, eminent as an historical painter. He studied under Ludov. Caracci, and died 1633, aged 64.

MASSARIA, Alexander, a physician, born at Vicenza. He wrote Latin treatises — on the Plague, 4to. — on Bleeding in Fevers — on Purging in the Beginning of Diseases, 4to. — Practica Medica, folio. He died very old, at Padua, 1598.

MASSE, John Baptiste, a Parisian, miniature painter to the French king. He died at Paris, 1767, aged 80. Some engravings were published 1753, from the copies which he took of Le Brun's famous pictures at Versailles.

MASSEI, Raymond, author of, Pœan Aurelianus, 4to. — Pugeæ, five de Lymphis Pugiæ, lib. 2, 1599, &c. was a physician of Orleans.

MASSEVILLE, Louis le Vavasseur de, a native of Montebourg, who died at Valogne, 1733, aged 66. He was an able topographical writer, and composed an History and Geography of Normandy, 8 vols. 12mo.

MASSIEU, William, a French writer, born at Caen, and educated by the jesuits, whose society he left to apply himself more intensely to belles lettres. He became tutor to M. de Sacy's children, and afterwards was made pensionary of the academy of inscriptions, professor royal of the Greek language, and member of the French academy. He was afflicted in the latter part of life, with two cataracts, which deprived him of his sight, and he died of a paralytic stroke, Sept. 26th, 1722. He published, an edition of the Greek Testament — History of French Poetry — a translation of Pindar — a Latin poem on Coffee — Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy. His Lectures on Pindar, Homer, Theocritus, and Demosthenes, were much admired.

MASSILLON, John Baptiste, a famous French preacher, born at Hieres, in Provence, 1663. He was admitted into the congregation of the oratory in 1681, and distinguished himself so much at Vienne, by his funeral oration on Villars, the archbishop of that city, that he was called to Paris, where his eloquence charmed and astonished crowded audiences. His mode of preaching was peculiarly his own; interesting, natural, and simple, his appeals were directed to the heart, and succeeded far above the efforts of all other competitors. The court heard him with applause, and Lewis XIV. paid him this sincere compliment, "Father," said the king, "when I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them, but whenever I hear you, I go away much displeased with myself." On one occasion, when discoursing on the small number of the elect, his eloquence was so awfully striking, that an involuntary murmur of applause arose in the congregation, and assisted the preacher more forcibly to convey his pathetic appeal. Uninfluenced by popularity, he followed his duty with modesty, but conscious dignity, and in 1717 was appointed by the regent, bishop of Clermont. In 1719 he was admitted member of the French academy; and after pronouncing his last oration in Paris, on the duchess of Orleans, in 1723, he retired to his diocese, where he presided with mildness, piety, and benevolence. He died Sept. 1742, aged 79, and his name is almost become proverbial as a powerful master of eloquence. His works were published by his nephew, 1745, 14 vols. 12mo.

MASSINGER, Philip, a dramatic poet, born at Salisbury, 1585. He entered at St. Alban's hall, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and then came to London, where he wrote for the stage. He was courted by the wits and the learned men of the times, and was assisted in some of his plays by Fletcher, Middleton, Rowley, Field, and Decker. He died suddenly.

suddenly at his house, Bankside, Southwark, and was buried March, 1639, at St. Mary Overy, or St. Saviour's church, Southwark, in the same grave which also received the remains of his friend Fletcher. He wrote 14 plays of his own, besides those in which he was assisted by his friends. His works appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. by Henry Dell, 1761, and by Mason and T. Davies in 1779.

MASSINISSA, king of part of Africa, from the enemy, became the most faithful ally, of Rome, when Scipio had sent him back, without ransom, his nephew, taken prisoner in battle. At his death, he left Scipio Æmilianus the guardian of his kingdom, B. C. 149.

MASSOLINO, de Panicale, a native of Florence, admired as a painter. He died 1450, aged 37. His best piece is a large representation of St. Peter's History.

MASSON, Anthony, a French engraver, whose plates of Turenne — of the duke d'Harcourt — of the disciples at Emmaus, are his best performances. His portraits were also admired. He died at Paris, 1702, aged 66.

MASSON, Innocent le, general of the Carthusian order, rebuilt the Grande Chartreuse when destroyed by fire, and died 1703, aged 75. He made a collection of the statutes of his order, enriched with notes, and printed at Paris 1703, folio.

MASSON, Anthony, a Minim, who died at Vincennes, 1700, was author of an History of the Deluge, and of Noah, 12mo. — History of Abraham, &c.

MASSON DES GRANGES, Daniel, author of the Modern Philosopher, or the Unbeliever condemned at the Tribunal of Reason, 1765, 12mo. was a French ecclesiastic, who died 1760, aged 60.

MASSON, Papirius, a French writer, born at Foréz, May, 1544. He was educated by the jesuits, and entered into their society, but after some time left it, and applied himself to the law. He became librarian to the duke of Anjou's chancellor, and in 1576, was made advocate of parliament, though he never pleaded but one cause, and that successfully. He died 9th June, 1611. He wrote, four books of French Annals, from Pharamond to Henry II. 1598, 4to. — and Elegia Virorum Clarissimorum, much admired, and other works.

MASSON, John, a reformed minister, who quitted France to enjoy liberty of opinion in England, and died in Holland about 1750. He wrote, in French, a Critical History of the Republic of Letters, 15 vols. 12mo. — Vitæ Horatii, Ovidii, & Plinii jun. 3 vols. 8vo. — History of Bayle, and of his Works, 12mo.

MASSUET, Rene, a learned Benedictine of St. Maur, born at St. Ouen de Macelles, 1665. He is known by his edition of Irænaeus, 1710, folio, with learned dissertations — a fifth volume of the Acts of the Saints of St. Benedict — and other works. He died 19th Jan. 1716, aged 50.

MASTELLETA, John Andrew, a painter, born at Bologna, 1577, who, after studying under the Caraccis, improved himself further by copying the works of Parmesan. He is blamed for employing too much black in his paintings. He died in a monastery, where under a fit of melancholy, he had retired.

MATANI, Anthony, a physician born at Pistoia, in Italy, 27th July, 1730. He became professor of medicine at Pisa, where he took his degrees, and died universally respected at Pistoia, June 1769. He published de Aneurismaticis Præcordiorum Morbis Animadversiones — Heliodori Larissæi Capita Opticorum e Græco Latine conversa — Account of the Natural Productions of Pistoia — de Nosocomiorum Regimine — de Remediis Tractatus, and left some MSS. besides.

MATERNUS DE CILANO, George Christian, a native of Presburg who died at Altena in Lower Saxony, 1773. He was author of treatises de Terræ Conculsionibus — de Causis Lucis Borealis. — de Motu Humorum Progressu Veteribus non Ignoti. — de Saturnalium Origine & celebrandi Ritu apud Romanos, &c.

MATHER, Increase, D. D. a native of New England who left his church at Gloucester, at the reformation to retire to his native country, where he died 1723, aged 84. He wrote brief History of the Wars with the Indians in New England, 1676. — Divine Right of Infant Baptism — Discourse on the Person of Christ — de Successu Evangelii apud Anglos in Nova Scotia, 8vo. — Diatriba de Signo Filii Hominis, & de Secundo Messia Adventu, 8vo. — Discourse on Comets, 8vo. &c.

MATHER, Cotton, D. D. an eminent divine, son of the preceding, born at Boston, America, Feb. 1663. He early distinguished himself by his learning, and in 1684 became minister of Boston, where he exerted all his influence in the most benevolent plans. He formed various societies for suppressing riots, for reforming manners, and for composing differences without the interference of the law. His popularity was such that the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D. D. in 1710, and in 1714 he was elected member of the London Royal society. He closed an honorable and useful life, 13th Feb. 1728. He wrote, it is said, not less than 382 pieces, the best known of which are an Ecclesiastical History of New England from 1620 to 1698, folio, — the Christian Philosopher, 8vo. — the Wonders of the Invisible World, or Account of several Witches lately executed in New England, a very superstitious performance.

MATHIAS, St. one of the 12 apostles in the room of the traitor Judas. He suffered martyrdom where he preached the gospel. A gospel was preserved among some sects, said to have been written by him.

MATHIAS, son of Maximilian II. was emperor of Germany after his brother Rodolphus II. 1612. He made peace with the Turks 1615, but a new war arose which continued for 30 years till the peace of Westphalia. Mathias died at Vienna 10th March, 1616, aged 63.

MATHIAS CORVINUS, king of Hungary and Bohemia, was the second son of John Huniades, and obtained the kingdom 1458, after escaping from the confinement where his enemies detained him. He broke the conspiracy of Hungarian lords who invited Frederic III. to take possession of the crown, in opposition to him, and he bravely defeated the Turks, who, invited by the dissensions of the country, had invaded the kingdom.

dom. He obliged also his rival to resign the consecrated crown of Stephen which he had seized, and in a new war he attacked the Austrian dominions and penetrated to Vienna, which he took, and also Neustadt. The emperor, terrified and subdued, made peace agreeable to the terms dictated by the conqueror 1487. After establishing wise regulations, reforming abuses, and checking duels and litigious quarrels, this great man was seized with an apoplexy which carried him off 16th April, 1490, at Vienna, as he was preparing to make war against the Turks.

MATHIAS, Christian, a native of Meldorp in Holstein, professor of philosophy and divinity in various universities, died at Utrecht 1655, aged 71. He wrote Historia Patriarcharum, 4to. — Theatrum Historicum, 4to.

MATHON DE LA COUR, James, a mathematician born at Lyons, 28th Oct. 1712, and died there 1770. He was an active member of the academy of Lyons, and wrote a memoir on the best method of supplying the Action of wind on large Vessels — Elements of Dynamics and Mechanics, 3 vols. 12mo. — Essay on calculating the Movements of Machines by the Reaction of Water.

MATHON DE LA COUR, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding was born at Lyons 1738. He came early to Paris, and there distinguished himself by his literary labors, and the prizes which he obtained in various learned academies, and on his return to his native city he gained universal esteem by the benevolence, hospitality, and the amiable virtues of his character. The revolution at last came to embitter his days; after the siege of Lyons, in 1793, he was condemned to death by the bloody tribunal, and shared with several others the fatal blow which hurried so many unhappy victims to an untimely grave. Among his elegant and ingenious pieces these rank high, Dissertation on the Causes which altered the Laws of Lycurgus, at Lacedæmon, a prize essay, 1771 — Discourse on the Danger of reading Books hostile to Religion, a prize composition — Testament de Fortuné Ricard, 1781, long ascribed to Franklin — Idylles in prose — Eloges — Letters on the Public Pictures exhibited in 1763, 5, and 7, &c.

MATIGNON, James de, prince of Mortagne, count of Thorigni, was born at Lonray in Normandy, 1526, and early became eminent as a soldier. He was distinguished at the battles of Jarnac, Roche-abeille, and Moncontour, and was commander in chief in Normandy, 1572, and made a marshal by Henry III. 1579. He assisted at the coronation of Henry IV. as constable, and died July 1597, aged 73.

MATILDA or MAUD, daughter of Henry I. king of England, married Henry IV. emperor of Germany, and was in 1135 publicly announced as her father's heir and successor on the English throne, after the death of his favorite son Henry. On her father's decease, Stephen, who was on the spot, seized the kingdom, and Matilda came at last with an army to conquer her father's inheritance, Stephen was defeated, and Matilda was in 1141 acknowledged queen, but her pride offended the nobles, and Stephen who had conciliated the affection of all parties by his courteous behaviour, and by the arts which an usurper can occasionally employ, was taken from his dungeon to be restored to the throne, and the queen fled from the kingdom. After Stephen's death, Henry II. the son of Matilda by Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, whom she had married after her first husband's death, was appointed king of England. Matilda died 1167, aged 67.

MATSYS, Quintin, a native of Antwerp, who from a blacksmith became an eminent painter. His works were chiefly portraits and historical pieces, and in a very masterly style. The best of his pieces is a Descent from the Cross preserved in Antwerp cathedral. He died 1529, aged 69. His son John was also a good artist, though inferior to his father.

MATTEI, Paolo da, a native of Naples who studied painting under Luka Giordano, and excelled by the correctness of his pieces, and the accuracy with which he copied the works of the ablest masters. He died 1728, aged 67.

MATTHEW or LEVI, son of Alpheus, a tax gatherer, who was called by our Saviour to become a disciple. He wrote his gospel about 64, and some imagine it was originally written in Hebrew or Syriac, and afterwards translated into Greek. He preached the gospel in Persia, and in Parthia, and is there supposed to have suffered martyrdom.

MATTHEW CANTACUZENUS, son of John emperor of Constantinople, was partner on the throne with him 1354. On the father's abdication Matthew took for his associate John Palæologus, but the divided power produced quarrels; a battle was fought in Thrace, and Matthew being defeated, resigned the crown to his opponent and retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he composed some commentaries on Solomon's Song.

MATTHEW, of Westminster, a Benedictine of the abbey of Westminster, known as an historian. His work called "Flores Historiarum," &c. treats of English affairs from the beginning of the world to the year 1307, and was published in London 1567, and at Frankfort 1601, folio. The work is divided into three books, the first extends from the creation to the christian æra, the second to the Norman conquest, the third to the beginning of the second Edward's reign, afterwards continued to the death of Edward III. 1377. The author, though occasionally credulous, is universally respected as a faithful, accurate, regular, and candid historian.

MATTHEWS, Tobias, an able and eloquent Oxford divine in the reign of James I. made bishop of Durham, and in 1606 translated to York where he died 1628, aged 82. A Latin sermon of his against Campanian has been published. His son Tobias, after receiving his education at Christ church, Oxford, became a catholic, and entered among the jesuits. He disgraced his name, and abused his talents by being the intriguer and spy of the court of Rome in England. He died 1655.

MATTHEWS, Thomas, a native of Glamorganshire, eminent as a naval commander. He fought in the Mediterranean in 1744, a most obstinate battle off Toulon, but as he was unfortunately not ably supported by his second in command, Lestock, instead of obtaining a glorious victory as he expected, he had only an indeactive action. Though he had done his duty, he was dismissed from the service by a court martial, and Le-flock was acquitted. He died on his estates in Glamorganshire, 1751.

MATTHIEU, Peter, a French historian, principal of the college of Vercell. He favoured the league and the Guises, and afterwards became historiographer to Henry IV. and attended Lewis XIII. at the siege of Montauban. He died at Toulouse 12th Oct. 1621, aged 58. He wrote a History of Memorable Events in the Reign of Henry the Great, 8vo. — the History of Henry's Death, folio. — the History of St. Lewis, 8vo. — the History of France from Francis I. to Lewis XIII. 2 vols. folio. — la Guisade, a tragedy, &c.

MATTHIOLUS, Peter Andrew, an able physician, born at Sienna. He published some valuable commentaries in Italian on Dioscorides, Lyons 1548, 4to. translated into Latin by Desmoulins, 1572, folio. His works were collected and appeared at Basil, 1598, folio, enriched with the notes of Gaspard Bartholin. He died of the plague at Trent, 1577, aged about 77. There was another physician of the same name, professor of medicine at Padua, where he died 1498. He wrote Ars Memorativa, 4to. a curious book.

MATTI, Don Emanuel, a Spanish poet of eminence, born at Oropesa, New Castille, 1663. He was member of the Arcadia at Rome, and Innocent XII. pleased with his poetry, made him dean of Alicant, where he died 18th Dec. 1737. His letters and poetry were published at Madrid, 2 vols. 12mo. 1735.

MATURINO, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. He assisted his master Raphael in several of his designs, and afterwards offered his services to Polidoro de Carravaggio, whose works he rivalled in correctness and execution. He died 1527, aged 37.

MATY, Matthew, an eminent physician, born in Holland 1718. He took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and in 1740, came to settle in England. He introduced himself to public notice 1759, by his "Journal Britannique," a periodical paper printed at the Hague, and giving an account of English publications. In 1758, he was chosen fellow, and 1765, secretary of the Royal society, and in 1772, he became chief librarian of the British museum. He unfortunately fell a victim to a languishing disorder 1776, after a life devoted to the offices of humanity, and the labors of science. He was a great advocate for the inoculation of the small pox, when it was considered as dangerous. His memoirs of the earl of Chesterfield, nearly finished before his death, were prefixed by his son-in-law Justamond to the works of that nobleman, 1777, 2 vols. 4to.

MATY, Paul Henry, son of the above, was born 1745, and educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He obtained there a travelling fellowship, which enabled him to go abroad, and in 1774, he went as chaplain to lord Stormont ambassador to the court of France. His rise in the church might have now been enforced by the influence of his powerful friends, but he expressed some conscientious scruples about those articles of faith, to which before he had subscribed, and in 1776, he totally withdrew himself from the duties of a minister of the church of England. The rest of his life was devoted to literary pursuits. He became assistant librarian to the British museum, and in 1778, succeeded Dr. Horsley as secretary to the Royal society. He began Jan. 1782, a monthly review of new publications, which from ill health he discontinued in 1786. In the disputes which unfortunately prevailed in the Royal society in 1784, about the re-admission of Dr. Hutton, he took a warm part, and resigned his office in disgust, when good sense would have dictated a more moderate and prudent conduct. A sedentary life had weakened his constitution, and he fell a martyr to an asthmatic complaint, 16th Jan. 1787, aged 42. He translated Riefbach's travels through Germany, and after his death a volume of his sermons appeared, in which were those of Secker and other authors which his editors suspected not to have been transcribed by him.

MAUCHARD, Burchard David, a native of Marbach, professor of physic and anatomy in Tubingen university, and physician to the duke of Wirtemberg. He wrote various tracts on his profession, and died at Tubingen 1751, aged 55.

MAUCROIX, Francis de, a French translator, born at Noyon 1619. He died canon of Rheims 1708. He translated the Philippics of Demosthenes — the Euthydemus, and the greater Hippias of Plato — some Orations of Cicero — the Rationarium Temporum of Petau, 3 vols. 8c. He was intimate with Boileau and Racine, and published, in conjunction with la Fontaine, miscellaneous and poetical works, 2 vols. 12mo.

MAUDUIT, Michael, an eminent divine, born at Vire in Normandy 1634. He died at Paris 1709. He wrote some useful works — a treatise on Religion against Atheists, Deists, &c. 1698 — a Translation of the Psalms into French Verse, not very respectable — Analyses of some of the Books of the New Testament, 8 vols. 12mo. — Dissertations on the Gout, &c.

MAUDUIT, Israel, a political writer, born at Exeter 1708. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, but soon after quitted his clerical employment, and became partner with his brother Jasper, a London merchant. In 1760 he excited the public attention by his "Considerations on the German War," and he was afterwards appointed agent for the province of Massachusetts, and consequently became a warm partizan in the disputes with the mother country. In 1769, he wrote his Short View of the History of the New England Colonies, and in 1774, he espoused the cause of the dissenters by his pamphlet "on the Case of the Dissenting Ministers," &c. He published various other pamphlets which are now deservedly forgotten, and died 14th June, 1787, aged 79.

MAUGIN, John, surnamed Angevin, or of Anjou, where he was born, translated Machiavel's Discourses on Livy into French. He published his new Tristan Prince of Leonnois, &c. 1554, which he dedicated to M. Mau-pas, who is the hero of the book.

MAUFERTUIS, Peter Lewis Moreau de, an able philosopher, born of a good family at St. Malo's 1698. He was for three years engaged in a military life, but quitted it for the labor of science. He was admitted member of the French academy 1723, and some years after, when visiting London, he was honored with the title of fellow of the Royal society. In 1736, he was at the head of the French academicians, sent by the king of France, to the North, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He was afterwards invited by the prince of Prussia to Berlin, to become president of the learned society there, and with a spirit of adventure he accompanied his royal friend to the war against the Germans. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Molwitz, and conveyed to Vienna, but soon honorably set at liberty by the emperor, and permitted to return to Berlin. He returned to Paris, but instead of quietly settling in his country, in the pursuit of science and philosophy, he went back to Berlin, and was soon after unfortunately engaged in some literary quarrels with Koenig, professor of philosophy at Franeker, and with Voltaire. The roving and unsettled disposition of Maupertuis was not indeed calculated to conciliate esteem and affection; but Voltaire was so severely satirical on him whom he had long called his friend and mathematical instructor, that even the king of Prussia thought it his duty to interfere and arrest the malevolent poet at Frankfort. Maupertuis went afterwards on a visit to his philosophical friends the Bernouillis at Basil, and died at their house, July 1759. His works are very valuable and display everywhere a great, well-informed, and penetrating mind. They have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo. 1756, consisting of the Figure of the Earth determined — the Measurement of a Degree of the Meridian — Discourse on the Figure of the Stars — Elements of Geography — Nautical Astronomy — Elements of Astronomy — Physical Dissertation on a White Negro — Essay on Cosinography — Reflections on the Origin of Languages — Essay on Moral Philosophy, and various other dissertations, &c. inserted in the Berlin Memoirs.

MAUPERTUY, John Baptist Drouet de, a native of Paris, who studied the law, and afterwards held a place under government, and then entered into orders and obtained a canonry. He wrote the History of the Holy Church at Vienne — a Christian's Sentiments on the True Love of God — the Dangerous Commerce between the two Sexes — Veneration due to Relics, &c. He died 1736, aged 86.

MAUPIN, N. Aubigny, a celebrated singer at the Paris opera. She possessed great personal courage, and she on some occasions assumed a man's dress to avenge boldly on her opponents those insults which her sex forbade her openly to resent. Her best character was Medea in the opera of Medus by la Grange. She left the stage in 1705, and died two years after, aged 33.

MAUR, St. a disciple of St. Benedict, who died about 584, abbot of Glaufeuil in Anjou. A congregation bearing his name was formed in France in the seventeenth century, which was approved by the pope, and has produced some learned men.

MAUR, Don Charles de, an eminent mathematician and engineer, whose abilities were employed not only in the Spanish army, but in the construction of canals, of public roads, and other great national works. He wrote a treatise on Dynamics, and Elements of Mathematics, and died 25th Nov. 1785.

MAURAN, Peter, a leading man among the Albigenes in Languedoc in the 13th century, who, because he denied transubstantiation, was stripped of his property, and condemned, after severe trials, to make a pilgrimage to the holy land, and there to administer to the relief of the indigent.

MAUREPAS, John Frederic Philippeaux, count of, a French statesman, born 1701. In 1715 he was made secretary at court, and was afterwards appointed superintendent of the king's household, and of the marine, 1723, and minister of state, 1738. Though he evinced sagacity and genius in his master's service, he was exiled to Bourges by the intrigues of Madame Pompadour, and continued in disgrace till Lewis XVI. in 1774, recalled him to enjoy his confidence, and to direct public affairs. The spirited measures, however, which he recommended in favor of the Americans against their parent country were very imprudent, and have since produced the ruin of his master. He died Nov. 1781, aged 80. His correspondence, which was very precise and correct, together with his memoirs, which are very negligently written, appeared at Paris 1792, 2 vols. 8vo.

MAURICE, of Nassau, prince of Orange, succeeded though only 18 on his father's murder, 1584, to the government of the Low Countries. Treading in the glorious steps of his father, he as captain general of the United States strengthened and confirmed the newly established republic, supported its liberties and privileges, and enlarged its provinces by the conquest of Breda, in 1590, and of Zutphen, Deventer, Hulst, Nimeguen, Gertruydenburg, &c. His successes were rapidly continued, the archduke Albert was defeated in 1597, and the Spaniards were forced to evacuate Holland, and though obliged to raise the siege of Dunkirk in 1600, Maurice avenged this trifling disaster by the total defeat of Albert, near Nieuport. The conquest of Rhinberg, Grave, and other places followed these glorious labors; but while Maurice, respected by the soldiery, for his valor and services aimed at the sovereignty of his country, his views were vigorously opposed by the unyielding integrity of Barneveldt, who, unhappily for the memory of his rival, was sacrificed in an unguarded moment. The Dutch mourned the loss of their virtuous pensionary, and Maurice sensible of his cruelty, and still more displeased by the loss of Breda, which after a siege of six months fell into the hands of the Spaniards, became the prey of sudden grief, and died of a broken heart 1625, aged 55, leaving behind him the character of being the ablest general of the age.

MAURICEAU, Francis, a French surgeon, chiefly eminent in midwifery, and in an extensive knowledge of female diseases. He wrote a treatise on the Disorders of Pregnant Women — on Midwifery — Diseases of Mothers and New Born Infants, 4to. 1694, a very useful work, translated into several languages. He died at Paris 1709.

MAURITIUS TIBERIUS, a Cappadocian who distinguished himself at the head of the Roman armies, and received in marriage the daughter of the emperor Tiberius Constantine. He was made emperor 582, but though valiant and successful against the Persians and Arabs, he was unfortunately defeated by Phocas his general, who had proclaimed himself emperor, and he was put to death with his five sons, A. D. 602, aged 63.

MAUROLICO, Francis, abbé of Santa Maria del Porto, in Sicily, and professor of mathematics, was born at Messina 1494, and died 1575. He is author of an edition of the Spherics of Theodosius — Emendatio & Restitutio Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi — Archimedis Momumenta Omnia — Euclidis Phænomena — Martyrologium, &c.

MAURUS, Terentianus, a Latin poet under Trajan. His poem de Literis, Syllabis, &c. is preserved in Maittaire's Corpus Poet. Lat.

MAUSSAC, Philip James, a counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse, president of the court of aids at Montpellier, and a most elegant Greek scholar, died 1650, aged 70. He published notes on Harpocration, Paris, 1614, 4to. — Remarks on Plutarch's treatise on Mountains and Rivers, &c.

MAUTOUR, Philibert Bernard Moreau de, auditor of the Paris chamber of accounts, and member of the academy of inscriptions, was born at Beaune, 1654, and died 1737. He published a translation of Petau's Rationarium Temporum, 4 vols. 12mo. and wrote some poems and some dissertations, inserted in the memoirs of the belles lettres' academy.

MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, son of Maximianus Hercules, declared himself emperor, 306. Though opposed by Galerius he established his power, but becoming odious by his cruelty, he was at last attacked and defeated by Constantine, and was drowned as he crossed the Tiber in his flight, 312.

MAXIMIANUS, Marcus Aurel. Valer. Hercul. a Roman emperor, who rose to that dignity from the rank of a common soldier. He possessed valor and prudence, but as the associate of Diocletian he was induced to lay down the ensigns of his office, 304, though afterwards he had the ambition to resume his power. His troops, however, rebelled against him, and he was put to death at last by order of Constantine, his son-in-law, 310, aged 60.

MAXIMIANUS, Galer. Valer. a shepherd of Dacia, distinguished by his valor, and at last raised to the throne by Diocletian, who gave him his daughter in marriage. After conquering the Goths, Dalmatians, and Persians, it is supposed that he obliged his father-in-law Diocletian to abdicate the crown. He died 311, in a miserable manner, calling upon the god of the christians, whose religion he had hitherto persecuted.

MAXIMILIAN I. archduke of Austria, son of Frederic IV. was born 1459. By his marriage with Mary daughter of Charles, last duke of Burgundy, he rose to consequence as an independent prince, and in 1486, he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1493, emperor. He was successful in his war against France, but his forces were defeated in Italy and Switzerland. In his eagerness to enlarge his dominions he expressed a wish to be the coadjutor of Julius II. on the papal throne, and like some of the Roman emperors, he assumed the title of pontifex maximus. He afterwards made an alliance with Henry VIII. against France, and even served as a private individual in the English army on the continent. He was unsteady in his attachments, and though possessed of good sense and great qualities, little to be depended on in political affairs. He died at Inspruck, 15th Jan. 1519, in consequence of eating melons to excess. He was author of some poems, and of memoirs of his own life.

MAXIMILIAN II. son of Ferdinand I. was elected king of the Romans, 1562, and succeeded his father two years after as king of Hungary and Bohemia, and emperor of Germany. He was of a peaceful disposition, and therefore suffered from the inroads of the Turks upon his dominions. He died at Ratibon, 12th Oct. 1576, aged 50. By his wife, Mary of Austria, sister of Philip II. of Spain, he had several children.

MAXIMILIAN, duke of Bavaria, deserved by his courage the title of defender of Germany, and by his wisdom that of Solomon. He gained the battle of Prague, 1620, and for his services as a warrior and as the supporter of the Catholic faith, he was raised to the dignity of an elector of the German empire. He died 1651, aged 70.

MAXIMILIAN, Emmanuel, elector of Bavaria, distinguished himself by his many services in the cause of the emperor Leopold. He was at the siege of Neuheusel, in 1685, when the Turkish forces were defeated, and the next year he was at the siege of Buda, and the year after at the battle of Mohatz. His merits placed him at the head of the Hungarian army, and in 1689 he took from the Turks the city of Belgrade, and afterwards commanded the imperial troops at the siege of Mentz, and on the banks of the Rhine. In 1692 he was made governor of the Low Countries by the king of Spain; but during the war of the Spanish succession he sided with France, and exposed himself to the resentment of the emperor, who deprived him of his electoral honors, to which he was restored at the general peace. He died at Munich, 26th Feb. 1726.

MAXIMILIAN, Leopold, elector of Bavaria, son of the emperor Charles VII. succeeded to the electorate of Bavaria, 1746. He died 30th Dec. 1777, and as he left no issue, the succession to his dominions occasioned a war between the empire and Prussia, which was terminated by the peace of Teschen, 1779.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Jul. Verus, son of a Thracian peasant, rose by his valor in the Roman armies, and on the death of Alexander Severus, was proclaimed emperor, 235. He was of gigantic size and proportionable strength, but a great tyrant. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, near Aquileia, 256.

MAXIMUS, Magnus, a Spaniard, proclaimed emperor of Rome, by his troops in Britain, 383. Though opposed by Gratian, he proved victorious, and at last marching into Italy, he was besieged in Aquileia, and defeated by Theodosius, who caused his head to be cut off, 388.

MAXIMUS, of Tyre, a Platonic philosopher, who was at Rome, 146, A. D. His Discourses, 41 in number, have been edited by Reiske, 1774, and translated into French by Formey.

MAXIMUS, the Cynic, a native of Ephesus, tutor to the apostate Julian, whom he encouraged in his opposition to Christianity, and flattered by his magic arts, assuring him, when going on his Persian expedition, that he would prove victorious, and that he was animated by by the soul of Alexander. He was put to death by the emperor Valens, 366.

MAY, Thomas, an English writer, born at Mayfield, in Suffex, 1594. He was of Sidney college, Cambridge, where he took, 1612, his bachelor's degree, and afterwards entered at Gray's Inn. His genius recommended him to the notice of the great of those times. He was the friend of sir Kenelm Digby, sir R. Fanshawe, Thomas Carew, Ben Jonson, sir John Suckling, and others, and became the favorite of Charles I. and of his queen. Under the sunshine of royal patronage he wrote "The Heir," a comedy, acted 1620 — Cleopatra, a tragedy, acted 1626 — Antigone, a tragedy — Agrippina, a tragedy — the Old Couple, a comedy, &c. and also by the king's command, "the Reign of Henry II." a poem in 7 books, and "the Reign of Edward III." a poem in 7 books. As a translator, May acquired some reputation. Virgil's Georgics appeared 1622, with notes, and his Lucan's Pharsalia, 1627. This last work is a very respectable performance, and the poet greatly increased his literary fame by a continuation of the poem to the death of Julius Cæsar, in verses which were much admired, and which Dr. Johnson preferred to the Latin of Cowley or of Milton. May, respected as the friend of the monarch, to whom he dedicated the best part of his publications, became despicable in the civil wars. He embraced the party of the parliament, was made their secretary and historiographer, and as such published the "History of the Parliament of England," which began Nov. 3d. 1640, to the first battle of Newbury, 1643. He wrote also a "Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England," a few months after the publication of which he died suddenly, 13th Nov. 1650, aged 55. He was buried in Westminster abbey, but at the restoration his body was dug up, and deposited in a pit in St. Margaret's church yard.

MAY, Lewis du, a protestant French historian, who spent the best part of his life in Germany. He died 1681. His works are "State of the Empire, or Abridgment of the Public Law of Germany" — Science des Princes, 8vo. — the Prudent Voyager, 12mo.

MAYENNE, Charles of Lorraine, duke of, son of Francis, duke of Guise, was born 26th March, 1554. He distinguished himself as a heroic foldier at the sieges of Poitiers and Rochelle, and at the battle of Montcontour, and defeated the protestants in Guienne, Dauphiné, and Saintonge. When his brothers were assassinated at the council of Blois, he proclaimed himself chief of the league, declared Cardinal Bourbon king, under the name of Charles X. and prepared to support his power by the force of arms. He opposed, with an army of 30,000 men, Henry IV. but was defeated at the battle of Arques, and again at Ivry, and after many losses he was at last reconciled to his victorious enemy, who, in the goodness of his heart, made him his friend, and added the government of the Isle of France. He died at Scissions, 3d Oct. 1611, and his family was extinct in his son, who died 1621.

MAYER, John Frederic, a Lutheran divine, born at Leipzig 1650. He was successively professor at Wittenberg, Hamburg, and Stettin, and became superintendent of the churches of Pomerania. He died 1712.

He wrote a treatise on the Method of studying Holy Scripture — Dissertations on Particular Parts of the Bible — Tractatus de Osculo Pedum Pontificis Romani, 4to. but his great work is Bibliotheca Biblica, 4to. 1713, in which he examines the character of the various commentators on the bible.

MAYER, Tobias, an eminent astronomer, born at Maspach, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, 1723. He was self-instructed, and in the formation of machines and instruments, displayed wonderful ingenuity. He also applied himself to the Latin language and belles lettres, and in 1750 was appointed professor of mathematics in Gottingen university. He died 1762, exhausted by his uncommon application. He studied the nature of the moon, and its influence upon the earth with such ability, and approached so nearly the problem of longitude, that his widow obtained an honorable reward of 3000l. from the British parliament. His discoveries in astronomy and geometry were very great and important. He published Tables of Refractions — Theory of the Moon — Astronomical Tables — a Mathematical Atlas, &c. — There was also a jesuit of the same name in Moravia, professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, for whom an observatory was built at Mannheim by the elector Palatine. He wrote Basis Palatina — De Transitu Veneris — De Novis in Cælo Phænomenis, and died 1783.

MAYERNE, sir Theodore, an eminent physician, born of most respectable parents, at Geneva, 28th Sept. 1573. He had Theodore Beza for his godfather. He studied at Heidelberg, and afterwards went to Montpellier, where he took his degree of M. D. 1597. He went to Paris, where he recommended himself to notice by his lectures, and became physician to Henry IV. who promised him his patronage, and endeavoured by the means of cardinal Perron and other priests, to convert him to the catholic faith. He came over in 1616 to settle in England, and was in the service of James I. and of his queen. He died at Chelsea, 15th March, 1655, leaving to inherit his large fortune, only one daughter, who married the marquis De Montpouillan, and died at the Hague, 1661, of a child of which she could not be delivered. His works were printed at London, 1700, in one folio volume.

MAYNARD, sir John, an able English lawyer, celebrated for his eloquence, his integrity, and his public spirit. He waited upon William with an address of congratulation after the abdication of James, and when the new king, observing his age, told him he must have outlived many of the judges, and of the lawyers of the state, of his own standing, yes, replied sir John, and I should have outlived the law too, if your majesty had not come to the throne of this country. He died 1690, aged 88.

MAYNARD, Francis, a poet, one of the 40 of the French academy, born at Toulouse, 1582. He was secretary to queen Margaret, and by his wit and gaiety was the delight of the court, who flattered him with compliments, but settled no favor on him. He retired in disgust, and died in his province, 1646. His odes, songs, epigrams, &c. were much admired.

MAYNE, Jasper, an English poet and divine, born at Hatherleigh, Devonshire, 1604, and educated at Westminster minster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, of which he became student. He was presented to the livings of Cassington, and of Pyrton, near Watlington, Oxfordshire, and in 1646, was created D.D. He distinguished himself as the author of the "City Match" a comedy, and the "Amorous Work" a tragi-comedy, and drew upon himself some severe reflections from Cheynell, in consequence of his sermon against false prophets, at Oxford. In 1648 he was deprived of his studentship and of his livings; but at the restoration he was reinstated, and made canon of Christ-church, archdeacon of Chichester, and chaplain to the king. He died Dec. 6th, 1672, and was interred at Christ-church. In his character he was cheerful, and in those times of fanatical melancholy very facetious. In his will he left to his servant, who had long lived with him, and was too fond of drinking, a trunk, with something in it which he said would make him drink. No sooner was his master dead, than the servant ran eagerly to the valuable trunk, but instead of a treasure, he found a red herring. He wrote besides, a poem on the naval victory obtained by the duke of York over the Dutch — sermons — Lucian's Dialogues translated, &c.

MAYNWARING, Arthur, a learned Englishman, born at Ighfield, Shropshire, 1668. He was educated at Shrewsbury school, and Christ-church, Oxford, and afterwards studied the law in London. An acquaintance with the earls of Dorset and Burlington, and the duke of Somerset, banished his strong prejudices against the revolution, and afterwards he became a commissioner of the customs, and in the beginning of Anne's reign, auditor of the impress, an office worth 2000l. per annum. He sat in the parliament of 1705, for Preston, in Lancashire, and died at St. Alban's, 13th Nov. 1712. His executrix was Mrs. Oldfield, the actress, by whom he had one son, and with whom he had lived before his death about nine years, much against the representations and wishes of his friends. He wrote various pieces in prose and verse, especially epilogues, &c. which were delivered with particular effect by his favorite actress.

MAYO, Richard, an English divine, ejected from his living of Kingston, Surrey, for non-conformity, 1662. He wrote a Life of Dr. Staunton — Two Conferences between a Jew and a Papist, and between a Protestant and a Jew — Comment on the Epistle to the Romans, in Pool's Annotations — sermons, &c. He died 1695.

MAYOW, John, a learned physician, born in Cornwall, 1645. He was of Wadham college, Oxford, and became fellow of All Souls, where he took his degrees in civil law, after which he practised physic chiefly at Bath. He died in York street, Covent garden, Sept. 1679, and was buried in the parish church there. His works were collected and published at Oxford, 1674. He was a man of extensive powers, and well skilled in chemistry, according to the opinion of Dr. Beddoes, who in a well written pamphlet in 1790, proved that the best part of modern discoveries with respect to air, was known to this active experimentalist.

MAZARD, Stephen, a native of Lyons, who greatly improved the manufacture of hats in France. He was in England to make observations on the genius of the English manufacturers, and he carried back with him several able workmen. He died 1736, aged 76, and left his large property to endow a public charity at Lyons.

MAZARINE, Julius, cardinal, and chief minister of France, was born at Piscina, in the province of Abruzzo, Italy, July 14th, 1602. His abilities were conspicuous even in early life, and under Jerome of Colonna he made great and important progress in literature. He recommended himself to the notice of the pope, and by his negotiations and intrigues, was happily successful in preventing a battle between the French and Spaniards before Cassel, and he effected a reconciliation between them. This gained for him the good opinion of Richelieu, and of Lewis XIII. and from keeper of the seals, and vice legate to Avignon, he was in 1641, raised to the dignity of cardinal. On the death of Richelieu, Mazarine became the prime minister of Lewis XIII. and continued in that high office during the minority of Lewis XIV. and the regency of Anne of Austria. Though at first popular, the jealousy of the nobles, and the distressed state of the poor, raised a clamor against him, and he at last yielded to the public voice, and retired from the kingdom. But though a price was set upon his head, the general hatred subsided, his abilities were acknowledged and regretted, and by degrees his return to power became the popular wish. Mazarine restored to greatness, applied himself to consolidate the happiness of France; he effected a peace between his country and Spain, and cemented the union of the two monarchies by the marriage of his master with the infanta of Spain. Excessive application at last produced disorders which proved fatal. He died at Vincennes, 9th March, 1661, aged 59, highly respected by the king and nation. He was buried in the college which he had founded. His letters, 103 in number, were published 1694, and again by Chatelan, Amsterdam, 1745, 2 vols. 12mo. Mazarine had a brother and two sisters. His niece, Hortensia Mancini, duchess of Mazarine, married in 1661, Armand Charles de la Porte de la Meilleraie, from whom she was separated, and afterwards settled in England, where she patronized St. Evremond. She died at London, 1699.

MAZEAS, John Mathurin, a native of Landernau, in Brittany, who died at Paris, 1802, aged 88. He wrote Elements of Arithmetic, Algebra, Geometry, with an Introduction to Conic Sections — Institutiones Philosophicæ, 3 vols. 12mo. He was professor in the college of Navarre, and canon of Notre Dame, at Paris; but when the revolution robbed him of his offices, and of his income, he retired into the country, where the kindness of a faithful servant administered to all his wants and infirmities.

MAZELINE, Peter, a sculptor of Rouen, member of the academy of painting and sculpture, died 1708, aged 76. His works were highly esteemed, and are still admired in the gardens of Versailles, especially Europa, a Pythian Apollo, &c.

MAZOCHI, Alexius Symmachus, an Italian antiquary, born at Santa Maria, near Capua. He died at Naples, where he was divinity professor, 1771, aged 87. His works on ancient medals and inscriptions, were valuable. His last, and perhaps best publication, was the Antiquities of the Campagna di Roma.

MAZUIER,

MAZUIER, Claude Lewis, a native of Bellevre, who became judge of Louhans, and during the French revolution was elected to the convention. His conduct in this violent assembly was firm and moderate, and he not only voted for the banishment of the king, but defended the measure as the most salutary for the honor and the happiness of the nation. His boldness in accusing the public plunderers of the state marked him for destruction, and he was dragged to the guillotine, Feb. 1794, aged 34.

MAZZUCHELLI, Grammaria, or John Maria, a nobleman of Brescia, eminent as a philologist and historian. He died Nov. 1765, and left several works, highly esteemed by the Italians.

MAZZUCHELLI, Peter Francis, a native of Rome, eminent as a painter. He was knighted by Charles Emmanuel, duke of Savoy, and died 1626, aged 55. Some of the beautiful altar pieces at Milan are by him.

MAZZUOLI, Francesco, better known by the name of Parmeggiano, or Parmesan, was an eminent painter, born at Parma, 1604. His application to his art was so great that when Rome was sacked by Charles V. he remained engaged with his pencil, like another Protogenes, unconscious of surrounding dangers. He excelled also in etching, of which he has, by some, been called the inventor. He died of a violent fever at the early age of 36, 1540. For sweetness of manner, elegance, and grace, he has been regarded by several judges, as the rival of Corregio, and in genius and invention, he had few equals. There was another artist of the 16th century, of the same name, and related to him, who excelled chiefly in historical painting.

MEAD, Matthew, an English divine, rector of Great Brickhill, Bucks, and afterwards of Stepney, near London, from which he was ejected in 1662 for non-conformity. His principles rendered him suspected during the Rye-house plot, but after appearing before the council, he was honorably dismissed. He died 1699, at Stepney, where he had continued to preach to a congregation of dissenters. He was author of, the Almost Christian tried and cast, 8vo. a work of some merit — Sermons on Ezekiel's Wheels — the Good of Early Obedience, 8vo. &c.

MEAD, Richard, a distinguished physician, son of the preceding, was born at Stepney, 11th Aug. 1673. From a private school, he went in 1689 to Utrecht, where he studied under Graevius, and three years after he removed to Leyden, where he attended the medical lectures of Pitcairn, and Herman, and contracted a strong intimacy with the celebrated Boerhaave. From Holland he visited Italy, and took his degree of M. D. at Padua, 1695, and then returning to England, the next year he settled in his native place, where he practised with increasing reputation for seven years. His "Mechanical Account of Poisons," 1702, was received by the public with avidity; and he, in 1704, was admitted into the Royal society, in 1707, chosen one of the council, and in 1717, appointed vice-president. From Stepney he removed to Crutched Friars, and seven years after, to Austin Friars. In 1707, he was honored with the diplomatic degree of M. D. by the university of Oxford; and such was his celebrity, that he was one of the physicians who attended queen Anne in her last illness. He was made fellow of the college of physicians in 1716, and in 1719 he was consulted by government upon the best means of preventing the importation of the plague, which raged with such fatality at Marseilles, and he published in consequence, his Discourse on Pestilential Contagion, which in one year, passed through seven editions. In 1727, he was appointed physician to George II. and had the satisfaction of seeing placed in the same situation, his two sons-in-law, Drs. Wilmot and Nicholls. He died 16th Feb. 1754, and was buried in the Temple church, near his brother Samuel, a counsellor; but though no stone is placed over his remains, there is a monument erected to his honor in Westminster abbey, by the gratitude of his son, with an inscription by Dr. Ward. He was twice married; by his first wife he had ten children, three only of whom survived him, a son, and the two daughters whose husbands we have mentioned; and by his second wife he had no family. Dr. Mead attained high honors and celebrity in his profession, so that in one year he made more than 7000*l.* by his practice. As a man of letters, he was highly respectable, and as the friend and the patron of the learned, universally admired; so that no foreigner of eminence ever came to London without soliciting, as an honor, an introduction to him. His collection of books and prints was very valuable, and sold after his death, for more than it had cost him. With the most pleasing manners, Dr. Mead united the greatest liberality and most extensive benevolence; he gave his advice to the poor with pleasure and gratis, and it is remarkable that he never would receive a fee from any clergyman except one, who disputed with him on the propriety of his prescriptions. His works were, a treatise de Imperio Solis & Lunæ — de Morbis Biblicis — Monita Medica. All his medical works were published together in 1762, 1 vol. 4to.

MEADOWCROFT, Richard, an English divine, born in Staffordshire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1733 he was made canon of Worcester, where he died 1769. He published in 1732, Notes on Milton's Paradise Regained, edited again in 1748, and mentioned with commendation by bishop Newton. He wrote also other small tracts, besides 11 sermons, &c.

MECHAIN, M. a native of Lyons, whose Observations on the eclipse seen at Versailles, 1774, procured him the applauses of the French academy. His work on the great comet of 1661, whose appearance was again expected in 1790, procured him the prize of the academy in 1782; and in consequence of his great astronomical talents, he was employed by the nation in 1792, to measure a degree of the meridian between Dunkirk and Barcelona. He finished the work in 1798, and then proposed to extend it to the Balears, but he died before the completion of his useful labors, of a fever, on the coast of Valencia, 1805. He edited and improved the Connoissance des Temps, and was much respected for the general information which he possessed, and the abilities which he displayed in difficult and and intricate calculations for the marine, and other public purposes.

MEDE, Joseph, B. D. a native of Berden, Essex, educated at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. He devoted himself to the study of divinity, and refused the preferment which the kindness of his friends offered him, especially Usher, the primate, who wished him to accept the provostship of Trinity college, Dublin. His works, in 1 vol. fol. are chiefly on divinity; and in his Commentary on the Apocalypse, he has been followed by bishop Newton, and other learned divines. He died 1638, aged 52.

MEDICIS, Cosmo, surnamed the Elder, was the founder of his illustrious family. He was so successful in commerce, that his riches were superior to those of the potentates of his times, and he indulged the noble sentiments of applying the resources of his ample fortune to the patronage of the sciences and of learned men. He collected a most valuable library, which he enriched with rare and curious manuscripts; but while he expected respect and gratitude from his countrymen, he found that his conduct was viewed with jealousy by the arts of his enemies. Yielding to the prevailing ingratitude of his countrymen, he retired in honorable exile to Venice, where he was received with the homage due to a sovereign prince; but the Florentines at last became sensible of their cruelty; Cosmo was recalled, and made for 34 years the arbiter of the destinies of his country. He died Aug. 1464, aged 75, and the gratitude of his fellow-citizens engraved on his tomb these glorious words, "the father of his people, the deliverer of his country."

MEDICIS, Lorenzo de, surnamed the Great, and the father of letters, was born 1448. He was son of Peter, and the grandson of Cosmo, and he was brother to Julian de Medicis. The great influence which he and his brother exercised in Florence, was viewed with jealousy by Ferdinand IV. of Naples, and by pope Sixtus IV. and a dreadful conspiracy was formed against them by the Piazzis, at the base instigation of these two foreign potentates. Julian fell by the dagger of an assassin, while celebrating mass 1478, but Lorenzo, who was then with him, had the good fortune to escape, though wounded, with his life; and such was his popularity, that he was conducted back to his palace by the multitude, in the general acclamations of condolence and of joy. Inheriting the beneficent and honorable qualities of his grandfather, he devoted himself to the patronage of literature, and was regarded as the Mæcenas of the age. The Florentines saw with pride their opulent countryman selling in one hand the products of the East, and with the other supporting and guiding the public concerns of the state; at one time giving audience to ambassadors, at another splendidly entertaining merchants, and now relieving the necessities of the poor, exhibiting public shows to the multitude, or adorning his native city with the most splendid buildings, for the purposes both of magnificence and hospitality. These high and meritorious services were not lost in the gratitude of the Florentines; Lorenzo was named chief of their republic, and so mild and equitable was his government; and so respectable his character, that foreign princes often submitted their disputes to his final and impartial decision. Ardent in the cause of science, Lorenzo was surrounded by the learned, the brave, and the ingenious; and to render Florence the emporium of whatever was rare in literature, John Lascaris, a man of classical taste, was sent in the most honorable manner, into the East, to collect the choicest manuscripts to enrich his library. Lorenzo was himself a man of learning. He wrote poetry with success, and his sonnets, songs, &c. in Italian, have often been printed, and are deservedly admired. This illustrious character died 9th April 1492, aged 44; but though so universally respected and admired, his glory was obscured by his passion for the female sex, and by his great indifference in religious duties. He left two sons, Peter, who succeeded him at Florence, and who was banished 1494, and died 1504, and John, who filled the papal chair under the name of Leo X. His history is become particularly interesting in the luminous pages of Mr. Roscoe.

MEDICIS, John, surnamed the Invincible, was son of John, and first learnt the art of war under Lorenzo, against the duke of Urbino. He afterwards was in the service of the pope, and of Francis I. of France, and distinguished himself against the armies of the emperor. He died at Mantua, 29th Nov. 1526, aged 28, in consequence of a wound which he had received in the knee, at the siege of Governolo.

MEDICIS, Lorenzo de, descended from the brother of the great Cosmo, aspired to the name of popular. He caused to be assassinated, in 1537, Alexander de Medicis, whom Charles V. had appointed duke of Florence, and he courted popularity by his patronage of literature. He died without posterity.

MEDICIS, Hippolyto de, natural son of Julian, was raised to the rank of cardinal by his cousin, Clement VII. in 1529, and sent as legate to Germany. He possessed great abilities as a negotiator, and also as a military man; so that when the pirate Barbarossa threatened the coast of Italy with devastation, Hippolyto was usefully employed against him, and obliged him to retire without even meeting him in the field. He contributed to the elevation of Paul III. to the papal chair, and afterwards formed a plan for the assassination of Alexander de Medicis, the governor of Florence, which failed. He died suddenly at Itri, as some imagine, in consequence of poison, 13th Aug. 1535, aged 24.

MEDICIS, Sebastian de, of the same illustrious family, was distinguished by his learning. He wrote, de Venatione, Plicatione, & Aucupio, 8vo. — de Fortuitis Casibus — de Sepulturis, 1580, &c.

MEDICIS, Peter de, a painter, born at Florence, 1586, of the same illustrious family. He studied under Cigoli, and as an historical painter, possessed celebrity from the strong expression, as well as the grace of his characters, and the correctness of his style, and his judicious coloring.

MEDINA, John Baptiste, a painter of Brussels, who studied the works of Rubens with such effect, that his own pieces possessed all the beauties and correctness of that illustrious master. He was for some years settled ted in England, and was the last knight created in Scotland by the high commissioner of that kingdom. He died 1711, aged 51.

MEGASTHENES, a Greek historian, about 292 B. C. His History of Judæa, which was once held in high esteem, is now lost.

MEHEGAN, William Alexander, a French historian, of Irish extraction, born at Salle, in the Cevennes, 1721. He was an elegant writer, though perhaps too affected in the attempt of rendering his style graceful and brilliant. He wrote, the Origin of the Guebres — Considerations on the Revolutions of Art — the Origin and Progress of Idolatry — a Picture of Modern History, the best of his works, translated into English. He died 23d Jan. 1766.

MEIBOMIUS, John Henry, a learned professor of physic at Helmstadt, his native place, was afterwards first physician at Lubeck. He wrote, a Latin Life of Meccenas — de Cerevisiis, 4to. — Tractatus de Ufu Flagrorum in Re Medica & Venerea, 4to. and 8vo: edited by Th. Bartholin. He died 1655, aged 65.

MEIBOMIUS, Henry, son of John Henry, was born at Lubeck, and studied at Groningen, Franeker, and Leyden. He married in 1664, and had 10 children, and died professor of medicine, history, and poetry, at Helmstadt, 1700, aged 62. His publications are, Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, 3 vols. folio. — ad Saxonie Inferioris Historiam Introductio, 4to. — Valentin. Hen. Vogleri Introductio Univers. in Notitiam Bonorum Scriptorum, 4to. — Chronicon Bergenfe — De Vasis Palpebrarum Novis, 4to.

MEIBOMIUS, Marcus, a learned critic, of the same family as the preceding. He published a translation of Greek authors who had written on Music — an edition of the Greek Mythologists — de Fabrica Triremium, 4to. — Corrections for an edition of a Hebrew Bible, &c. He was for some time at the court of Christina, queen of Sweden, but left it in disgust. He died 1711.

MEIBOMIUS, Henry, a native of Helmstadt, celebrated for his knowledge of medicine, as well as for his great learning, and his critical powers. His works, which are valuable, are preserved in the Germanicarum Rerum Scriptores, 4to. He died 1625.

MEIER, George Frederic, a German philosophical writer, born at Ammendorf, in Saxony, 1718. His best works are, a Representation of a Critic — Instructions how any one may become a Modern Philosopher — Introduction to the Elegant Arts and Sciences, &c. He died 1777.

MEISNER, Balthasar, a Lutheran divine, theological professor at Wittenberg, was author of, Anthropologia, 2 vols. 4to. — Moderate Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to. — and died 1628, aged 41.

MEISSONIER, Justus Aurel. a native of Turin, eminent as a painter, sculptor, goldsmith, and architect. His abilities recommended him to the French king, who appointed him his designer and goldsmith, in which employment he exhibited the most beautiful specimens of his ingenuity and of his art. He died at Paris 1750, aged 55.

MELA, Pomponius, a Latin geographer, born in Spain. His work, de Situ Orbis, is best edited by J. Gronovius, 1658. He flourished A. D. 45.

MELANCHTHON, Philip, a celebrated reformer, born 16th Feb. 1497, at Bretten, in the palatinate of the Rhine. His father's name was Schwartzferdt, which signifies black earth; but the word was changed, according to the affectation of the times, by his friend Reuchlin, into Melanchthon, which in Greek, expresses the same meaning. He studied at Bretten, Pforsheim, and Heidelberg, and with such success, that at 13 he wrote a comedy of some merit. He left Heidelberg in 1512, because he was refused a degree on account of his youth, and then passed to Tübingen, where he resided for six years, and gave public lectures on Virgil, Terence, and other classics. In 1518, by the recommendation of his friend Reuchlin, he was appointed by the elector of Saxony, Greek professor at Wittenberg; and here began that intimacy with Luther, which contributed so much to the progress of the reformation. He was in 1527 appointed by his patron, the duke, to visit the churches of the electorate, and afterwards he was employed in the arduous labors of preparing those articles of faith which have received the name of the Augsburg confession, because presented to the emperor at the diet of that city. In the disputes which he maintained in those days of controversial enmity, he displayed great candor and mildness, which his friend Luther attributed more to a spirit of timidity, than to the meekness of the Christian character. His moderation as well as his learning, were so universally acknowledged, that he received a liberal invitation from Francis I. to come to France, to settle the disputes of the protestants; but through the interference of the duke of Saxony, the offer was declined; as likewise a similar invitation from the king of England. He was engaged in the various conferences which took place on religious subjects at Frankfort, Reinspurg, Worms, Spire, and Ratibon; and every where evinced the deepest learning, the most peaceable temper, and the strongest moderation. The character of the times, and not inclination, rendered him a controversialist, and his answer to his mother, displayed the great and the good man. When asked by the aged woman, who repeated before him her prayers in a simple but pious manner, what she must believe in this great confusion of creeds, he replied, "go on mother to believe and pray as you have done, and never trouble yourself about controversies." He died at Wittenberg, 19th April, 1560, and was buried by the side of his friend Luther, in the church of the castle. Among the reasons which, on his death-bed, he assigned for considering dissolution as happiness, he said, that it delivered him from theological persecutions. By his wife, the daughter of a burgo-master of Wittenberg, he had two sons and two daughters. His works were very numerous, and as they were written in the midst of controversy, and ecclesiastical avocations, they were not always so correct in language, as they proved useful in advancing the reformation. A chronological catalogue of these was published in 1582, and they appeared altogether in 4 vols. folio, at Wittenberg, 1601.

MELA-

MELANIPPIDES, two Greek poets of merit. The one grandfather, B. C. 520, the other his grandson, 460 B. C. Their works are lost.

MELCHISEDECK, high priest of God, and king of Salem, met Abraham after his defeat of the king of Sodom, and gave him his blessing. As he is represented by St. Paul without father and without mother, some heretics have imagined that he was no other but Jesus Christ; and hence arose the sect called Melchisedecians, in ancient times.

MELCTHAL, Arnold de, one of the founders of Swiss liberty. His father was cruelly deprived of his eyes by the order of Griser, the Austrian governor; and the son, irritated at the sufferings of his parent, united in 1307, with Stouffacker, Furst, and Tell, to break the chains of their servitude, and after defeating an army of 20,000 men at the pass of Morgarten, with only 500 men, the liberty of Switzerland was established.

MELEAGER, a Greek poet of Syria, 186 B. C. His epigrams, which possess great merit, are preserved in the Anthologia, printed by Brunck, 1789, with notes.

MELITIUS, bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt, was deposed by an Alexandrian synod, and became the founder of a new sect, which supported the Arians against Athanasius. He died about 346.

MELISSUS, a philosopher of Samos, who maintained that the universe is infinite and immoveable, and that the knowledge of a divinity is improper. He flourished about 444 B. C.

MELITO, St. bishop of Sardis in Asia, A. D. 170, was author of several works, which have perished.

MELITUS, an Athenian orator, the chief accuser of Socrates. His conduct appeared afterwards so odious to the Athenians, that they put him to death B. C. 400.

MELLAN, Claude, a French engraver and designer, born at Abbeville, 1601. He died at Paris 1688. Charles II. wished in vain to invite him to settle in England. His mode of engraving was peculiar to himself. His most admired piece is a head of our Saviour, formed of one spiral line, beginning at the top of the nose.

MELMOTH, William, a learned man, born 1666. He was benchet of Lincoln's inn, and joined Peere Williams to publish Vernon's Reports. He is deservedly celebrated for his treatise of "the great Importance of a Religious Life," a work of infinite merit, and of the most benevolent tendency, of which, besides large editions, not less than 42,000 copies were published in the 18 years preceding 1784. Melmoth died 6th April 1743, and was buried in the cloister of Lincoln's inn chapel.

MELMOTH, William, son of the preceding, was born 1710. He distinguished himself as the translator of Pliny's and Cicero's epistles, in a very neat and elegant style, and published besides, Memoirs of his Father—some poems in Dodsley's collection—and Letters under the name of sir Thomas Fitzosborne. This worthy and amiable character died 1799.

MELON, John Francis, a native of Tulle, who settled at Bourdeaux, as secretary to the learned academy which, by his influence with the duke of la Force, had been founded there. He wrote, a Political Essay on Commerce, 12mo. a work of merit—Mahoud, the Gasnevide, an Allegorical History of the duke of Orleans' Regency—Dissertations, &c. This learned and well informed man died at Paris, 1738.

MELOT, John Baptist, a French writer, esteemed for his memoirs inserted in the volumes of the academy of inscriptions, of which he was a member, and for an edition of Joinville's Life of St. Lewis, with a Glossary. He was librarian to the king, and was employed to make a catalogue of the royal collection. He was born at Dijon, 1697, and died at Paris 1760, much respected.

MELVIL, fr James, third son of lord Keith, was born at Halhill, Fifeshire, 1530. He was page to Mary, queen of Scots, when dauphiness of France, and was afterwards in the service of Montmorency, prime minister of France; and after travelling over Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, he returned again to Scotland, to attend his widowed mistress. He became distinguished at the Scotch court, was made a privy counsellor, and entrusted with the most important affairs of the kingdom. He merited this confidence by his loyalty to the unfortunate queen, whom he attended till her confinement at Lochleven, and he held the same rank of trust and of honor in the cabinet of her son. When James succeeded to the English crown, Melvil, too infirm to share in the affairs of state, came to England, to pay a visit of respect and duty to his sovereign, and returned to Scotland, where he devoted himself to the writing of his Memoirs for the Information and Instruction of his son. These valuable memoirs were published by his grandson, 1683, in folio, and contain a very interesting detail of the state affairs of Scotland, for several years. Sir James died at Halhill, 1606, aged 76.

MEMMI, Simon, a portrait painter of Sienna, who died 1345, aged 60. He painted Laura, Petrarch's mistress.

MEMNON, a Rhodian, general of Darius, opposed Alexander's invasion of Asia. He ably defended Miletus against the conqueror, and subdued the isles of Chios and Lesbos; but died suddenly, when his valor might perhaps have impeded the rapidity of the Macedonians.

MENAGE, Giles, a learned Frenchman, the Varro of his time, was born at Angers, 15th Aug. 1613. After a rapid progress in belles lettres and philosophy, he applied himself to the law, and becoming an advocate he pleaded with great popularity at Angers, Paris, and other places. But the laborious profession of the law was disagreeable to a man who had a strong inclination to devote himself to polite literature, he therefore quitted it, much against his father's desire, and took orders. He was for some time in the family of cardinal de Retz, but on the death of his father he converted all his property to an annuity that his literary engagements might be less disturbed with family affairs. He became the companion of the great and and the learned, and obtained some ecclesiastical preferment, but the wit of his conversation, and the propensity of uttering a joke even at the expence of a friend, brought upon him many enemies, and among them d'Aubignac, Boileau, Cotin, Salo, Bouhours, Baillet and others. Mazarine too in the midst of his greatness was jealous of his influence, and a Latin elegy addressed to him by the poetical ecclesiastic was almost considered as a satire, not a compliment to the all-powerful minister. Menage was honored with a place at the Florentine academy, but when his friends proposed him for the French academy, his name was rejected. He unfortunately, late in life, put his thigh out of joint, by a fall, and died 23d July, 1692, of a defluxion of the stomach, aged 79. This ingenious and learned writer, it is said, possessed a most retentive memory, and from this great storehouse, and the inexhaustible resources of a polished mind, could say, as Bayle observes, a thousand good things in a thousand pleasing ways. His works are numerous, the best known of which are, Origines de la Langue Française, 4to. — Miscellanea, or a collection of some of his poetical and prose pieces in Greek, Latin, and French — la Requete des Dictionnaires, an ingenious satire about the French Academy's Dictionary — Poemata, 12mo. 1656. — Origini della Lingua Italiana, 4to. — Observations sur la Langue Française, 2 vols. 12mo. — Juris Civilis Amoenitates, 8vo. — Histoire de Sablé, folio. — an edition of Diogenes Laertius — Menagiana, published after his death, &c.

MENANDER, a celebrated Greek poet, prince of the new comedy. All his plays have perished, and as he was esteemed superior to Aristophanes it is an irreparable loss. Terence is said to have borrowed his six plays from him. He flourished at Athens about 342 B. C.

MENADRINO, Marfilio, or Marfilius of Padua, a learned lawyer of the 14th century. He was excommunicated by the pope 1327, for writing "Defensor Pacis," a work in favor of his master the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, in which he boldly maintained that the imperial power was superior to that of the pope, both in temporal and spiritual affairs. He wrote besides de Translatione Imperii, &c. and died at Montemalto 1328.

MENARD, Claude, a French magistrate at Angers, eminent as an antiquarian. He lost his wife in his old age, and in consequence quitted the world and became an ecclesiastic. He died 20th Jan. 1652, aged 72. He published Joinville's History of St. Lewis, 4to. with learned notes — St. Austin's books against Julian — Researches about the Body of St. James the elder, said to have been buried at Angers — History of Bertrand de Guesclin, 4to.

MENASSER-BEN, Israel, a Portuguese rabbi, of the sect of the Pharisees, son of a rich merchant. He was successor to Isaac Urie, in the care of the synagogue of Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Basil, and attempted in London, against the wish of the presbyterians, to obtain from Cromwell a toleration of the Jews. He died at Middleburg 1660, aged 56. He published an edition of the Hebrew Bible without points, 2 vols. 4to. Amsterd. with a Latin preface — the Talmude with Notes, 8vo. — El Conciliador, 4to. — de Resurrectione, 8vo. — de Fragilitate Humana, &c. — Spes Israelis, 12mo. — the Breath of Life in Hebrew, 12mo. — the End of Life, 12mo. translated into English by Pococke with a life.

MENCKE, Otto, a learned German, born at Oldenburg, Westphalia, 1644. He studied at Rome, and at Bremen, and Leipzig, and afterwards visited the other German universities. He became in 1668 professor of morality at Leipzig, was five times rector of the university, and seven times dean of the faculty, and died there 1707. He published Marshall's Canon Chronicus, 4to. — Camden's Annals of Elizabeth — Jus Majestatis circa Venationem, 4to. — Respublica in Microcosmo conspicua, 4to. and was the first author of the "Acta Eruditorum" of Leipzig, a valuable work which established a correspondence with the learned of Europe, and first appeared 1682, 4to.

MENCKE, John Burchard, son of Otto, was born at Leipzig 1674. After travelling into Holland and England, he settled at Leipzig, where in 1699 he was appointed professor of history, and in this office he acquired great reputation. Frederic Augustus king of Poland made him his historiographer and Aulic counsellor, as a mark of his esteem, and the Royal societies of London and Berlin enrolled him among their members. He died April 1, 1732. His works are numerous and learned. He wrote, de Charlataneria Eruditorum Declamationes duae, 8vo. — Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, 3 vols. folio. — two Latin Discourses on the empiricism of learned men, 12mo. a weak performance. He continued also the "Acta Eruditorum" and had some share in the dictionary of learned men, Leipzig, folio, 1715.

MENDAJORS, John Peter de, a native of Alais, in Languedoc, who became member of the academy of inscriptions at Paris, and was known as the author of an history of Gaul Narbonensis, 12mo. — Arlequin, Valet de deux Maitres, &c. He died in his native town 15th Nov. 1747, aged 68.

MENDEZ PINTO, Ferdinand, a Portuguese, who from a menial servant, became celebrated in consequence of his adventures. He embarked for the Indies 1537, and after a residence of 21 years he returned to Portugal. He published an account of his adventures, in which he asserts that he was 13 times made a slave, and sold 16 times. The work is interesting from the particulars which it communicates of the history of Japan, Brama, Pegu, Siam, Java, Achem, &c.

MENDEZ, Moses, an English writer of Jewish extraction, known as a poet and dramatic writer. He was, on account of his abilities, honored with the degree of M. A. by the university of Oxford, and he died 1758. He wrote also, some poems preserved in Dodley's collection.

MENDELSONN, Moses, a Jew of Berlin, of obscure origin at Dessau. He quitted commerce for literature, and acquired great reputation. He died 1785, aged 56. He published, Jerusalem, 1755, supporting that the Jewish religion is but deism — Phædon, 8vo. in which he maintains the spirituality and immateriality of the soul, in such sensible language, and powerful argumentation, that he has been called the Socrates of the Jews — Philosophical works, 2 vols. 8vo. — Letter to Lavater, 8vo. — Translation of Genesis — Commentary on Ecclesiastes — treatise on the Sublime — Letters on Sensations, &c.

MENDOZA, Gonzales Peter le, archbishop of Seville and afterwards of Toledo, chancellor of Castille and Leon, was born at Guadalajara 1428. He early distinguished himself by his progress in literature, and his fidelity in the service of the kings of Castille, by whose interest he obtained a cardinal's hat from pope Sixtus IV. He also ably served Ferdinand and Isabella, and after a life of great virtue, wisdom, and moderation, died 11th Jan. 1495. He translated in his youth Sallust, Homer's Iliad, Virgil, and some parts of Ovid.

MENDOZA, John Gonzales, an Augustine friar, of Castille, sent by the king of Spain as his ambassador to China, 1584. He wrote an History of China, 1589, 8vo. in Spanish, which has been translated into other languages. His last preferment was the bishopric of Propagan in the West Indies.

MENECRATES, a physician of Syracuse, who, proud of the success of his medical prescriptions, assumed the title of Jupiter, in the age of Philip, father of Alexander, who deservedly ridiculed him.

MENEDEMUS, a Greek philosopher of Eubœa, who died in the age of Alexander the Great.

MENEDEMUS, a cynic philosopher who pretended with fanatic zeal, and in all the eccentricity of dress, to have been sent from hell to observe the actions of mankind.

MENESES, Alexis de, a Portuguese Augustine monk, of noble birth at Lisbon. He was sent to Goa as archbishop, and there he held a synod, the acts of which were called Synodus Dianperensis. On his return to Europe he was promoted to the see of Braga, and was made viceroy of Portugal by Philip II. of Spain. He compiled an history of his order in Portugal, and died at Madrid 1617.

MENESTRIER, John Baptist le, a French antiquarian, author of medals, coins, and ancient monuments of the Roman emperors, and of illustrious medals of emperors of Rome. He was born at Dijon, and died 1634, aged 70.

MENESTRIER, Claude Francis, a jesuit, born at Lyons 1633. He wrote, History of Lewis XIV, by medals, emblems, &c. — Consular History of Lyons — the Art of Heraldry — the Philosophy of Images, &c. He possessed a very astonishing memory, and it is said that to try him Christina of Sweden pronounced in his presence 300 unconnected words, which he immediately repeated in the same order. He died 1705. There was another author born at Dijon, called also Claude. He wrote Symbolica Dianæ Ephesiæ Statuæ exposita, 4to. and died 1657.

MENGOLI, Peter, a learned and popular lecturer on mechanics at Bologna, died about 1690. He was author of Geometria Speciosa, 4to. — Arithmetica Rationalis — Muzæa Speculativa — treatise on the Circle, &c.

MENGES, Antony Raphael, a famous painter born at Augsig, in Bohemia, 1726. His father who was painter to Augustus III. king of Poland, saw and encouraged his rising abilities, and after studying at Rome for four years, the young painter returned to Dresden, where his genius soon displayed itself. He was patronized by Charles III. of Spain who granted him a pension with a house and equipage; but though thus favored by the monarch he resided not in Spain, but at Rome where grief for his amiable wife, and the ignorance of an empiric put an end to his life 1779. His five daughters and two sons were honorably provided for by the king of Spain. The chief of his paintings are preserved at Madrid and Rome, and in them he successfully united the graces and the beauties of his great masters Raphael, Correggio, and Titian. The altar piece of All-soul's chapel, Oxford, is also one of his admired pieces. He was also an author. His works were published with notes by d'Azara at Parma 1780, 2 vols. 4to. containing Reflections on Beauty and Taste in Painting — the Life of Correggio — the principal Pictures at Madrid, &c. The works have been translated into French, and also into English, 2 vols. 8vo.

MENINSKI, Franciscus à Mesnien, or MENIN, an eminent German orientalist, born in Lorraine 1623. He studied at Rome, and learned the Turkish language at Constantinople, and from interpreter to the Polish embassy, became himself ambassador to the Porte, and for his services was honored with the addition of shi to his name. He was afterwards in the emperor's service, and in 1669 went to Jerusalem. He obtained the dignity of counsellor of war to the emperor, and died at Vienna 1698. His great and very important work "Thesaurus Linguarum Orientalium," appeared at Vienna 1680, in 4 vols. folio. and in 1687 another volume was added. This valuable work was begun to be re-printed in 1780 at the expence of Maria Theresa, who thus favored the wishes of sir William Jones, and of the learned, who had expressed a desire to see the scarce volume re-published. Meninski was unfortunately engaged in a controversy with Podesta, oriental secretary to the emperor, and much acrimony was shewn on both sides.

MENIPPUS, a cynic philosopher, born at Gadara, in Palestine. He was so severe in his satires, that the epithet of Menippean has been applied to harsh reflections.

MENNO, Simonis, an ecclesiastic of Friesland, who embraced the tenets of the anabaptists, and after being again baptized by Ubbo Philippi, became a powerful leader of his sect. He denied that Jesus Christ received a human shape from his mother, the Virgin Mary; and while he maintained the necessity of again baptizing adults, he inveighed against the custom of infant baptism, which he regarded as popish innovation. His eloquence and his learning were so much admired, that he gained a great number of followers followers in Westphalia, Guelderland, Holland, and Brabant; but though a price was set on his head, he had the good fortune to escape his persecutors. He was, in his opinions, more moderate than the rest of the anabaptists. His followers are still to be found in the Low Countries, under the name of Mennonites, divided into two distinct sects. He died at Oldeflo, between Lubec and Hamburg, 1565. His works were published at Amsterdam, 1681.

MENOCHIVS, James, a civilian of Pavia, possessed of such respectable abilities, that he was called the Baldus and Bartholus of his age. He was professor of law in several universities of Italy, and at last settled at Milan, where he was made president of the council, and where he died 10th Aug. 1607, aged 75. He wrote, de recuperandâ Possessione, de adipiscendâ Possessione, 8vo. — de Præsumptionibus, 2 vols. folio — de Arbitrariis Judicium Quæstionibus & Causis Conciliorum, folio — His son John Stephen, was born at Pavia, and became a jesuit, which profession he adorned by his learning and his virtues. He died 4th Feb. 1656, aged 80. He was author of, Political and Economical Institutions — a learned treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews — a Commentary on the Scriptures, 2 vols. folio, and 4 vols. 4to. all in Latin, and works of merit.

MENTEL, John, a printer of Strasburg, to whom some authors have attributed the invention of printing, but not on sufficient grounds. He was originally a writer and illuminator of manuscripts, in the service of the bishop of Strasburg, and he was the first who introduced the art of printing there. His first publication was a bible, 1466, in 2 vols. folio, and other works followed. He obtained great celebrity, and equal opulence by his profession, and was ennobled by the emperor Frederic IV. He died at Strasburg, 1478.

MENTZEL, Christian, a native of Furstenwal, in Germany, celebrated for his great knowledge of medicine and botany, which he improved by travelling into foreign countries. He wrote, Index Nominum Plantarum, 1696, folio, reprinted and improved, 1715 — a Chronology of China, 4to. — Natural History of Brazil, 4 vols. folio — on the Flowers and Plants of Japan, 2 vols. folio, &c. These two last works are preserved in MS. in the Berlin library. He died 1701, aged 79.

MENZIKOFF, Alexander, a Russian prince. His father was a poor peasant, and he himself was apprentice to a pastry-cook, and carried pies about the streets, till the Czar Peter saw and admired his wit and liveliness. From this low situation, or as others say, from the place of groom in the royal stables, young Menzikoff soon became a favorite, and was appointed governor of Ingria; and in reward for his services, his abilities, and his zeal, was raised to the rank of prince and of major-general. He also distinguished himself in Poland 1708, but his enemies accused him of peculation, and he was fined and disgraced, till the favor of his master again restored him to power, and sent him as ambassador to Poland 1722. He also gained the good graces of the empress Catherine, and after the death of Peter, the imperial heir, afterwards Peter II. was destined to marry the daughter of the favorite. At the accession of the young Czar, Menzikoff conducted himself with imprudence, and instead of securing the marriage of his daughter, he behaved with haughtiness, and even treated the monarch with contempt, so that his enemies, especially the Dolgorucki took advantage of his folly, and he was soon banished from the court, and sent at last to end his days in the distant deserts of Siberia. He bore his misfortunes with great resignation, and died in his exile, 2d Nov. 1729, a victim to his ambition, and the intrigues of a court. In his rise, in his ostentatious display of power, and in his fall, he is not very dissimilar to the favorite of our Henry VIII.

MENZINI, Benedict, an Italian poet born at Florence 1646. His origin was humble, but his genius rose superior to poverty, and though unnoticed by those to whom he dedicated the efforts of his muse, and obliged to maintain himself occasionally by dictating extempore sermons to various ecclesiastics, he gained the patronage of Christina queen of Sweden, and afterwards was made canon of St. Angelo in Piscina by the pope. He was made member of the society of Arcadi, and of the Della Crusca academy. He died of a dropsy 1704, aged 58, and left nothing behind him but his works. His poetry was much admired, and his satires possessed great spirit. His works containing, elegies, hymns, Art of Poetry — a treatise on the Irregular Construction of the Tuscan Language, &c. have been collected in 4 vols. 4to. 1731, by Fabroni.

MERCADO, Michael de, or MERCATI, a native of St. Miniato in Tuscany, who became first physician to pope Clement VIII. and his successors, and inspector of the botanical garden of the Vatican, where he formed a valuable cabinet of metals and fossils, of which a description appeared at Rome in fol. 1717, with an appendix in 1719. He was so highly esteemed that Ferdinand grand duke of Tuscany, as well as the Roman senate raised him to the honors of nobility. He wrote some works on botany, besides a learned treatise in Italian on the Obelisks of Rome. He died 1593, aged 53.

MERCATOR, Marius, an ecclesiastical author, the friend and the pupil of St. Augustine. He wrote against the Nestorians and Pelagians, and died about 451. His works have been published by Garnier the jesuit, in fol. 1673, and again by Baluze, 1684, 8vo.

MERCATOR, Gerard, an eminent geographer, born at Ruremonde 1512. He composed a Chronology — Geographical Tables — Atlas, larger and smaller — Harmonia Evangelistarum, 4to. — a treatise on the Creation, &c. and he engraved and colored his own maps himself. He died 1594, aged 82.

MERCATOR, Nicolas, a well known mathematician and astronomer. He was born in Holstein, and settled in England about the restoration, and became a fellow of the Royal society. He published Cosmographia — Rationes Mathematicæ — de Emendatione Annuæ Diatribæ duæ, &c. — Hypothesis Astronomica — Logarithmo Technia — Institutionum Astronomicæ, &c. With all his learning he was very credulous, and a great friend to astrology. He died about 1690.

MERCIER, John, a philologist, born at Uzez, Languedoc, where he died 1562. He was Hebrew professor feffor at the Royal college of Paris, 1547, after Vatablus, and distinguished himself by his great learning. He wrote Lectures on Genesis, and on the Prophets, Geneva, 1598 — Commentaries on Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, 2 vols. fol. — Tabulæ in Grammaticam Chaldaicam, 4to. His son Jofins published notes on Ancient Authors — and an Edition of Nonius Marcellus, 4to. and died 1626.

MERCIER, Bartholomew, known under the name of abbé de St. Leger, was born at Lyons 1st April, 1734, and entered into the society of St. Genevieve, where he became librarian. He was noticed in 1764 by Lewis XV. and made abbot of St. Leger in Soissons. He was a very learned and intelligent man, and wrote Letters on the Bibliography of Debure, 1763, 8vo. — Letter to Caperonier — Letters on the true Author of Richelieu's Political Testament — Supplement to Marchand's History of Printing, 4to. — Letter on the Maid of Orleans — Dissertation on the Author of the Book of the Imitation of J. C. by Kempis — Notice on the curious Book called Pedis Admirandæ, by J. d'Artis — Letters on the Letters attributed to pope Ganganeli — Notice on the Tombs of the dukes of Burgundy — Library of Romances from the Greek, 12 vols. — Letters on Different rare Editions of the 15th century, 8vo. &c. He was also engaged in the Journals de Trevoux and des Savans, and the Magazine Encyclopedique. This worthy man whom the revolution reduced from comfort and independence, to poverty and wretchedness, died 13th May, 1799.

MERCURIALIS, Jerome, an Italian physician, born at Forli 30th Sep. 1530. He studied and took his doctor's degree at Padua, and practised at Forli, where he became so popular that his countrymen sent him in 1562, as ambassador to pope Pius IV. His abilities rendered him every where respected, and after being courted and patronized by cardinal Farnese, by the emperor Maximilian, and by the Venetians, and after being professor at Padua, Bologna, and Pisa, he retired to Forli, where he died of the stone 9th Nov. 1606. His chief works are de Arte Gymnasticâ — de Morbis Mulierum — de Morbis Puerorum — Consultationes & Responfa Medicinalia — Medicina Practica — de Hydrophobiâ, &c. collected together and published, Venice, folio, 1644. He also edited Hippocrates' works, Greek and Latin, with notes, 1588.

MERCY, Francis de, a native of Longwy, who became general of the Bavarian army, and distinguished himself in various campaigns. He took Rotwell and Friburg, 1643, but lost the battle near Friburg soon after, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Nordlingen, 3d Aug. 1645. His body was buried on the field of battle, where these words marked the spot ;
Sta ! Viator, Heroem calcas.

His grandson Florimond, became by his valor marshal of the empire, and obtained the command of the German forces. He took the lines of Pfaffenhoven, and afterwards signalized himself in the wars against the Turks. He fell gloriously at the battle of Parma, 29th June, 1734.

MERDDIN, son of Mervyn, a Welsh poet, called with Merdyn Emris, and Talieffin, one of the 3 great bards of Wales. He was so unfortunate as to kill his nephew in battle, and this had such an effect upon him that he retired from the society of mankind, to conceal himself in a wood, for which circumstance he is called the Wild. He flourished about 560, A. D.

MERE, George Broffin, Chevalier de, a French writer, much admired at court for his rank, and for his learning. He wrote Discourses of Wit and Conversation — the Elegances of Discourse — treatises on Politeness, Eloquence, and Speech — Letters, &c. but though once applauded, his works are now forgotten. He died at his estate in Poitou, 1690, at an advanced age.

MERIAN, Maria Sibylla, a lady celebrated for her skill in drawing insects, flowers, &c. daughter of an engraver, was born at Frankfort on the Maine, 1647, and married John Andriez Graff, a painter and architect at Nuremberg. The fame which she had acquired before her marriage was not lost in her husband's name, and she has preserved her maiden appellation as her public character. In her zeal for reputation she went on a voyage to Surinam, accompanied by her two daughters, to delineate with greater accuracy the insects, reptiles, and other natural curiosities of that country, and after two years' residence she returned to Holland, and obliged the world with the publication of her Dissertatio de Generatione et de Metamorphosis Insectorum Surinamensium, folio, containing sixty plates, to which her daughters Dorothea and Helena afterwards added 12. She wrote besides the Origin of Caterpillars, &c. in Dutch, 2 vols. 4to. The two works have appeared united under the title of Histoire des Insectes de l'Europe et de l'Amerique, Amst. 1730, Paris 1768-1771. She died at Amsterdam 1717, aged 70. Her father Matthew Merian, published the Topography of the Universe, 31 vols. folio, and a Florilegium, 2 vols. fol.

MERLIN, Ambrose, a British writer about the year 480. Little but what is fabulous is known of that celebrated character who was and is still regarded as a prophet and magician. Superstitious tales represent him as begotten by an incubus, and it is said that he did not die but fell asleep, and after a certain period he will again rise to life. Some suppose that by the power of magic he placed the stupendous stones of Stonehenge in Salisbury plain from Ireland. Merlin's hall near Carmarthen is by some considered as his burial place. His prophecies were printed at Paris, 1530, in folio.

MEROVÆUS, king of France after Clodion 448, defeated Attila 451, near Mery-sur-Seine, and extended the limits of his kingdom from the Somme to Treves, a town which he took and plundered. He died 456, and was succeeded by his son Childeric. He was the progenitor of the Merovingian race.

lated — Papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. He died 1695, aged 81.

MERRICK, James, an English poet, born about 1718. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford where he took his master's degree 1742, and became a fellow 1744. He published a translation of Tryphiodorus, 1739 — Prayers, &c. — Poems on Sacred Subjects, &c. — Annotations on John, 1, c. i. 14. &c. — the Psalms translated and paraphrased with Annotations, a most excellent work, breathing piety in the noblest accents of poetry. This amiable man died at Reading, where he had been educated, Jan. 5th, 1769.

MERRY, Robert, son of a London tradesman, received a good education at Harrow and at Christ-church, Oxford, after which he became an officer in the guards and a man of fashion, of wit and gallantry. He wrote Lorenzo, a tragedy, performed at Covent garden, and various trifling poems in the newspapers, under the signature of Della Crusca. He married Miss Brunton the actress, and with her passed to America, where he died 1798.

MERSENNUS, Marin, of the religious order of Minims, and eminent as a mathematician and divine, was born at Oyse, in the province of Maine, Sep. 8th, 1588. He studied at La Fleche with Descartes, and afterwards at the Sorbonne, and then taught philosophy at Nevers. He settled at Paris 1620, and there gained great reputation by his learning, so that he had an extensive correspondence with the literati of Europe, and his friend Descartes never ventured to publish any thing without his previous approbation. He is chiefly known for his discovery of the curve called a cycloid, to which he gave the name of Roulette, and which excited much admiration among the learned of Europe. He published — Quæstiones in Genesim, in fol. 1623, in which he mentions that there were in his time 50,000 atheists in Paris — Universal Harmony, on the Theory and Practice of Music, 2 vols. fol. — de Sonorum Naturâ — the Truth of Sciences — Recreations of Learning — the Spherics of Menelaus — Cogitata Physico-mathematica — Impiety of Deists refuted, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. He died of an abscess in his side, 1648, aged about 60.

MERVILLE, Michael Guyot de, a French journalist, born at Versailles 1696. After travelling through Germany, Italy, Holland, and England, he settled as bookseller at the Hague, and in 1726, began to publish a journal. He afterwards went to Paris, where he wrote for the stage, but finding his circumstances involved he returned to Switzerland, and in a fit of melancholy drowned himself in the lake of Geneva, 1765. He wrote besides his Journal, Histoire Littéraire, 6 vols. 12mo. — Voyage Historique, 2 vols. 12mo. several comedies, &c. His dramatic works were published, Paris, 1766, 3 vols. 12mo.

He died at Milan of a quinsy, 1494, respected by Erasmus and other learned men.

MERULA, Paul, a learned Hollander, born at Dort,

1558. After travelling to France, Germany, Italy, and England, he settled at Dort as an advocate, and afterwards became professor of history at Leyden after Justus Lipsius. He died 1607, from excessive application. He published Ennius, 1595, 4to. — Urbis Romæ Delineatio, 1599 — Vita D. Erasmi — Cosmographia Generalis, 4to. &c. — Opera Posthuma, 4to.

MERY, John, a native of Vatan in Berry, member of the academy of sciences, and principal surgeon of the hospital of invalids at Paris. He was very eminent in his profession, and wrote Physical Problems on the Fœtus — Observations on the Operation for the Stone, &c. — Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy. He died 1700, aged 55.

MESENGUY, Francis Philip, a French ecclesiastic, born at Beauvais, Aug. 1677. He was for some time professor of belles lettres at Beauvais, and at Paris, and died at the latter place, Feb. 1769. He wrote Exposition of the Christian Doctrine, 6 vols. 12mo. a work disapproved at Rome, and condemned 1761, by Clement XIII. — Abridgment of the History of the Old and New Testament, 10 vols. 12mo. — the New Testament with notes, 3 vols. — Discourses on Religion — the Constitution Unigenitus, with remarks, &c.

MESNAGER, Nicholas, a native of Rouen, of a respectable mercantile family. He was made knight of the order of St. Michael, and raised to the honor of nobility by Lewis XIV. by whom he had been employed as a negociator on the commercial affairs of India with Spain, and afterwards with Holland. He was one of the plenipotentiaries that signed the treaty of peace between England and France in 1711, and he afterwards was with Polignac at the conferences at Utrecht. He died at Paris 1714, aged 56. His memoirs have been published.

MESNARDIERE, Hippolytus Julius Pillet de la, a French poet, born at Loudun 1610. He studied medicine which he quitted for literature, and he was patronized by Richelieu and became maitre d'hotel to the king. He died 1663. He wrote a treatise on Melancholy, 8vo. — Poétique, 4to. — Alindé, et la Pucelle d'Orleans, two indifferent tragedies — Pliny's three First Books of Letters translated — a Collection of Poems — Relations of War, &c.

MESSALINA, Valeria, daughter of Messala, and wife of the emperor Claudius, is infamously known for her libidinous propensities. She was repudiated by the emperor, and afterwards put to death with her favorite Silius, A. D. 46. — Another, the third wife of Nero, who after the tyrant's death devoted herself to studious pursuits.

MESSËNIUS, John, a learned Swede, appointed by Gustavus Adolphus professor of law in Upsal university. The celebrity which he acquired, and the abilities which he displayed excited the envy of his rivals in the public favor, and he was at last cruelly and falsely accused of traitorous correspondence with the enemies of his country. The accusation was believed, he was thrown into prison 1615, and died there 21 years after. He is author of Scandia Illustrata, 14 vols. fol. Stockholm, 1714, a work of merit. His son Arnold was historiographer of Sweden, and wrote an History.

tory of the Swedish Nobility, fol. 1616. He wrote some satires, reflecting on the royal family, for which he was beheaded 1648. His son, though but 17 years old, suffered with him.

MESSIS, Quintin, Vid. MATSYS.

MESTON, William, a Scotch poet, born at Midmar, Aberdeenshire, 1688. He was educated at Aberdeen Marischal college, and by the interest of his friend Marshall Keith and family, where he had been private tutor, he obtained, in 1714, a professorship of philosophy there. He followed the principles of his patrons in 1715, and consequently was deprived of his professorship, and after concealing himself escaped by the act of indemnity. He afterwards attempted a school at Elgin, and in other places, but as he was more fond of conviviality than regularity and application, his labors did not succeed, and he subsisted upon the liberality of his friends. He died of a languishing disorder in the spring of 1745. His poetical pieces were chiefly satirical, and possess merit. His works were published, Edinburgh 1765, in 12mo.

METASTASIO, Pietro Bonaventura, the most illustrious poet of modern Italy, was born at Rome 6th Jan. 1698. His genius early developed itself, and at the age of ten he often collected little audiences in the streets, who listened with attentive admiration to the sweetness of his extemporary verses. The celebrated Gravina witnessed and admired his rising talents, he became his instructor and friend, but while he wished him to follow the law, he found poetry his favorite pursuit. This propensity was indulged, and Metastasio at 14 produced his tragedy of Giustino. He accompanied his patron to Naples, and without forsaking the muses, he again applied himself to the law, and at last assumed the clerical habit, and entered into the minor order of priesthood. The death of his friend left him disconsolate in 1718; he bewailed his misfortune in his elegy "la Strada della Gloria," and found afterwards that he was the heir of his fortune, worth 15,000 crowns, which in two years disappeared in the midst of cheerful conviviality and hospitable attention. Again reduced to dependence, he wished to study the law, but found poetry more pleasing, and when by the acquaintance of Bulgarella detta Romagnina the celebrated singer, he was prevailed upon to write for the stage, he found himself admired, courted and flattered as a poet, and more fully devoted to the muses. He now united his establishment with that of Bulgarella and her husband, and lived with them in the closest intimacy, till an invitation from the emperor in 1729, removed him to Vienna, as assistant imperial laureat, with Apostolo Zeno. He quitted Italy, and his friends with reluctance and settled at Vienna, where he constantly resided with the greatest regularity, dividing with punctilious exactness his hours of study, of recreation, and of repose. In this honorable abode he was deservedly respected; the city of Assisi, where his family had long lived, granted him the honor of nobility, he was affectionately patronized by the emperor Charles VI. and by his successors Charles VII. and Francis I. and the empress Maria Theresa, and Ferdinand VI. king of Spain, were also among the number of his friends and benefactors. In 1734, his favorite Bulgarella died and left him heir to all her property, which he with becoming propriety immediately bestowed on her husband. He died after a short illness 12th April, 1782, and was buried in the parish church of St. Michael, Vienna. His death was soon after followed by that of Farinelli the well known singer, who about 1723 had begun his theatrical career with him and on such friendly terms, and such continued correspondence that they called each other Gemelli. His works consist of 26 operas, eight oratorios or sacred dramas, besides masques, sonnets, and other poetical miscellanies. Of his operas he regarded Atilio Regolo, as the best, of the oratorios Betulia Liberata, and Artaserse as the most fortunate of his dramas. Several editions have appeared of his works, and they have been translated into various languages. Metastasio has found in Dr. Burney an able and impartial historian, and it is evident that his character was most amiable as a man and as a writer. The superior excellence of his abilities may in some degree be attributed to his patron and friend Gravina; but for the sublimest flights of his muse, he was indebted to the powers of his genius; and the pictures of virtue and morality so sweetly delineated in his writings were drawn from the goodness of his heart. It has been questioned whether his regard for Bulgarella was purely platonic; but the character of a theatrical heroine, and the manners of Italy forbid the supposition. The heir of his fortune was Joseph Martinetz, at whose house he lived at Vienna; but he received 20,000 florins for each of his own sisters, and 3000 for each of his younger brothers.

METELLI, Augustino, a painter, disciple of Gabriello d'Ochiali, born at Bologna 1609. His excellence was in the perspective, and in architecture; and with Michael Angelo Colonna, he completed several magnificent buildings, especially under the patronage of Philip IV. of Spain. He died at Madrid 1660.

METELLUS, Q. Cæcilius, a celebrated Roman, called Numidicus, from the war which he carried on against Jugurtha of Numidia. Though superseded in the command of the war by his lieutenant Marius, yet he deserved and obtained the gratitude of the Roman nation.

METEREN, Emanuel Van, a native of Antwerp, who on account of his attachment to the protestant faith fled to England for an asylum, where he died 1612, aged 77. He wrote the History of the Low Countries, from 1500, to 1612, in Latin, fol. a work of merit, translated into various languages.

METZEAU, Clement, a native of Dreux, in the reign of Lewis XIII. His abilities as an engineer were usefully employed, and he has immortalized his name by the famous dyke or canal which he constructed near Rochelle, 4882 feet long, which he completed in 1628. The labor seemed so difficult that his meritorious services were acknowledged in this elegant distich;

Dicitur Archimedes terram potuisse movere,

Æquora qui potuit sistere non minor est.

His brother Paul, was an ecclesiastic of the congregation of the oratory, who died at Calais 1632, aged 50, author of some theological books.

METHOCHITUS, Theodore, an officer at the court of Andronicus, the emperor of Constantinople, where he he died 1332. He wrote a Roman History, from Cæsar to Constantine, 4to — Sacred History — History of Constantinople, &c.

METHIDIUS, bishop of Patara, in Lycia, and of Tyre, suffered martyrdom at Chalas 311. Only fragments of his works remain edited with notes, Paris, 1644, 4to.

METIUS, James, the inventor of telescopes about 1609, was born at Alcmæer in Holland. His brother Adrian was professor of mathematics at Franeker, where he died 1636, author of Doctrina Sphæricæ Astronomiæ Universæ Institutio, 8vo. — Arithmet. et Geometr. Practica, 4to. — de Geminis Ufus utriusque Globi, 4to. — Geometrices per Usum Circini Nova Praxis, 8vo.

METON, inventor of the golden numbers, was an Athenian mathematician, B. C. 432.

METRODORUS, a physician of Chios, the disciple of Democritus. He supported the doctrine of the eternity of the universe.

METRODORUS, a philosopher and painter of Athens, employed by Paulus the conqueror of Perseus, to instruct his children, and to paint his battles, B. C. 171.

METTRIE, Julian Offray de la, a physician, born at St. Maloe's 1709. He studied under Boerhaave, and was patronized by the duke of Grammont. His book "the Natural History of the Soul," in which he maintained the materiality of the soul, was regarded as impious, and when persecution threatened him he wrote against the medical profession in a book called "Penelope, or the Machiavel in Medicine," 3 vols. 12mo. In consequence of this work he was obliged to leave France, and at Leyden he published "l'Homme Machine," a pernicious treatise of Materialism which was publicly burnt, and drove the author to Berlin. At Berlin he was patronized by the sceptical monarch, and he died there in consequence of his violent system of bleeding, 1751, aged 48. His works appeared at Berlin, 1 vol. 4to. or two in 12mo. and Frédéric himself wrote his funeral oration.

MEZZU, Gabriel, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden 1615. He excelled as an imitator of Dow and Mieris, and his women selling fish, fowls, and game, his patients and attending physicians, his chemists and their laboratories, his shops, &c. were much admired. He died in consequence of being cut for the stone, 1658.

MEURSIUS, John, a learned Dutchman, born at Lofdun near the Hague 1579. He was educated at the Hague and Leyden, and made such rapid progress in classical literature, that at the age of 16 he wrote a commentary on Lycophron. He was afterwards tutor to the children of the famous Barnevelt, and with them for 10 years travelled over the best part of Europe. On his return to Leyden in 1610, he was appointed professor of history and next of Greek, and historiographer to the states of Holland, but the unsettled affairs of the times brought him into trouble, and upon the execution of Barnevelt he was accused as a partizan of that unfortunate remonstrant, and his enemies endeavoured to expel him from the professorial chair. He resigned in 1625, and on the invitation of the king of Denmark accepted a professorship at Sorø. He was there highly respected and beloved, and died Sep. 20th, 1639. In the knowledge of Greek and of antiquity Meursius possessed superior merit, though J. Scaliger has rudely stigmatized him as an ignorant and presumptuous pedant. His works were printed in 12 vols. folio, Florence, 1741. They contain treatises de Populis Atticæ — Archontes Athenienses — Fortuna Attica — de Athenarum Origine — de Festis Græcorum — Historia Danica — Archontes Athenienses, &c. His son of the same name who died in Denmark very young, published Arboretum Sacrum, five de Arborem Conservatione, 1642, 8vo. — De Tibiis Veterum.

MEUSNIER, Philip, a French painter, born at Paris 1655. He studied at Rome, and was patronized by Lewis XIV. and XV. and adorned their palaces at Marly, Louvre, and Versailles. His architecture and views of perspective are much admired. He was of the French academy, and died at Paris 1734.

MEYER, James, a Flemish historian, born 1491, near Bailleul, whence he is called Babilolanus. He died Feb. 5th, 1552, rector of Blankenburg. He wrote Annales Rerum Flandricarum, folio — Flandricarum Rerum Decas, 4to.

MEYER, Felix, a German painter, born at Winterthur, 1653. He studied in Italy and Switzerland, and in his landscapes of Alpine grandeur exhibited the noblest ideas. He died in Germany 1713, aged 60.

MEZERAÏ, Francis Eudes de, a French historian, born at Ry, near Argentau, lower Normandy 1610. He was educated at Caen, where he began to distinguish himself as a poet, but on going to Paris he was persuaded by des Yveteaux to devote himself to history and to politics. He was commissary of war for two or three campaigns, and afterwards determined to employ himself in studious retirement. The narrowness of his circumstances was removed by the publication of some severe but popular satires against the court, and at the age of 26 Mezeraï entered upon the laborious character of historian of France. He was encouraged by Richelieu, and when his history appeared, the first volume of which was published 1643, the second in 1646, and the third in 1653, in folio, it was received with universal applause, and was rewarded with a handsome pension from the king. In 1668, he published an abridgement of the History of France, 3 vols. 4to. but as he had spoken in some parts with more boldness than could please the court, Colbert retrenched his pension, and at last totally withdrew it. He was in 1649, admitted member of the French academy in the room of Voiture, and in 1675, chosen perpetual secretary, and he deserved it, as he contributed much to their dictionary. He died 10th July, 1683. He wrote besides a treatise on the Origin of the French — a Continuation of the History of the Turks — History of a Mother and Son, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Vanities of the Court — a Translation of Grotius de Veritate Chr. Relig. As an historian Mezeraï is deservedly esteemed, and in integrity, candor and faithfulness he is inferior to none.

MEZIRIAC, Claude Gaspard Bachet, fleur de, known as a poet, in French, Latin, and Italian, as a good Greek scholar, and able critic, was born of a noble family at Bresse. He was of the order of the jésuits, and was admitted into the French academy. He died at Bourg in Bresse, Feb. 26th, 1638, aged 45. He was universally esteemed and respected, so that at one time it was in agitation to appoint him preceptor to Lewis XIII. an honor from which he shrunk with diffidence and terror. He wrote various poems in Italian, Latin and French, he also published the six books of Diophantus, with notes — a Life of Æsop, besides several works not printed, and a translation of Plutarch's works, just completed when he died. In arithmetic and in geometry Meziriac was also respectable.

MICAH, the sixth of the minor prophets, foretold the captivity of his nation, their deliverance, and the coming of the promised Messiah, in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah.

MICAL, N. abbé, a celebrated French mechanic. He constructed two heads of brass which had the power of articulation, and by means of springs could repeat various passages from authors. These curious but useless labors of human ingenuity were disregarded by the government, and the artist in disappointment, broke them to pieces, and died in the greatest indigence, 1789.

MICHAEL I. succeeded Stauracius on the throne of Constantinople, 811. He was a mild and virtuous monarch, and after establishing regularity and promoting happiness at home, he made war against the Saracens, whom he defeated by his general Leo, the Armenian. He was less successful against the Bulgarians, and Leo taking advantage of his distress, declared himself against him. Michael descended without regret from the throne, 813, and retired to a monastery, where he took the religious habit, and ended his days in peace.

MICHAEL II. a Phrygian of obscure origin, raised to consequence and patrician honors by Leo the Armenian. His elevation created him enemies, and Leo was persuaded to send him to prison, and to order him to be burnt. The night preceding the fatal day the emperor was strangled in his bed, and Michael dragged from prison, was seated on the imperial throne, 820. Though hitherto the protector of the christians he became their persecutor, and obliged them to observe the sabbath and the other holy days of the Jewish law. This and other acts of cruelty and oppression rendered him unpopular, and Euphemius his general, spurred on by personal revenge, proclaimed himself emperor near Syracuse, but was slain soon after. Regardless of the murmurs of his subjects, Michael gave himself up to every extravagance and licentious debauchery, and died 1st Oct. 829.

MICHAEL III. surnamed the Drunkard, succeeded his father Theophilus, 842, though only six years old. His minority was governed by his mother Theodora, a woman of distinguished abilities, but he no sooner arrived to years of maturity than he obliged her to resign the reins of government and retire into a monastery. He next took for his associate Bardas, his mother's brother, who persuaded him to send into exile, St. Ignatius, the patriarch of Constantinople, and to place in his seat Photius, which proved the cause of the separation of the eastern and western churches. Michael afterwards put to death his associate, and created Basil, the Macedonian, Cæsar in his room, but soon after meditated his destruction because he reproved his vicious and profligate habits. Basil, however, averted the blow, and caused the tyrant to be assassinated, 24th Sept. 867.

MICHAEL IV. called the Paphlagonian, from his birth place, ascended the imperial throne, 1034, by the favor of Zoe, the empress, who having fallen in love with him caused her own husband the emperor Romanus Argyrus to be assassinated, that she might gratify her criminal desires. Though successful in his wars against the Saracens and Bulgarians, he found unhappiness on the throne which he had gained by murder, and at last in 1041, stung by remorse of conscience, he retired to a monastery, where he died soon after.

MICHAEL V. surnamed Calafates, succeeded his uncle Michael IV. in 1041, by the intrigues of Zoe. The great qualities which he had displayed in private life disappeared on the throne. He became suspicious, cruel, and revengeful, and dreading the power of Zoe he sent her into exile. This measure, however, was so offensive to the people that she was recalled, and Michael exposed to the popular fury had his eyes put out, and was in 1042 sent to a monastery, where he ended his days.

MICHAEL VI. or Warrior, was raised to the throne by the empress Theodora. He was old and weak, and though he chose his officers from among the senators he became unpopular, and was obliged to resign the crown in favor of Isaac Comnenus, 1057. He afterwards retired to a monastery, where he died.

MICHAEL VII. Paleologus, son of Constantine Ducas and Eudoxia, was deprived of his throne by the arts of his mother, who soon after his father's death married Romanus Diogenes, whom she proclaimed emperor. The defeat and captivity of Romanus by the Turks in 1071, enabled Michael to re-ascend the throne, but he was so weak and unpopular that Nicephorus revolted against him, and obliged him in 1078 to fly to a monastery. He died archbishop of Ephesus.

MICHAEL VIII. Paleologus, was regent of the eastern empire during the minority of John Lafcaris, but taking advantage of the young monarch's weakness and inexperience, he dispossessed him of his throne, and put out his eyes, 1260. In 1261 he retook Constantinople from Baldwin II. after it had been for 58 years under the power of the French, and he labored earnestly to procure a reconciliation between the eastern and western churches. As the plan was not approved by the Greeks, Martin IV. excommunicated Michael under pretence that he was insincere. He died 11th Dec. 1282.

MICHAEL PALÆOLOGUS, son of Andronicus the elder, was crowned 1214, emperor under his father, and shared the sovereign power with him, and died 1220.

MICHAEL FOEDEROWITZ, was elected Czar of Russia, 1613. Though raised to power in times of great danger he shewed himself brave, prudent, and sagacious, and after making peace with the Poles and the Swedes, he labored for the happiness of his subjects in the establishment of wise and salutary regulations. He died 1645. He was the son of the daughter of John Basilowitz.

MICHAEL ANGELO, of Battles, a Roman painter, who exchanged his name of Cerquozzi, for that of Battles, cles, as expressive of the subjects which employed his pencil. His pieces were much admired for boldness, spirit, and correctness. He died at Rome, 1660, aged 58.

MICHAEL CERULARIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in 1043, prevented by his writings the union which the emperor Michael VI. wished to effect between the eastern and western churches. He was banished for his intrigues by Isaac Comnenus, 1059, and died of chagrin, in the island of Proconesus.

MICHAEL ANGELO BUONAROTTI, Vid. ANGELO.

MICHAEL ANGELO DU CARAVAGGIO, Vid. CARAVAGGIO.

MICHAELIS, John David, a celebrated divinity professor in Gottingen university, who died 22d Aug. 1791, aged 75. His works are 49 in number, and are valuable, as chiefly designed to explain and illustrate the Holy Scriptures. The work most known in England, is his Introduction to the New Testament, published in 1750, and translated into English, 1761. The work has lately been again recommended to the notice of the public in a translation, 3 vols. 8vo. with valuable notes, by the Rev. Herbert Marsh, fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge, for some time resident at Leipsic. The work exhibits great learning and deep research, but doubts and scepticisms are occasionally introduced, which capriciously altering the text or the sense, undermine the authority, of scripture, and lessen the respect which should be paid to inspired writings.

MICHEL, Peter Anthony, an able botanist, born at Florence, of mean parentage. He was at first an errand boy in a bookseller's shop, but showing great zeal in obtaining the Tithymalus Characias, a plant which it is said intoxicates fish, that he might angle with greater success, he was noticed by the monks of the abbey of Vallombrosa. Under the care of these benevolent fathers he greatly improved himself, and was enabled to follow his inclinations in the science of botany. By degrees his reputation was spread abroad. Tournesort, Sherard, and other learned men admired his taste and botanical knowledge, which proved so respectable as to recommend him to the grand duke of Florence, who appointed him director with Tilly, of the botanical gardens at Pisa and Florence. Under the patronage of the duke he also visited Egypt, Greece, and other parts of the world, in pursuit of botanical discoveries, and died 1737, aged 58. He wrote various botanical works, the best known of which are Nova Plantarum Genera, 1729, Florence — Catalogus Plant. Horti Cæsaris Florent. fol. 1748, &c.

MICHEL, James Bartholomew, a Genevese of an ancient respectable family. He served as captain in the French army, but afterwards in 1738, retired to his native country, and devoted himself to philosophical and mathematical pursuits. Though absorbed in literary cares, he felt the troubles of civil dissension, and was for some time imprisoned by the Bernese government. He died March, 1766. Besides Tracts on Meteorology — the Power of the Tides — the Temperature of the Globe — Light — the Comet of 1680 — the Deluge — Views of the Glaciers of Switzerland, &c. he constructed some ingenious maps, and invented a new thermometer.

MICKLE, William Julius, a poet, known as the translator of the Lusiad, was born at Langholm, in the county of Dumfries, 29th Sept. 1734. He was educated under his father, who had been one of Bayle's translators, and after his death he was placed in the high school of Edinburgh, where about the age of 13 he accidentally met Spenser's Faery Queene, and was enchanted with the poetical imagery. He settled at Edinburgh as a brewer, first for his aunt and then for himself; but his industry proved unsuccessful in trade, and in 1763 he left Scotland, for London. He introduced himself to the notice of lord Lyttleton, but was disappointed in his expectations of going to the East or West Indies in some mercantile occupation, and at last accepted the offer of corrector of the Clarendon press at Oxford. In this learned employment so congenial to his taste, he published various things, and in 1771, after he had acquired a perfect knowledge of the Portuguese, he published the first book of the Lusiad as a specimen. The work was applauded and continued, and in 1775 was favorably received by the public, and again edited in 1778. Mickle afterwards went to Lisbon as secretary to his friend governor Johnstone, and there in 1781 he wrote his Almada Hill, a poem, 4to. At his return he married Miss Tomkins, June, 1782, daughter of the person with whom he resided at Forest Hill, after he had retired from Oxford for the more peaceful completion of his Lusiad, and with her he settled at Wheatley, near Oxford. He here wrote some few things, and made several communications to the European magazine. He died at Wheatley, 25th Oct. 1789, aged 55, leaving a son, but with scanty resources. By his Lusiad, an elegant and classical work, rivalled only by the Iliad of Pope, Mickle has obtained immortal fame. His poems were published 1794, in one vol. 4to. and appear among the English poets of Dr. Anderson. He wrote besides a letter to Dr. Harwood, on the Arian Controversy, 1769 — Voltaire in the Shades, or Dialogues on the Deistical Controversy, 1770 — a pamphlet on the Affairs of the East India Company. In his private character Mickle was very amiable; he lived without reproach, and wrote nothing but what virtue approved.

MICRELIUS, John, professor of divinity at Stettin, was born at Custin, Pomerania, 1597. He distinguished himself as a theological disputant, and was honorably noticed by Christina of Sweden. He had three wives, and died 3d Dec. 1658. His works are Lexicon Philosophicum, 4to. — Syntagma Historicum Mundi et Ecclesiarum, 8vo. — Tractatus de Copiâ Verborum — Ethnophronium contra Gentiles, &c. — Archaeologia — Historia Ecclesiastica, 2 vols. 4to. — Orthodoxia Lutherana contra Bergium.

MIDDLETON, Richard, of the order of the Cordeliers, was called the Profound, from his extensive learning. He was distinguished in the universities of Oxford and Paris, and wrote a commentary on Peter Lombard, and other theological works, and died 1304.

MIDDLETON, Mr Hugh, a native of Denbigh, well known for his public spirit. He formed the project of supplying London with water, and though he met with numerous difficulties from the prejudices and the envy of others, and from the exhausted state of his affairs, he triumphed over all opposition, and brought the united streams of two rivulets in the parishes of Ware and of Amwell, in Hertfordshire, through a course of 20 miles to the capital. The work was begun 20th Feb. 1608, and on Michaelmas day, 1613, water was brought into the great cistern at Islington. This honorable completion of an useful work was rewarded by king James, who had liberally supported the projector, and erected by charter, a company of proprietors. He was knighted, and afterwards made a baronet, and under Charles the moiety of the property, which he had given to the king's father for his assistance, was reconveyed to him for an annual sum, and is now become a source of princely fortune to the proprietors. Sir Hugh gave one share of the property to the company of goldsmiths, to which he belonged, for the benefit of their poor members. He died about 1636.

MIDDLETON, William, a native of Gwenynog, Denbighshire, who served in the army under Elizabeth, and afterwards had the command of a ship of war. He employed his leisure hours at sea in composing a version of the psalms into Welsh verse, which he completed 1595, in the West Indies. He also wrote a grammar, and art of poetry, 1593, &c.

MIDDLETON, Thomas, a dramatic writer in the reign of James I. He joined Jonson, Massinger, and Fletcher, in the composition of some dramatic pieces, and died 1630.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, an eminent critic and able divine. He was the son of the rector of Hinderwell, near Whitby, and was born at York, 27th Dec. 1683. At the age of 17 he was sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1707 he took his degree of M. A. In 1709 he joined the other fellows of the society in opposition to Dr. Bentley the master; but soon after he retired from college by marrying Mrs. Drake, a widow of large property. In 1717 he was, on the visit of George I. to the university, created D. D. by royal mandamus, and on this occasion he resisted the demand of Dr. Bentley for extraordinary fees. This affair engaged much of the public attention, and was at last decided against Bentley, who behaved with great contumacy towards the university, in consequence of which he was degraded. In this dispute Middleton published some pamphlets, and when Bentley made proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, and a Latin version, 1720, he was treated with such severity by his antagonist, in "Remarks, &c." that he totally abandoned the plan. In 1723 Middleton was elected principal librarian at Cambridge, and the following year, in consequence of his wife's death, he visited the continent, where he was received with great respect by men of learning and of rank. Soon after his return, in 1725, he drew upon himself the resentment of the medical world by an attack on Dr. Mead, Spon, and others, and in 1729 he highly offended the catholics by publishing his letters from Rome, showing an exact conformity between popery and paganism. In 1731 he incurred the public displeasure in a high degree, by publishing his letter to Dr. Waterland, who had attacked Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation, and in his pamphlet he spoke with such freedom of religion, and with such contempt of his respectable antagonist, that he not only was severely censured as an infidel in an answer by bishop Pearce; but when known to be the author of the obnoxious tract, he was very nearly stripped of his academical honors. In 1731, notwithstanding his unpopularity, he was appointed Woodwardian professor at Cambridge, but as his pursuits were very different from the study of fossils and minerals, he resigned the place 1734. About this time he married a second wife, after whose death he took a third, who survived him. In 1735 he published a Dissertation on the Origin of Printing in England, and in 1741 appeared his great work, the History of the Life of M. Tullius Cicero, 2 vols. 4to. reprinted in 3 vols. 8vo. This performance is of superior eminence, written in correct and elegant language, and abounding in every thing which can interest the heart, inform the understanding, and polish the taste, though it must be confessed, that with all the partiality of an author, he has drawn the character of the orator with more glittering ornaments than belong to him, and in concealing his defects has magnified his virtues. In 1743 he published Cicero's epistles to Brutus, and those of Brutus to Cicero, in Latin and English, with a vindication of their authenticity in answer to Tunstall's objections. In 1745 appeared his Germana quædam Antiquitates Erudite Monumenta, &c. and in 1747 his Treatise on the Roman Senate. That same year was also remarkable for the publication of the introduction of his discourse on the miraculous powers supposed to have existed in the Christian church from the earliest ages, &c. 4to. a work which excited in the highest degree the reprehension of the clergy, and drew upon him severe and well directed reflections, two of which procured to the authors, Dodwell and Church, the degree of D. D. honorably conferred by the university of Oxford. While preparing to answer his opponents he made a petulant attack on Sherlock's Discourses, once his friend and companion, 1750; but before his reply to Dodwell, Church, and others, could be completed, he was seized with a hectic fever, and a disorder in his liver, which proved fatal, 28th July, 1750, in his 67th year, at Hilderham, Cambridgeshire. His miscellaneous works, not including the life of Cicero, appeared together in 1752, with several new pieces, in 4 vols. 4to. Dr. Middleton left no children by his three wives. As a writer he ranks high, for elegance of language, animated description, and all the graces of profound learning and extensive information. Though attacked and reviled as an infidel, and an enemy to christianity, by his opponents, it appears from his letters to his friend and patron lord Hervey, that his opinions were not fully orthodox, and though he speaks with indifference of the preferment which was conferred on others not so well entitled to it for learning and abilities, as himself, yet it is plain, that his language is the language of a disappointed man, who affected to despise what his intemperate writings had rendered it impossible for him to obtain.

MIDDLETON, Erasmus, rector of Turvey, Bedfordshire, and author of a dictionary of arts and sciences, of little merit, of sermons on Jackson and Binns, and editor of Biographia Evangelica, 4 vols. 8vo. died 25th May, 1805. He was one of the six young men expelled some years ago from Oxford, in consequence of which Macgowan's Satire, called the Shaver, was published. He was in his principles a strong follower of the methodists.

MIEL, Jan, a Flemish painter, born 1599, near Antwerp. He was the disciple of Ger. Segers, and copied at Rome, the works of the Caracci and Correggio. He was patronized by Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, and died at Turin, 1664. He excels in his historical, hunting, and conversation pieces, and his animals are particularly admired for spirit, and for all the graces of nature. Several engravings have been made from his works.

MIERIS, Francis, called the Older, was born at Leyden, 1635. He was the disciple of Ger. Douw, whom he is said in some degree to have excelled. His pictures are very scarce and valuable. He died 1681, leaving two sons, both eminent painters.

MIERIS, William, the Younger, son of the above, was also an eminent painter, and born at Leyden, 1662. He also excelled in completing models of clay and wax, and deserved the name of a good sculptor. He died 1747. His son Francis, called the young Francis, was also a painter, but his pieces have not the same excellence as those of his father and grandfather.

MIGNARD, Nicolas, a French painter, born at Troyes, 1608. He studied in Italy, and married at Avignon, and at last became rector of the Paris academy of painting. His portraits and historical pieces were much admired. He died of a dropsy, 1668.

MIGNARD, Peter, called the Roman, as for 20 years a resident at Rome, was the younger brother of Nicolas, and was also born at Troyes, 1610. He was much esteemed at Rome, and afterwards at Paris, where Lewis XIV. sat ten times to him, ennobled him and made him his chief painter at the death of Le Brun. He died 13th March, 1695.

MIGNON, Abraham, a painter born at Frankfort, 1639. His flowers and insects were much admired, especially the drops of dew on fruit, which displayed all the transparency of real water. He died 1679.

MILBOURNE, Luke, M. A. an English divine, educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, became rector of St. Ethelburgh, and lecturer of St. Leonard's, Shore-ditch. He published a poetical Translation of the Psalms — some Latin Verses — Notes on Dryden's Virgil — Thirty-one single sermons, &c. His name is frequently mentioned with that of Blackmore, by Dryden, and has been introduced by Pope in his Art of Criticism, and in the Dunciad. Dr. Johnson speaks in Dryden's Life, with no great respect of his abilities. He died 15th April, 1720. His father Luke was a nonconformist, and in consequence, ejected from the living of Wroxall, Warwickshire, 1662. He died at Newington, 1667.

MILDMAY, sir Walter, surveyor of the court of augmentations under Henry VIII. and under Elizabeth, privy counsellor, chancellor, and under treasurer of the exchequer, was a man of great public and private worth, and immortalized his name by the foundation of Emanuel college at Cambridge. He died 1589.

MILL, John, a learned English divine, born at Shap, in Westmoreland, 1645. He entered as servitor at Queen's college, Oxford, of which society he became fellow. In 1681 he took his degree of D. D. and was appointed chaplain to Charles II., and in 1685 made principal of Edmund hall. He was a good preacher, and published some sermons; but the work for which he is deservedly celebrated is his edition of the New Testament. This very valuable work, which was first begun by the advice of Fell, bishop of Oxford, and partly printed at his expence, was the labor of 30 years of application, and was published about a fortnight before his death, which happened 23d June, 1707. It is remarkable that bishop Fell's executors refused to complete the work, which his lordship had so honorably begun, and Dr. Mill therefore repaid them what had been expended, and finished the whole at his own charge. These labors so popular and so useful, were not however received without censure. Dr. Whitby attacked the notes, and the 30,000 various readings which had been collected by the indefatigable editor, were considered as likely to open the way for cavil and scepticism among free-thinkers and wanton polemics. These arguments were ably refuted by Dr. Bentley, and Dr. Mill's Greek Testament is now deservedly regarded as a most valuable book.

MILL, Henry, an eminent engineer, born about 1680, near, or in Red Lion square, Holborn. He was well educated, and passed some time at one of the universities, and his mechanical abilities became so eminent, that he was, when very young, employed as engineer by the new river company. His labors were there so usefully directed in the improvement of the concern, that by gradual increase the original shares of 100l. are now sold for upwards of 8000l. His abilities were also employed in supplying the town of Northampton with water, for which he was presented with the freedom of the corporation, and he likewise ornamented Houghton, the seat of sir Robert Walpole, with an excellent stream. This worthy man was seized with a fit on Christmas-day, 1770, and expired before the next morning. A monument was erected to him, by his sister, in Breemoore church, near Salisbury.

MILLAR, John, a popular professor of law at Glasgow. He practised also at the Scotch bar, and for 40 years maintained the high reputation of an able and intelligent professor. He was author of an Historical View of the English Government, 4to. — and on the Origin of Distinction of Ranks in Society, 1 vol. 8vo. He died 1801.

MILLER, James, a dramatic poet, born in Dorsetshire, 1703. He was intended for a merchant, but he preferred literature, and was sent to Wadham college, Oxford, where he began his famous comedy, "the Humors of Oxford," performed 1729. He wrote besides some other comedies, occasional pieces, and Mahomet the Impostor, a tragedy, during the popular run of which the author died. Miller was a clergyman, and published some sermons; but he had no preference till a few weeks before his death he was presented to the living of Uperne, Dorsetshire, which his father had held. He died 1744.

MILLER, Philip, author of the Gardener's Dictionary, was born 1691, in Scotland. He succeeded, in 1722, his father as gardener of the company of apothecaries' garden at Chelsea, and united the knowledge and information of a botanist to the practice and mechanical drudgery of a gardener. He was well acquainted with the plans of Ray and Tournefort, and by the advice of sir William Watson and Mr. Hudson, with difficulty adopted the system of Linnæus, with whom he afterwards corresponded as a scientific and experienced botanist. He was made fellow of the Royal society, member of the Florence botanical society, and honored with the correspondence of several learned men in Europe, who called him, with flattery but truth, Hortulanorum Princeps. Linnæus said of his dictionary, Non erit Lexicon Hortulanorum, sed Botanicorum. He resigned through infirmity, some time before his death, his place at Chelsea, and died 18th Dec. 1771, aged 80. He published his Gardener's Dictionary, 1731, folio, which has passed through various editions, and has been translated into several languages — the Gardener's Calendar, 8vo. — a Short Introduction to Botany — Figures of Plants, 2 vols. folio, with 300 plates — besides Papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. and a large Herbarium of Exotics in MS.

MILLER, lady, a woman of respectable abilities who resided at Bath-Easton, near Bath, and published Letters from Italy, 3 vols. 8vo. A collection of poems appeared in her name, and in the name of some of her literary friends who frequented her house. She died 1781.

MILLES, Jeremiah, D. D. a native of Highcleer, Hants, where his father was minister. He was made dean of Exeter after Lyttelton, and became president of the antiquarian society, to whose literary labors he contributed very largely. He was also engaged in the Chattertonian controversy, and warmly supported the authenticity of those ancient poems imposed upon the world as the works of Rowley. His edition of the poems in 4to. with annotations, displayed his abilities as an editor, but exposed him to the severity of criticism. He died 1784, aged 71.

MILLETIERE, Theophilus Brachet, fleur de la, a protestant, who studied law at Heidelberg, and practised as advocate, and afterwards became a divine. He wrote at Rochelle against Tilenus, and asserted that it was lawful for the protestants to resist by force of arms, the persecutions raised against them. He was, in consequence of this, suspected of disloyalty to the government, and sent as prisoner to Toulouse, where he was put to the rack. He was at last, by the intercession of friends, liberated, and then turned catholic, and endeavoured by his writings to reconcile the Huguenots, and his new friends to the same faith. He dedicated one of his books to Charles II. in his exile, and advised him to embrace the catholic tenets; that faith in which he insolently affirmed his father Charles I. had died. Milletiere died 1665, little respected.

MILLOT, Claude Francis Xavier, a French historian, born at Besançon, March, 1726. He was for some time among the jesuits, but quitted their society, and was afterwards appointed professor of history at Parma, by the interest of the duke of Nivernois. After acquiring reputation as a professor, he returned to France, and was made preceptor to the duke of Enghien, in which situation he died 1785. In his manners he was a very diffident man, though amiable and benevolent. His works are valuable, and written with spirit, and in an elegant style. He published Elements of the History of France, 3 vols. 12mo. — Elements of the History of England, 3 vols. — Elements of Universal History, 9 vols. — History of the Troubadours, 3 vols. — Memoirs for the History of Lewis XIV. and XV. 6 vols. — Translation of Orations from Latin Historians — Discourses on Academical Subjects, &c.

MILLO, an athlete of Crotona, celebrated for his prodigious strength. He obtained the prize seven times at the Pythian games, and six times at Olympia, and was devoured by wild beasts, 500 B. C.

MILLO, Titus Annius, a Roman, who killed Clodius in the Appian Way, in consequence of a violent rivalry which existed between them in the solicitation of public honors. Though defended by Cicero, he was banished to Marseilles. The oration delivered by Cicero on the occasion is much admired.

MILTIADES, an Athenian general, celebrated for the great victory which he, at the head of 10,000 men, obtained over the numerous forces of the Persians at Marathon, 490 B. C. He was afterwards cruelly imprisoned by his suspicious countrymen, and died in confinement, 489 B. C.

MILTON, John, a celebrated English poet, descended from an ancient family at Milton, Oxfordshire. He was born Dec. 9th, 1608, in Bread street, where his father, a scrivener, was settled, and after receiving instruction from a private tutor he went to St. Paul's school, and in 1625 removed to Christ-college, Cambridge. He was intended by his father for the church, and he took his master's degree in 1632; but he expressed an aversion for the ecclesiastical profession, and by degrees grew dissatisfied with the established form of church government. When he left Cambridge he returned to his father, who had settled with a competent fortune at Horton, near Colnbrook, in Buckinghamshire, and in this retirement he laboriously devoted himself for five years to reading the purest classics in Greek and Latin. Here likewise he produced his Comus — L'Allegro — Il Penseroso — and Lycidas, poems of such intrinsic merit as would have transmitted his fame to the latest period of time, if he had written nothing besides. On his mother's death he obtained his father's permission to travel abroad, and in 1638 he embarked for the continent, attended by one servant. From Paris, where he was introduced to the great Hugo Grotius, he proceeded to Nice, and by sea to Genoa, Leghorn, Pisa, and then passed to Florence, where he spent two months, respected and beloved by persons of eminence, rank, and learning. His next visit was through Sienna to Rome, where he passed two months, delighted with the vast treasures of the Vatican, and honored with the kindness and civilities of cardinal Barberini, Holstenius, and other learned men. From Rome he went to Naples, and formed the design of visiting Sicily; but the disturbed state of affairs at home engaged now all his attention, and he determined to hasten back. He passed through Rome, Bologna, Ferrara, Venice, Verona, Milan, Geneva, and France, and reached England after an absence of 15 months. Instead, however, of returning to live with his father, who had retired to Reading, from Horton, he settled in St. Bride's church yard, to educate his sister's two sons, Edward and John Phillips.

After.

Afterwards, with the intention of taking a greater number of pupils, he removed to a large house in Aldersgate-street, and published his tractate of education, which proved how well qualified he was to instruct others, though from a dislike of university rules, he adopted a mode of education totally the reverse of what was practised in schools. In 1641 he published some pamphlets, in which he vented his virulence against the church, and supported the republican principles of the times. In 1643 he married the daughter of Mr. Powell, a justice of peace in Oxfordshire; but as she had been educated a firm royalist, this union proved unhappy, and after cohabiting with him about a month, she left him, and would not return. Disgusted with this conduct, the poet thought that he might be permitted to take another wife; and he not only wrote some strong tracts in favor of divorce, but paid his addresses to another lady, of great wit and beauty. This had due effect; and his wife, after long despising his invitations, relented, and throwing herself at his feet, obtained his forgiveness and reconciliation in 1645. From Aldersgate-street he removed to Barbican, and then to a smaller house in Holborn, where, in the midst of his studies, he rejoiced at the prospect of the fall of regal government, and the future establishment of his favorite republic. The momentous events of the times gave full scope for the exertion of his literary abilities; he defended the trial and the execution of the king, and animadverted in severe terms on every measure which might tend to disturb the popular government. His talents were too great to be neglected, and therefore he was appointed Latin secretary to the council of state, and in this office he answered the Icon Basilicon, by his Iconoclastes, 1649, and two years after published his celebrated work against Salmasius, pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, which not only spread his fame through Europe as an elegant Latinist, and able disputant, but procured for him from the government, a present of 1000*l*. About this time he lost his eye-sight, which had been gradually decaying from his severe application to his studies; but he nevertheless continued zealous and active in the support of his principles. In 1652 his wife died, soon after the delivery of her fourth child, and some time after he married a second. But though patronised and raised to independence by the favor of Cromwell, and of Richard, Milton saw with terror the dissolution of his favorite republic approaching, and not all the respectable labors of his pen could uphold the crumbling fabric. Anxious to ensure his safety, on the restoration, he concealed himself in a friend's house in Bartholomew close; but though his sentiments and his active conduct had marked him out at first for destruction, yet by the interest and influence of his friends, especially Sir Andrew Marvell, Davenant, and others, who respected his learning and his abilities, while they detested his principles, he was included in the act of amnesty, and permitted to appear in public. Removing therefore from Petty France, Westminster, where he had lived since 1652, he took a house in Holborn, and then removed to Jewin-street, where he took a third wife, and then settled in a house in the Artillery walk, Bunhill fields. In this place, which was his last stage, and where he lived longer than in any other, he was accustomed, as Phillips observes, to sit at the door in the summer, in a grey coarse cloth coat, and while he enjoyed the fresh air, many persons of rank and of eminence have been known to pay their respect of admiration to the blind but venerable bard. Though reduced in his circumstances by the restoration, he refused to accept the Latin secretaryship which was honorably offered him by Charles II. and he devoted himself earnestly to the completion of his great poem, on which he had already bestowed much labor. He was assisted in his literary pursuits by Thomas Ellwood, a quaker, who acted as an amanuensis, and daily visited him. In 1665, during the plague, the poet retired to a small house at St. Giles, Chalfont, Buckinghamshire, and while in this place, he was visited by his friend, into whose hands he put his Paradise Lost, now finished, and modestly requested his opinion. Ellwood read the work with approbation, and in returning it to the poet, told him that he had said much about Paradise Lost, but, added he, what hast thou to say of Paradise Found. The hint was not lost; Paradise Regained was begun, and afterwards when visited by Ellwood, Milton presented him the poem which originated in his conversation. The poet returned to London 1666, and the Paradise Lost was first printed the following year, in 10 books, afterwards swelled to 12, and Paradise Regained in 1670, in 4 books, to which was added, Samson Agonistes, a dramatic poem. Milton received for this great work only 15*l*. and the money was paid by instalments. It is singular that the poet considered Paradise Regained as a superior performance to Paradise Lost, but posterity have decided otherwise; and this matchless poem, which long remained unknown from the prejudices entertained against the author, gradually rose to notice, to fame, and immortality. Dryden had, indeed, recommended its great merits to the public, in the six beautiful lines, "Three poets in three distant ages born," &c. which are generally prefixed to the work, and which are borrowed from the distich which Salvaggi wrote at Rome on the youthful bard; but it was not till the days of Addison, that England became sensible of the greatness, of the beauties, and the sublimity of her poet. The critique of the Spectator opened the eyes of the nation, and in banishing prejudice, liberally proved that however violent the publications of Milton were, however biased in his love of republican principles, and however blameable in some parts of his political life, yet his merits as a poet cannot be affected; he must shine as the greatest ornament of the British isles, and in the ranks of immortality, be placed by the side of Homer, of Virgil, and of Tasso. Milton died at his house near Bunhill fields, in the beginning of Nov. 1674, and was buried near his father, in the chancel of St. Giles', Cripplegate, where a monument has been lately erected to his memory, and another with greater propriety, among the great departed dead of Westminster abbey, raised in 1737 by Mr. Benson. It is supposed that Milton drew his idea of his great work from an Italian tragedy on the Loss of Paradise, on which he originally intended to compose a tragedy; but as his matter enlarged, his genius gave it the form of an epic poem. His Samson Agonistes was written after the Greek model, but is unfit for representation: the Comus was first acted for the benefit of his grand-daughter, Mrs. Clarke, a widow in indigent circumstances, and the public support was earnestly solicited by a prologue from the nervous pen of Dr. Johnson. His poetical works have been often and elegantly edited; the latest edition is that by Todd, 6 vols. 8vo. To the edition of bishop Newton, a well written life was prefixed, and Mr. Hayley has also given a poetical life of the author; but the critique of Johnson can never be surpassed. The smaller poems were edited by Thomas Warton, 8vo. with valuable notes. The prose works of Milton are numerous and highly respectable. Besides his political tracts, he wrote, an History of England, 4to. down to the conquest — Areopagitica, or the Liberty of unlicensed Printing — Letters — History of Muscovy, &c. His political works have appeared in 3 vols. folio, and in 4to. and in 8vo. Dr. Newton's edition of all his works was comprehended in 5 vols. 4to. The person of Milton was fair, so that he was called at Cambridge, the lady of Christ-college; his hair was light brown, and his features exact and pleasing. He was of the middle size, well proportioned, nervous and active; but his constitution was tender, and his health consequently weak. In his mode of living he was economical, abstemious, and averse to strong liquors. Though he did not inherit much from his father, yet frugality maintained him in a respectable manner, and at his death he left about 1500*l.* besides the value of his household goods. He had no children except by the first of his three wives. Three daughters survived him, and of these the two youngest were well employed by him to read; and though they could read with ease eight different languages, yet they understood nothing but English, as their father used to say, that one tongue was enough for a woman. In his religious opinions, Milton was inconsistent. In his early years he favored the puritans, afterwards he inclined to the tenets of the independents and anabaptists, whose liberty of worship he greatly admired; but in the latter part of life, he professed no attachment to any particular sect, and he neither frequented any public place of worship, nor observed in his own house any of the religious rites of the times, though it is fully evident that he was sensible of the great truths of revelation, and hoped for salvation through the merits of a Redeemer.

MIMNERMUS, a Greek poet of Colophon, in the age of Solon. His elegies are lost, except a few fragments, preserved in Stobæus.

MINELLIUS, John, a Dutch grammarian, born at Rotterdam. The best part of his life was engaged in teaching the classics, and he facilitated the labors of future instructors, by publishing editions of Virgil, Terence, Sallust, Horace, Florus, and other works, with notes, adapted to the capacity of school boys. He died 1683.

MINOS, a fabulous son of Jupiter, king of Crete, celebrated for the laws which he established in his country, which are said to have continued in force above a thousand years. He lived 1432 B. C. — The second of that name, was king of Crete about 1300 B. C. He made war against the Athenians and Megareans. The history of these monarchs is greatly involved in fable.

MINOT, Lawrence, an English poet, whose works were discovered by Mr. Tyrwhit, in the Cottonian library, and presented by him to the public, 1795. He died about 1352.

MINUTIUS FELIX, a Roman orator in the third century. His Octavius, with Christian and Pagan Disputations, is a work of merit, and in favor of Christianity; edited Cambridge, 1707, and Leyden, 1709, 8vo.

MIRABAUD, John Baptist, perpetual secretary to the French academy, was born in Provence 1674, and lived to the age of 86. He published a translation of Tasso's Jerusalem — and also of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso — Alphabet de la Fée Gracieuse, 12mo. 1734. The System of Nature, an atheistical book, published in 1770, was falsely ascribed to him, and has been translated into English.

MIRABEAU, Victor Riquetti, marquis de, of an ancient family of Provence, originally from Naples, was one of the chief institutors of the political assembly called economists. He published in 1755, L'Ami des Hommes, 3 vols. 12mo. a work of some merit, containing, with much crude and extraneous matter, fine ideas on rural and political economy, and judicious remarks on the interests of society. His Theorie de l'Impot, in 12mo. proved so offensive to the government, on account of the freedom and boldness of his opinions, that he was confined in the Bastille. He wrote besides, Hommes Celebres, published by his friend Boscowich, at Bassano, in 2 vols. 8vo. His works, collected together, except the last mentioned, have been published in 8 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris 1790.

MIRABEAU, Honoré Gabriel Riquetti, count de, son of the preceding, and deputy of Provence to the states general, was born 1749. After serving for some time in the army, during the war of Corsica, he married a rich heiress of Aix; but a fondness for dissipation soon squandered away the property which he had lately acquired, and he left his country, overwhelmed in debts, and in poverty. After being confined for some time in the prisons of If, and of Joux, he had an amour with the wife of Monnier, the president of the parliament of Besançon, and carried away the frail one to Holland. For this crime he was condemned to lose his head, and consequently was doomed to spend the rest of life in a foreign country. He was, however, seized in 1777, and confined in the castle of Vincennes, and three years after, by the power of interest, restored to liberty. Undismayed by reflections on his flagitious conduct, he appeared at Aix, before the parliament, to demand his wife, who indignantly refused to live with him, and he personally pleaded his own cause, which proved deservedly unsuccessful. The French revolution now arose to give employment to the talents of this depraved and ambitious man; and when rejected by the nobility of Provence, he, in contempt contempt of their order, opened a shop, over which he inscribed, Mirabeau, marchand de draps. This probably recommended him to the populace of Aix, whose deputy he was elected to the third estate, and consequently called by the court, with contempt, the plebeian count. In the assembly, by his abilities, his eloquence, and his intrigues, he became a leading member; but though he aimed at popularity, he yet wished for power, and secretly planned the destruction of the monarchy, and the regeneration of the state under a new order of things. His ambition displayed itself in spite of his hypocrisy, and when the unfortunate Louis appeared in the assembly, all covered with diamonds, the aspiring deputy could not help exclaiming to one of his accomplices, behold the victim. Thus by his intrigues, and by the vast resources of his mind, he was capable of being apparently the friend and the leader of all parties; and while he created, as one of his biographers has observed, volcanoes, for the pleasure of extinguishing their flames, he flattered himself secretly with the hope of being one day, like another Cromwell, the protector of France. Whilst the favorite of the multitude, he did not hesitate to accuse the Jacobins, and to denounce vengeance against the factious; but his threats were the signal of his death. He was attacked by a sudden disease, which in a few hours proved fatal, 2d April 1791, and though the physicians, who opened his body, attributed his death to the violence of a fever, the public believed that he had been cut off by poison. His funeral was conducted with all the pomp of republican pride, and his remains were deposited near those of Des Cartes; but as he had observed that near the capitol was the Tarpeian rock, this same fickle populace dispersed, the following year, his ashes in the air, with every mark of ignominy. Mirabeau wrote, a Comparison between the great Condé and Scipio Africanus—History of Prussia under Frederic the Great, 8 vols. 4to.—Collection of his Labors in the National Assembly, 5 vols. 8vo.—Original Letters, containing an Account of his Life and Amours, 4 vols. 8vo.—Secret History of the Court of Berlin, 2 vols. 8vo. a work burnt by the hands of the hangman—a treatise on Lettres de Cachet, 8vo.—Political Pamphlets—besides some indecent books, &c.

MIRABEAU, Boniface Riquetti, viscount de, brother to the preceding, served with distinction in America, and at the time of the French revolution, was elected deputy of the nobility of Limousin to the states general. He ably opposed the union of the three chambers, and when the king, in an evil hour, sanctioned it, he, in quitting the room, broke his sword, and declared that the monarchy was at an end. The innovations introduced by the demagogues were resisted by him with equal boldness, and when he found that attachment to the throne became a crime, he emigrated, and raised a regiment, which served with credit under the prince of Condé. He died at the end of 1792, at Friburg, in the Brisgaw. He was author of some songs, and other temporary satires, at the beginning of the revolution. He was much addicted to drinking, and was, it is said, a man of little courage. When he paid a visit to his brother, who had been wounded in a duel, he was received with great politeness, and thanked earnestly for his attention, because, observed, with keen satire, the wounded man, I am afraid I shall never have the opportunity of returning your visit.

MIRABELLA, Vincent, an Italian, author of the Ancient History of Syracuse, 1713, folio, Naples, a scarce book. He died 1674.

MIRÆUS, Aubertus, a learned German, born at Brussels 1573. He was almoner and librarian to Albert, archduke of Austria, and died 1640, at Antwerp. He wrote, Opera Historica & Diplomatica, 2 vols. folio—Elogia Illustrium Belgii Scriptorum, 4to.—Vita Justi Lipsii, 8vo.—Origines Benedictinæ—Origines Carthusianorum, 8vo.—Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, 2 vols. folio—Rerum Belgicarum Chronicon—de Rebus Bohemicis.

MIRANDULA, John Picus, earl of, a celebrated Italian nobleman, born 24th Feb. 1463. He lost his father early, but he found in his mother a most attentive guardian, and the care which she took of his education, was repaid by the most astonishing improvement. To strong natural powers, Mirandula united unceasing application, and he possessed besides, a memory so retentive, that nothing which he heard or read was ever forgotten. After studying the law at Bologna, he visited the most celebrated universities of France, and by conversation, and by study, still enlarged the resources of his capacious mind. At his return to Rome, though only 23, he published 900 propositions in logic, mathematics, divinity, physics, &c. drawn not only from classical, but Jewish and Arabian authors, and challenged, through the universities of Italy, any philosopher or divine to enter the lists with him in disputation. This public exhibition of learning was anticipated not only with astonishment but envy, and enemies soon arose, who persuaded pope Innocent VII. that 13 of the propositions were heretical; and the disappointed Mirandula, though he explained in a submissive "Apology," was forbidden to read or dispute upon these theses. In 1491 Mirandula bid adieu to profane literature, to devote himself more attentively to divinity. He declared war against astrologers, because, it is said, they had foretold his death at the end of his 33d year. The prophecy was too true; this amiable scholar died at Florence, 17th Nov. 1494, in his 32d year. He was buried in the cemetery of St. Mark, in the habit of a Jacobin, an order to which he wished, on his death-bed, to belong; and these lines were engraved on his tomb:

Joannes jacet hic Mirandula, cætera morant
Et Tagus & Ganges, forsitan & Antipodes.
Though he died so young, he wrote several works, which were printed together at Bologna, 1496, folio, and latterly at Basil, 1601. They are written in elegant Latin, and have been translated into French and Italian, and they display profound learning, acuteness, and vivacity.

MIRANDULA, John Francis Picus, prince of, son of Galeoti Picus, the eldest brother of John, just mentioned, was born 1469. He succeeded in 1499 to his father, as the head of his principality, but he met with with opposition in his family, and by the assistance of the emperor Maximilian I. and of the duke of Ferrara, his two brothers, Lewis and Frederic, obliged him to fly from his country. Thus a fugitive in various countries for nine years, he was at last reinstated in 1511, by the assistance of pope Julius II. but the next year the papal troops were defeated at Ravenna, and Mirandula again sent into banishment. The expulsion of the French from Italy in 1515, restored him again to power, and he continued in peaceful possession of his principality till Oct. 1533, when his nephew Galeotti, the son of Lewis, supported by 40 assassins, entered his castle in the night, and murdered him, with his eldest son. Though tossed in the troubles of political life, he was a great lover of learning, and was a more voluminous writer than his uncle; and though he was inferior to him in wit, sprightliness, and information, yet he was his superior in solidity. His works have been generally edited with those of his uncle.

MIREVELT, Michael Janson, a portrait and historical painter, was born at Delft, and died there, 1641, aged 53.

MISSON, Francis Maximilian, a lawyer, distinguished for his eloquence in favor of the protestants, before the parliament of Paris. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to England, and engaged as travelling tutor to an English nobleman, through Italy, in 1688 and 9. He died at London, 16th Jan. 1721. He published, a New Voyage to Italy, 3 vols. 12mo. Hague, a work commended by Addison, and translated into English—the Sacred Theatre of Cevennes, or Account of Prophecies and Miracles performed at Languedoc, 1707, a weak performance—Observations of a Traveller, 12mo. a posthumous work.

MITCHELL, Joseph, a poet, born in Scotland about 1684. He came to London, and was patronised by lord Stair, and by sir Robert Walpole; but the liberality of his friends, and particularly of Aaron Hill, was wasted away in extravagance and licentiousness, and thus by his improper conduct, he remained always involved in distresses and difficulties. He died Feb. 6th, 1738. He is described by Cibber as a poet of the third rate, whose versification was in a style of mediocrity, and exhibited few marks of genius. He published, the Fatal Extravagance, a tragedy, properly belonging to Aaron Hill—the Highland Fair, a ballad opera—and poems, 2 vols. 8vo. 1729.

MITHRIDATES, king of Pontus, was surnamed the Great. He made war against the Romans, which continued for several years, and though defeated by Lucullus, Sylla, and Pompey, he still maintained his armies in the field, and threatened to carry invasion into the heart of Italy. He put an end to his life, when his son Pharnaces rebelled against him, B. C. 64.

MITTARELLI, John Benedict, a native of Venice, general of the order of the Calmudenfes, of which he published an history, in 8 vols. folio. He wrote other works, and died 1777, aged 69.

MOAVIA, general of the caliph Omar, avenged his master's death, and seized his kingdom, 643 A. D.

After taking Rhodes, and destroying the colossus, he attacked Sicily, and afterwards carried devastation to the gates of Constantinople. He was, however, unsuccessful, and after besieging in vain the capital for seven years, he purchased peace by paying an annual tribute to the eastern emperor. He died 680. During this siege, the Greek fire is said to have been invented, and to have been used with peculiar effect against the besiegers.

MOCENIGO, Lewis, a Venetian, like many of his family raised to the dignity of doge 1570. Supported by the pope, and by Spain, he attacked the Turks who had seized Cyprus, and their combined fleet defeated the infidels at the celebrated battle of Lepanto, Oct. 7, 1571, the doge died 1576. One of his family, Andrew, was an able negotiator, and wrote two historical works, de Bello Turcarum—la Guerra di Cambrai.

MODREVIUS, Andreas Fricius, secretary to Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, was a learned man, and wrote various works of which that “de Republicâ Emendendâ,” in 5 books, printed 1554, is highly esteemed as a most able political performance. In his religious opinions he showed himself very inconsistent, and while he inclined to the Lutherans he rendered himself suspected by the catholics, and exposed to the resentment of Pius V. He is regarded by Grotius as a person who wished to reconcile the different schemes of religion.

MOEBIUS, Godfrey, a native of Thuringia, and medical professor at Jena, was author of Philosophical principles of Medicine, 4to.—Abridgment of the Elements of Medicine, fol.—Anatomy of Camphire, 4to. in Latin. His son of the same name was also a physician, and published Synopsis Medicinæ Practicæ, fol. 1667. He died at Halle 1664, aged 53.

MOEBIUS, George, a native of Lauchan, in Thuringia, professor of theology at Leipzig, where he died 1697, aged 81. He wrote on the Origin, Propagation, and Continuance of Pagan Oracles, against Vindale, 12mo.

MOINE, Stephen le, a learned protestant, born at Caen 1624. He became professor of divinity at Leyden, and died there 1689. He wrote “Varia Sacra,” 2 vols. 4to. and other theological works.

MOINE, Peter le, a French poet, born at Chaumont, in Bassigny 1602. He was a jesuit, and was the first of that society who acquired reputation as a French poet. His greatest work is “St. Lewis” an epic poem in 18 books. His works are not highly approved by Boileau, and are therefore only above mediocrity. He died at Paris 22d Aug. 1672.

MOINE, Francis le, a French painter, born at Paris 1688. He was the pupil of Galloche, and was professor of the academy of painting. His famous apotheosis of Hercules in the grand saloon of Versailles, in which he was engaged four years, was so much approved by the French king that he made him his first painter, with a liberal pension. In a fit of lunacy, this unfortunate man stabbed himself with his sword, and died 4th June, 1737, aged 49.

MOINE, Abraham le, a French divine who left France on account of his religion, and became the minister nister of a protestant congregation in London where he died 1760. He translated into French Gibson's Pastoral Letters — Sherlock on the Witnesses of the Resurrection, and on the Use and End of Prophecy, with learned and valuable notes and dissertations.

MOIVRE, DE, Vid. DEMOIVRE.

MOLA, Pietro Francesco, a painter born at Lugano, in Switzerland, 1609. He was the pupil of Arpino, and of Albano at Rome, and he afterwards studied the works of Titian, and acquired a peculiar style of his own which ensured him success and reputation. He died 1665. He chiefly excelled in history, and also in landscape.

MOLA, Giovanni Battista, the brother, according to some, of the preceding, was also an eminent painter. He studied under Vouet at Paris, and afterwards under Albano, and was much admired for his landscapes, and the foliage of his trees. He was born about 1620; but the year of his death is not known.

MOLANUS, or VERMEULIN, John, an ecclesiastic, professor of theology at Louvaine. He was born at Lisse, and died 18th Sept. 1585, aged 52. He published, Ufnard's Martyrology, with notes and an appendix, 8vo. — Natales Sanctorum Belgii, 12mo. — Historia S.S. Imaginum & Picturarum, 8vo. and 1771, 4to. with a Supplement by Paquot — de Canonicis, a work of merit — de Fide Hereticis servandâ — de Piis Testamentis — Theologiæ Practicæ Compendium — Militia Sacra Ducum Brabant. — Rerum Lovaneng. &c.

MOLANUS, Gerard Walter, a Lutheran divine, abbot of Lockum. He was the correspondent of Bosuet, with respect to an union between the catholics and protestants. He wrote some theological works, and died 1722.

MOLAY, James de, the last grand master of the Templars. The riches as well as the pride of his order, excited the suspicion and the jealousy of Philip the Fair, who, with the consent of the pope, seized their property, and summoned the master to appear at Paris, to answer for his conduct. Molay came, attended by 60 knights, but they were no sooner in the power of their persecutors, than they were seized, and all burnt alive, falsely accused as being guilty of atrocious crimes. Molay suffered 11th May, 1314, and before the fatal torch was lighted, declared his innocence, and the innocence of his order.

MOLESWORTH, Robert, viscount, an able statesman, descended from an ancient family in Northamptonshire, was born Dec. 1656, in Dublin, where his father who died before his birth had settled as a merchant. He was educated at Dublin, and displayed so much zeal and patriotism at the revolution that James' parliament sequestered his property. The victorious William, however, rewarded his fidelity, made him one of his privy counsellors, and sent him as his ambassador to Denmark. After a residence of three years Moleworth offended the Danish court by not sufficiently respecting the customs and the privileges of the country, and left the place abruptly, and on his return to England published "an Account of Denmark." The book, though well received and translated into several languages, offended prince George of Denmark, by representing the Danish government as tyrannical, and a memorial of complaint was presented to king William, and an answer prepared to it by Dr. King. But Moleworth disregarded these measures, safe in the public approbation and the friendship of Shaftesbury. He was member of the commons in several parliaments, but rendered himself obnoxious to the clergy, by an affectation of popularity, and by profane insinuations that religion is a pious craft, an useful state engine, but far inferior to the principles which in the school of Athens and Rome, incited their attentive youth to the love of their country, and to the practice of the moral virtues. As he strongly supported the Hanoverian succession, notwithstanding the eccentricity of his principles, he could not but be acceptable, for his abilities and influence, to George I. by whom he was made a privy counsellor, and created a peer of Ireland 1716. He died 22d May, 1725, at his seat near Dublin, leaving by his wife seven sons and four daughters. He published besides, an address to the House of Commons, and translated Hottoman's "Franco-Gallia."

MOIERE, John Baptist Pocquelin de, a celebrated French comic writer, born at Paris 1620. His real name was Pocquelin, and his father who was a tapestry maker to the court, intended him for his own business. The boy, however, being frequently taken by his grandfather to the theatre, acquired such a taste for dramatic representations that his contempt for tapestry making prevailed, and he was sent to study under the jesuits at the college of Clermont. In five years he here completed his education, and further improved his mind by attending, with his friends Chappelle and Bernier, the lectures of Gassendi the celebrated philosopher. He afterwards applied himself to the law, but after his father's death, he renounced all other employments for the stage, and uniting himself with one of those small theatrical parties which were now patronized by Richelieu, he assumed the name of Moliere which he has rendered so illustrious. He joined La Bejart an actress of some merit, and with her went to Lyons, in 1653 where he produced his first play called P'Etourdi, or the Blunderer, which was received with universal applause. He performed afterwards at Languedoc, was at Grenoble in 1657, and the next year went to settle at Rouen. Some visits to Paris recommended him to the great, he was noticed by the duke of Conti, by the king's brothers, and at last patronized by the monarch himself. He exhibited before the king, and with such success that he received a pension, and continued from that time to entertain the court by a rapid production of new plays. The last comedy which he produced was le Malade Imaginaire, or the Hypochondriac, and on the fourth night of its being acted, 17th Feb. 1673, the author died. It has been said that he exerted himself much in the chief character, and that as in a part of the play the actor pretends to be dead, Moliere was discovered to be not only a theatrical, but a real corpse. This incident has given occasion to the following beautiful lines:

Roscus hic situs est, triste Molierus in urnâ
Cui genus humanum ludere, ludus erat.
Dum ludit mortem, mors indignata jacentem
Corripit, et nimium fingere sæva negat.

It is, however, certain that during the representation the author had a severe defluxion on his lungs, and that after the conclusion of the piece, he went to bed and expired half an hour after, by the bursting of a vessel in the lungs through excessive coughing. The death of their favorite actor deeply affected the Parisians, and Lewis XIV. interested himself much in the honors to be paid to his memory. Though the archbishop would not permit his body to be deposited in consecrated ground, the severe sentence was reversed by the king's command, and the lamented poet was buried in St. Joseph's chapel. Moliere by his "Tartuffe" had drawn upon himself the indignation of the clergy, and that of the other orders by the severity with which he lashed their follies and extravagant conduct. He was, says Voltaire, the best comic poet that ever lived in any nation, and it must be confessed that he retrieved comedy out of chaos, as Corneille had tragedy. He married the daughter of his fellow comedian, La Bejart, who was suspected of being his own child, and with her he led a very unhappy life, ever haunted by jealousy, and too sensible of the fair one's frailties. To his own experience some attribute the great success with which he paints the broils of domestic life, and the varying passions which agitate the jealous breast. Moliere's widow married afterwards a comedian named Guerin, and died 1728, aged 92. The plays of Moliere have frequently been printed, the best edition is that of Paris, 1772, in 6 vols. 8vo. They have appeared also in an English dress, and several of them have been introduced on our stage.

MOLIERES, Joseph Privat de, a French philosopher of noble birth. He was born at Tarascon, and was educated at the oratory, after which he went to Paris. As the friend of Malebranche, and a man of great abilities, he was admitted into the academy of sciences, and in 1723, made philosophical professor of the Royal college. He wrote Mathematical Lessons to understand Philosophy, 12mo. — Lessons of Philosophy, or Elements of Physics, &c. to explain and improve the systems of Descartes and Newton, 3 vols. 8vo. — Elements of Geometry, 12mo. He died 1742, aged 65.

MOLINA, Lewis, a native of Cuenza, New Castille, of noble birth. He studied at Coimbra, and was admitted among the jesuits, and for 20 years was professor of divinity at Eboræ. He died at Madrid 1600, aged 65. He wrote besides Commentaries on the Summa of Aquinas — a treatise de Justitiâ & Jure — de Concordiâ Gratiae & Liberi Arbitrii, 4to. a work in which the author is accused by the Dominicans of reviving Pelagianism. A Spanish author of that name, wrote a valuable work on the hereditary property of the Spanish nobles.

MOLINÆUS, Carolus, or Charles DU MOULIN, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 1500. An impediment in his speech prevented his displaying his abilities at the bar; but he wrote on jurisprudence with such success that he was called the Papinian of France. In 1552, in consequence of the persecution of the protestants he removed to Basil and other places, and on his return to Paris was confined in the Conciergerie for some severe reflections on the council of Trent, but was restored to liberty by the intercession of the queen of Navarre. In his old age he conformed to the Roman catholic tenets, and died 1566. His works were published 1681, in 5 vols. folio. It is said that he was allied to Elizabeth queen of England.

MOLINÆUS, or DU MOULIN, Peter, a protestant minister, of the same family as the preceding, born at Bechny in the Vexin, 1568. He studied at Sedan, and afterwards at Christ-college, Cambridge, and obtained the professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where he had among his pupils the celebrated Grotius. In 1599 he became minister of Charenton, and chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, the sister of Henry IV. whom he preserved in the protestant faith, against all the machinations of the catholics. In 1615 he was invited to England by James I. who greatly honored him, and gave him a prebend of Canterbury. He was afterwards deputed by the Gallican church to the synod of Dordt, where the affairs of the reformed churches were to be discussed, but was prevented by intrigues and menaces. He was offered in 1618, the divinity chair of Leyden, but declined it, though he afterwards settled at Sedan, as theological professor, and minister of the church. He died there 10th March 1658, aged 90. He wrote among other things, a treatise on the Keys of the Church — the History of the Monks — a Defence of the Reformed Churches — the Anatomy of Arminianism, folio — Novitas Papismi.

MOLINET, John, librarian to Margaret of Austria, and canon of Valenciennes, died 1607. He wrote several things, the best known of which are, les Dits & Faits de Molinet, 8vo. — a Paraphrase of the Romance of the Rose. His poems were reprinted, Paris, 1723.

MOLINET, Claude du, canon of St. Genevieve, was born at Chalons 1620, and died 1687. He published the Epistles of Stephen, bishop of Tournay — a Latin History of the Popes from Medals, folio — Reflections on the Origin and Antiquity of the Canons — on the Mitre of the Ancients — the Cabinet of St. Genevieve, &c.

MOLINETTI, Anthony, a native of Venice, who practised medicine at Padua with great reputation. He wrote a Latin treatise on the Organs of Sense, Padua, 1669, 4to. &c. and died at Venice 1675.

MOLINIER, John Baptist, a native of Arles, distinguished as a preacher at Toulouse, Aix, Lyons, Orleans, and Paris. He was author of some valuable sermons, 14 vols. 12mo. — Penitential Prayers, &c. He died at Paris, 15th March 1745, aged 70.

MOLINOS, Michael, a Spanish ecclesiastic, born at Saragossa 1627. He was the cause of great controversies in the church by his "Spiritu Alguide," first published in Spanish, and afterwards in other languages. He inculcated in this famous work that man must annihilate himself in order to be united to the deity; and this passive doctrine, called quietism, had many abettors, and among them Fenelon, and Madame Guyon. The author of it, however, fell into the hands of the inquisition, and was forced to abjure his errors, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in which he died, 1696.

MOLL, Herman, an English geographer, who died 1732. His maps were once in high esteem.

MOLLER, Henry, a protestant Hebrew professor at Wittemberg, and author of Commentaries on the Psalms, and Isaiah, some Latin poems, &c. He was born at Hamburg and died there 1589, aged 59.

MOLLER, Daniel William, a celebrated traveller, professor of metaphysics and history, and librarian in Altorf university, was born at Presburg, and died at Altorf, 1712, aged 70. He wrote Opuscula Ethica, &c. 12mo. — Opuscula Medico-historico-philologica, 12mo. — Menfa Poetica — Indiculus Philologorum ex Germaniâ oriundorum, 4to. — Meditatio de Infectis ex Aere delapsis, 12mo. &c.

MOLLER, John, an able writer, born at Fleinsbourg in Sleswick duchy, died 1725, aged 64. His son has published his life at Sleswick, 1734. He wrote a Latin History of the Duchies of Holstein and Sleswick, 8vo. — Cimbria Literata, 3 vols. fol. — de Cornutis & Hermaphroditis, 4to. — Ilagoge ad Historiam Chersonesi Cimbricæ, &c.

MOLLOY, Charles, an English dramatic writer, born at Dublin, and educated at the college there, of which he became fellow. He entered at the Middle Temple, London, and was engaged as the conductor of the periodical paper "Fog's Journal," and afterwards of "Common Sense." He married a lady of fortune, and died 16th July, 1767. He wrote the Perplexed Couple — the Coquet — Half-pay Officer, three comedies.

MOLO, a rhetorician celebrated for his learning, and for the number of his pupils, among whom was Cicero. He chiefly resided at Rhodes.

MOLSA, Francis Maria, an Italian poet, born at Modena. He possessed very great talents, but unfortunately his manners and conduct were licentious, and stopped the way of his preferment. He died of a foul disease contracted by his intemperate pleasures, 1544. His poems, both Latin and Italian possess merit, and are to be found the first in the Deliciæ Poetarum Italorum, and the latter in 2 vols. 8vo. 1750.

MOLSA, Targuina, grand-daughter of the preceding, was deservedly celebrated for her learning, her wit, her beauty, and her virtues. She was highly esteemed at the court of Alphonfus, duke of Ferrara, and honored with the appellation of singular, by the Roman senators, who bestowed on her and her family the rights of a citizen, Dec. 8th, 1600. Besides some elegant translations from Greek and Latin authors, she wrote some original pieces, and was equally admired for her superior knowledge of music. She was married, but had no children, and losing her husband she refused, though young, again to marry.

MOLYNEUX, William, an eminent mathematician, born 17th April, 1656, at Dublin, and educated at Trinity college there. He came to London, 1675, and entered at the Middle Temple, and after three years' residence there, he returned to Ireland. The bent of his genius led him to mathematics and astronomy. He was the correspondent of Flamsteed, and other learned men; and to his exertions Ireland was indebted for the establishment of her philosophical society, of which he became the first secretary, and sir William Petty the president 1683. In 1685, he was elected fellow of the Royal society of London, and then travelled to Flanders to improve himself in the knowledge of engineering, as he was surveyor of the works, and chief engineer of Ireland. In 1689 he fled from the political and religious disturbances which agitated Ireland, and settled at Chester, where he devoted himself to literature and science. He returned to Dublin in 1692, and was chosen member for the city; and in 1695, for the university. In 1698 he came to England to pay a visit to the great John Locke; but on his return to Ireland he was attacked by a severe fit of the stone, and during his agony broke a blood vessel of which he died 11th Oct. 1698. He wrote besides some papers in the philosophical transactions, a treatise on Dioptrics, published at Chester, 1692 — Sciotheticum Telescopicum, or a description of the telescope dial he had invented — the Case of Ireland stated as being not bound by acts of parliament in England, &c. Some of his letters to Locke were also published.

MOLYNEUX, Samuel, the only son of the above by Lucy, daughter of sir William Domville, was born at Chester, July, 1689, and lost his mother a few days after. His education was conducted after his father's death by his uncle Dr. Molyneux the physician, and he afterwards became secretary to George II. when prince of Wales. He devoted much of his time to the sciences and to astronomy, and brought to greater perfection the method of making telescopes, one of which he presented to John V. king of Portugal. When appointed one of the commissioners of the admiralty, public affairs superseded private studies, and he gave his papers to Dr. Smith, astronomy professor at Cambridge, by whom they were published in his "Complete Treatise of Optics."

MOLYNEUX, sir William, a gallant soldier in the service of Henry VIII. at the battle of Flodden field. On his death-bed he gave this advice to his son "let the underwood grow, the tenants are the support of a family, and the commonalty are the strength of a kingdom. Improve this fairly, but force not violently either your bounds or rents above your forefathers."

MOMBRIUS, Monimus, a writer of Milan, author of some verses, and of a scarce, but curious work, called the Lives of the Saints, printed 1479.

MONALDESCHI, Lewis, a native of Ovieta, who settled at Rome, where he died 1380, aged 54. He wrote Roman Annals from 1228, to 1340, in Italian.

MONALDESCHI, John, the equerry of Christina queen of Sweden, was cruelly put to death at Fontainebleau, 10th Oct. 1657, for writing an account of the intrigues and licentiousness of his mistress. The step was rash and vindictive, and Christina was justly blamed, and felt the displeasure of government for such violence in a country where she was but a guest.

MONAMY, Peter, a painter of sea pieces, born at Jersey. He learnt first of a sign painter on London bridge. He died at Westminster 1749. One of his pieces, finished 1726, is preserved in Painters' hall.

MONANTHEUIL, Henry de, professor of mathematics, and dean of physic in the university of Paris, 1577, translated Aristotle's Mechanics, with a Commentary.

MONARDES, Nicholas, a physician of Seville, whose works were greatly esteemed, especially his treatise on the Virtues of the American Drugs, which have been translated into English, Latin, and Italian. He died 1578.

MONBRON, N. Fongeret de, a native of Peronne, known for his virulence as an author. He travestied the Henriade of Voltaire, and wrote besides the Cosmopolite — Preservation against Anglomania — and some indelicate romances. He died little respected 1760.

MONCEAUX, Francis de, ambassador from Alexander Farnese, to Henry IV. was born at Arras. He is author of Bucolica Sacra, 8vo. 1589 — Aaron Purgatus, five de Aureo Vitulo, 8vo. — Templum Justitiæ, a poem — Lucubrationes in Cantica Canticæ — and the History of the Divine Apparitions to Moses.

MONCONYS, Balthasar de, a native of Lyons, who travelled into the East, and published in 3 vols. 4to. an account of his adventures. He died at Lyons 1665.

MONCRIE, Francis Augustin Paradis de, member of the French academy, was born at Paris, and died 1770, aged 83. He wrote an Essay on the Means of Pleasing — the Friendly Rivals, a romance — the Abderites, a comedy, besides poems and smaller pieces, collected, 4 vols, 12mo.

MONDONVILLE, John Joseph Cassanca de, a musician of eminence, born at Narbonne. Besides sonatas, symphonies, operas, he composed Magnus Dominus, the Jubilate, Dominus Regnavit, and other religious pieces, and died at Belleville, near Paris 1772, aged 57. He was an excellent and judicious player on the violin.

MONGAULT, Nicolas Hubert, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1674. He studied under the fathers of the oratory, and at Mans, and boldly opposed the philosophy of Aristotle by that of Descartes. In 1710, he was appointed by Orleans, regent of the kingdom, to be preceptor to his son, the duke de Chartres, and in consequence of his faithful services he received the abbey of Chartreuse, 1714, and that of Villeneuve, 1719. He published a valuable edition of Cicero's Letters to Atticus, 6 vols. 12mo. — and translated Herodian, and wrote two learned dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions. He was member of this society, and also of the French academy, and died 15th Aug. 1746, aged 72.

MONIN, John Edward du, a native of Gy, in Burgundy, author of some elegant poems, in French and Latin, flourished under Henry III. of France. He was assassinated 1586, aged 29.

MONK, George, duke of Albemarle, celebrated for restoring Charles II. to his throne, was born of an ancient family at Potteridge, Devonshire, 6th Dec. 1608. As he was a younger son he devoted himself to the profession of arms, and accompanied as a volunteer, sir Richard Grenville in his Spanish expedition, and the following year, 1626, he was made ensign in the expedition against the isle of Rhé. After some campaigns in Flanders, and great experience, he returned to England at the breaking out of the civil wars, and he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the king's expedition against the Scotch. In the Irish rebellion his services were so meritorious, that he was made governor of Dublin by the lords justices; but afterwards giving offence for making peace with the rebels, he fell under temporary disgrace, and then was appointed major-general, and entrusted with a command at the siege of Nantwich. Here he was surprized by Fairfax and sent a prisoner to Hull; but in 1646, he subscribed to the covenant, and was employed by the republicans in the Irish station. Though thus a friend to the parliament, it is to be observed that the king's power was now abolished, and that in serving his former enemies he had no other source of promotion or maintenance. He had, in 1648, the chief command of the army in the North of Ireland; but his treaty with the Irish rebel O'Neal, gave great offence to the parliament, yet Cromwell who knew his abilities reconciled him to his situation, and left him at the head of the army in Scotland, after the second Charles's invasion. In 1653, he was united with Blake and Dean in the command of the sea forces, and by courage and good conduct he obtained a victory over the Dutch fleet. Though suspected by Cromwell, he was invested still with the chief command of the North, and for five years recommended himself to the love of his army and the affection of the people by his affability, and conciliating manners. His popularity indeed gave uneasiness to the jealous protector, who is said in one of his letters to him to have added this postscript, "there be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart, I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him, and send him up to me." Monk, however, knew how to dissemble, and when Charles wrote to him, he sent the letter to the protector, and evinced his devotion to his service by promoting addresses from the army to him. After Cromwell's death he congratulated his successor; but when Richard dropped the reins from his hand, Monk conducted himself with deep and artful caution, and while he listened to some who wished him to seize upon the government, he seemed to pay little attention to those who recommended the establishment of a republic, or to those who sighed for the restoration of royalty. Apparently undecided he marched towards London, and being secure of the affection of his soldiers, and sensible of the general wishes of the nation, he called a free parliament, and ensured the restoration of the exiled monarch, with whom he had long secretly corresponded. Replaced on the throne of his ancestors without blood-shed, Charles showed his gratitude to the illustrious character who had so prudently effected it. Monk was loaded with pensions and honors; he became knight of the garter, privy counsellor, master of the horse, first lord of the treasury, and was created baron Monk, earl of Torrington, and duke of Albemarle, with a grant of 7000l. to him and his posterity. His elevation gave pleasure to the whole nation, and the commons in full body attended the new peer to the house of lords, where his modesty, and unaffected behaviour were the admiration of all. Deservedly popular, Monk was consulted and employed in every affair of importance. He was placed at the head of the admiralty, and afterwards with prince Rupert contributed much to the defeat of the Dutch fleet. During the plague the king who retired to Oxford, entrusted him with the care of London, and when the city was burnt in his absence in 1666, the people, fond of their favorite hero, exclaimed, that if he had been there the dreadful calamity would have been avoided. This great man was attacked by a dropsy which proved fatal, 3d Jan. 1669-70, in his 62d year, and his remains were honored by the most magnificent pomp, and after lying in state at Somerset house, were deposited in the royal vault of the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster. Monk who displayed so much moderation, and refused to step to a throne which was within his reach, was fully entitled to all the honors paid to him. In his private character he was amiable, and he possessed also some learning as is proved by his book "Observations on Military and Political Affairs," &c. published after his death, in fol. 1671, and a collection of letters which appeared in 1715. He married the daughter of a blacksmith who had been a milliner and his mistress, but who ensured his affection and his gratitude by her attendance upon him when confined by the parliament in the tower. She was a woman of great intrigue, and of so violent a temper that the general who never dreaded a cannon shot, trembled at the sound of her voice. He had by her a son, Christopher, duke of Albemarle, who died governor of Jamaica, 1668, when the family became extinct.

MONK, Nicholas, brother to the great Monk, was educated at Wadham college, and made rector of Kilkhampton, Cornwall. As he assisted his brother in the restoration of the king, his services were rewarded by Charles with the provostship of Eton, and the bishopric of Hereford. He died 1661.

MONK, the Hon. Mrs. daughter of lord Moleworth, and wife of George Monk, was well acquainted with the Latin, Spanish, and Italian languages, and wrote poetry with elegance and spirit. She died about 1715, and her poems under the title of "Miranda, Poems and translations on several occasions," 8vo. appeared 1716, dedicated by her father to queen Caroline.

MONMOUTH, James duke of, natural son of Charles II. was born at Rotterdam 1649, and educated among the Roman catholics. On his restoration Charles showed him various marks of kindness, and created him earl of Orkney, knight of the garter, and afterwards duke of Monmouth. He had the care of an expedition in Scotland, and afterwards served in an English regiment in France, and obtained the rank of general. In 1679, he defeated some of the Scotch rebels; but afterwards forgetting his duty he entered into a conspiracy to dethrone his father. This ingratitude was forgiven by Charles, but Monmouth still intent on schemes of ambition retired into Holland, and as soon as he heard that James II. had ascended the throne, he determined to invade the kingdom, and he landed in Dorsetshire. He had the rashness with few followers to attack the king's forces, and he was defeated at Sedgemoor, in Somersetshire, and taken afterwards in disguise in a field, with some peas in his pocket for his sustenance. He made the most humiliating petitions to James; but his death was determined upon, and he came out of the tower to ascend the scaffold. He was beheaded 25th July, 1685, and in his last moments showed resignation and fortitude.

MONNIER, Peter le, professor of philosophy, in the Harcourt college, at Paris, was author of Curfus Philosophicus, 6 vols. 12mo. and died at Paris 1757, aged 82. His son Charles was also a man of science. He was professor of philosophy in the Royal college, member of the academy of sciences, and was one of those sent by the government in 1736, to measure a degree of the meridian near the pole. He died 1799.

MONNOYE, Bernard de la, a learned Frenchman, born at Dijon, 15th June, 1641. He obtained in 1671, the first prize of poetry, offered by the French academy, on the suppressing of duelling, and again gained the same honors 1675, and in 1677. Besides his poetry in French, and also in Greek, Latin, and Italian, in all of which he evinced the greatest elegance united with sweetness and simplicity, he wrote various other prose compositions. His Remarks on the Menagiana — his Dissertation on the Book de Tribus Impostoribus — his Dissertation on Pomponius Lætus, are well known, and to his extensive information and assiduity, Bayle was indebted for several curious particulars in his dictionary. He left in MS. some dissertations, epigrams, a collection of letters, and other things. His poems were edited at the Hague by Sallengre, with an eulogium. He died at Paris 15th Oct. 1728, aged 87.

MONNOYER, John Baptist, a painter, born at Lille, and educated at Antwerp. He was admitted into the academy at Paris with great applause, and afterwards came to England, where he was much flattered and approved. Several of his pieces are preserved in the collections of lord Carlisle, the duke of St. Alban's and others. He died in Pall-Mall 1669.

MONRO, Alexander, an eminent physician, born in Scotland 1697. He studied at Paris and Leyden, and was the intimate friend of Boerhaave. In 1719, he returned to Edinburgh, and began those lectures in anatomy and on surgical subjects which have rendered his fame so celebrated as a man of science, and a skilful inquirer after truth. He died 1767. His works are Osteology — Anatomy of the Nerves — Medical Essays and Observations — Success of Inoculation in Scotland, most of which have been republished in one vol. 4to. 1781, by his son, who was also successor in the professorial chair.

MONRO, John, an able physician of Scotch extraction. He was born 16th Nov. 1715, at Greenwich in Kent, and educated at Merchant Taylors', and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was, by the interest which his father possessed with sir Robert Walpole, elected in 1743, to one of Dr. Radcliffe's travelling fellowships, and in consequence of the appointment went abroad and studied under the famous Boerhaave at Leyden. After visiting France, Germany, and Holland, he returned to England, and in 1751, was elected joint physician with his father, to Bridewell and Bethlem hospitals. In this office he devoted the whole of his attention to cases of insanity, and in 1758, he published Remarks on Dr. Battie's treatise on Madness, in which, in bold and elegant language he retorted the censures thrown on his predecessors by his adversary, and at the same time paid an honorable and well merited compliment to the memory of his father. He had by his wife six children. The death of his eldest son, and soon after of his daughter ter Charlotte, had a powerful influence on his spirits, and brought on a paralytic stroke in Jan. 1783, in consequence of which he gradually withdrew himself from the labors of public business, and retired to the village of Hadley, near Barnet, where he died 27th Dec. 1791, aged 77. Though he published only the work already mentioned, he possessed very extensive information and great abilities, and from his knowledge of the early history of engraving Mr. Strutt derived much assistance in his history of engravers.

MONRO, Alexander, D. D. a learned divine, born in Rosshire, 1648, and educated at King's college, Aberdeen, where he became professor of philosophy. In 1686, he was made principal of the university of Edinburgh, but unwilling to comply with the revolution he was expelled and became an episcopal preacher. He wrote an Inquiry into the New Opinions, in which he attacked the Presbyterians, with such severity that he was obliged to fly from their resentment. He returned afterwards to Edinburgh, where he died 1713, aged 65.

MONSEY, Messenger, an eminent physician of extensive practice, and in his character very singular and eccentric. He was for many years physician at Chelsea hospital, and died 1788, aged 96, ordering, as he disapproved of interment in churches, that his body should be anatomized, and the skeleton hung up in Chelsea hospital for the benefit of the students.

MONSIGNORI, Francis, a native of Verona, eminent as a portrait and historical painter. He was the disciple of Andrew Mantegna, and died 1519, aged 64.

MONSON, sir William, a brave admiral, born at South Carlton, Lincolnshire, 1569. He was for two years at Baliol college, Oxford; but the love of adventure, and the participation of danger were more congenial to his feelings, and therefore unknown to his friends he enlisted for a common soldier. He was afterwards in the sea service, and engaged in the expeditions of the duke of Cumberland against the Azores, and at the taking of Fayal. His bravery and undaunted spirit in the various expeditions in which he was employed strongly recommended him to the notice and favor of queen Elizabeth, by whom he was knighted. Under James I. he was appointed admiral of the narrow seas, and distinguished himself against the Dutch, and the French. His services, however, were disregarded, and through the jealousy of the courtiers he was, in 1616, imprisoned in the tower, but soon after discharged. He was consulted afterwards by the ministry on naval subjects, and he opposed as impracticable and improper the expeditions against Algiers, 1617, and against Cadiz, 1625, and Rhe, in 1628. In 1635, he was successfully employed against the French and the Dutch, and then retired to privacy. He died at his seat, Kinnerley, in Surrey, Feb. 1642-3, aged 73. He published "Naval Tracts," a valuable performance, printed 1682, folio.

MONT, Deodate de, a native of St. Fron, celebrated as a painter. He travelled into Italy with his master Rubens, and acquired eminence by copying the beauties of this great painter. He died 1634, aged 53.

MONTAGUE, Richard, an English prelate, born 1577, at Dorney, Buckinghamshire, where his father was minister. From Eton, he went to King's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and afterwards he was made chaplain to James I. and in 1616, installed dean of Hereford. He possessed other ecclesiastical preferment besides, and in 1621, he distinguished himself by his Diatribe on the first part of Selden's History of Tythes, which so pleased the king that he engaged him to write his Analecta Ecclesiastica. Exercitationum, which appeared 1622. In 1624, he attacked some popish and jesuit missionaries who attempted to gain over his flock at Stanford Rivers, Essex, and in consequence of the controversy which took place, his enemies selected some passages from his writings, which they threatened they would submit to the parliament as heretical and inclined to popery and Arminianism. With the king's approbation he withstood their attacks, and published his Appello Cæsarem, 1625, which as being more objectionable brought him before the first house of commons of Charles I. where he was censured by the Speaker, and obliged to give a security of 2000l. for his appearance. Though prosecuted by the commons, he, however, found a patron in the king, and he was in 1628, promoted to the see of Chichester, and 10 years after translated to Norwich, where he died 1641. He wrote besides Verfio et Notæ in Photii Epistolas, and assisted Savile in his edition of St. Chrysostom's works. He was an excellent scholar, and Selous himself his great antagonist owns him to have been a man well skilled in ancient learning.

MONTAGUE, Charles, earl of Halifax, was born at Horton, Northamptonshire, 16th April, 1661, and from Westminster school, he went in 1682, to Trinity college, Cambridge. His poem on the death of Charles II. in 1684, recommended him to the notice of the earl of Dorset, and of the learned wits of the time, and the assistance which he gave to Prior in the composition of the country and city mouse, 1687, to ridicule Dryden's Hind and Panther, contributed still more to his celebrity. On James I.'s abdication of the throne, he was appointed one of the members of the convention, and on William's arrival he was presented to him by lord Dorset, and received a pension of 500l. In 1691, he began to display his oratorical powers in the house of commons, and was made that same year, one of the lords of the treasury, and three years after chancellor of the exchequer. In 1695, he began the recoinage of the current money of the kingdom, and completed it through all difficulties; and in 1696, he projected the scheme of a general fund, which has proved so essential to modern financiers under the name of the sinking fund. In 1698, he was appointed first commissioner of the treasury, the next year auditor of the exchequer, and in 1700, raised to the peerage by the title of baron Halifax. Though attacked by the commons in 1701, as guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, the accusation was disproved, and he gained in a stronger degree the confidence and protection of the monarch. His zeal in the cause of the Hanoverian succession procured him the favor of George I. on whose accession he was created earl of Halifax, and made knight of the garter, and first lord of the treasury. He did not long enjoy his honors, as he died suddenly, after an illness of four days, May, 19, 1715. Halifax owed his elevation and his honors to his merits. As a man of learning he was highly respectable, and the patronage which he extended to Addison, to Steele, Pope, Swift, and the other wits of the age, will extend his fame to the latest posterity. His poems, speeches, &c. and memoirs of his life have been collected among the works of English poets.

MONTAGUE, Edward, earl of Sandwich, an illustrious character, who though he fought against Charles I. and advised Cromwell to assume the crown, was zealous for the restoration of the royal family. Distinguished as a general and as a statesman, he was equally so as an admiral, and in the Dutch war, which Charles II. undertook by his advice he behaved with astonishing valor in the battle of Southwold bay. After extricating his fleet, however, from the most imminent danger, his ships caught fire from one of the fire ships of the enemy, and in the general confusion he leaped over board and was drowned, 1672. He had been created an earl by Charles II. He was distinguished also as a writer, and gave to the world Letters to Secretary Thurloe — Letters during his Embassy in Spain — the Art of Metals, &c. translated from the Spanish, a book of merit — original letters, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.

MONTAGUE, lady Mary Wortley, eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, earl, and afterwards duke of Kingston, was born at Thoresby, in Nottinghamshire 1690. She received a very learned education, and was instructed with her brother lord Newark in the knowledge of the Greek and Latin classics. She married in 1712, Edward Wortley Montague, a gentleman of great political knowledge and influence, and distinguished not only as an eloquent and upright member of parliament, but as the friend of Addison, and in 1716, she accompanied him in his embassy to Constantinople. In this distant region she examined with accuracy the manners and habits of the natives, and communicated by letter her judicious observations to her friends in England. To her sense and discernment Europe is indebted for the happy introduction of the small pox; but it is to be remarked that before she recommended it she made the first experiment upon her own son, and its success proved the means of disseminating the blessings and the continuation of life to thousands. In 1718, she returned to England and settled at Twickenham, where she formed a strong intimacy with Pope. This proved, however, of short duration, the poet was irascible, and he soon vented the severity of his satires against his fair friend, and when charged with the scurrility of his writings he had the meanness to deny them. In 1739, lady Mary went to settle at Brescia near Venice for the benefit of her health, where she continued till 1761, when she returned to England to see her daughter who had married lord Bute. She died the following year. The letters of lady Montague appeared before the public in a surreptitious edition, in 1763, in 4 vols. 12mo. under the care of the infamous Cleland, and were read with such avidity that they were translated into several languages. They have made their appearance in a more correct and perfect form under the approbation of her grandson lord Bute, in 5 vols. 8vo. 1803. These letters exhibit her powers in a very pleasing view. The many adventures which attended her in her travels are presented in interesting description, and prove that with a warm and romantic imagination she possessed great talents, and inexhaustible powers of language. Many passages, however, it must be acknowledged, especially in her poetry, cannot be read without a blush by a person of delicacy, and it is to be lamented as much, that such offensive pages should be presented to the public eye, as that they should issue from the pen of a lady of respectable character, of elegant taste and solid judgment.

MONTAGUE, Edward Wortley, son of the above, born at Warnccliffe lodge, Yorkshire, was remarkable for his eccentricities. He ran away from Westminster school, to become a chimney sweeper, and when restored by accident to his parents he again left them to join himself to a fisherman, after which he embarked as a cabin boy for Spain, and hired himself there as a servant to a muleteer. Here again he was discovered and prevailed upon to return to his friends, who placed him under the care of a tutor, and with him he visited the West Indies, and other foreign countries. On his return he was elected member of parliament, and conducted himself with all the propriety becoming his birth and fortune; but soon his fondness for novelty gained its usual ascendancy and he embarked for the East. At Constantinople he adopted the dress and the manners of the Turks; he kept a numerous seraglio of wives, he sat cross-legged, he wore a long beard, and behaved with all the pomp of oriental consequence. In early life he had married a woman of mean birth, with whom, however, he had never cohabited, and hearing, while at Constantinople, of her death, he determined by a most extraordinary plan, to alienate his fortune from his relations, against whom he had a particular dislike. He caused, therefore, to be inserted in the English newspapers, an advertisement for a young woman as a wife, who was already advanced in her pregnancy, and a proper person was accordingly provided; but before the romantic hero could return thus to impose on the world his false heir, death arrested his purposes. He died in Italy 1776, aged about 62. He was author of an Examination into the Causes of Earthquakes — and of Observations on the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire — Account of the Mountains of Arabia, which possess some merit, besides some interesting papers inserted in the philosophical transactions.

MONTAGUE, Elizabeth, daughter of Matthew Robinson of Horton, Kent, was a lady of great accomplishments, which were much improved under the tuition of Dr. Conyers Middleton. About 1742, she married Edward Montague, of Allertorpe, Yorkshire, son of Charles, the fifth son of the first earl of Sandwich, and by him she had only one son who died in his infancy. She soon became a widow with an ample fortune, and numerous connections, and respected by the great, the learned, and the gay. She showed now greater attachment to literature than to the amusements of the fashionable world, and she formed among her friends a literary club, which received the singular appellation of the blue stocking club, because one of the members, a gentleman, generally wore stockings of of that color. Her abilities, and correct taste were evinced in her essay on the writings and genius of Shakespear, 1769, a valuable work which acquired deserved celebrity. She was much courted by lord Lyttelton, whom it is said she assisted in the composition of his dialogues of the dead. This very respectable lady died in 1800, much lamented by the tribe of chimney sweepers in the metropolis, to whom she had for many years, with great humanity, and with some show of ostentatious vanity, given a splendid entertainment yearly on May-day.

MONTAIGNE, Michael de, a celebrated French writer, born of an ancient family at Perigord, 1533. He was educated under his father, and instructed to speak Latin first as his mother tongue, and afterwards he studied at the college of Guyenne. He was intended for the law, but disregarding the drudgeries of the profession, he travelled for the improvement of his understanding by observations on men and manners. While at Rome he was honored with the title and privileges of citizen, and in 1581, he was chosen in his absence mayor of Bourdeaux in the room of marshal Biron. He was at the meeting of the states of Blois, 1588, where his conduct merited the approbation of his countrymen, and the notice of Charles IX. who there invested him with the order of St. Michael. He died 1592, at his seat of Montaigne near Bourdeaux, where he had retired to the enjoyment of learned ease and philosophical society, and his last moments evinced the character of a good and faithful catholic. His essays have been repeatedly published. The best edition is that of Peter Coste, with notes, 1725, or 1739, 3 vols. 4to. They are amusing, and convey much instruction to the heart, though it must be observed that often they abound with scepticism and obscurity. Cardinal du Perron called them the breviary of honest men, and lord Halifax to whom they were dedicated by Charles Cotton the translator, declares them to be the book in the world with which he was best entertained. His travels were printed, 3 vols. 12mo. 1772.

MONTALBANI, Ovid, professor of medicine and astronomy at Bologna, died 1672, aged 70. He was author of Index Plantarum, 4to. — Bibliotheca Botanica, 4to. — Arboretum Libri duo, folio — Epistola de Rebus in Bononiensi Tractu Indigenis, &c.

MONTALEMBERT, Mark René, a French general, born at Angoulême, of a respectable family. He served with great credit in the French, Russian, and Swedish armies, and distinguished himself as a man of learning, and as member of the academy of sciences. He was author of Perpendicular Fortification, or the Defensive superior to the Offensive Art, by a new Method of employing Artillery, 11 vols. 4to. 1776 — Correspondence with Generals, &c. 3 vols. — comedies and poems. He divorced his wife in 1794, at the age of 80, and took another, by whom he had a daughter. He died 1799, aged 85.

MONTAMY, Didier Francis d'Arclais, lord de, a native of Montamy in Normandy, knight of the order of St. Lazarus, employed in the service of the duke of Orleans. Besides a treatise on Colors for Painting on Enamel and on Porcelaine, 12mo. — he translated from the German of Pott, Lithogeognosie, 2 vols. 12mo. and died 1765.

MONTANUS, founder of a new heresy in the second century, was born at Or, near Ardabas in Phrygia. He pretended to be immediately inspired with the Holy Ghost, and was assisted in his prophetic labors by two rich women, Priscilla and Maximilla, who were likewise inspired, but whose gold, says Jerome, succeeded better to gain converts than their working of miracles. He denied the Trinity, and included all the three persons into one indivisible; he regarded second marriages as fornication, and established his authority among his deluded followers by declaring himself sent, like Moses and Jesus, to propagate new doctrines, and to lead the world to salvation. The imposture for a while prevailed, and even Tertullian himself was for a time supporter of the doctrines of the Montanists. It is said that at last Montanus hanged himself, and his coadjutres Maximilla, followed his example.

MONTANUS, Benedict Arias, a learned Spaniard, born at Frexenal de la Sierra, near Badajos, 1528. After acquiring a perfect knowledge of ancient and eastern languages, he travelled through France, Germany, England, and the Low Countries, to learn the living tongues, and at his return to Spain, was so admired, that Philip II. employed his abilities in the publication of a new Polyglott bible, after the Complutensian edition. This he completed with great labor and success, and it was printed at Antwerp, 1571. The work was attacked by various critics, but the Spanish king was sensible of the merits of the author, and offered him a bishopric, which he refused, preferring the peace of solitude and retirement to dignities. He died at Seville about 1600. He wrote besides, critical tracts, and Commentaries on the Scriptures.

MONTANUS, John Baptist, an eminent physician, born at Verona, 1488. He studied the law at Padua; but though it offended his father, he preferred physic, in which he soon acquired reputation and opulence. He retired to Padua, where he obtained a professor's chair, and though solicited by the emperor, by the king of France, and by the duke of Tuscany, he refused to quit this peaceful abode. He died 1551. He wrote Medicina Univerſa — Opuscula Varia Medica — de Gradibus & Facultatibus Medicamentorum — Lectiones in Galenum & Avicennam.

MONTARANI, Geminiano, a native of Modena, mathematical professor at Bologna, author of a Dissertation on Comets — on the fixed Stars — on Astronomical Observations, &c. died at the end of the 17th century.

MONTARRAGO, or MASCARENHAS, Freyre de, a learned Portuguese, born at Lisbon 1670. He wrote, a Natural, Astrological, and Political History of the World — an Account of Oudenarde and Peterwardin — Narrative of the Death of Lewis XIV. — and other works, and died 1730.

MONTAULT, Philip de, duke of Noailles, renounced the protestant faith by the persuasion of Richelieu, and rose to high rank in the army. He was in 1669 sent to the relief of Candia, but failed in his attempt, though he retired covered with glory. He died at Paris, much respected, 5th Feb. 1684, aged 65. His Memoirs appeared in 1701, but are little interesting.

MONTAUSIER, Charles de Sainte Maure, duke de, peer of France, knight of the various orders of the monarchy, and governor of the dauphin, was born of an ancient family of Touraine. During the civil wars of the Fronde, he maintained order in his governments of Saintonge and Angoumois, and when appointed over Normandy, he no sooner heard that the plague infested the country, than he hastened to the relief of the people. His family expostulated, but he replied, that governors were obliged to reside as well as bishops; and if not on all occasions, yet in the time of public calamity. In his conduct towards the dauphin, he behaved like a man of probity, virtue, and integrity, and without flattering his vices, he wished to lead him to the paths of duty and honor. To inspire him with a due sense of the attentions which sovereigns owe to the meanest of their subjects, he one day took the prince to a cottage, where he addressed him in these words: "behold lodged in this wretched habitation, the father, the mother, and the whole family, who labor incessantly to provide gold, that your palaces may be adorned, and who almost perish with hunger, that your table may be spread with the most exquisite dainties." When his attendance on the prince was completed, he told him, "if you are a man of probity and honor, you will love me, but if you are not, you will hate me, and I shall comfort myself through the disappointment." This virtuous character died 17th May 1690, aged 80. By his wife, Julia Lucy d'Angennes, of the house of Rambouillet, a woman of great merit and virtue, who died 1671, aged 64, he had only one daughter, who married the duke of Uzes.

MONTBEILLARD, Philibert Gueneau de, an eminent naturalist, born at Namur, 1720. He assisted Buffon in his great work, and wrote the History of Birds, and began that of insects, but died before its completion, 1785. He was author of Collection Academique, containing interesting extracts from the various learned societies of Europe.

MONTCALM, Lewis Joseph de St. Veran, marquis de, a native of Candiac, descended from a noble family. He was brought up to the military service, and in various engagements distinguished himself by his valor, particularly at the battle of Placenza in 1746. He rose by degrees to the rank of field marshal, and in 1756 he was selected to preside over the province of Canada. In this distant province he ably opposed the English general lord Loudun, and defeated his successor Abercrombie; but the attack of Wolfe proved fatal. The English general, determined on the conquest of Quebec, fell in the attempt, and died in the arms of victory; and Montcalm, who had opposed most valiantly this illustrious chief, also shared his fate, 1759.

MONTCHRESTIENDE VATEVILLE, Anthony, a French poet, known for his contentious disposition, and his various adventures. He was for some time in England, in consequence of his being accused of murder; but as the accusation seemed false, he was permitted to return home. He was afterwards suspected of coining; and at last, engaging in the civil wars which distracted France, he was killed near Falaife, by a party of his enemies, who attempted to arrest him, after a most determined defence. The tribunal of Domfront ordered that his body should be torn to pieces and burnt, which was done, 21st Oct. 1621. He wrote some tragedies — besides a pastoral — Sufan, a poem, &c.

MONTECUCULI, count Sebastian, an Italian, made cup-bearer to the son of Francis I. of France, whom he is said to have poisoned at Valence. When accused of this horrid crime, and tortured, 1536, he confessed that he had done it at the instigation of the partizans of Charles V. but the bloody deed originated in the criminal breast of Catherine de Medicis, the wife of Henry II. who was brother to the murdered prince.

MONTECUCULI, Raynard de, an able general, born at Modena, 1608. His uncle Ernest made him pass through all the gradations of military life, and enlisted him first as a common soldier. He first distinguished himself against the Swiss, 10,000 of whom he defeated with 2000 men, though he was afterwards taken prisoner by general Bannier. Restored to liberty, after two years of confinement, he gained fresh laurels against the Swedes, and at the peace of Westphalia, began to travel. In 1657 the emperor sent him as field marshal to the assistance of John Casimir, king of Poland, against the Swedes and the Turks, and in this campaign he gained several victories. In 1673 he was employed against Turenne, who fell in the battle, and afterwards against Condé, and in this arduous contest maintained unshaken the glory which he had acquired. He died at Lintz 1680. His Memoirs were published at Strasburg, 1735.

MONTE MAYER, George de, a Castilian poet, in the reign of Philip II. of Spain. His poems, called Cancionero, appeared 2 vols. 12mo. 1554. He wrote also, Diana, a novel, and died 1560.

MONTENAULT, Charles Philip, a French writer, born at Paris. His History of the Kings of the two Sicilies, of the House of France, in 4 vols. 12mo. has been much admired. He wrote also in the journal de Verdun, and translated into prose Quillet's poem, called Callipædia. He died 1749.

MONTESPAN, Athenais Mortimar, madame de, was wife of marquis de Montespan, and is known as the mistress of Lewis XIV. Her husband ventured indignantly to resist the intrigue, but banishment from the capital, and the fear of despotic power, soon reconciled him to his disgrace, and 100,000 crowns purchased his wife, his silence, and his virtue. From 1669 to 1675, this guilty woman exercised uncontrolled authority, by her wit and by her beauty, over the captivated monarch, and the people of France; till satiety, and the love of madame de Maintenon, alienated the king's regard. She, however, for some time continued at court, treated with respect, but robbed of her personal influence, and she divided her time, which passed on heavily upon her mind, in acts of devotion, and in the drawing up memoirs of whatever passed at court. She had by the king a son, created duke de Maine, and two daughters, one married to the grandson of the great Condé, and the other to the duke de Chartres. The last years of her life were spent away from the court, on a pension of 1000 louis d'or a-month. She died at Bourbon, 1717. She was rather ashamed of her faults, says her biographer, than penitent for them; half of her life was spent in grandeur, and the rest in contempt. Her reign was so intolerable and fatal, that the French regarded it as a judgment from heaven.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles de Secondat, baron of Brede and of, a celebrated writer, of a noble family, was born at Brede, near Bourdeaux, 18th Jan. 1689. He devoted himself to literature from his earliest years, and first displayed the strong powers of his mind in the publication of his Persian Letters, 1721, in which he ridiculed the follies and the vices of the French nation with spirit and success. In 1722 he made some eloquent and convincing remonstrances against a tax which was going to be imposed upon the people, and his appeal proved so effectual, that the tax was suppressed. He was in 1728 admitted member of the French academy, after the opposition of cardinal Fleury, who was displeased with the language of his Persian Letters, against religion and government, had been removed by the influence of marshal d'Estrées. Deeply engaged in the completion of his great work, the Spirit of Laws, he visited various countries for information, and after passing through Germany, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, and Holland, he fixed his residence for two years in England. In this country he was honored with the attention not only of the learned, but of the great, and of the queen herself; and he wisely observed, that England was the country where to think, and France where to live. On his return home, he finished his work, on the Cause of the Grandeur and Decline of the Romans, and in 1748 appeared his Spirit of Laws, 2 vols. 4to. This work, which better deserves the name of the Spirit of Nations, acknowledges three sorts of government, the republican, the monarchical, and the despotic; and in examining these divisions, the author displays astonishing depth of thought, vigor of imagination, and solidity of judgment, and deserves the honorable appellation of the Legislator of the Human Race. He did not, however, escape the censure of the malevolent; and while foreign nations admired this very philosophical performance, some of the French critics pretended to discover strong blemishes in the composition. He succeeded his uncle as president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, and, with all the resignation of a true christian, died at Paris, 10th Feb. 1755, aged 66, universally lamented, by the court, as well as by the people. His Letters were published in 1767, 12mo. but his works have appeared together in 3 vols. 4to. His son died 1796. Vid. SECONDAT.

MONTEZUMA, emperor of Mexico, displayed great firmness and powers of mind in opposing the Spaniards, whom an ignorant people regarded as more than mortals. He was at last seized by Cortes, in a pretended sedition, and ignominiously loaded with chains, and obliged to acknowledge himself the vassal of Spain. The Mexicans resented the indignities offered to their king, and Cortes, apprehensive of a fatal insurrection, made his royal prisoner appear before his irritated subjects on the top of a house, and arrayed in his robes, attempt to repress their violence. His fight for a moment checked the popular fury; but the monarch, wounded by two arrows, and by the blow of a stone, fell to the ground, and soon after, refusing all aliment, and rejecting every invitation of becoming a christian convert, expired, to the great regret of the Spaniards, and of his subjects, 1520. He left two sons and three daughters, who became christians. The eldest son was enriched, and made by Charles V. a count of Spain, where his posterity still live in splendor. He died 1608.

MONTFAUCON, Bernard de, a learned Benedictine, of the congregation of St. Maur, was born 17th Jan. 1655, at Roquetaillade, in the diocese of Alet. He first became a soldier, but the death of his parents affected him so powerfully, that he renounced the world, and commenced Benedictine monk 1675. He now devoted himself to literature with astonishing labor, and in 1698 travelled to Italy, to consult libraries and learned men. He was received with respect wherever he went, and treated with kindness by the Roman cardinals, and by Innocent XII. In 1701 he returned to Paris, and published an account of his journey, called Diarium Italicum, 4to. The rest of his life was dedicated to literature, for which he was so well qualified by his extensive erudition, and his great knowledge of history and antiquity. He died at the abbey of St. Germain, 21st Dec. 1741, aged 87. His works are, Græca Analecta, 4to. — St. Athanasius' works, Greek and Latin, with Notes, 3 vols. folio — a Collection of Ancient Greek Fathers, 2 vols. folio — Palæographia Græca, folio — Remains of Origen's Hexapla, 2 vols. folio — Chrysostom's works, Greek and Latin, with Notes, 13 vols. folio — Monumens de la Monarchie Française, 5 vols. folio — Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, &c. 2 vols. folio — Dissertation on Judith — and Antiquity Explained, a most valuable work in French and Latin, illustrated with figures engraved on copper, 10 vols. folio, with a supplement of 5 vols. more.

MONTFLEURY, Zachary Jacob, a native of Anjou, who was page to the duke of Guise. He afterwards, under the name of Montfleury, joined a strolling company in Burgundy, and was one of the first players engaged in the Cid. He also wrote the death of Al-dubal, a tragedy, and became the instructor of Baron, who outshone him as a theatrical hero. He died Dec. 1667. His son Anthony Jacob, was born at Paris, and left the profession of the law, against his father's inclination, for the stage. He wrote several comedies, which possess little merit, and which have been collected in 4 vols. 12mo. 1775. He died 1685, aged 45.

MONTFORT, Simon count de, a great French general, whose cruelty, however, in his crusades against the Albigenes, 1209, deeply tarnished his character. In 1213, he defeated Peter king of Arragon, and was killed in 1218, at the siege of Toulouse, by a woman who who threw a stone upon his head from the ramparts. His younger brother was the earl of Leicester, so celebrated in English history.

MONTGAILLARD, Bernard de, a mendicant friar, born 1553. He was called the petit feuillant of the league, and acquired so much celebrity as a preacher, that the scripture expression of "happy is the womb that bare thee," was applied to him. He prostituted his powerful eloquence to the meanest and most bloody purposes of the league, and even excited de Rougemont to become the assassin of Henry IV. He was abbé of Orval, a rich appointment, and died of a drop-sy, 1628.

MONTGERON, Lewis Basille Carre de, a Parisian, who pretended to be converted from infidelity to christianity, at the tomb of the deacon Paris, an account of which he presented to the king. He was sent to the Bastille for the wildness of his conduct, and the fanaticism of his writings, and died in the citadel of Valence, 1754, aged 67.

MONTGOLFIER, James Stephen, a native of Annonai in France, eminent as an ingenious paper manufacturer, and as the first who made vellum paper, so much admired for its beauty and smoothness. A higher degree of celebrity still awaited him: in 1783, as he was boiling water in a coffee-pot, the top of which was covered with paper, folded in a spherical form, he observed that the paper gradually swelled, and rose up in the air, and from this simple incident, reflection and experiment proved to him, that a light machine, filled with gas, not so heavy as atmospheric air, might float in the upper regions. The experiment was exhibited to the eyes of astonished Europe, and by this extraordinary invention, the bold aeronaut presumed to commit himself to the air, and claim as his own the regions which seemed assigned only to the feathered race. For this singular service to science, Montgolfier was made member of the academy of sciences, created knight of the order of St. Michael, and rewarded with a pension from the king of 2000 livres. He died in the autumn of 1799. His elegy was pronounced by Boissy d'Anglas, at Paris, and by Duret, at Annonai.

MONTGOMERY, Gabriel de, count of, a French nobleman of Scotch origin. In a tournament given by Henry II. of France, in honor of his daughter Elizabeth's marriage with the king of Spain, the young knight unwillingly entered the lists against the monarch, and had the misfortune to wound him so severely in the eye, that he died 11 days after. After this melancholy event, Montgomery retired to his estate in Normandy, and then travelled into Italy, till the civil wars recalled him home to support the cause of the protestants, and to defend Rouen. When at last the city surrendered after a brave defence, he escaped to Havre, and in 1569 he flew to the assistance of Bearn, which was attacked by the catholic army under Terrides. Here he was victorious, and pursued his flying enemy, whom he besieged in Orthez, a place which he took by assault. This gallant chief was at Paris during the general massacre, and he escaped by the swiftness of his horse. From France he passed to Jersey with his family, and then took refuge in England, from which he failed the following year to the relief of Rochelle, but without success. In 1573 he again went to France, and joined at St. Lo, the protestant nobles of Normandy. Here he was suddenly besieged by Matignon, the commander of Normandy, but he escaped to Domfront, where he was quickly pursued by his enemy, and obliged to surrender. This valiant nobleman was then conducted to Paris, and there beheaded, 26th June 1574, by order of Catherine de Medicis.

MONTGON, Charles Alexander, a French ecclesiastic, born at Versailles, 1690. He was spy to the duke of Bourbon, near the person of Philip V. of Spain, to whom he was confessor; and when slighted by Fleury, his successor, he published "Memoirs," 8 vols. 8vo. in which he reflected with great severity upon the minister's conduct. He died 1770.

MONTI, Joseph, professor of botany at Bologna, was author of a Catalogue of Plants, 4to. — Plantarum Varii Indices, 4to. — Exoticorum Simplicium Indices, 4to. &c. He died about 1750. His son Cajetan, translated into Latin the Italian History of Plants by Zannoni, 1742, folio.

MONTICELLI, Andrew, a native of Bologna, admired as a painter. His flowers, fruits, vases, carpets, &c. were painted in a very pleasing style. He died 1716, aged 75. Another painter of that name, was eminent for his landscapes and battle pieces.

MONTIGNI, Stephen Mignol de, a native of Paris, member of the academy of sciences, and eminent as a mechanic. The memoirs of the academy contain various ingenious communications from him on mechanics, on mathematics, &c. He introduced into France the manufacture of some stuffs from England, and he improved also the method of printing cottons, of making carpets, and of dying thread and stuffs. He died 6th May 1782, aged 68.

MONTJOSIEU, Lewis de, author of "Gallus Romæ Hospes," in 4to. a curious book, which treated of the sculpture and paintings of the ancients, reprinted with Vitruvius, at Amsterdam, 1649, was born at Rouergne, and was the attendant of the duke of Joyeuse, in his travels to Rome, 1583.

MONTLUC, Blaise de, a brave Frenchman, born 1500, in a village near Condour, of a noble family. He first served in the army in Italy, and gradually rose to the rank of marshal of France. He was at the battle of Pavia, 1525, where he was taken prisoner, and afterwards in the expedition to Naples, and he assisted in the brave defence of Marseilles against the attacks of Charles V. He next distinguished himself in Piedmont, and retook Boulogne from the English in 1547, and in 1551 raised the siege of Berne, which was attacked by the Spaniards. He was in 1554 entrusted by Henry II. of France, with the defence of Sienna in Tuscany, which had driven out the Imperial garrison, and implored the assistance of the French; and so determined was his opposition, that for eight months he withstood undaunted the judicious and well-directed attacks of Marignan, and surrendered at last on honorable terms, only after his troops had been obliged to feed upon the flesh of their cats and dogs. Tuscany, Piedmont, and Thionville afterwards witnessed his valor; and during the religious wars which desolated Guienne, he maintained his usual character, and was rewarded with the place of king's lieutenant over the country, for the signal victory which he obtained at Ver in 1562, over the Calvinists. He was wounded in the cheeks at the siege of Rabastens, and so disfigured, that he always afterwards wore a mask to hide his deformity. His meritorious services were rewarded with the rank of marshal in 1574. He died three years after, aged 77, at his seat d'Estillac, in Agenois. He was author of a Memoir of his own Life, written when he was 75, and it was published at Bourdeaux, 1592, in fol. and has often been reprinted. Though brave in the field, and so successful, that he never was defeated, when at the head of the army, Montluc deserves censure for the cruelties which he exercised towards the protestants; and to his discredit it must be observed, that he regarded little his promises of quarter, or of safety, when they were made to persons who differed from him in religious opinions.

MONTMAUR, Peter de, Greek professor in the royal college of Paris, was born in the Limousin, and educated among the jesuits, whose society he left to become a druggist at Avignon. He afterwards practised as an advocate, and then turned poet, and became the companion of the great and the opulent, whom he pleased and amused with his wit and jocularity, while he shared the profusion of their tables, to which he was so partial. Though very satirical in his observations, he met with many enemies, who wielded his own weapons against him with vigor and effect. Of those who entertained themselves and the public at his expence, Menage was the keenest, and the most able satirist. Montmaur, who was a polite scholar in Greek and Latin, died 1648, aged 74. The satires written against him were published 1715, by Sallengre, under the title of the History of Montmaur.

MONTMORENCY, Matthew de, constable of France under Lewis the Younger, was of one of the most illustrious families of Europe. He married a natural daughter of Henry I. king of England, and for his second wife, the widow of Lewis VI. of France. He died 1160. His grandson of the same name, deserved the title of Great by his courage and prudence. He distinguished himself at the battle of Pont-a-Bouvines in 1214, and the following year he fought with such bravery against the Albigenes in Languedoc, that he was made constable of France, and general of the army. He behaved with equal valor at the sieges of Niort, Rochelle, &c. in 1224, and against the English; and when entrusted by Lewis VIII. on his death-bed, with the care of the minority of his infant son, the ninth Lewis, he discharged his new duties with all the fidelity and zeal of a good subject, and an honorable man, and protected Blanche the queen mother, against the machinations of some of the insurgent nobles. This brave man died 24th Nov. 1230. His great grandson of the same name, was in the service of Philip the Bold, and of Philip the Fair, and was engaged in the Flemish wars, and died 1304.

MONTMORENCY, Charles de, of the same family, was made marshal of France for his military services. He was at the battle of Cressly in 1346, and ably promoted the treaty of Bretigny, 1360. He died 11th Sept. 1381.

MONTMORENCY, Anne de, of the same family, displayed the valor of his ancestors at the battle of Marignan, and in 1521 bravely defended the town of Mezieres against the forces of Charles V. and obliged his general count Nassau, to raise the siege. He was made marshal of France, and accompanied Francis I. into Italy, where against his advice, the battle of Pavia was fought and lost, 1525. He shared the captivity of his master on that fatal day; but though rewarded for his services with the sword of constable of France, he was afterwards disgraced by the court. Restored to favor under Henry II. he took the Boulonnois 1550, and Metz, Toul, and Verdun, 1552; but the intrigues of Catherine de Medicis at last drove him from the court. Under Charles IX. he was recalled to head the armies, and after a reconciliation with the Guises, he defeated the Calvinists at Dreux in 1562; but though victorious, he was unfortunately taken prisoner, and the next year set at liberty. He afterwards retook Havre-de-Grace from the English, and he again defeated the Calvinists under Condé, at the battle of St. Denis, 10th Nov. 1567, but was himself slain, after performing prodigies of valor, and receiving eight dreadful wounds. When a cordelier exhorted the dying hero to prepare for his dissolution, he answered fiercely, "what, think you that after living nearly four score years in the field of honor, I know not how to terminate the short quarter of an hour which remains to me of life." He died, aged 74. His eldest son, Francis, was ambassador in England, and honored with the collar of the garter by queen Elizabeth. He died of an apoplexy, 1579, aged 49, highly respected. His other brother Charles, was general of Paris, and gained great reputation by his services under the reign of five kings of France. He died 1612, aged 75.

MONTMORENCY, Henry de, second son of Anne, distinguished himself at the battle of Dreux, where he took Condé prisoner, and also at the battle of St. Denis. He was made governor of Languedoc, and marshal of France; but when disgraced by the arts of Catherine de Medicis, he retired to Savoy, and made successful war against his country. He was reconciled to Henry IV. and obtained the sword of constable. He died 1st April, 1614. His son Henry, born 1595, was made admiral of France at the age of 18, and he supported the honors of his house by his valor and prudence. He defeated the Calvinists in Languedoc, and obtained another victory by sea near the Isle of Rhe, which submitted to his arms. He distinguished himself in 1628 against the Huguenots, and afterwards in Piedmont; but puffed up with his conquests, he determined to resist the power of Richelieu, and joining himself to Gaston, the discontented duke of Orleans, he took up arms against his sovereign in Languedoc, where he was governor. The marshals de la Force and Schomberg, were sent to reduce them to obedience, and at the battle of Castelnaudary, the rebels were defeated, and and Montmorency taken prisoner. His former services pleaded loudly in his defence, and the voice of the people was raised for his preservation, but the court was inexorable, and Richelieu put the law into execution. He was beheaded at Toulouse, 30th Oct. 1632, aged 37. His sister Charlotte Margaret, who married the prince of Condé is famous for her beauty, which captivated the hoary Henry IV. and exposed him to the ridicule of his courtiers. To avoid the importunities of this aged but powerful lover, her husband removed her to Brussels, from which she returned to France after Henry's death. She died 2d Dec. 1650, aged 57, four years after the death of her husband. Her son was the great and illustrious Condé.

MONTPENSIER, Anne Marie Louisa d'Orleans duchess de, daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, was born 1627. She inherited boldness, intrigue, and impetuosity from her father, and during the civil wars of La Fronde, she not only embraced the party of the duke of Condé, but she made her adherents fire the cannon of the bastille on the troops of Lewis XIV. This rash step against the authority of her sovereign and relation, ruined her hopes, and after in vain aspiring to the hand of an independent prince, and among others of Charles II. of England, she in 1669, married the count de Lauzun. The king, however, who had permitted the union, threw difficulties in the way of the lovers; but after some sacrifices, and the cession of Dombes and of Eu, of which she was the sovereign, this disappointed woman was allowed to see her husband. Happiness, however, did not prove her portion. She was violent and jealous, and her husband ungrateful and faithless; and she at last retired from the dreams of conjugal felicity to obscurity, and the austerities of a convent. She died 1693, aged 66. Her memoirs were published at Amsterdam, 8 vols. 12mo. and are curious. She wrote two romances, and some books of devotion. She was best known by the name of Mademoiselle.

MONTPER, Jesse, a painter of the Flemish school, born about 1580. Though he affected a studied negligence in his characters, and was too profuse of yellow colors, his pieces are interesting, and appear to advance when viewed at a distance.

MONTPETIT, Arnold Vincent, a native of Macon. After studying at Dijon he left the profession of the law for painting and mechanics, and in 1759 he discovered the eludoric method of painting, in which water colors were covered with a coat of oil. Some of his horological machines were constructed with great ingenuity, and he not only attempted to improve the wheels of watches, but contributed to the increase of the powers of steam engines. He in 1779 presented a memoir to the academy of sciences, on iron bridges, and proposed to the king of France, the erection of one of which the single arch was to be of 400 feet span. This ingenious man died at Paris, 1800, aged 87.

MONTPEZAT, Anthony de, a Frenchman, who was taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, and rose to consequence by the attention which he paid to Francis I. in his captivity. The monarch intrusted him with affairs of importance, and at last raised him to the rank of marshal of France. He died 1544.

MONTROSE, James, marquis of, a celebrated hero in the annals of Scotland, who by his genius, valor, and perseverance during the civil wars, reduced the kingdom to the king's obedience, but was compelled to abandon his conquest for want of proper support. After the death of Charles I. he served with honor in Germany, and on the landing of Charles II. in Scotland, he sallied forth from his retreat, and might, with a few followers, again have acquired the ascendancy, had he not been defeated by superior forces, and unfortunately betrayed into the hands of his enemies by the treachery of lord Ashton. This heroic chief was now exposed to every indignity of triumphant barbarism. The book which related his exploits was hung in derision around his neck; but he regarded it as an honor, and suffered with the same magnanimity which marked his life. He was hung on a gallows, 30 feet high, May 21st, 1650, at Edinburgh, and his quartered remains exposed over the city gates.

MONTUCIA, Joseph de, a native of Lyons, associate of the national institute, and member of the Berlin academy. He studied at Toulouse and Paris, and went as secretary and astronomer to Cayenne, with Turgot, and was appointed, on his return, first commissioner of buildings. Devoting himself to mathematical studies he had the good fortune to escape through the storms of the revolution, and the wants of his old age were relieved by a liberal pension from Bonaparte. He died at Versailles, 1800, aged 75. He wrote the History of Mathematics, 2 vols. 4to. 1758; a valuable work translated into English — History of the Researches about the Quadrature of the Circle, 12mo. — Collection of pieces on Inoculation.

MOORE, Philip, rector of Kirkbridge, and minister of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, was the chaplain, friend, and companion of the pious bishop Wilson, whose funeral sermon he preached. He superintended the revision of the translation of the bible into Manks, and other theological works. He was in his character a most exemplary and amiable man, and he died 22d Jan. 1783, aged 78, universally regretted. He was buried in Kirk Braddon church, and his remains were attended by all the clergy of the island.

MOORE, sir Jonas, an able mathematician, born at Whitby, Yorkshire, 1620. He was noticed and patronized by Charles I. and during the civil wars he taught mathematics. At the restoration, Charles II. made him surveyor general of the ordnance, and by his influence and interest with the monarch, he obtained the foundation of a mathematical school at Christ's hospital, and the appropriation of Flamstead house for an observatory. He wrote Arithmetic, in 2 books, &c. — Mathematical Compendium — General Treatise on Artillery, and a System of Mathematical Education, for the Hospital, published after his death, 1681, in 4to.

MOORE, Robert, an eminent penman, successor to Ayres, as writing master in St. Paul's church yard. He published the Writing Master's Assistant, and other similar works, and died about 1727.

MOORE, Edward, an English poet, author of Fables for the female sex — Gil Blas, a comedy — the Gamester, a tragedy, and other pieces, died 1757.

MOORE, Francis, an ingenious mechanic, whose inventions, inventions in machinery have been of great service in the improvement of the manufactures of Great Britain. He died 1787.

MOORE, John, M. D. son of a Scotch clergyman, was born at Stirling, 1730, and educated at Glasgow, where he studied medicine. He went in 1747 with the English army in Flanders as surgeon's mate, and after the peace he came to London, to improve himself in medical knowledge. He afterwards passed to Paris, where the English ambassador, lord Albemarle, engaged him as surgeon to his household. He next settled at Glasgow, as partner with Dr. Gordon, but in 1773 he travelled abroad for five years, as tutor to the young duke of Hamilton and his brother. On his return he settled in London, and published in 1779, his View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany, 2 vols. 8vo. which was received with universal approbation, and encouraged him to publish, two years after, Views of Society and Manners in Italy. His Medical Sketches, in 8vo. 1785, possessed merit, but were said to give offence to the medical world, because they betrayed some of the secrets of the profession. In 1792 Dr. Moore accompanied lord Lauderdale to Paris, and was an eye witness to some of the atrocious scenes which so much disgraced the French revolution, of which he published an account in 2 vols. 8vo. 1795, with a map to show the situation of the armies of Prussia, and of those of France under Dumourier. Dr. Moore died in London, 1802, highly respected as a man of letters, and of general information. His two sons have distinguished themselves greatly in the service of their country, Graham in the navy, and sir John in the army. Besides the above works, Dr. Moore published Zeluco, a novel, 2 vols. 8vo. a work of merit, and abounding with interesting scenes, but of which the principal character is so flagitious, as to raise in the reader, sentiments of terror, rather than attention or amusement. His Edward, intended as a contrast to Zeluco, appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1796, but it does not excite equal interest. Mordaunt was published in 1800, 2 vols. 8vo. and contains pleasing sketches of life, characters, and manners in various countries, and deserves to be read for its favorable views of virtue, and for the instruction which it imparts.

MOORE, John, D. D. archbishop of Canterbury, was son of a grazier at Gloucester. From the grammar school of that town he entered at Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and from which he was recommended to the duke of Marlborough as tutor to his sons. In this employment Dr. Moore conducted himself with great propriety and zealous activity, and he was rewarded for his attentive services by a prebendal stall at Durham, and in 1771 was made dean of Canterbury, and in 1776 raised to the see of Bangor. On the death of Cornwallis, 1783, he was recommended to the king by bishops Lowth and Hurd, who declined the honor, as the most proper person to succeed on the archiepiscopal throne of Canterbury, and he did honor to the appointment, as his authority was never exerted to excite dissatisfaction in the minds either of the friends, or of the enemies of our venerable church establishment. He died 18th Jan. 1805, aged 74, at Lambeth, and was buried in Lambeth church, with great funeral pomp. He never published but two sermons, preached on public occasions. He married Miss Eden, sister of lord Auckland, who survived him with four sons, two of whom are in the church.

MORABIN, James, author of a Life of Cicero, 2 vols. 4to. and of translations of some of that great orator's works, and of Boethius de Consol. died at Paris, 1762. He was secretary to the lieutenant-general of police at Paris.

MORALES, Ambrose, historiographer to Philip II. of Spain, and professor in the university of Alcalá, wrote a Spanish Chronicle, 2 vols. folio, and other works, and died 1590.

MORAND, Sauveur Francis, a native of Paris, who came in 1729 to England, to study surgery under the well known Chefelden. His reputation procured him the place of surgeon major to the French guards, and of director to the academy of surgeons, with the ribband of the order of St. Michael. He wrote a Treatise on the Operation for the Stone — a Discourse on the Necessity of Learning in the Surgical Profession — Eloge on Marechal — Experiments on the Stone — Miscellanies, 2 vols. 4to. He was made member of the Royal society, London, and of the academy of sciences at Paris, and died 1773, aged 76. His son John Francis, was physician to Stanislaus, king of Poland, and author of some medical and chemical works, and died 1784, aged 58.

MORAND, an architect of Lyons of great ingenuity. The wooden bridge which he built over the Rhone, and which bears his name, is much admired for its neatness, elegance, and mechanical lightness. This amiable man perished among those who were cruelly devoted to the guillotine after the siege of Lyons, 1793.

MORANDE, N. Thevenot de, a French writer. After being for some time in the military profession, and then escaping from the prison of Armentieres, where his extravagance and dissipation had confined him, he came to England, and procured money by his libel on the French court, called Le Gazetier Cuirassé. His intended publication against Mad. du Barry was purchased for a handsome sum, and the Courier de Londres was then undertaken, and gained the public favor by the satirical reflections which it contained. At the revolution this unprincipled libeller returned to Paris, and was one of those who were massacred in Sept. 1792. He was concerned in some other periodical works.

MORANDI, John Maria, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter, and patronized by the imperial family, of whom he painted the portraits at Vienna. His historical pieces were also admired. He died 1715, aged 90.

MORANT, Philip, M. A. and F. S. A. was born at St. Saviour's, in the Isle of Jersey, 6th Oct. 1700, and educated at Abingdon school, and Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was chaplain to the English church, Amsterdam, and afterwards obtained some livings in Essex, the last of which was Aldham, 1745. He was in 1768, appointed to prepare for the press, a copy of the rolls of parliament, the completion of which was unfortunately prevented by his death, 25th Nov. 1770, occasioned by a cold, caught on the river as he passed from the Temple to Vauxhall. This work was afterwards finished by Th. Atle, esq. who married his daughter. Morant wrote an History of Colchester, 1748, of which 200 copies only were printed — Beausobre's Introduction to the New Testament, translated — a Summary of the History of England — Geographia Antiqua & Nova, from Dufresnoy — the History of Essex — the Life of Edward the Confessor — 150 sermons — those lives in the Biographia Britannica, marked C. and other works.

by

MORATA, Olympia Fulvia, a learned Italian lady, born at Ferrara, 1526. Her father, who taught belles lettres in some of the universities of Italy, saw and improved her natural talents, and she made such progress that she was called to be the companion and instructress of the duchess of Ferrara, in polite literature, and she declaimed in Latin, and spoke Greek to the astonishment of her auditors. She soon after left the court, and married a young German physician, called Grunthler, whom she followed, 1548, to Schweinfurt, in Franconia. The siege and the burning of this town, soon after left her and her husband in great distress; they escaped with difficulty to Heidelberg, where Grunthler became professor of physic; but the hardships they had endured were too great for Morata's constitution. She sunk under them, and died 1555, and was soon after followed to the grave by her husband, and brother, who had come with her to Germany. She died a protestant. The greater part of her works perished at Schweinfurt; but some of her orations, dialogues, letters, and translations, appeared at Basil, 1562, 8vo.

MORDAUNT, Charles, earl of Peterborough, born 1658, succeeded his father John lord Mordaunt, 1675. He early distinguished himself in the naval service, especially in the African expedition under lord Plymouth, to the relief of Tangier, besieged by the Moors. He was afterwards in Holland, and attended William III. when he invaded England, and for his services he was created, in 1689, earl of Monmouth, sworn of the privy council, and made first commissioner of the treasury, which office, however, he retained only one year. In 1697 he succeeded his uncle as earl of Peterborough, and under queen Anne was appointed commander of the forces sent against Spain. In this expedition he acquired great renown. He took Barcelona with a handful of men, and not only gained possession of Catalonia, Valencia, Arragon, and other provinces, but with an inferior force, drove out of Spain the duke of Anjou and the French army. Though these extraordinary successes, which resemble romance rather than history, did not effectually establish Charles III. on the Spanish throne, yet Peterborough was deservedly honored abroad and at home. He was afterwards employed as ambassador to Sicily, and to negotiate with some Italian princes; and in 1714 he was made governor of Minorca, and under George I. general of all the marine forces of Great Britain. This great man died in his passage to Lisbon, 25th Oct. 1735, aged 77. To bravery and heroism he added a penetrating genius, and a mind highly polished, and well instructed in ancient and modern literature, as his "Familiar Epiftes," preserved among those of his friend Pope, fully evince.

MORE, sir Thomas, chancellor of England, was son of sir John More, one of the judges of the king's bench, and was born in London, 1480. From a free school in London he passed into the household of cardinal Morton, and in 1497 entered at Canterbury college, Oxford, now part of Christ-church. After two years' residence he was admitted at New Inn, London, and afterwards at Lincoln's Inn, where he studied the law with great attention. When of age he was elected member of parliament, and distinguished himself in 1503 by an opposition to a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. with such eloquence, that the House refused the application. This conduct was so resented by the king, that young More was marked for persecution by the court, and his father was imprisoned in the tower till he paid a fine of 100l. The death of Henry freed him from further persecution, and he now became law reader at Furnival's inn, and upon being called to the bench, he was appointed, in 1508, judge of the sheriff's court in London, an honorable and lucrative office. Though much engaged in his profession, he devoted some time to literature, and wrote his Utopia in 1516. He also held a correspondence with other learned men, especially Erasmus, who came to England to visit him. These two illustrious scholars, it is said, met by accident at the lord mayor's table without knowing one another, and after some argument at dinner, Erasmus, feeling the power of his friend's wit, exclaimed, Aut tu Morus es aut nullus! to which More replied, Aut tu es Erasmus, aut diabolus! His celebrity for learning and abilities was now so firmly established, that he was introduced by Wolsey to Henry VIII. who made him master of requests, and soon after knighted him, and appointed him privy counsellor. In 1520 he was made treasurer of the exchequer, and gained so much of the king's attention and confidence, that he assisted him in his attack upon Luther in defence of the seven sacraments. He was in 1523 chosen Speaker of the house of commons, and supported his office with such dignity, that he prevailed on the House to reject an oppressive subsidy proposed by Wolsey. This offended the favorite, and was reported to the king; but the abilities of More were too respectable to be despised, and in 1527 he was sent as joint ambassador with other lords to France, and afterwards to Cambray, and in 1530, on Wolsey's disgrace, he was entrusted with the great seal. This elevation, it seems, was intended to gain him over to the opinion of the king, who wished to divorce his queen; but the diligence, fidelity, and integrity which he displayed in this new office, proved how well he deserved the royal confidence. Afraid, however, of the storm which hung over his head, because he resisted the king's iniquitous measures, he resigned his new dignity in 1533, and determined to live the rest of life in retirement at Chelsea. He found, nevertheless, the emissaries of the court intent to injure him, and after various fruitless accusations, he exposed himself to the royal displeasure by refusing, in 1534, to take the oath of supremacy. He was, upon this, arrested and sent a prisoner to the tower, but in this season of danger his friends stepped forward, and among them

Cranmer,

Cranmer, and by every argument of prudence, reason, and interest, they exhorted him to acknowledge the king's supremacy. So great, however, was his attachment to Rome, that he refused, though death was the consequence, and, therefore, rather than to abjure what he considered as the test of his faith, he suffered himself to be tried and condemned as a traitor. He was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his head to be fixed on London bridge; but the ignominious punishment was changed by the king into beheading, and he suffered on Tower-hill, 5th July, 1535, showing, even in his last moments, resignation, and that innocent mirth and pleasantry which had in happier days adorned his conversation. Sir Thomas was twice married, but had children only by his first wife, three daughters and a son. The eldest daughter was a woman of great character, and well skilled in the learned languages. She married Mr. Roper, a gentleman of Kent, and wrote some things, which possessed merit. She died 1544, and was buried in St. Dunstan's church, Canterbury, with her father's head, which she had procured after its exposure on London bridge, between her arms. The son, who was little better than an idiot, was imprisoned after his father's death, for refusing to take the oaths of supremacy; but afterwards liberated. He had five sons, and the son of the eldest of these proved a violent catholic, and at last took orders at Rome, and wrote the life of his great grandfather, dedicated to Henrietta, the first Charles's queen. Besides the Utopia, a kind of romance in which he gives an account of a country, said to be discovered by the companions of Americus, with an artful insertion of his own political opinions, Sir Thomas More wrote in part an History of Richard III. — some polemical works, and other things in Latin as well as in English. The English works were published by order of queen Mary, 1557, and the Latin at Basil and Louvain, 1563 and 1566. The Utopia was translated into English by Dr. Burnet.

MORE, Henry, an able divine, born at Grantham, Lincolnshire, 12th Oct. 1614. As his parents were Calvinists, he was strictly educated in their principles, but, much against their wishes, he rejected those rigid tenets, and after being three years at Eton, he entered at Christ college, Cambridge, and assiduously applied himself to the study of Aristotle, and other more modern philosophers. These pursuits, however, yielded not the mental satisfaction which he expected, he left philosophy for platonic writers, and found in the "Theologia Germanica" of Taulerus, the instruction and information which formerly had proved so agreeable to the celebrated Luther. In 1639 he was made fellow of his college, and afterwards became tutor to some persons of distinction, and among them, to Sir John Finch, and his sister lady Conway, a woman whose powers of mind were of a singular cast, and at last brought her to quakerism. By means of these powerful friends he obtained, in 1675, a prebend at Gloucester, which he soon after resigned in favor of his friend Dr. Fowler, and satisfied with a small, but independent competence, he declined the offers of high preferment at home and in Ireland, which he might have obtained. After thus devoting himself to laborious study, and the writing of books, he died 1st Sept. 1687, aged 73, and was buried in the chapel of his college. His Mystery of Godliness — Mystery of Iniquity — Philosophical Collections, and other works, were at one time in high reputation, and were collected and published together in 1679, in three large folio volumes.

MORE, Alexander, a protestant divine, born 1616, at Castres, Languedoc, where his father, a native of Scotland, was principal of the college. He studied at Geneva, and obtained there the Greek professorship, and three years after, the divinity chair in the room of Spanheim. As he was a very eloquent and popular preacher, and consequently envied by his associates at Geneva, he in 1649 became divinity professor at Middleburg, and afterwards removed to Amsterdam, and thence to Paris, where he was appointed minister of the reformed church. He died at Paris, Sept. 1670. Though great as a preacher, his private character has been severely censured, and he has been accused not only of irregularity in his morals, but of inconsistency in his faith. He published "De Gratiâ," & Libero Arbitrio — De Scripturâ Sacrà — a Reply to Milton's Second Defence of the People of England — Orations and poems in Latin, &c.

MORE, Sir Francis, an English lawyer, born at East Illey, Berks, and educated at St. John's college, Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. He was at one time member of parliament, and died 1621. He wrote Cases collected and reported, 1633, fol. — Readings on 4 Jacob I. in the Middle Temple, 1676, folio.

MORE, John, a learned prelate, born at Harborough, Leicestershire, and educated at Clare hall, Cambridge, where he was fellow, and took his degree of D.D. 1681. He was patronized by the chancellor, Lord Nottingham, and was made bishop of Norwich, 1691, and translated to Ely, 1707. He died July 31st, 1714. His sermons were published by his chaplain, Dr. Samuel Clarke, and his valuable library purchased for 6000 guineas, by George II. and presented to the university of Cambridge.

MORE, St. Antonio, a painter, born at Utrecht, was the pupil of John Schorel, but imitated the works of Holbein with great success. He was in the service of Philip II. king of Spain, whose portrait he painted, and also those of John III. of Portugal, of Catherine of Austria, of Mary the Infanta, and of Mary queen of England. He was afterwards receiver of the revenues of West Flanders, and died at Antwerp, 1575, aged 56.

MORE, or MOORE, James, an English writer, educated at Worcester college, Oxford. He wrote the "Rival Modes," a comedy, condemned in the acting, but yet submitted to the public in 1727. He was the friend of the duke of Wharton, and joined him in writing a sarcastic periodical paper, called "the Inquirer." He quarrelled with Pope, and in consequence, was made one of the heroes of the Dunciad. He was a polite writer, the companion of the great, but imprudent in his conduct, and too fond of being called a man of wit. He died at Whiter, near Illeworth, 1734.

MORE, Henry, a native of Devonshire, pastor of a dissenting congregation at Liskeard, Cornwall, where he

he died 1802. His poems, which possess some merit, have appeared since his death, in a vol. 4to. with a short account of his life by Dr. Aikin.

MOREAU, James, a French physician, the friend and disciple of Guy Patin, was born at Chalons sur Saone, 1647. He wrote Consultations on Rheumatism — a Treatise on the Knowledge of Continual Fevers — a Dissertation on the Dropsy, &c. and excited the envy of other practitioners by the boldness of his writings. He died 1729.

MOREAU, Jacob Nicholas, historiographer of France, librarian to the queen, censor royal, and counsellor of the court of aids, was born at St. Florentine. He wrote Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Carouacés, 12mo. — Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de notre Temps, 2 vols. 12mo. — Observateur Hollandois — Principes de Morale, de Politique, & de Droit Public, ou Discours sur l'Histoire de France, 2 vols. 8vo. &c. This able writer suffered on the scaffold, 27th March, 1794, aged 77.

MOREELSE, Paul, a painter, pupil to Michael Mirevelt, was born at Utrecht, 1575, and died 1638. Some of his wood-cuts in chiaro oscuro, are much admired.

MOREL, the name of some learned and ingenious printers in France. William was professor of Greek, and director of the king's printing house, Paris, and died 1674. Frederick was also professor of Greek and Latin, and king's printer, and died 1583. His son Frederick was also a printer, and the authors he printed prove him to have been a very learned man. He died 1630, aged 78. His descendants followed his steps, as distinguished in literature, and as elegant printers.

MOREL, Andrew, an eminent antiquary, born at Bern, in Switzerland. He was a diligent and curious collector of medals, and in 1683 published at Paris, in 8vo. his "Specimen Univerſæ Rei Nummarie Antiquæ," in which he promised to give an account of 20,000 medals exactly designed. He was placed in the cabinet of antiques at Paris by Lewis XIV. but in consequence of some imprudent speech, he was sent to the bastille by the minister Louvois, and after three years' confinement, was with difficulty liberated. He afterwards went to Arnstadt, in Germany, where he was employed as antiquary at the court of Schwartzburg. He died there, of an apoplexy, 10th April, 1703. His "Thesaurus Morellianus," &c. in which he gave an account of 3539 medals, was part of his great work, and was published 1734, by Havercamp, 2 vols. folio.

MORELL, Thomas, D. D. an able divine, known as the editor of Ainsworth's Dictionary, and of Hederic's Lexicon. He wrote also Annotations on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and assisted Hogarth in the completing of his Analysis of Beauty, and selected the passages of scripture for Handel's oratorios. He died 1784, aged 83.

MORELY, lord, son of sir Thomas Parker, of Haltingbury, Essex, was a great favorite with Henry VIII. by whom he was raised to the peerage. He signed, with other peers, the letter to the pope, in favor of the divorce of Catherine of Arragon, and this more firmly secured the kindness of his master. He spent the last part of his life in retirement, and was author of some Latin poems. He died 1547.

MORERI, Lewis, D. D. the learned author of the great historical dictionary, was born at Bargemont, in Provence, 1643. He studied at Draguignan, under the jesuits, and at Lyons, and after publishing some inferior things, undertook his great work, the first edition of which appeared at Lyons, 1674. This valuable book soon spread his reputation, and gained him friends; he was patronized by the bishop of Apt, and by De Pomponne, secretary of state, and might have obtained distinguished preferment, had his health permitted it. His great application, however, ruined his constitution, and he died July 10th, 1680, at the early age of 37. The second edition of his dictionary appeared soon after his death, 1681, 2 vols. and few alterations took place in the third, fourth, and fifth. The sixth was improved by Le Clerc, and the book received no alterations till the eleventh, which was corrected by Bayle. The 13th, in 5 vols. folio, was improved by Du Pin. The best editions are those of 1749 and 1759, enlarged to 10 vols. folio.

MORES, Edward Rowe, an able antiquary, born 13th Jan. 1730, at Tunstall, in Kent, where his father was rector. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' school, and Queen's college, Oxford, where in 1748, he published an ancient fragment, called "Nomina & Insignia Gentilitia Nobilium Equitumque sub Edwardo Primo Rege Militantium," and also a new 8vo. edition of Dionysius' treatise, De Claris Rhetoribus. In 1752 he was elected fellow of the antiquarian society, and about this time spent much labor in making collections relative to the antiquities of Oxford, and especially of his own college, and All-Souls, and also Godstow nunnery. Though he was whimsical in his religious notions, and affected to follow the tenets of Erasmus, it is certain that he took deacon's orders; but it was said, that it was with the intention of escaping civil offices. He was equally singular in the education of his daughter, to whom he early talked, principally in Latin. He was the original promoter of the equitable society for assurance on lives and survivorship, of which he was nominated perpetual director, with an annuity of 100l. In the latter part of life he lost the industry and steadiness of his younger years, and sunk into indolence and dissipation, which at last occasioned a mortification, of which he died at his house at Low Layton, 28th Nov. 1778, in his 49th year. The History of the Antiquities of Tunstall, in Kent, with plates, was the only work which he left completed for the press. He published a Dissertation on Typographical Founders and Foundries, of which only 80 copies were printed.

MORETT, an ingenious artist, goldsmith to Henry VIII. He executed many curious works from the designs of Holbein.

MORGAGNI, John Baptist, an eminent anatomist, born at Forli, in Italy, 1682. He studied at Bologna, where his abilities were displayed with such success, that he was early placed in the medical chair. He was afterwards appointed by the senate of Venice, to a professorship at Padua, and was enrolled by the royal societies of London and Paris among their members. He died died 1771, much respected. He published Adversaria Anatomica — Nova Institutionum Medicarum Idea — De Sedibus & Causis Morborum per Anatomiam Indigatis — Epistolæ Anatomicae, &c. His works were published together 1765, in 5 volumes.

MORGAN, William, a native of Wales, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards vicar of Welsh-pool, and in 1595, raised to the see of Landaff, and in 1601 translated to St. Asaph, where he died 1604. He was a learned prelate, and zealously employed in completing the translation of the bible into Welsh, which appeared in 1588.

MORGAN MWYNIAWR, or the Courteous, a Welsh prince, who died 1001, aged 129. He was the friend of Edgar, king of England, and though an able warrior, was strongly attached to peace.

MORGAN, prince of Powys, son of Cadwgan, atoned for the violent conduct of his youth by going on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He died on his return at Cyprus, 1126.

MORGAN, George Cadogan, a native of Bridgend, Glamorganshire, educated under his uncle Dr. Price. He became teacher of a dissenting congregation at Norwich, and died 1798. He wrote Lectures on Electricity — Observations on the Light of Bodies in a State of Combustion, &c.

MORGUES, Matthew de, fleur de St. Germain, preacher to Lewis XIII. and almoner to Mary de Medicis, was born at Vellai, in Languedoc, 1582. He entered among the jesuits, but soon relinquished their society, and acquired universal reputation by his preaching. Upon the disgrace of Mary de Medicis he made his escape, as he had drawn upon himself the resentment of cardinal Richelieu, by the severity of his reflections upon his conduct and ministry. After the cardinal's death he returned to Paris, where he died 1670, aged 88. He wrote an "History of Lewis the Just," besides a vindication of the queen-mother against the malevolent insinuations of Richelieu.

MORHOFF, Daniel George, a learned German, born at Wismar, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, 6th Feb. 1639. He studied at Stettin and Rostock, and visited Holland and Oxford, and in 1665 was invited by the duke of Holstein to become professor of poetry, eloquence and history, and librarian in the university of Kiel. He married in 1671, and it is supposed, that the death of his wife, in 1687, hastened his own dissolution. He died 1691. His principal works are Polyhistor, five de Notitiâ Auctorum & Rerum, 2 vols. 4to. — Dissertationes, 4to. — Orationes — besides Principes Medicus, 4to. in which he spoke of the pretensions of the kings of England and France, to cure the king's evil — and a translation of his learned friend Boyle's philosophical works into Latin.

MORICE, fr William, a learned Englishman, raised through the influence of his friend and kinsman, general Monk, to the office of secretary of state, for which he was not fully qualified, as unacquainted with foreign affairs. He held it, however, for seven years, and without reproach, and resigned in 1668. He died Dec. 12th, 1676. He wrote the "Common Right of the Lord's Supper asserted," printed 1651, 4to. and 1660, folio.

MORILLO, Bartholomew, a Spanish painter, born at Seville, 1613. He studied in Italy, and his compositions were so much admired, that he was compared to Paul Veronese. After his return to Spain, Charles V. wished to make him his first painter, which honor, through modesty, he declined. He died 1685.

MORIN, John Baptist, a French physician, born at Villefranche, in Beaujolais, 1583. He studied philosophy at Aix, and physic at Avignon, where he took his doctor's degree, and then came to Paris. He began in 1617, to apply himself to astrology, and lived in the retinue of several dignitaries, where the accidental fulfilment of some of his prophecies gave him great celebrity. In 1630 he was chosen professor royal of mathematics, and so well established was his astrological reputation, that he was consulted by the cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, and liberally rewarded for his calculation of the influence of the stars. He was also consulted in the affairs of Lewis XIII. and as in examining the monarch's horoscope, he had the good luck to foretell that his approaching illness would be severe, but not fatal, he was very royally rewarded. He died at Paris, 6th Nov. 1656. He wrote various books, the best known of which are his treatise against the Præadamites, and his Astrologia Gallica, the labor of 30 years, printed at the Hague, 1661, in folio, and dedicated to Jesus Christ, and to Louisa Maria, queen of Portugal, at whose expence it was printed, as the author had foretold, she was to be a sovereign princess.

MORIN, John, a learned Frenchman, born at Blois, 1591. He studied at Rochelle and Leyden, and afterwards settled at Paris, where by the conversation of cardinal du Perron, he was converted from the protestant to the catholic faith. He then was admitted into the congregation of the oratory, and distinguished himself by his writings. He resided for nine years at Rome, where he was much courted by the pope and cardinals, and then was recalled by Richelieu to France. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 1659. His works are very numerous, but the best known are, Exercitationes on the Samaritan Pentateuch — an edition of the Septuagint — an History of the Deliverance of the Church by Constantine, &c.

MORIN, Simon, a fanatic, born at Richemont, near Aumale. He published in 1647, a foolish book, called "Pensées de Morin dédiées au Roi," in which he conceived himself to be Jesus Christ, the second Messiah. This book, which drew around him many followers, proved at last his ruin; he was imprisoned, but afterwards liberated as a visionary, till one of his disciples, Desmarets, from envy and malice, called him the son of God risen again, and thus revived a fanatical sect, which the arm of the law immediately repressed. The unhappy Morin was condemned to be burnt alive, which sentence he suffered with great resolution, 14th March 1663, and his accomplices were whipped and branded, and sent to the galleys for life.

MORIN, Stephen, a protestant divine, born at Caen, 1st Jan. 1625. He studied at Caen, and afterwards at Sedan, under du Moulin, and Rivet, and after acquiring a very extensive knowledge of classical and oriental literature, he returned to his native place, and married.

married. In 1664 he was made minister of Caen, and at the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, he retired to Holland, and fixed first at Leyden, and then at Amsterdam, where he became professor of oriental languages. He died May 5th 1700. His Latin Dissertations on various subjects of Criticism and Antiquity, were highly esteemed, the best edition of which is that of Dordt, 1760, 8vo.

MORIN, Henry, son of Stephen, was author of several dissertations in the memoirs of the academy of inscriptions at Paris, of which he was member. He left the protestant for the Roman catholic religion, and died at Caen, 1728, aged 73.

MORIN, Peter, a learned critic, born at Paris 1531. He was for some years in the printing office of Paul Manutius, at Venice, and was afterwards employed by Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V. to superintend the editions of the Septuagint, and of the Vulgate. He wrote a Collection of General Councils, and several learned works besides. He died at Rome 1608.

MORIN, Lewis, a French physician, born at Mons 1635. He was member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and made himself known by his accurate index to the works of Hippocrates in Greek and Latin. He died 1715.

MORIN, John, professor of philosophy at Chartres, and author of "Mechanisme Universel," and of a "treatise on Eternity," was born at Meung, near Orleans, 1705, and died 1764.

MORNIERE, Adrian Claude le Fort de la, author of "Choix des Poësies Morales" — "Bibliothèque Poétique — Passetems Poétiques, Historiques," &c. — and some comedies, was born at Paris 1696, and died 1768.

MORISON, Robert, a physician, born at Aberdeen, 1620. He studied in his native university, and took his master's degree; but the civil wars disturbed his pursuits, and after he had distinguished himself for his loyalty and bravery, especially in a battle on Aberdeen bridge, between the people of the town and the republican forces, where he was wounded in the head, he retired to France, in expectation of better times. At Paris he applied himself to botany and anatomy, and took his degree of M. D. at Angers, 1648, and obtained, two years after, the care of the royal gardens at Blois. At the restoration he followed Charles II. to England, and was made physician to the royal family, professor royal of botany, and afterwards was elected botanical professor at Oxford. He was unfortunately bruised by the pole of a coach, as he crossed the street near Charing-cross, and died the day after, 1683, aged 63. He published 1669, Præ-ludium Botanicum, 2 vols. 8vo. — Plantarum Umbelliferarum Distributio, folio — Historia Plantarum, folio, a valuable work, which he left incomplete. It was finished by Jacob Bobart.

MORISOT, Claude Bartholomeu, a French writer, born at Dijon, 1592. He was author of Peruviana, or the Secret History of Cardinal Richelieu, Mary of Medicis, and the Duke of Orleans, 4to. 1645 — Orbis Maritimus, &c. and died 1661.

MORLAND, Samuel, an eminent statesman, born in Berkshire. He was under-secretary to Thurloe, and his abilities were employed by Cromwell in embassies to Geneva, Savoy, and other states. In 1660 he waited on Charles II. at Breda, and so recommended himself by his extensive knowledge and faithful services, that he was created a baronet. He published Urim of Conscience, 8vo. 1695. The time of his death is not mentioned. His son was master of mechanics to Charles II. and invented the drum-head capstan, for weighing heavy anchors, the speaking trumpet, a fire engine, an arithmetical instrument, &c.

MORLAND, George, an eminent painter, born in London. His father was an able artist, and the son, being early employed in making drawings, acquired great ease and expedition. These essential advantages were aided by strong powers of genius; but the celebrity which these promising talents might have ensured, was prevented by vicious habits, and an unconquerable propensity for low and dissipated society. In proportion as his abilities expanded, and his pieces commanded the public esteem, his foibles increased, and his wants became more urgent. While the employment of his pencil in hours of sobriety and retirement, might have procured independence and general esteem, the efforts of his genius were never or seldom called forth but to extricate him from the grasp of persecuting creditors, the riotous company of a spunging house, or the horrors of a prison. Thus ever poor, and ever exposed to the filthy temptations of an ale-house, or an intemperate party, he produced no historical piece, truly sublime for grandeur of conception, or vastness of execution. The scenes of rural and domestic life, indeed, received from his hand the most finished and captivating charms; and his farms, horses, rural views, shepherds, fishermen, smugglers on the sea coast, dogs, pigs, &c. were delineated with the most striking and the happiest effect. This singular genius, whose pieces were generally the effect of accident, and fell into the hands of those who induced him to work with the selfish view of profiting by his extravagance, died in a spunging house, 1804, aged 40, leaving a wife, who survived him but two days. His life has been written, and a curious account of all his pieces given by Mr. Hassell, 1806.

MORLEY, George, a learned bishop, born in Cheap-side, London, 1597. He was educated at Westminster school, and made student of Christ-church, 1615. He was afterwards chaplain in lord Carnarvon's family, and to Charles I. who gave him a canonry of Christ-church, 1641. Though chosen one of the assembly of divines, he adhered firmly to the interests of his master, and assisted him at the treaty of Newport, in the Isle of Wight. After being imprisoned for some little time for loyalty, he left England, 1649, and officiated as minister to his fugitive countrymen at the Hague, Antwerp, and Breda. At the restoration, his zeal in the royal cause was not forgotten; he was restored to his canonry, 1660; made dean of Christ-church, and nominated to the see of Worcester the same year, and in 1662 translated to Winchester. In this bishopric he showed himself a most munificent prelate; he spent 8000l. on the repairs of Farnham castle; purchased with 4000l. Chelsea, for the residence of his successors, and among other benefactions, left five scholarships of 10*l.* per annum, to the natives of Jersey and Guernsey. By temperance he reached a good old age, and died in October 1684. He wrote some religious tracts, in 1 vol. 4to. besides sermons, and various other treatises.

MORLIERE, James Augustus de la, a native of Grenoble, who acquired some celebrity by his romances, the best of which is his Angola, 2 vols. 12mo. He wrote also Mirza-Nadir, 4 vols. 12mo. — some comedies, and other things, which obtained a temporary fame. He died at Paris 1785.

MORLIN, Joachim, a Lutheran divine, born 1514. He was engaged in the various theological disputes of the times, and was made bishop of Sambia by Sigismund, king of Poland, where he died. He was author of several religious tracts, &c.

MORNAC, Anthony, an eminent French advocate. He wrote 4 folio volumes on law subjects, and also an 8vo. volume of excellent poetry, called Ferix Forenses. He died much respected, 1619.

MORNAY, Philip de, lord of Pleffis Marly, an illustrious nobleman, born at Buhi in Vexin, 1549. He was carefully educated by his mother in the protestant faith, and afterwards served in the army during the civil commotions of the times, but soon quitted the military life for literary pursuits. He passed to Geneva, and through Switzerland went to Heidelberg in Germany, where he applied himself to the civil law. He afterwards visited the most remarkable places of Italy, Germany, and Flanders, and also came to England, where Elizabeth received him with cordiality and interest. In 1576 he went to the court of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, by whom he was kindly treated, and made counsellor of state. He greatly distinguished himself by his abilities and negotiations in the king's service; but when he saw him inclined to become a convert to the catholic tenets, he gradually withdrew from the court to devote himself to literature. He had been made governor of Saumur by his master, but he was deprived of the office by Lewis XIII. in 1621, and died at his seat of la Forest, near Poictou, 1623. Du Pleffis was an extraordinary character; though the heir of rank, dignity, and opulence, he cultivated literature with taste and success; and in an age when religious opinions were guided by interest, and altered by political connections, he remained a protestant, firm and unshaken in his principles, virtuous in his conduct, and respected even by his enemies. His publications are numerous and valuable. The best known are a treatise on the Church, 1578 — upon the Truth of the Christian Religion, begun 1579 — upon the Eucharist, 1598, a celebrated treatise, which procured an interview between him and cardinal du Perron, and which obtained for him among the protestants, the title of protestant pope — the Mystery of Iniquity, or the History of the Papacy, 1607 — an Exhortation to the Jews concerning the Messiah, &c.

MOROSONS, Francis, a native of Venice, who distinguished himself by his valor against the Turks, at the siege of Candia. He long maintained himself against an invading army of 120,000 men, with hardly a fourth part of the number; but though allured by promises from the enemy, and offered the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, he continued firm to his country; and when the place surrendered, he was treated with great humanity. His countrymen afterwards, though for a moment displeased, appointed him procurator of St. Mark, and enabled him again to attack the Turks, whom he defeated in a dreadful naval battle near the Dardanelles. He was in 1688 elected doge of his country, and died six years after, aged 76.

MORRIS, Lewis, a native of Anglesea, engaged in the service of the admiralty in 1737, to survey the coast of Wales. He published in 1748 an account of his observations, and died at Pembryn, Cardiganshire, 1765, aged 63. He possessed some abilities as a poet, and several of his pieces in Welsh have appeared. Above 80 MS. volumes of antiquities, &c. collected by him, are preserved in the Welsh charity school, London.

MORRIS, Richard, brother to the preceding, was clerk in the navy pay-office, and was eminent as a critic, and as a poet, and was engaged in the publication of two editions of the Welsh bible. He died 1779. His brother William, was known as a curious collector of Welsh MSS. He died 1764, comptroller of the customs at Holyhead.

MORTIMER, John Hamilton, an English painter, born 1739, at East Bourne, Suffex, and descended from Mortimer, earl of March. He learnt his art under his uncle, but afterwards improved himself under Hudson, and sir Joshua Reynolds, and greatly corrected his taste by studying attentively the graces and sublime beauties of the duke of Richmond's gallery. He honorably obtained the prize of the society for the encouragement of arts, by his picture of Paul preaching to the Britons, a valuable piece, preserved in Chipping-Wycombe church, Bucks. He was in 1779, without his solicitation, created royal academician by the king, but unfortunately died before he could enjoy the honor, after an illness of 12 days, at his house Norfolk-street, 4th Feb. 1779. His Magna Charta, battle of Agincourt, &c. are eminent proofs of his great genius; but it is remarkable that while his feelings and taste seemed to lead him to the delineation of savage scenes, and all the horrid tortures of inquisitorial fury, and suffering martyrdom, he possessed the most benevolent heart, susceptible of tender impressions, and easily moved by the cries of distress.

MORTON, Thomas, an English bishop, born at York, 1564, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow 1592. He was in the service of lords Huntingdon and Sheffield, and in 1603 went as chaplain to lord Eure, ambassador to the emperor of Germany, and the king of Denmark. In 1606 he was made chaplain to king James, the next year dean of Gloucester, and 1609 dean of Winchester. In 1615 he was made bishop of Chester, 1618 translated to Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1632 to Durham. During the civil wars, though esteemed for benevolence, piety, and moderation, he was exposed to much trouble from the parliament, and the republican forces, and after suffering imprisonment fonment and perfecution, he at laft was permitted to retire to the houfe of his friend fir Henry Peyton, in Northamptonfhire, where he died 22d Sept. 1659, aged 95. He was the author of fome practical books of divinity.

MORTON, James, earl of, was born at Dalkeith, 1530, and educated under Buchanan who was profeffor of philofophy at Paris. He returned to Scotland, 1554, and ably promoted the reformation, but the murder of Darnely, in which he was called an accomplice, obliged him to fly into England. On his return he was made chancellor of Scotland, and in 1574, fucceeded Mar as regent, an office which he refigned 1579. His enemies prevailed at laft againft him, and in 1681 he was condemned for high treafon, and loft his head, by a machine called maiden, faid to refemble the modern French guillotine, which it is reported he had brought from Halifax, Yorkfhire, for the execution of fome of his opponents.

MORTON, William, a barrifter, who diftinguifhed himfelf during the civil wars, and obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel of horfe. He was after the reftoration made king's ferjeant, and in 1665, appointed juftice of the king's bench.

MORTON, John, a native of Dorchefter, who rofe by his abilities, his knowledge of law, and the favor of Henry VI. to places of dignity and confequence. He was privy counfellor to the king and his fucceffor, and from the fee of Ely he was tranflated to Canterbury, and was alfo raifed by Henry VII. to the office of lord chancellor, and by the pope to the dignity of cardinal. He died 1500.

MOSCHOPULUS, Emanuel, a native of Crete, in the 14th century, known as the author of a treatife on Grammar, firft printed in 4to. 1545. His nephew of the fame name was an able mathematician and antiquary, and compofed a Greek Lexicon, published 1545.

MOSCHUS and BION, two Greek poets, who both flourifhed in the reign of Philadelphus. Their works are generally printed together, and though fhort, abound with great beauties.

MOSES, the great legiflator of the jews, was born in Egypt 1571 B. C. and providentially faved by the daughter of Pharaoh, when expofed on the waters of the Nile. He was commiffioned by God at the burning bufh to deliver the people of Ifrael from their Egyptian bondage, and after he had performed miracles, and marched through the Red fea, he promulgated his laws during the refidence of his countrymen in the wildernefs. He was not permitted to enter the land of Canaan, but died at the age of 120.

MOSES, Mendelfon, Vid. MENDELSON.

MOSES, Miconi, a Spanifh rabbi of the 14th century. His "Great Book of Precepts," explanatory of the Jewifh law, was published at Venice, folio.

MOSHEIM, John Laurence, an able German divine, born 1695 of a noble family at Lubeck. He diftinguifhed himfelf in the German univerfities, and was invited to honorable fituations by the king of Denmark and other princes. He became divinity profeffor at Helmftadt, and was afterwards appointed chancellor of the univerfity of Gottingen, where he died, univerfally lamented 1755. This very learned man wrote Differtationes Sacrae, 4to. — Sermons — Cudworth's Intellectual Syftem of the Univerfe, tranflated into Latin, with notes, but the beft known and moft ufeul of his works is an Ecclefiaftical Hiftory, written in Latin, and tranflated into Englifh by Dr. Mac-laine.

Moss, Robert, an Englifh divine, born at Gillingham, Norfolk, 1666. He was brought up at Norwich fchool, and Benet college, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was a popular preacher, and much followed in London, and became chaplain to king William and his two fucceffors. He was made 1712, dean of Ely, and held other ecclefiaftical preferments. In the latter part of life he was much afflicted with the gout, and died 26th March, 1729. His fermons have been published in 8 vols. 8vo. He wrote alfo fome poetry, and fmall trafts. His nephew was raifed to the fee of Bath and Wells.

MOTHE LE VAYER, Francis de la, counfellor of ftate, and preceptor to the duke of Anjou, only brother to Lewis XIV. was born 1588, at Paris. He diftinguifhed himfelf early by his learning, and in 1639, was admitted member of the French academy. He enjoyed the friendship and patronage of Richelieu, and Mazarine, and was appointed to places of honor and diftinction. Though very regular, and exemplary in his conduct, it has been obferved that he was occasionally licentious in his writings. The death of an only fon at the age of 35 afflicted him very feverely, but he, however, foon after, though 75 years old, took a fecond wife. He died 1672. His works collected by his fon, and dedicated to Mazarine, appeared in 1663. The beft edition is that of 1669, in 15 vols. 12mo. No French writer, more than he, fays Bayle, approaches nearer to Plutarch. Beautiful thoughts, and folid arguments are every where interwoven in his writings.

MOTHE LE VAYER, de Boutigni, of the fame family as the preceding, was mafter of requests, and wrote a difertation on the Authority of Kings — a tragedy — and Therfis and Zelié, a popular romance. He died 1585.

MOTHERBY, George, an Englifh phyfician, beft known by his popular work, the Medical Dictionary, fol. He died 1793, aged 62.

MOTTE, Anthony Houdart de la, an ingenious Frenchman, member of the French academy, was born at Paris 17th Jan. 1672. He ftudied the law, but quitted it for poetry and literature, and at the age of 20 he produced "les Originaux," a comedy, ill received by the public, which fo difgufted him with the world, that he retired to the abbey of la Trappe with the intention to live in retirement and devotion. Other ideas, however, foon prevailed, and his other productions met with a more favorable treatment from the public. He had many friends, but his literary enemies were more numerous than his admirers, and if he had not acquired celebrity by his writings he would have obtained it from the attacks of Racine, Boileau, Rouffeau, and others. His "Discours fur Homere" is a mafterly performance, but it was attacked by Madame Dacier, and with great fpirit, but with moderation defended.

defended by the author in his "Reflexions sur la Critique." He became blind in his old age, and died 26th Dec. 1731, universally regretted. His works consisting of epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, lyrics, &c. besides critical and academical discourses, and other prose compositions, were edited in 11 large vols. 8vo. 1754. He was, says Voltaire, of a solid and comprehensive rather than of a sublime genius. His prose possessed delicacy and method, but his poetry often is destitute of fire and elegance.

MOTTEUX, Peter Anthony, a French writer, born at Rouen in Normandy, 1660. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to England, where he became a respectable merchant, and acquired such a perfect knowledge of the language that he wrote in it various things, among them a translation of Don Quixote, poems, and dramatic pieces. He was found dead in a disorderly house in the parish of St. Clement Danes, on his birth day, 19th Feb. 1717-8, and was supposed to have been murdered.

MOTTEVILLE, Frances Bertrand, dame de, a French lady, born in Normandy, 1615. She was patronized by Anne of Austria, and though for a while banished from court by the jealousy of Richelieu, she was afterwards restored to favor, and wrote the "Memoirs" of her mistress, in 5 vols. 12mo. which have frequently been reprinted. She died at Paris, 1689.

MOTTLEY, John, an English gentleman, whose father followed the fortunes of James II. was born in England 1692. He was early disappointed of some places under government, which though solemnly promised to him, were bestowed, through greater interest and favor, on others; and in the midst of his wants, he applied to his pen for support. He wrote five dramatic pieces, which were received with some applause, and also the Life of the Czar Peter. He died 30th Oct. 1750.

MOUCHERON, Isaac, a painter, born at Amsterdam, where he died 1744, aged 74. His landscapes, especially those of Italy, were much admired.

MOUFET, Thomas, a medical writer, the first who introduced chemical medicines in England. He studied for some time at Cambridge, but took his doctor's degree abroad, and settled at Ipswich. The latter part of his life was spent at Bulbridge, near Wilton, in the retinue of the Pembroke family. He died about 1600. He is known for his "Theatrum Infectorum," folio, 1634, a work praised by Ray, though censured by Lister.

MOUHY, Charles de Fieux, a native of Metz, member of the academy of Dijon. He wrote several romances of no great merit, but to excite the public attention he gave to his works the title of some celebrated composition, as la Payllanne Parvenue, 4 vols. 12mo. after Miravaux's Payfan Parvenu — Mille et une faveurs, 8 vols. 12mo. after Mille & une Nuits, &c. He wrote besides, Memoires d'une Fille de Qualité, 4 vols. 12mo. — Tablettes Dramatiques, &c. and died at Paris, 29th Feb. 1784, aged 82.

MOULIN, Peter du, son of the preceding, was chaplain to Charles II. and prebendary of Canterbury. He died 1684, aged 84. He was author of "the Peace of the Soul," 12mo. — Clamor Regii Sanguinis, ascribed by Milton to Alexander More — a Defence of the Protestant Religion.

MOULIN, Lewis, brother to the preceding, wrote Parænesis ad Edificatores Imperii, dedicated to Cromwell — Patronus Bonæ Fidei, against the church of England. He was a violent independent, and died 1680, aged 77.

MOULIN, Gabriel, a catholic minister of Maneval in the diocese of Lisieux. He wrote the History of Normandy, under the Dukes, 1631, folio — History of the Norman Conquests in Naples and Sicily, 1658, folio.

MOUNTFORT, William, a native of Staffordshire, known as an actor, and as a dramatic writer. He possessed great comic powers, and once displayed them with effect before lord Jefferies, and the court of London aldermen, by mimicking the gestures, manners, and delivery of the great lawyers of the times. Cibber speaks with great approbation of his successful exertions in comedy, as well as in tragedy, which had not even yet attained their highest excellence at his death. He was basely murdered by captain Hill, and lord Mohun, in Norfolk-street in the Strand, in the winter of 1692. Hill immediately escaped, and Mohun, when tried by his peers, was acquitted, as the evidence against him was not sufficiently strong and connected. Mountfort was author of six dramatic pieces.

MOURET, John Joseph, a musician, composer of some very elegant works, was born at Avignon 1682, and died 1738, at Charenton, near Paris.

MOURGUES, Michael, a French jesuit, author of a treatise on French Poetry, and on Geometry — and a collection of French bon-mots. He died 1713.

MOURGUES, Matthew de, an ex-jesuit, who wrote in favor of Richelieu, but afterwards deserted him to support the cause of the queen-mother. He died in the hospital of incurables at Paris 1670. His works are chiefly controversial.

MOUVANS, Poul Richard, a protestant officer, surnamed the Brave. He distinguished himself much in the civil wars of France, and was slain in battle, 1568.

MOXON, Joseph, a native of Wakefield, Yorkshire, who became hydrographer to the second Charles, and died about 1700, aged 73. He wrote several books on navigation, mathematics, astronomy, Mechanic Exercises, or the Doctrine of Handy-work, &c. and for some years taught mathematics in Warwick-lane, London, where he constructed globes, maps, &c.

MOYLE, Walter, an ingenious writer, born in Cornwall 1672. He was for some time at Oxford, and then entered at the Temple, where he studied the law, and acquired a strong bias in favor of the protestant succession. He was for some time in parliament, where he conducted himself in a very honorable and independent manner, and ably supported the bill for the encouragement of seamen. Retirement, however, was more congenial to him than the bustle of political life, and therefore he removed to his seat at Bake in Cornwall.

Cornwall, and devoted himself assiduously to literary pursuits. He died 9th June 1721, aged 49, and in 1726 his works appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. edited by Th. Serjeant, esq. and dedicated to his brother Joseph Moyle. A third volume was added 1727, by his friend Mr. Hammond. These volumes contain chiefly political pamphlets — Dissertations on some of the works of Xenophon and Lucian — besides Remarks on Prideaux's Connection — letters — and a treatise on the Miracles of the Thundering Legion, &c.

MOYSE, Henry, page to James I. and one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber, was born at Lanerk in Scotland, 1573. He accompanied his master to England, and as he was so near the royal person, he wrote a diary of what he saw and knew, which was published 1753. He lived in retirement the latter part of life, and died at Edinburgh 1630.

MOZART, Wolfgang, a German musician, born at Salzburg, where his father, also an eminent musician, was master of the chapel. He possessed such strong natural powers, that when a child he played before the emperor, and he, in approbation of his great merits, called him the Little Sorcerer. He was in 1763 in London with his father and sister, and after being heard with equal approbation by the king and the English nobility, he returned home three years after, and in 1769 went to Italy, where the pope honored him with the order of the golden spur. In 1781 he settled at Vienna, where he was liberally patronised by Joseph II. and the court, and where he died 1791, aged 35. Among his popular works, his six sonatas for the harpsichord, published in London, are particularly admired.

MUDGE, John, an ingenious physician, and able mechanic, who settled at Plymouth, where he died 1793, author of a treatise on Catarrhus Coughs, 12mo. &c. He also improved the construction of the reflecting telescope. His brother Thomas acquired celebrity as an ingenious watch and clock-maker, on which profession he wrote a treatise. Their father Zachary, was minister of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, and an able divine. He wrote a volume of admired sermons — an Essay for a New version of the Psalms, &c.

MUDO, Hernandez, a Spanish painter, the pupil of Titian. Though deaf and dumb, he acquired eminence, and was in the service of Philip II. of Spain, who employed him in ornamenting the Escorial, and his other palaces.

MUET, Peter le, a French architect, born at Dijon, 1591. His abilities were employed in fortifying several of the towns of Picardy, and also in the erection of the church of Val de Grace, at Paris, under the auspices of Anne of Austria. He wrote some valuable treatises on architecture, and died at Paris, 1669.

MUGGLETON, Lodovick, an English fanatic, originally a tailor. He pretended to be inspired by inward light, and while he collected followers after him, he made no scruple of damning all those who opposed or differed from his tenets. His fame began to spread about 1650. His books, which were replete with nonsense and impiety, were burnt by the common hangman, and himself pilloried and imprisoned, but not reformed. He died 12th March 1697, aged 90, and left behind him a sect, which, from the fondness of innovation and mysterious singularity in the vulgar, still subsists.

MUIS, Simeon de, an eminent orientalist, professor of Hebrew at Paris, and author of a Latin Commentary on the Psalms, in 2 vols. 4to. died 1664, aged 57.

MULGRAVE, Constantine Phipps lord, Vid. PHIPPS.

MULLRE, John, an eminent astronomer, called also Regiomontanus. Vid. REGIOMONTANUS.

MULLER, John, a famous Dutch engraver, brought up under Goltzius, whose manner he successfully imitated. His works are much esteemed. He flourished 1600.

MUMMIUS, Lucius, a Roman consul, known for his triumph over Corinth, Thebes, Chalcis, &c. He conveyed the famous pictures and ornaments of the conquered cities to Rome, and died in exile at Delos.

MUNCER, Thomas, a Saxon fanatic, born at Zwickaw in Misnia. He was one of Luther's disciples, but afterwards preached against him with equal violence as against the pope, and became the leader of the anabaptists. In conjunction with Storck he destroyed the images in the churches, and being with all his followers re-baptized naked, he began to regard all things in common, and to abolish all distinctions. Backed by 40,000 enthusiasts he commanded the sovereign princes of Germany to resign their authority to him as armed not only with temporal force, but with directions from heaven. His devastations were great, till the landgrave of Hesse took up arms. Muncer with the title of king met him in the field, promising his associates a complete victory, but after losing 7000 of his followers he fled to Franchaufen, where he was seized, and afterwards executed at Mulhausen, 1525.

MUNCKER, Thomas, the learned author of Mythographi Latini, of an edition of Hyginus with notes, &c. died 1680.

MUNDAY, Antony, a comic poet in the 16th century, of whom little is known. He was in the retinue of the earl of Oxford, and messenger of the queen's bed chamber. His plays were said to possess merit, but none of them are come down to the present times.

MUNDINUS, a celebrated anatomist, whose work on that subject was published at Paris 1478. He was born at Florence, and died at Bologna 1318.

MUNICH, Burchard Christopher, a native of New Huntorf in Oldenburgh. He learned the art of war under Marlborough and Eugene, and for his bravery at Malplaquet was made lieutenant-colonel. He was afterwards in the Polish, and then in the Russian service, but after being distinguished by the Czar Peter I. and made marshal by the empress Anne, and acquiring military glory in the wars against the Turks, he was disgraced by Elizabeth in 1741, and sent to Siberia. After 20 years' exile he was recalled by Peter III. and appeared at court in the same sheep skin dress which he had worn in his captivity. After being restored to the favor of Peter and Catherine, he lived in retirement, and died 1767, at Riga.

MUNNICKS, John, professor of physic, botany, and anatomy anatomy at Utrecht, and author of a dissertation "de Urinis," &c. — of Chirurgia ad Praxim hodiernam adornata — & de Re Anatomicâ, died 1711, aged 59.

MUNSTER, Sebastian, a German divine, born at Ingelheim 1489. He studied at Heidelberg and Basil, but after being in the society of the Cordeliers, he attached himself to the tenets of Luther. He published a "Chaldee Grammar and Lexicon — a Talmudic Dictionary" — an Universal Cosmography, folio — and a Latin Version of the Old Testament, for which two last works he was called the Strabo and the Estras of Germany. He wrote besides other valuable works, but though living in controversial times he never engaged in theological disputes. He died of the plague at Basil 1552, aged 63.

MUNTING, Abraham, a learned botanist, author of Phylographia Curiosa, folio — de Herbâ Britannicâ, 4to. — Aloes Historia, 4to. He was born at Groningen, and died 1683, aged 57.

MURALT, Beati Lewis de, a native of Berne, who died 1760. He travelled over various parts of Europe, and is author of Letters upon the French and English, 2 vols. 12mo. 1726 — fables, 8vo. 1753, &c.

MURATORI, Lewis Antony, an Italian writer, born at Vignola in the Bolognese 1672. He was invited when only 22, by Charles Borromæus, to be librarian at Milan, and in 1700, he was recalled to Modena by the duke, to take care of his library and to arrange his archives. Thus in the enjoyment of ease and retirement he devoted himself to literature, but he met like all others persecution and trouble from his enemies. He was accused of heresy and atheism, and was obliged to justify himself before the pope, Benedict XIV. who received his apologies with humanity and friendship, and wrote him a letter of approbation. He died 1750. His works have appeared in 46 vols. folio, and possess great merit. The best known are Anecdota quæ ex Ambrosianæ Bibliothecæ Codicibus nunc primum eruit Notis et Disquisitionibus, &c. — Anecdota Græcæ, quæ ex MSS. nunc primum eruit — Rerum Italicarum Scriptores ab Anno 500, ad 1500 — Antiquitates Italicæ Mediæ Ævi. — Novus Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum — Annali d'Italia — Della Perfetta Poesiana Italiana — le Rime del Petrarca — Italian poems, &c.

MURETUS, Mark Antony, a learned critic, born at Muret, near Limoges, 11th April, 1526. His abilities early displayed themselves, he read lectures on Cicero and Terence at Auch, and afterwards visited Agen, Villeneuve, Paris, Poitiers, and Bourdeaux, where he occasionally taught Latin authors for his maintenance. In 1552, he returned to Paris, but while he distinguished himself here by his oratorical and poetical talents he was accused of an unnatural crime. He fled to Toulouse where he read lectures on civil law, but here again it is said he forgot his character, and was condemned in 1554, say the registers of Toulouse, to be burnt in effigy with Memmius Fremiot of Dijon, his associate, as being a huguenot and a sodomite. He escaped from the public indignation to Italy, and after instructing youth for several years at Padua and Venice, he was invited 1560, by cardinal Hippolite d'Est to Rome. Here he led a life of regularity, was honored with the title of citizen of Rome by pope Gregory XIII. and was so much noticed by his patron that he attended him in 1562, in his office of legate to Paris. At Paris Muretus acquired celebrity by his lectures on Aristotle's Ethics, and on civil law. In 1576, he became an ecclesiastic and obtained some preferment, and in the latter part of life it is said entered into the society of the jesuits. He died at Paris 4th June, 1585. His works are numerous and consist of valuable orations, various readings and translations from Greek authors, especially Aristotle, poems, epistles, &c. all written in a pure, polished, and elegant style. They were collected together and published at Verona, in 5 vols. 8vo. Muretus was the friend and correspondent of various learned men, especially J. C. Scaliger, Lambinus, and others.

MURILLO, Bartholomew, a Spanish painter, born at Seville 1610. His landscapes and historical pieces were much admired, and compared to those of Paul Veronese, and they obtained for him from the king of Spain a patent of nobility. He died at Madrid 1682.

MURPHY, Arthur, a dramatic writer of eminence. He was born in Ireland of respectable parents, and educated at the school at St. Omer's, and on his return home he was placed under the care of a relation in London, engaged in commercial pursuits. Business, however, had no attractions for him, and he soon left the house of his friend to devote himself to the labors of a literary life. He had a strong partiality for the stage, but after trying his powers in Othello and other characters he resigned all pretensions to eminence on the theatre, and he determined to support himself by his pen. He studied the law at Lincoln's inn, and was called to the bar but did not practise, as the dramatic muse engaged the whole of his attention. He was particularly successful in his performances; of the 22 pieces which he wrote, most of them were received with the most flattering applause, and several of them are still retained on the stage, and at certain seasons exhibited to the public with increasing celebrity. As a man of letters he was intimate with the wits of the times, with Foote, Garrick, Johnson, Burke and others. Of his dramatic pieces the best known are the Orphan of China — the Grecian Daughter — All in the Wrong — the Way to Keep him — Know your Own Mind — Three Weeks after Marriage — the Apprentice — the Citizen, &c. which procured him with public esteem, both opulence and independence. He wrote besides the Gray's Inn Journal, a weekly paper, — the Test — and the Auditor, in favor of government — a Reply to Churchill's illiberal attack upon him; and he evinced his abilities as a learned scholar by his elegant translation of Tacitus, in 4 vols. — and Latin versions of the Temple of Fame — of Gray's Elegy, &c. He wrote also Garrick's Life. The three last years of his life his services to government were rewarded by a pension of 200l. a-year, and he was also a commissioner of bankrupts. In his manners he was affable and polite, and his urbanity was seasoned by an inexhaustible fund of anecdote. He died at his house in Brompton-row, Knightsbridge, 18th June, 1805, aged 78.

MURRAY, James, earl of, natural son of James V. of Scotland by the daughter of the earl of Mar, was born in 1529, and created earl of Murray by Mary queen of Scots. He proved the ingratitude of his heart by his barbarous conduct towards this unhappy princess, against whom he excited the nobles of the kingdom. On the flight and disgrace of Mary he was appointed regent of the kingdom during the minority of the young king, 1567, and he was shot four years after at Linlithgow, by Hamilton a gentleman whose wife he had seduced.

MURRAY, Thomas, a Scotch portrait painter. He possessed abilities, and was patronised by the Royal family, and the nobility, and died 1724, aged 58.

MURRAY, William, a Scotch divine, who settled at Birmingham as a dissenting minister. He wrote Closet Devotions, 12mo. and died 1753, aged 62.

MURRAY, James, a native of Dunkeld, educated at Aberdeen where he took the degree of M.A. He refused preferment at home, and settled in London where he preached to a congregation in Swallow street. He was author of Aletheia, or System of Moral Truths, 4 vols. 12mo. and he died 1758, aged 55. Another dissenting divine of that name wrote History of the American war, 4 vols. 8vo. — Sermons to Asses, 12mo. — History of the Churches of England and Scotland, 3 vols. and died 1782.

MURRAY, William, earl of Mansfield, a celebrated lawyer, fourth son of David, viscount Stormont, was born 2d March, 1705, at Perth, in Scotland. He was educated at Westminster school, and in 1723 was elected to Christ-church, Oxford. He took his master's degree in 1730, and then went on his travels, and at his return, entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar. He gradually rose to eminence, and distinguished himself as an eloquent orator, both at the bar and in the house of commons. He was in 1742, appointed solicitor general, and during the trial of lord Loyat before the peers, he displayed for much candor and liberality, that he received the thanks of the accused as well as of the president of the court, lord Talbot. In 1754 he succeeded to the office of attorney general, and two years after was raised to the dignity of chief justice of the king's bench, and soon after created baron Mansfield. In the unsettled state of public affairs in 1757, he held for a little time the office of chancellor of the exchequer, till by a coalition of parties, an efficient ministry was formed, whose vigor and wisdom upheld the glory of the British arms, and the honor of the nation. For some years after the accession of George III. this upright magistrate was attacked by malevolent insinuations, but the slanders of malice, and the virulence of party, failed to influence his conduct, or to interrupt that sedulous attention which he paid to the affairs of his office. To this unworthy treatment he alluded in pathetic, but firm language, on the business of Wilkes' outlawry, and concluded by observing that he honored the king, respected the people, but that many things acquired by the favor of either were not worth his ambition, and that he wished popularity, but such popularity as followed not that which is run after. He was three times offered the great seal which he declined, and in 1776, he was created an earl, with remainder to his nephews by lady Stormont. In 1780, when London exhibited a scene of tumult, devastation, and plunder, his house in Bloomsbury-square became an object of popular fury, and was burnt down by the mob, and together with it a very large collection of books and valuable manuscripts. For these, however, when offered an honorable compensation by a vote of the commons, he refused to accept any thing, but devoted himself with increasing assiduity to the labors of his high office. After filling with unusual activity and unshaken integrity this elevated situation for many years, the infirmities of age became so great that he resigned it in Jan. 1788, and in his honorable retirement was accompanied with the respect not only of the bar, but of the whole nation. This venerable man retained his faculties to the last, amidst the gradual decay of nature, and expired at his seat at Caenwood, 20th March, 1793, in the 89th year of his age. He was buried privately, according to his desire, in Westminster abbey. As he had no children his title descended to his nephew lord Stormont, who also inherited his immense fortune. The character of lord Mansfield stands high in the records of fame, for integrity, wisdom, and sagacious discernment. Whilst he presided in the king's bench the court was remarkable for the regularity, the punctuality, and the dispatch which his attentive mind introduced. With such impartiality were his decisions given that only in two cases, where the opinions of the judges were very discordant, the judgment of the court has been reversed, and therefore among those who have devoted the energies of their mind to promote the happiness and the good order of society, few will appear more entitled to the reverence and homage of applauding posterity, than lord Mansfield.

MURTOLA, Gaspard, an Italian poet, born at Genoa. His poem on the creation of the world, exposed him to the censures of Marini a contemporary poet; but after mutual abuse, Murtola at last attacked personally his antagonist, and fired a pistol at him, and nearly killed him. He wrote besides, a Latin poem, Nutriciarum Libri tres — a poem on Janus, &c. and died at Rome 1624.

MUSA, Antonius, a Greek physician in the service of Augustus. He acquired some reputation by first recommending the use of the cold bath, till the death of Marcellus brought this salutary plan into disrepute. Two tracts de Herbâ Botan. — de Valetudine tuendâ, are ascribed to him.

MUSÆUS, a celebrated poet of Greece before the age of Homer. The loves of Hero and Leander, preserved under his name, was the work of a more modern poet.

MUSCHENBROECK, Peter de, a celebrated natural philosopher and mathematician, born at Utrecht 1692. He was professor of philosophy and mathematics in his native town, and afterwards at Leyden, and was honored with a seat in the Royal society of London, and the academy of sciences at Paris. He died at Leyden full of reputation and literary honors. He wrote Tentamina Experimentorum, 4to. — Institutiones Physicæ, 4to. — Compendium Physicæ Experimentalis, 12mo. and a course of natural and experimental philosophy very much esteemed, and translated into English by Colson, 2 vols. 8vo.

MUSCULUS, Wolfgangus, a famous divine, born at Dieuze in Lorraine 1497. He was very poor and taken out of charity among the Benedictines whose society he forsook on embracing the tenets of Luther. He retired to Strasburg, where he married, but the narrowness of his circumstances obliged him to work for his bread, and while he gained applause as a preacher on a Sunday, he was under the necessity of laboring the rest of the week in transcribing the works of Bucer, who kindly entertained him in his house. From Strasburg he went in 1534, to Augsburg, where his eloquence was so powerful that the magistrates expelled their popish ministers. In 1548, however, Charles V. restored the catholic rites at Augsburg, and Musculus fled to Switzerland, where the magistrates of Bern promoted him to the divinity chair in their city. He died there Aug. 30th, 1563. He was a man of great learning, though he was 32 years old before he became acquainted with Greek, and 40 with Hebrew, and his abilities as a disputant were also successfully employed in ecclesiastical conferences. He wrote commentaries on some of the scriptures, and translated some of the works of the fathers into Latin.

MUSCULUS, Andrew, a Lutheran divine professor at Frankfort on the Oder. He was born at Schneberg in Misnia, and died 1580. He wrote various books and affected to understand well the prophecies of Scripture.

MUSGRAVE, William, a physician and antiquary, born at Charlton Musgrave, Somersetshire, 1657. He was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, where he became fellow and took his degree of M. D. 1689. He was made secretary to the Royal society, 1684, and member of the college of physicians, and in 1691, he settled at Exeter, where he practised with great reputation, and died 23d Dec. 1721. His works were de Arthritide, &c. — de Legionibus Epistola — de Aquilis Romanis — Geta Britannicus, &c. — Belgium Britannicum, &c. His son was also a physician at Exeter, and wrote some critical pieces. He brought himself into public notice by charging the ministry with bribery, at the peace of 1763, which he could not substantiate when brought before the commons. He died 1777.

MUSIUS, Cornelius, professor of belles lettres and languages in Flanders, was born at Delft 1503. He was afterwards placed at the head of a convent at home, and put to an ignominious and barbarous death, on account of his religion, by William Lumei, 1572. He was author of some poems much admired.

MUSSASA, a warlike princess, who succeeded her father Dongy as sovereign of Congo. She dressed herself in a male habit, and often conducted her soldiers to battle and to victory, and extended far the boundaries of her empire. She flourished in the 17th century.

MUSSATI, Albertin, an historian and poet of Padua, minister to the emperor Henry VII. was author of de Gestis Henrici VII. Imperat. — de Gestis Italorum post Henricum, and died 1329. His works were edited at Venice 1636. folio.

MUSO, Cornelius, a famous preacher, made bishop of Bitonto by pope Paul IV. and sent to assist at the council of Trent. He was born at Placentia 1511, and died at Rome 9th Jan. 1574. His sermons are curious, and contain quotations from Homer, and other mythological letters, as much as from the scriptures.

MUSTAPHA, I. succeeded his brother Achmet as emperor of Turkey 1617, and was at last strangled 1623, by his janissaries, after being deposed and again reinitiated during a turbulent reign of six years.

MUSTAPHA II. son of the fourth Mahomet, succeeded after his uncle Achmet II. 1695. He was an able warrior, and after defeating the Imperialists at Temeswar, he attacked the Venetians, Poles, and Russians with success, till a change of fortune rendered him unpopular and obliged him to make peace. He retired to Adrianople, where he forgot himself in luxury and lascivious pleasures, till a dreadful revolt of his subjects compelled him to descend from the throne 1703. He died of melancholy six months after.

MUSTAPHA III. son of Achmet III. succeeded to the Turkish throne 1757. He spent his time in the pleasures of his seraglio, and left the cares of government to his ministers and favorites. He died 1774, before the conclusion of that fatal war which had been kindled between him and the Russians.

MUSURUS, Marcus, a learned native of Candia, who taught Greek in the universities of Venice, Padua, and Rome, and contributed much to the revival of letters. He was made bishop of Malvasia, in the Morea, by pope Leo X. and died of a dropy soon after, 1517. He was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and to his critical knowledge the public was indebted for the first edition of Aristophanes and Athenæus. He published also Etymologicum Magnum Græcorum, a valuable work printed at Venice, folio, 1499, and Heidelberg 1594.

MUTIAN, Jeremy, a painter, born at Brescia 1528. He studied the manner of Titian, and his landscapes and historical pieces were much admired. He died at Rome 1590.

MUTIUS, Caius Scævola, an illustrious Roman, distinguished for his attack on Porfenna, who had threatened the destruction of Rome.

MUTIUS, Hulric, historical professor of Basil, was author of a History of Germany, printed at Basil 1539.

MUY, Louis Nicolas Victor count de, a native of Marseilles, who acquired celebrity in the military profession, and signalized himself by his valor in the battles of Fontenoy, of Hastenback, of Crevelt, and of Minden. He was raised for his services to the rank of marshal of France, and of war minister, but died soon after, of the stone, 10th Oct. 1775, aged 64.

MUYS, William, a native of Sleenvick, Over-yssel, who was successfully promoted to the chairs of medicine, chemistry, and botany, at Franeker, where he died 1744. He was an able writer, and gave to the world besides orations, &c. Elements of Natural Philosophy, 4to. — Inventio Fabricæ quæ in Partibus Musculis componentibus extat, 4to. — de Virtute Seminali quæ Plantæ et Animalia Generi suo propagand. sufficiunt.

MUZIO, Jerome, a native of Padua, author of Della Vergeriane, lib. 4, 1559, 8vo. — di Fesa Della Messa, &c. — Lettere Catoliche — le Mentite Ochiniene against Olpinus

Olpinus — il Duello et la Faustina — Notes on Petrarch, &c. He also wrote against the protestants, and died 1576.

MYN, Herbert Vander, a Dutch painter of Amsterdam. His flowers, &c. as well as his portraits and historical pieces were deservedly admired. He died 1741, aged 57.

MYREPSUS, Nicolas, a physician of Alexandria in the 13th century. He collected a "Pharmacopœia," from the writings of Greek and Arabic physicians, which was for some time much followed among medical men in Europe. It was translated from the Greek into Latin, by Fusch, and published 1658.

MYSON, a celebrated Greek philosopher, placed by some among the seven wise men.

MYTENS, Arnold, a native of Bruffels, eminent as a painter. His best pieces adorn the churches of Italy. He died 1602, aged 61.

MYTENS, Martin, a native of Stockholm, known as a painter. Though liberally invited by Peter the Great, whose portrait he took, to settle in Russia; he refused it, and after visiting Italy and other parts of Europe he lived at Vienna, highly and deservedly respected by the emperor Charles VI. and by the court. He died there 1755, aged 60.

N.

NAL

NABI-EFFENDI, a Turkish poet of great merit. He was well acquainted with the classic writers of Greece and Rome, and gained applause by his poems. He flourished in the 17th century.

NABIS, king of Lacedæmon, disgraced himself by his cruelties and extortions. He was put to death B. C. 94.

NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon, supposed to be the Baladan of scripture. His name is celebrated in history, as the founder of that epoch which began B. C. 747.

NABOPOLASSAR, king of Babylon, invaded and divided the kingdom of Syria, with Ashtages B. C. 626. He was afterwards defeated by Necho king of Egypt, and died after a reign of 21 years.

NÆVIUS, Cneius, a Latin poet, banished from Rome by the consul Metellus, who was offended by the satire of his comedies. He died at Utica B. C. 230.

NAHUM, one of the minor prophets, born at Elkost in Galilee. He prophesied in the reign of Hezekiah, and directed his predictions against Niniveh. His languages is bold and animated, possessing fire and sublimity.

NAIRON, Faustus, a Maronite, nephew of Eccheensis, and professor of Syriac in the Sapienza college, at Rome, where he died 1711, aged 80. He wrote Euoplia Fidei Catholicæ, &c. 1694 — Dissertatio de Maronitarum Origine, &c. 1679. He maintains in these books that the Maronites have preserved inviolate the christian faith from the time of the apostles, and that they derive their name not from Maro the Monothelite, who died 707, but from St. Maro, an Anachoret of the fourth century.

NALSON, Valentine, a native of Malton, Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and made prebendary of York, and rector of St. Mary there. He wrote a volume of sermons, &c. and died 1724, aged 83.

NAN

NALTON, James, minister of St. Leonard's, Fosterlane, was concerned in Love's plot, and fled to Holland. He was afterwards ejected for non-conformity, 1662, and died the next year of a dreadful melancholy. Some of his sermons were published.

NANCEL, Nicholas de, a native of Nancel, near Soissons, who became a physician of some eminence, and after practising in several towns, settled at the abbey of Fontevrault, where he died 1610. He wrote Stichologia Græca Latinaque, &c. 8vo. — the Life of Peter Ramus — De Immortalitate Animæ, 8vo. &c.

NANI, John Baptist, a Venetian noble, proctor of St. Mark, was born 30th Aug. 1616. He was, through his abilities, admitted into the college of senators, 1641, and went as ambassador to France, and in that capacity had such influence upon Mazarine, that he obtained from the French court, succours in men and money to continue the war against the Turks in Candia. He was afterwards ambassador to the emperor, and received the highest approbation from his fellow citizens, who appointed him, for his services, proctor of St. Mark, and captain general of the marine. He died much respected, 5th Nov. 1678. He was the author of an History of Venice, undertaken at the request of the senate, the best edition of which is that of 1679, 2 vols. 4to. He wrote also an account of his embassy in France.

NANNIUS, Peter, born at Alcaer, 1500, was professor at Louvain, and died 1557. He wrote, Learned Notes on Classic Authors — Miscellaneorum Decas, &c. 8vo. — Dialogues on Heroines, 4to. an excellent work — Paraphrase on the Canticles — a translation of the Psalms into Latin verse.

NANQUIER, Simon, a French poet in the 16th century. He chiefly excelled in Latin composition, and his epigrams — his poem De Lubrico Temporis Curriculum, &c. possess merit.

NANTIGNI, Lewis Chazot de, a French writer, author of Historical Genealogies of Kings, Emperors, and other Sovereigns of Europe, 4 vols. 4to. — Geographical Tables, 12mo. — Genealogies in the Supplement to Moreri, 1749 — Historical, Genealogical, and Chronological Tables, 9 vols. He died at Paris, after being blind three years, 1755, aged 65.

NANTUEIL, Robert, a French painter and engraver of eminence, born at Rheims, 1630. He was well educated, though his father was poor, but his exertions were not sufficiently rewarded at home, and therefore he went to Paris, in quest of employment and patronage. He particularly excelled in taking likenesses in crayons, and his portrait of Lewis XIV. was executed with such dexterity and elegance, that the monarch liberally rewarded him with 100 louis, and gave him a pension, with the new appointment of designer and engraver to his cabinet. Thus patronized, he soon gained a considerable fortune, and in the gratitude of his heart, sent for his aged father to share his honors and his independence. He died at Paris, Dec. 18th, 1678. His works have been collected, and consist of about 240 prints.

NAOGEORGUS, Thomas, a native of Straubingen, in Bavaria, 1511. His real name was Kirchmayer, but was altered according to the fashion of the times. His satires, which possessed merit, were chiefly directed against the papists, and their many irregularities. His best work is Regnum Papisticum, 1559, 8vo. He died 1578.

NAPIER, or NEPER, John, baron of Merchiston, was born near Edinburgh, 1550. He studied at the university of St. Andrew's, and after making the tour of France, Italy, and Germany, he returned to Scotland, and devoted himself assiduously to mathematical pursuits. His abilities were of a superior cast, and he has rendered his name immortal by the discovery of logarithms, published 1614. This science was afterwards further improved by himself, and also by Mr. Briggs, geometrical professor of Gresham college. Lord Napier published also an useful work, called Rabdology and Promptuary. His invention of the five circular parts in trigonometry, and the mode of calculation by rods, called Napier's rods, or bones, were very ingenious contrivances. He is also author of an "Essay on the Apocalypse," which proves his knowledge of theology in a very honorable degree. He died at Manchester, 1617. His life has been written by lord Buchan.

NARES, James, doctor of music, and brother to judge Nares, was born at Stanwell, Middlesex, 1715. He was one of the choristers of the royal chapel, and studied under Mr. Gates, and afterwards Dr. Pepusch, and in 1734 became organist at York. In 1755 he was appointed organist and composer to the king, in the room of Dr. Green, and the next year he took his musical degree at Cambridge, and in 1757 was made master of the choristers, which he resigned in 1780 to his pupil and friend, Dr. Ayrton. He died 10th Feb. 1783. He was highly respected by the great, and by men of learning, and his works are much admired, especially the Royal Pastoral, an ode, the words of which were written by Mr. Bellamy.

NARSES, king of Persia after his father Varanes, was successful against the Romans, but afterwards was defeated. He died A. D. 303.

NARSES, a Persian eunuch, in the service of the Roman emperors. He bravely headed their armies against the Goths, whom he defeated, A. D. 552.

NASH, Thomas, an ingenious writer, born at Leiston, in Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge. He took orders, but his irregularities were in the way of his preferment. His poems, chiefly directed against the puritans, and especially his "Pierce Pennyles," possess merit, but with their satire, breathe nothing but disappointment and disgust at the ingratitude of mankind. He died about 1600.

NASH, Richard, an extraordinary character, born at Swansea, Glamorganshire, 18th Oct. 1674. From Carmarthen school he went to Jesus college, Oxford, where he became known more for his love of pleasure, and his intrigues, than for his application or industry. From college, where his extravagancies gave offence to his superiors, he entered the army, and obtained a pair of colors; but this profession he soon relinquished for a town life, and the study of the law at the Temple. Admired and courted as a jovial companion, he became the arbiter elegantiarum of the fashionable world, and when the Middle Temple, according to custom, exhibited an entertainment for king William, Nash had the management of the ceremony, which was so well conducted, that the monarch offered him the honor of knighthood, which he declined. In 1704 Nash went to Bath, which now began to be a place of resort, and being elected master of ceremonies, by the influence of his friends, and the popularity of his own character, he soon made that city the resort of the gay, the fashionable, and the opulent. Under his direction the greatest regularity was made to prevail in the public rooms, and Bath, lately known to few, became the centre of attraction for persons in the higher rank of life. In the midst of this gay assemblage, Nash supported his expences chiefly from the gaming table; but with this vicious propensity, predominant in his character, he was humane, generous, and charitable, and though persecuted by creditors, he has often been known to bestow on the cravings of indigence, what was due from him to patient industry. Flattered with the appellation of the king of Bath, and called in his gayer days, beau Nash, this umpire of fashion continued his career of genteel dissipation, though his income was precarious, and his resources depended on chance. In the decline of life, it is said, that he became very poor, and that the presents which formerly he had received from the partiality of the great, and the favor of the opulent, were all disposed of, to support his necessities. His last moments brought with them unpleasing reflections, and he expired in great agitation of mind, 3d Feb. 1761, aged 87. As he had so much contributed to the celebrity of Bath, and had been the chief promoter of the building of an hospital, the people of the city shewed due respect to his remains, which were conveyed with becoming funeral pomp to the abbey church, and there interred.

NASINI, Joseph Nicholas, a native of Sienna. He studied painting under Ciro Ferri, and his abilities were employed employed in historical works, by the grand duke of Tuscany. He died 1736, aged 76.

NATALIS, Michael, an engraver of Liege. From the house of his father, who instructed him in the art of engraving, he went to Rome, and studied under Joachim Sandraart. His engraved representations of statues, after the paintings of Rubens, Titian, &c. from the Justinian gallery, were much admired. He died 1670, aged 61.

NATHAN, a prophet in the age of David. The pathetic parable of the poor man's lamb, by which he reproved that monarch's cruel and unmanly murder of Uriah, and his adulterous intercourse with Bathsheba, his wife, is well known.

NATHAN, Isaac, or Mordecai, the first who published a Hebrew Concordance, which he completed 1448, after 10 years' labor. It was first printed at Venice, 1523, and afterwards improved by Buxtorf, and edited Basil, 1632.

NATTIER, John Mark le, a French painter, born 17th March, 1685. His designs for the Luxemburg gallery have been engraved and printed, 1 vol. folio, 1710. He was professor in the academy of painting, and was patronized by Lewis, but he declined the liberal invitations of the Czar Peter to settle in Russia. He died 1766, leaving three daughters.

NATTIER, Lawrence, a native of Bilberach, in Swabia, who engraved entaglios, and published a book of ancient gems. He died at Petersburg, of an asthma, 27th Dec. 1763.

NAVAGERO, Andrew, a noble Venetian, whose abilities were employed as ambassador to Francis I. He died of a fever at Blois, 1529, aged 44. He was engaged in writing the History of Venice, but burnt the work in his last illness. His poems are preserved in the "Carmina Poetarum Italarum," and his other works were printed at Padua, 1718, 4to.

NAVAGERO, Bernard, of the same family as the preceding, was bishop of Verona, and a cardinal. He assisted at the council of Trent, and died 1565, aged 58. He wrote the Life of pope Paul IV.

NAVARRÉ, Peter, a famous warrior in the 16th century. He was born in Biscay, of an obscure family, and after being for some time a seaman, he entered into the service of cardinal Aragon, as valet. He next served in the army of the Florentines, and then engaged in the sea service, where he distinguished himself by his valor. Known for his bravery, he was employed by Gonfalso de Cordova in the Neapolitan wars, as captain, and he contributed much to the taking of Naples by the judicious management of a mine. His services were rewarded by the emperor, who gave him the domains of Alvetto, in Naples, from which he assumed the name of Navarre. He afterwards failed in an expedition against the Moors of Africa, and took possession of Oran, Tripoli, and other fortified places; but part of his army was defeated by the Moorish cavalry. His campaigns in Italy afterwards were unfortunate, and he was taken at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and for two years endured captivity in France. The ill treatment of the Spanish king determined him to enter into the service of Francis I. and he distinguished himself in several expeditions, but in his attempt to relieve Genoa, he was taken by the imperial troops. For three years he languished in the dungeons of Œuf, till the treaty of Madrid set him free. He was at the siege of Naples in 1528 under Lautrec, and was taken prisoner at the retreat of Averla, and again sent to the dungeons of Œuf. Here his life was spared by the duke of Orange, and either in compassion for his misfortunes and his valor, or because he was laboring under a severe illness, he was not beheaded with the rest of the captives who were devoted to destruction. He died soon after, though some assert that he was strangled in his bed in an advanced age. An account of his life has been published by Paul Jovius, and by Philip Tomafini. His remains were honored in the 17th century by a splendid monument in the church of St. Mary the Neuve, in Naples, by the duke of Sessa.

NAVARETTA, Ferdinand, a Spanish Dominican, of Old Castille, whose eloquence was employed as a missionary in China 1659. He was well acquainted with the language of the country, and on his return to Spain 1672, he went before the pope to account for his mission. He was made by Charles II. archbishop of St. Domingo, where he died 1689. He printed at Madrid, in Spanish, his treatise, Historical, Political, and Moral, of China, but only one folio volume appeared, as the two others were suppressed by the inquisition.

NAVARETTA, Balthasar, a Spanish Dominican, at the end of the 16th century, who published, 3 vols. folio, Controversiæ in D. Thoma ejusque Scholæ Defensionem, 1634.

NAUCLERUS, John, a native of Swabia, who changed the name of Vergeau into that of Naclerus, and became professor of law at Tübingen, and provost of the cathedral. He died at the beginning of the 16th century. His Chronicle from the Creation to the year 1500, is a work of merit, of which the best edition is that of Cologne in folio, 1570.

NAUDE, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris, 12th Feb. 1600. After studying with great assiduity at Paris, he went further to improve himself to Padua, where he took his degrees in physic. In 1631 he was made librarian to cardinal Bagni, at Rome, and after his death he was with equal liberality patronized by Barberini. He was invited by Richelieu to Paris, and was treated with great kindness by his successor Mazarine, over whose library he presided, and from whom he received several benefices. He attended Christina at the court of Sweden, but he did not remain long there; and the fatigues of his journey threw him into a fever, of which he died at Abbeville, 29th July, 1653. He wrote, Apology for great Men who have been accused of Magic, 12mo. — Advice for forming a Library — Addition to the Life of Lewis XI. — Bibliographia Politica — Synagma de Studio Militari — de Studio Liberali — a Discourse against Libels, &c.

NAUDE, Philip, a mathematician, born at Metz, 1654. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to Berlin, where he became professor of mathematics, and member of the academy. He died there 1729, much respected. He published a "treatise on Geometry," in German, 4to, and was succeeded in his professorship by his son, who died 1745.

NAVIER,

NAVIER, Peter Toussaint, a native of St. Dizier, who died at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1779. He practised as a physician, and is eminently known for his discovery of nitrous ether, and the combination of mercury with iron, hitherto regarded as impossibilities. His knowledge in epidemical disorders was very great, and his prescriptions very successful; and to the truest meekness and modesty, he united the highest humanity and benevolence. He wrote a Dissertation on common Diseases—Observations on the Softening of the Bones—Reflections on the Danger of Hasty Burials, and the Abuses of Interments in Churches—Antidotes against Arsenic, 2 vols. 12mo—on the Use of Burgundy in Putrid Fevers—de Thermis Borboniensibus, 4to. &c.

NAYLER, James, a quaker, born at Ardley, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1616. He was in 1641 a private in the parliamentary army, and rose to the office of quarter-master under Lambert, but quitted the military life in 1649. The preaching and conversation of George Fox, converted him to quakerism, 1651, and thinking himself now divinely inspired, he became an itinerant minister of his persuasion. In 1656 he was imprisoned for his extravagant conduct at Exeter, where his followers addressed him as the prince of peace; and afterwards, when liberated from confinement, he went to Bristol, he was accompanied by an enthusiastic cavalcade, who sang before him, holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of hosts, Hosanna in the highest. This fanatic zeal was noticed by the parliament; Nayler was accused and condemned, as guilty of blasphemy, and as an impostor, he was exposed in the pillory, and whipped, and branded on the forehead, his tongue was bored through with a red hot iron at the Old Exchange, and he was then imprisoned in Bridewell for life. After two years' imprisonment he was set at liberty, and in 1660 he left London to return to Wakefield, to his wife and family, but died by the way, and was buried at King's Ripon. His writings have appeared in an 8vo. volume, 1716.

NEAL, Daniel, a native of London, educated at a dissenting academy, and afterwards at Utrecht and Leyden. He was chosen pastor of a congregation of independents in Aldergate-street, and afterwards in Jewin-street, and died 1743, aged 65. He wrote an History of the Puritans, 4 vols. 8vo.—History of New England, 2 vols. 8vo.—sermons, &c.

NEANDER, Michael, a learned protestant, born at Soza in Silesia, 1523. He was made rector of the university of Ilfeldt, and presided over it for forty years, and at Pfortsheim, where he died 26th April, 1595. He was author of Erotemata Linguae Græcæ, 8vo.—a Hebrew Grammar—Pindarica Aristologia—Gnomologia, &c.—There was a physician of the same name, who died at Jena 1581, author of Synopsis Menfurarum & Ponderum, 4to. 1555.

NEARCHUS, one of Alexander's officers, who was employed by his master to examine the Indian seas in a voyage of discovery. His voyage from India to Ormus, still extant, has become particularly interesting by the valuable annotations and ingenious remarks of Dr. Vincent.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR I. or NABUCHADONOSOR, king of Nineveh and Babylon, supposed to be the Nabopolassar who founded the kingdom of Nineveh.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR II. king of Babylon, is supposed to be the son of the preceding. He invaded Judæa, and carried the inhabitants into captivity. He afterwards, according to the relation of scripture, was banished from the society of men, and herded among the beasts of the field. After seven years, he was restored to his dignity, and died about 562 B. C. in the 44th year of his reign.

NECHO, or the PHARAOH NECHO of scripture, was king of Egypt after his father Psammetichus. The expedition which his ships undertook from the Red sea round the coast of Africa to the entrance of the Mediterranean, is famous, and was completed in three years. Necho marched against Assyria, and in this way defeated the Jews under Josiah, but was afterwards routed, and returned in disgrace. He died about 600 B. C.

NECK, John Van, a native of Naarden, eminent as a painter. His naked figures were particularly admired. His best piece is Simeon holding in his arms the infant Saviour, preserved in a church at Amsterdam. He died 1714, aged 79.

NECKER, Noel Joseph, a native of Flanders, who applied himself to botany and to medicine, in which sciences he obtained celebrity. He wrote Deliciae Gallo-Belgicae Sylvestres, 2 vols. 12mo.—Physiologia Muscorum, 8vo.—Methodus Muscorum, 8vo.—Hist. Nat. du Taffilage, &c. 8vo.—Elementa Botanica—Eclaircissement sur la Propagation, &c. 8vo. He died at Manheim 1793, aged 64.

NECKER, James, a native of Geneva, known as a financier. He was at first member of the council of 200 at Geneva, and then went as ambassador from the republic to France, where in 1765, he obtained the office of syndic to the East India company, and in 1775 was made director of the Royal treasury. His abilities were so highly respected, that he was, though a foreigner, twice elevated to the rank of prime minister of France; but the revolution, to which, as some imagine, his financial schemes had imperceptibly contributed, destroyed his popularity, and he yielded to the storm, and retired to Switzerland, where he died at Copet 1804, aged 72. He is author of a work on the Finances of France, 3 vols.—a treatise on the Influence of Religious Opinions, &c. His wife was the daughter of a protestant divine, and she rendered herself known not only by her writings, but by the amiable virtues of her character. When her husband was raised to the highest offices of France, she did not assume the manners of supercilious pride, but continued the friend of the learned, and the protectress of the poor, whose necessities she relieved with a liberal hand. Among her illustrious friends were Thomas and Buffon. She followed her husband's disgrace to Copet, where she died 1795. Her works are a treatise on Hasty Burials, 8vo.—Mémorial on the Establishment of Hospitals—Reflections on Divorce—Miscellanies from her MSS. published after her death. Her daughter by Mr. Necker, married baron de Stael Holstein, the Swedish ambassador at the court of France, and she has acquired some celebrity not only only by the intrigues which she carried on during the revolution, but by "Delphine," a romance, full of indecent and irreligious sentiments.

NECKHAM, Alexander, canon of Exeter, and abbot of St. Mary's, Cirencester, was admired as a learned man, and as a poet, and therefore called Miraculum Ingenii. He wrote Commentaries on the Psalms—a treatise de Nominibus Utensilium, &c. and died 1227.

NECTARIUS, a pious native of Tarsus, made patriarch of Constantinople 381. He died 397.

NEEDHAM, Marchmont, an English writer, born at Burford, Oxfordshire, Aug. 1620. He was educated at All Souls' college, and St. Mary's hall, Oxford, then accepted the place of usher in Merchant Taylors' school; and at the breaking out of the civil wars, became writer to an attorney at Gray's inn. Here he engaged in the publication of a periodical paper, called Mercurius Britannicus, in which he favoured the republican party; but afterwards he was reconciled to the royalists, obtained the king's pardon, and began to serve his cause by his Mercurius Pragmaticus. This, however, soon endangered his safety; he was imprisoned by the parliament in Newgate, and then persuaded to embrace the cause of the independents, which he again did with warmth in his new paper, called Mercurius Politicus. He had in the mean time studied physic, and taken his degrees, and on the return of Charles II. he obtained his pardon under the great seal, and practised as a physician, much respected among the dissenters. He died suddenly 1678. He was a man of great abilities, but his change of principles according to the prevalence of party, rendered him suspected and despicable. Besides his Mercuries, he wrote various political pamphlets, which, though read with avidity in his time, are not now worth recording.

NEEDHAM, John Tuberville, a Roman catholic, born in London 1713, and educated at Douai. His abilities recommended him to be professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon, and afterwards he became travelling tutor to several English and Irish noblemen. He was fellow of the London Royal society, and was appointed rector of the academy of sciences at Brussels, where he died 1781. Though a learned, he was a very superstitious character. He wrote Enquiries on Microscopical Discoveries, and Organized Bodies—Observations on Spallanzani's Discoveries—Enquiries on Nature and Religion—besides some Observations inserted in Buffon's Natural History.

NEEDLER, Benjamin, a native of Lalam, Middlesex, educated at Merchant Taylors', and St. John's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was afterwards minister of Margaret Moses, Friday-street, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He then settled at North Warnborough, Hants, where he died June, 1682. He wrote an Exposition of the first five chapters of Genesis.

NEEDLER, Thomas, an English writer of the Navy office, author of some prose and poetical works, published by Duncombe, 1724, 12mo. He was of amiable manners, and died 1718, aged 28.

NEL

NEEFS, Peter, a Flemish painter, educated under Steenwick. His paintings in perspective, and especially the inside of churches, are much admired. His son also possessed merit as a painter, but inferior to his father.

NEER, Arnold Van der, a native of Amsterdam, celebrated as a painter of landscapes and moon-light scenes. He died 1683, aged 64. His son, called Hendric, was eminent as an historical and portrait painter, and died 1703.

NEHEMIAH, a Jew, son of Hachaliah, born at Babylon during the captivity. He was cup-bearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, by whom he was permitted to return to Jerusalem, to rebuild the city and temple, which he effected 454 B. C. He died at Jerusalem 430, after governing his nation with justice and integrity 30 years.

NELLER, George Christopher, a learned divine, belonging to the cathedral of Treves, and counsellor to the elector. He wrote Dissertatio de Decretis Basilensibus—de Primatu S. Ecclesiæ Trevirensis.—Hermania inauguralis in Balduani Trev. Documentum, &c.—de Juribus Parochi Primitivi—de Genuina Idea & Signis Parochialitatis, &c.—de Solido Ficto, de Solido Speciei Argento, &c. He died at Treves, 1784, aged 74.

NELSON, Robert, a celebrated Englishman, generally called the Pious Nelson, was born in London, 22d June, 1656. He was educated at St. Paul's school, and afterwards privately, by Dr. G. Bull, of Saddington, Gloucestershire, and then sent to Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1680 he was admitted fellow of the Royal society, and in the same year he began his travels in the company of his friend Dr. Halley. He visited Paris, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he became acquainted with lady Theophila Lucy, the rich widow of sir Kingmill Lucy, bart. and daughter of lord Berkeley, whom he married on his return to England. This lady soon after declared herself of the catholic persuasion, but though she spoke and wrote in favor of her principles, against what her husband published, their mutual affection was never diminished by controversy, or embittered by religious disagreements. Firm in his principles, Nelson remained attached to his creed, and to his sovereign, and he not only refused to transfer his allegiance to William, but declared himself a nonjuror. This conduct did not render him less dear to his many respectable friends; he was still regarded by Tillotson, though they disagreed in political opinions, and such was their attachment, that the venerable prelate was attended in his last illness by his worthy friend, and died in his arms. About the end of 1709, he returned to the communion of the church of England, and in this he yielded to the arguments of some able and pious divines. He was, about 1713, attacked by an asthma and dropsy in the breast, of which he died at Kensington, 16th Jan. 1714-5. He was the first person buried in the cemetery of St. George's church, where a Latin inscription by bishop Smalridge, records his virtues. This great, learned, and amiable man wrote various works, the best known of which are his Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England, 8vo. a useful work, often reprinted. He wrote wrote besides, the Practice of True Devotion, 12mo. — Transubstantiation contrary to Scripture, 4to. — the Great Duty of frequenting the Christian Sacrifice, 8vo. — the Life of his Friend Bishop Bull, 8vo. — a Letter to Dr. Clarke on his Doctrine of the Trinity — Addresses to Persons of Quality, &c. — the Whole Duty of a Christian, in question and answer — a Letter on Church Government, &c.

NELSON, Valentine, author of some sermons, Vid. NALSON.

NELSON, Horatio viscount, an illustrious English seaman. He was the fourth son of the Rev. Edward Nelson, and was born 29th Sept. 1758, at Burnham Thorpe, Norfolk, of which his father was rector. He began his education at Norwich school, afterwards removed to North Waltham, and at the age of 12, when the nation was threatened with war, in consequence of the disputes about the Falkland islands, he entered on board the Raisonable of 64 guns, under his maternal uncle captain Maurice Suckling. Soon after that ship was put out of commission, and the young seaman went to the West Indies, in the merchants' service, but again joined his uncle on board the Triumph, and in 1773 was permitted to accompany the expedition which was sent under the command of captains Phipps and Lutwidge on a voyage of discovery to the North pole. In this voyage he, as coxswain to captain Lutwidge, gained great reputation for boldness, zeal, and perseverance, and on his return he went to the West Indies, on board the Sea-horse under captain Farmer. He rose to the rank of lieutenant in April 1777, and was immediately employed as second of the Loweftoffe, of 32 guns on the Jamaica station, from which he was removed to the command of a schooner, and thus was enabled to acquire a perfect knowledge of the intricate navigation of the seas near Hispaniola. In June 1779 he obtained under admiral Peter Parker, the appointment of post captain, and the command of the Hinchinbroke, and when an attack was expected in Jamaica from the French forces under D'Estaing, the youthful hero was entrusted with the care of the batteries of Port Royal, and the defence of Kingston and Spanish Town. In the attack made in 1780, upon Fort Juan, in the gulf of Mexico, his perseverance was of infinite benefit to the public service, and by his intrepidity the out-posts were gallantly stormed, and the place reduced. The next ship which he commanded was the Janus, of 44 guns, and soon after he was removed to the Albemarle, and continued on the American station with sir Samuel Hood till the peace. In 1783 he visited France, and the next year he was appointed to the Boreas of 28 guns, at the Leeward islands, and during his continuance in this station he married, March 1787, Frances Herbert Nesbit, widow of Dr. Nesbit, of Nevis, and daughter of W. Herbert, esq. senior judge of that island. He returned to England, Nov. 1787, and retired to Burnham Thorpe, in the bosom of domestic happiness, till 1793, when the war with France called upon him for the exertion of his great talents. He obtained the command of the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, and joined lord Hood in the Mediterranean, where he assisted at the taking of Toulon, and at the siege of Bastia, in which he superintended the disembarkation of the troops, and ably commanded the batteries. He afterwards had a gallant encounter with five French ships of war, and then supported the siege of Calvi, where he lost the sight of his right eye, in consequence of some particles of sand being violently driven against it by one of the shots of the enemy's batteries. Under the next commander, lord Hotham, he continued to distinguish himself, particularly in the engagements with the French fleet, 15th March and July, 1795, and in the blockade of Genoa. When admiral Jervis succeeded in the Mediterranean command, the brave hero removed from the Agamemnon to the Captain, of 74 guns, and soon after obtained a commodore's pendant, and was employed in the blockade of Leghorn, and the taking of Porto Ferrajo. On his passage to Gibraltar, in the Minerva frigate, he fell in with two Spanish frigates, one of which, the Sabine, of 40 guns, he took, and sailing immediately to join admiral Jervis, he was pursued by two ships of the Spanish fleet, a circumstance which was quickly communicated to the commander in chief, and in a few hours produced a general action. In this memorable fight, on the 14th Feb. 1797, in which 15 English ships defeated a Spanish fleet of 27 ships, and took four three deckers, the commodore behaved with his usual gallantry. In the Captain, to which he had shifted his flag, he attacked the Santissima Trinidad, of 136 guns, and passing to the St. Nicholas, of 80 guns, and then to the San Joseph, of 112 guns, he had the happiness to see both these ships strike to his superior valor. For his gallant conduct on this occasion, he was created knight of the Bath, and in April 1797, he was made rear admiral of the blue, and appointed to the command of the inner squadron in the blockade of Cadiz. After making some vigorous, but unsuccessful attacks on the town, he was sent by lord St. Vincent, to take the town of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, but though he obtained possession of the place for seven hours, he was unable to reduce the citadel, and therefore was permitted to retire unmolested to his fleet. During this desperate attack he lost his right hand, which was shattered by a shot, but his life was preserved by the attention of his son-in-law, captain Nesbit, who during the darkness of the night, missed him from his side, and returning, found him exhausted on the ground, and carried him safe on his back to the shore, where a boat conveyed him to his ship. In consequence of his wound the gallant admiral received a pension of 1000l. and in the memorial which, according to custom, he presented to his majesty on the occasion, he declared in the simple language of truth, that in the glorious services in which he had been employed, he had been engaged with the enemy upwards of 120 times. Among other marks of public favor, he received the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, worth 100 guineas; but these honors excited him to greater exertions, and he soon after joined in the Vanguard, lord St. Vincent, and was sent up the Mediterranean to watch the motions of the French ships, which were ready to convey Bonaparte to the invasion of Egypt. Notwithstanding his vigilance, the fleet escaped, but he failed in its pursuit, and after returning from the Egyptian shores to Sicily, almost in despair, he again hastened to the mouth of the Nile, and to the general joy of his fleet, perceived the enemy moored in an advantageous situation in the bay of Aboukir, flanked by strong batteries, and supported by gun boats. The attack immediately began, and by a bold manœuvre on an unknown shore, part of his ships failed between the enemy and the land, and thus exposed them to a double fire. The action continued with increasing violence during the night, and the sudden explosion of the French admiral's ship, the Orient, of 120 guns, added to the terrors of the scene. The rising day exhibited to the British seamen, the pleasing sight of dismasted and submissive ships; and of the whole fleet only two men of war, and two frigates were able to escape. The fame of this glorious victory, which thus captured or destroyed eleven sail of the line, was received with general exultation by the people of England; the rest of Europe re-echoed the praises of the British hero, and the emperor of Germany was, in consequence, prevailed upon to renew the war, by breaking off the insidious conferences of Radstadt, and the Porte declared itself an open enemy against the unprincipled invaders of Egypt. In the mean time these services did not pass unrewarded; the brave admiral was created a baron, by the title of Nelson of the Nile, with the grant of a pension of 2000*l.* more; the sultan honored him with an aigrette, or plume of diamonds, and pelisse, and the king of Naples conferred on him a valuable estate in Sicily, with the title of duke of Bronte. On his return to Naples the naval hero removed the royal family from the violent popular commotions which seemed to threaten their safety, and even their life, and in July 1799, in consequence of the success of the Russian arms in Italy, he had the satisfaction to convey them back from Palermo to their capital, and to replace the monarch on his throne. Soon after his return home, where he was received with enthusiastic joy by every rank of society, lord Nelson was called away to break that confederacy which the capricious politics of the emperor of Russia had formed with Denmark and Sweden against this country. In consequence of this, the gallant admiral embarked as second in command, under sir Hyde Parker, and after passing through the Sound, in defiance of the batteries, he volunteered to make an attack on Copenhagen, 2d April, 1801. After a most vigorous defence, the Danes saw their strong batteries silenced, and 17 of their men of war either sunk, burnt, or taken. A conference with the crown prince immediately succeeded this glorious victory, and after peace was restored by the heroic admiral, between the two countries, the fleet failed to complete its triumph over the hostile squadrons of Sweden and Russia; but the sudden death of the emperor Paul rendered further exertions unnecessary. For these services, which were chiefly attributed to him, and not to the commander in chief, lord Nelson was created a viscount, and his honors made hereditary in his family, even in the female line. In Aug. 1801, he made an unsuccessful attack on Boulogne, but the negotiations for peace prevented the destruction of the armament in that harbour, which his ardent mind would, no doubt, have accomplished. The short-lived peace of Amiens restored him, for a little time, to retirement; but on the recommencement of hostilities, in 1803, he was summoned from his beloved retreat at Merton, to take the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean. Notwithstanding his active vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and from the Mediterranean, and after being joined by the Cadiz squadron, they sailed to the West Indies, but he pursued them with rapidity, and nearly came up to them near Antigua. Such, however, was the terror of his name, that they returned in consternation, back to Europe, and before their entrance into Cadiz, had a partial action, near Ferrol, with sir Robert Calder. Thus baffled in his attempts to overtake his terrified enemy, lord Nelson returned to England for the re-establishment of his health, but in a few weeks he was again prevailed upon to take the command of the fleet with very unlimited powers. On the 19th of October, 1805, Villeneuve, with the French fleet, and Gravina with the Spanish, sailed from Cadiz, and on the 21st, about noon, the English squadron had the satisfaction to close with them off cape Trafalgar. The most precise orders had been previously given by the enlightened commander, so that the fleet was not distracted by signals; and shewing the first example of heroism, the admiral ordered his ship, the Victory, to be carried along side of his old friend, the Santissima Trinidad. The carnage on both sides was dreadful, and the heroic chief, unfortunately not covering the star, and other insignia, which he wore on his person, became a marked object to the musketeers who were placed in the tops of the enemy's ships. A musket ball, from one of the riflemen of the Bucentaur, struck him in the left breast, and in about two hours after, he expired in the arms of victory, retaining to the last his firmness and heroism, and rejoicing in the glorious triumphs which his death ensured to his country. On his lamented fall the chief command devolved on admiral, now lord Collingwood, who improved the high advantages already obtained, and in his dispatches paid an honorable tribute, in the language of nature and of affection, to the meritorious services of the departed hero. Of the 33 ships of the line in the combined fleet, which thus engaged the inferior number of 27 English ships, sixteen were destroyed, four were carried to Gibraltar, six escaped into Cadiz, mere wrecks, and four which retired from the action, were 13 days after, captured by sir R. Strachan's squadron. The remains of the illustrious hero of Trafalgar, were brought in his own ship, the Victory, to the mouth of the Thames, and conveyed to Greenwich, and on the ninth of the following January, they were deposited in St. Paul's cathedral, with all the pomp and solemnity, the tributes of regret and of affection, which a grateful and independent nation could pay to a departed conqueror. His brother, the heir of his honors, was raised to the dignity of an earldom, and a handsome sum of money was liberally voted by parliament, for the purchase of an estate to perpetuate the memory of the conqueror, and the gratitude of England. As a professional character, lord Nelson possessed a mighty genius, an ardent spirit, and a resolute mind; cool, prompt, and discerning in the midst of dangers, he roused all his powerful energies into action, and the strong faculties of his soul were vigilantly exerted in the midst of the fury of battle, to make every accident contribute to the triumph of his crew, and to the glory of his country. So highly established was his reputation, that his presence was a talisman to the courage of his sailors, who fought under him as sure of victory, and regarded his approbation as the best solace for their fatigues and their sufferings. In his manners he was polished and gentle; he was no stranger to the mild charities of human nature, and in his heart he felt all the emotions of a devout and pious christian. His dispatches from Aboukir, in which he attributed his success to the interference of Providence, excited sentiments of respect and admiration through the nation, and it was on that memorable occasion, that his venerable father exclaimed Oh, my great and good son!

NEMESIANUS, Aurel. Olymp. a Carthaginian poet, who wrote, in Latin, Cynegetica, a poem, and four eclogues, published among the poets Rei Venaticæ, 1730. He lived about 281 A. D.

NEMESIUS, a Greek philosopher, who became bishop of Emessa in the fifth century, and wrote De Naturâ Hominis, &c.

NEMOURS, Mary d'Orleans, daughter of the duke de Longueville, was born 1625. Her Memoirs of the War of the Fronde are valuable, as containing anecdotes of the principal characters and events of her time, under the minority of Lewis XIV. They are printed with those of de Retz and Joli, and have been translated into English, in 8 vols. 12mo. She died 1707.

NENNIUS, author of the History of Britain, flourished in the ninth century. A MS. of this history is preserved in the British museum, among the Cotton papers.

NEPER, John lord, Vid. NAPIER.

NEPOS, Cornelius, a Latin historian, patronised by Augustus. Of all his works there only remain the lives of illustrious Greek and Roman generals, a composition of singular elegance, and highly interesting.

NEPOS, Flavius Julius, a Dalmatian, who, by his marriage with the niece of Leo the emperor, obtained the Western empire. He was assassinated in Dalmatia, 480.

NERI, Philip de, an eminent historian, born of an honorable family at Florence, 1485. He was one of the 48 magistrates called senators, chosen by duke Alexander 1532, and after a life devoted to public services, he died at Florence, 17th Jan. 1556. His History of Florentine Affairs from 1214 to 1537, appeared at Augsburg, 1728, in folio.

NERI, St. Philip de, a native of Florence, celebrated as the founder of the congregation of the priests of the oratory in Italy, whose duties were to administer to the wants of the poor, to attend the sick, and to relieve strangers and distressed pilgrims. He died 1595, aged 80, and was canonized by Gregory XV. in 1622.

NERI, Pompeio, a Florentine, law professor at Pisa, eminently distinguished in the affairs of Maria Theresa, and of the duke of Lorraine. He was founder of the botanical academy at Florence, and died there, 1776, aged 69. He was the learned author of Observations on the Tuscan Nobility — on the Imports of Milan — on the Legal Value of Coin, and the Difficulty of settling it. Anthony, the author of the Art of making Glass, printed at Florence, 1612, was also of this family.

NERO, Claud. Domit. Cesar, a Roman emperor after Claudius, A. D. 50. The beginning of his reign was marked by humanity and virtue, but soon after, Nero shewed himself vindictive, cruel, and licentious; his mother was inhumanly murdered, and every species of oppression and debauchery was indulged. Rome was set on fire, that the tyrant might behold the disasters of which he had read in the conflagration of Troy, and the virtue and honor of the senate and the people were insulted and trampled upon. At last, a conspiracy was formed to rid the world of the bloody tyrant, who in the moment of his distress, when deserted by his flatterers, destroyed himself, A. D. 68.

NERVA, Cocceius, a Roman emperor after Domitian, A. D. 96. After a short, but glorious, mild, and virtuous reign, this excellent monarch appointed Trajan his successor, and died 98, aged 72.

NESBIT, Thomas, son of the lord president Nesbit, of Dirlton, was born at Edinburgh, 1672. He was well skilled in antiquities and heraldry, and wrote a Vindication of Scottish Antiquities, preserved in MS. in the advocates' library, Edinburgh. He died at Dirlton, 1725.

NESLE, N. de, a native of Meaux, known by his writings. His poem, called Sanfonnet, in imitation of Vert Vert, is much admired. He wrote besides, the Modern Aristippus — the Prejudices of the People, 2 vols. — the Prejudices of the Ancients, &c. He died in indigent circumstances at Paris, 1767, in an advanced age.

NESSE, Christopher, a native of Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. When ejected from his church at Leeds, in 1662, for nonconformity, he opened a school for 10 years, and afterwards, in 1675, came to London, where he preached to a dissenting congregation. He wrote the Christian's Walk and Work on Earth, 8vo. — the Christian's Crown and Glory, 12mo. — Church History from Adam — Antidote against Popery — a Divine Legacy — the History and Mystery of the Old and New Testament, 4 vols. fol. &c. He died 1705, aged 84.

NESTOR, a Russian monk, author of a Description of Russia, and of a Chronicle from 858 to 1113, in a simple and unadorned style, of which Muller published a translation in German, 1732, died 1115, aged 59.

NESTORIUS, a Syrian, who became bishop of Constantinople, 431. He was deposed for refusing to assent to the doctrine of the incarnation of the Redeemer, and his followers are still found in the eastern parts of the world.

NETSCHER, Gaspard, a portrait painter, born at Prague, 1636. After a series of accidents, he settled at the Hague, where he acquired reputation and opulence. There was scarce a family in Holland, but what could boast of a miniature from his pencil. He died at the Hague, 1684.

NEUBAUER, Ernest Frederic, a native of Magdeburg, author of Academic Dissertations — Explanations of Scripture — Lives of the Divinity Professors of Gießen — sermons, &c. died at Gießen, where he was professor of antiquities, and of theology, 1748, aged 43.

NEUBAUER,

NEUBAUER, Francis, a native of Bohemia, educated at Prague, and Vienna. He was celebrated for his skill in music, and was musician to the chapel of the prince of Nassau. His compositions were much admired, but he unfortunately disgraced himself by immoderate intoxication. He died 1795.

NEVE, Timothy, a native of Wotton, near Ludlow, Shropshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He afterwards kept a school at Spalding, and became successively canon of Peterborough, prebendary of Lincoln, archdeacon of Huntingdon, and rector of Alwalton, Huntingdonshire, where he died about 1740. He communicated, in 1727, to the Spalding society, of which he was the joint founder, an essay on the invention of printing, and on our first painters. His son Timothy, who was born at Spalding, was of Merton college, Oxford, and Margaret professor there. He died 1798, author of some sermons.

NEVERS, Philip Julian Mazarine Mancini, duke de, nephew of Mazarine, was born at Rome, and acquired some reputation by supporting Pradon against Racine. He wrote some sonnets, poetical pieces, &c. which were admired as the compositions of a duke, but possessed little merit. He died 1707, aged 76.

NEVISAN, John, an Italian lawyer, born at Asti. He studied at Padua, and taught at Turin. He is known by his work Sylvæ Nuptiales, &c. 8vo. in which he asserts curious things, but without order or connection. It is said that the women of Turin were so offended against him on account of this book, in which he spoke with disrespect of the sex, that they drove him in disgrace with stones from the city, and would not suffer him to return before he entreated pardon on his knees. He died 1540.

NEUHOFF, Theodore Baron, king of Corfica. Vid. THEODORE.

NEUVILLE, Charles Frey de, a jesuit of Coutances, long known as an eloquent preacher in the capital. After the banishment of his order he retired to Compiègne, where he lived in privacy, and died 13th July, 1774, aged 81. He wrote sermons, 8 vols. 12mo. — la Morale du Nouveau Testament, 3 vols. 12mo, &c. His brother Peter Claude, was also a jesuit, and author of 16 sermons. He died at Rennes, 1773.

NEUVILLE, Didier Peter Chicanau de, a native of Nancy, in the service of Stanislaus king of Poland. He afterwards became professor of history at Toulouse, and died there Oct. 1781, aged 61. The best known of his writings is Dictionnaire Philosophique, &c. 8vo.

NEWCOMB, Thomas, son of a clergyman in Herefordshire, was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1734, he became rector of Stopham, Suffex, and afterwards lived at Hackney, it is said in distressed circumstances. He was author of various original poems, and among other things turned Hervey's Meditations into blank verse, and also the Death of Abel from the German. The school which he established at Hackney has long continued to enjoy celebrity.

NEWCOMB, William, a learned prelate, born at Abingdon, Berkshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at the grammar school of his native place, and then elected on the foundation of Pembroke college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He was afterwards appointed tutor to Mr. Fox at Hertford college, and to this connexion he was indebted for his elevation in the church. He became successively bishop of Ossory and Waterford, and was afterwards translated to Armagh, by lord Fitzwilliam, when lord lieutenant. This venerable prelate was a man of amiable manners, and as a scholar was eminent for his learning, and his extensive acquaintance with biblical knowledge. He died in Ireland 1799, aged 70. His publications were very respectable, and particularly a letter to Dr. Priestley, on the Duration of our Lord's Ministry, 8vo. — Observations on our Lord's Conduct, 4to. — an improved Version of the 12 Minor Prophets, 4to. — Another Version of Ezekiel — a Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to our Lord's Resurrection — an Historical Review of the English Biblical Translations, &c. and after his death his Version of the New Testament appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. He was member of the Royal Irish academy.

NEWCOMEN, Matthew, a non-conformist divine, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. As member of the Westminster assembly of divines, he assisted in the drawing up of their catechism, and he was one of the five divines who attacked bishop Hall's Vindication of Episcopacy. This curious work was called Smectymus, from the initials of the authors' names, Stephen Marshal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, William Spurstow. He was ejected from the living of Dedham, Essex, in 1662, and then retired to Leyden, where he died 1666.

NEWLAND, Peter, a learned Dutchman, son of a carpenter at Dimmermeer, near Amsterdam, where he was born 1764. He was possessed of strong natural powers, so that at the age of 10 he wrote poetry with elegance, and could resolve without the instruction of a master some of the most difficult problems of geometry. These great talents were happily encouraged by the government; the young prodigy was made one of the commissioners of longitude, and afterwards he filled with great ability the chairs of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht, and Amsterdam. He wrote poems in Dutch, on the Means of enlightening a People — on the General Utility of Mathematics — on Lavoisier's System — on the Form of the Globe — on the Course of Comets, and the Uncertainty of their Return — on ascertaining the Longitude at Sea — a treatise on Navigation, &c. He died 1794.

NEWTON, John, an English mathematician, born at Oundle, 1622. He entered, in 1637, at Edmund hall, Oxford, where he applied to astronomy and mathematics. After the restoration he was rewarded for his loyalty, and made chaplain to the king, created D. D. and appointed rector of Rofs in Herefordshire, where he died Christmas day, 1678. He wrote Astronomia Britannica, in three parts, 4to. — Help to Calculation, with Tables of Declination, Ascension, &c. — Trigonometria Britannica, fol. — Geometrical Trigonometry — Chiliades Centum Logarithm. — Mathematical Elements — Perpetual Diary — Ephemerides — Introduction to Rhetoric — Cosmography, &c.

NEWTON, sir Isaac, a most illustrious philosopher, bora

Born of a very ancient family, settled at Woolstrop, Lincolnshire, where he was born Christmas day 1642. He early lost his father, but his mother, though she soon after took a second husband, bestowed particular care on his education. From Grantham school, where he was placed at the age of 12, he was removed at 18 to Trinity college, Cambridge, as he seemed to prefer studious pursuits to the management of his estate. At Cambridge, under the care of the famous Isaac Barrow, he began to apply to mathematics, but his powerful mind so easily comprehended the elements of Euclid, that he quickly passed to higher pursuits, and paid attention to Descartes' analytical method which then was very popular, and as he proceeded in his studies he made marginal notes. In 1664, he discovered a new method of infinite series and fluxions, which he afterwards greatly improved, and the same year he took his bachelor's degree. His next pursuit was the grinding of optical glasses in one of the figures made by the three sections of a cone, for the improvement of telescopes, but not succeeding as he expected, he procured a glass prism, to make experiments on the phenomena of colors, lately discovered by Grimaldi; and the result of his skilful researches gradually matured his new theory of light and colors. Whilst he reflected on this discovery that light was not homogeneous, but a heterogeneous mixture of refrangible rays, he was obliged to quit Cambridge in 1665, by the plague, and he retired to his house, where, though deprived of the assistance of his books, new truths were to be opened to his active mind. Whilst he was sitting alone in his garden, the falling of some apples from a tree led his thoughts to the subject of gravity, and considering that this power is not sensibly diminished, at the remotest distance from the centre of the earth, even at the top of the highest mountains, he thought that it must be extended much farther. Why not as high as the moon, was his next question to himself, therefore the moon may be influenced by this power of gravity, and retained in her orbit, and the whole planetary system moving round the sun as their common centre may obey this great principle, which, however, as he calculated, must decrease in strength in the duplicate proportion of the increase of distance. The further examination of this important subject was deferred, as he returned to Cambridge; and in 1667, being elected fellow of his college, he devoted all his attention to the construction of a reflecting telescope. In 1669, he succeeded to the mathematical chair at Cambridge, on the resignation of his friend Dr. Barrow, and for three years he delivered lectures on the discoveries which he had made in optics, and communicated his theory of light and colors, which he had brought to a great degree of perfection, to the Royal society, of which he was elected member in 1672. Some time after he presented to the same learned society his telescope, with a description of its properties. While laboring on the problems of his great system, his attention was attracted to the comet of 1680, and by repeated experiments he proved the truth of Kepler's supposition, about the motion of the primary planets, and after establishing his conclusions on the most infallible proofs, he in 1687 published, at the request of the Royal society, the result of his astronomical pursuits, under the title of Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica. This excellent performance which set his name above the philosophers of ancient and modern times, met, however, with opposition; but though its truths were delivered with conciseness and precision, and required study and labor to be comprehended, even by the most learned of mathematicians, it gained by slow but sure degrees universal praise and admiration. At this time the attacks of James II. on the privileges of the university were resisted with great spirit, and Newton was appointed as one of the delegates to complain of the illegal encroachment. His eloquence on this occasion was so strong and powerful, that the king abandoned his claims. He was member of the convention parliament in 1688, and when his friend the earl of Halifax planned the recoinage of the money of the kingdom, he called to his assistance the abilities of Newton, and made him in 1696, warden of the mint. In 1699, he was made master of the mint with an ample salary, and enjoyed the office till his death. In consequence of these appointments in London, he resigned the emoluments of his professorship to Mr. Whiston, of Clare hall, his deputy, for whom he generously procured the appointment in 1703. In 1703 he was elected president of the Royal society, and for 25 years he adorned the chair of that learned body till his death. He also was made honorary member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and received every mark of distinction from the learned of the continent. When he published, in 1704, his theory of light, after establishing its truth by repeated experiments, during the space of 30 years; he also made mention of his discovery of the nature of fluxions, which since 1672, had engaged his attention, but had not been communicated to the public; yet by mean suggestions Leibnitz laid claim to the merit of discovering them. While the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig attributed the honor to the German philosopher, Keill of Oxford undertook the defence of his friend, and proved by the clearest evidence, and from extracts from the papers of the Royal society, that this system, so important in mathematics, originated first in the genius of Newton. In 1715 Leibnitz proposed to the English philosopher his famous problem of the trajectories, which while it might have puzzled other mathematicians, was resolved by Newton in a few hours, after the labors and the fatigues of the day. This great man, who had been in 1705 knighted by queen Anne, became a great favorite at the court of George I. and the prince of Wales, afterwards queen Caroline, took infinite pleasure in the conversation of the philosopher. As he had an uncommon genius for mathematics and astronomy, the often said, she considered herself happy in being born in an age when she could enjoy the conversation, and the instruction of so illustrious a philosopher. At the request of the prince of Wales he drew up his abstract of chronology, but a copy of it was imprudently communicated to signor Conti, a Venetian, who with illiberal effrontery had it printed at Paris, and at the same time engaged some of the French literati to attack and abuse it. This drew a defence from Newton, inserted in the philosophical transactions, and soon after he published the work himself. Having now nearly reached the age of 80, sir Isaac after enjoying from his regular and temperate habits, all the blessings of health, found himself seized by an incontinence of urine, which was attended with the excruciating pains of a stone in the bladder. For a few weeks before his death, the agonies which he suffered were very great, yet his meekness and patience subdued them, and though from the severe paroxysms which he endured, large drops of sweat ran down his cheeks, he preserved his usual smile of cheerfulness and serenity. On the night of the 11th March 1726-7, his intellects were visibly affected, and he continued insensible till he expired nine days after, aged 85. His body lay in state in the Jerusalem chamber, and on the 28th March, was conveyed in becoming funeral pomp to Westminster abbey, while the lord chancellor, the dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, the earls of Pembroke, Suffex, and Macclesfield supported the pall. He was interred near the entrance of the choir on the left hand, and a stately monument with a proper inscription has been erected to his honor. Sir Isaac had the happiness of enjoying during his life the fame, the honors, and the rewards which seldom attend the learned and the great, but which often are lavished with insulting profusion on their remains or their posterity. In his person this great man was of a middle stature, his countenance was pleasing and venerable, though it did not display that deep and penetrating sagacity which are every where perceptible in his writings. He never made use of spectacles, and it is said he lost only one tooth during the whole of his life. In his temper he was meek and unassuming, and so great a lover of peace and harmony that he kept some of his publications from the eye of the public, that he might not excite the envy, and the malice of opponents or rivals. With great powers of mind, and with a comprehension which embraced at one view the meaning of every subject to which he directed his attention, and overleaped as trifling all the difficulties which had arrested the progress of other philosophers, he was thus enabled to shed lustre on the age in which he lived, and the country which gave him birth, and to introduce such astonishing improvements, and make such stupendous discoveries in science, in mathematics, and in astronomy, as would each of them individually have bestowed immortality. To his other great qualities, he added the virtues of piety, and religious fidelity he marked with abhorrence; no remark of levity or indifference, on the powers of the deity, or on revelation ever was made in his presence without drawing from him the severest censure; and while he made the bible his favorite study he employed some portion of his time in proving the great truths of the prophetic writers of scripture. Ardently attached to the tenets, and the discipline of the church of England, he bore with patience the errors and the failings of others, and was at all times an enemy to intolerant persecution. He was never married, and it is probable that as his time was devoted so assiduously to study, he felt little of the concerns of domestic life, and never was sensible of the want of a companion at home. In his conduct he was charitable, and as his income increased he was proportionably more affected by the wants of his indigent neighbours. He left 32,000*l.* at his death, but made no will. His most valuable works have been collected and published, together with an excellent commentary, 1784, in 5 vols. 4to. by bishop Horsley.

NEWTON, Richard, a learned divine born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Westminster, and Christchurch, Oxford. He distinguished himself as an able tutor, and in 1710, was inducted principal of Hart-hall, when he took the degree of D.D. By the friendship of bishop Compton, he obtained the rectory of Sudbury, Northamptonshire, and in 1753 he was preferred to a canonry of Christchurch, by the interest of the duke of Newcastle, to whom he had been tutor. In 1740 he obtained a charter to erect Hart-hall into a college, and to separate it from the superintendence of Exeter college, to which it belonged, and this he effected at great expence, and was himself the first principal. He died at Lavendon Grange, deservedly respected, 21st April 1753. He wrote a book against Pluralities and Non-residence—on University Education,—and also edited Theophrastus, with notes in English, which work is said to have brought him 1000*l.* which he nobly applied in endowments on his college.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English bishop, born at Lichfield, 1st Dec. 1703. From Lichfield school he entered at Westminster, and in 1723 was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge. When in orders he removed to London, and became curate, afterwards assistant preacher, at St. George's, Hanover square, and next, afternoon preacher to Grosvenor chapel. He was afterwards tutor to lord Tyrconnel, and in 1744 he obtained St. Mary-le-Bow rectory, Cheap-side, by the friendship of the earl of Bath. In 1747 he was chosen lecturer of St. George's, Hanover square, and that year married the daughter of Mr. Trebeck the rector. He published in 1749 his edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, with useful notes, and a well written life. In 1756 he was made king's chaplain, and then prebendary of Westminster, and precentor of York, and 1761 he was nominated bishop of Bristol with the residentiaryship of St Paul's, which he exchanged in 1768 for the deanery. Satisfied with his ecclesiastical honors he determined to solicit no more, and kept his word. He died at the deanery 14th Feb. 1782, aged 79. He lost his wife in 1754, and in 1761 married a second, a daughter of John lord Lisburne, widow of Mr. Hand, whom he describes as an amiable and excellent woman. His dissertations on the prophecies in 3 vols. 8vo. is a work of great merit. He also preached Boyle's lectures. After his death his miscellaneous works, with memoirs of his life by himself, were published.

NEWTON, Thomas, an English divine, born at Presbury, Cheshire. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Cambridge, and then obtained the grammar school at Macclesfield. Besides divinity, he paid attention to medicine, and practised with credit. He died at his living of Ilford, Essex, 1607. He was author of the History of the Saracens, 4to.—Approved Medicines, and Cordial Receipts, 8vo.—Illustrum Aliquot Anglorum Eneidia, 4to.—Directions reactions for the Health of Magistrates and Students — Herbal of the Bible, 8vo. &c.

NICAISE, Claude, a French antiquary, born at Dijon. He resided for some time at Rome, and had a most extensive correspondence with the learned men of his times in every country. He published a treatise de Nummo Pantheo — a Discourse on the Form and Figure of the Sirens — a Dissertation on two of Raphael's Pictures, and on the Schools of Athens and Parnassus. He died at Velley, Oct. 1701, aged 78.

NICANDER, a native of Colophon, eminent as a physician, a grammarian, and a poet, B. C. 140. His two poems, called Theriaca and Alexipharmaca, are still extant.

NICAUSIS, or BALKIS, according to the Arabians, is the name of the famous queen of Sheba, whose visit to Solomon is mentioned in scripture. She reigned in Arabia Felix, or according to Josephus, in Egypt and Ethiopia.

NICEPHORUS, Gregoras, a Greek historian, author of a History of the Eastern empire, from 1204 to 1341, printed in 1702, Paris, 2 vols. folio, and also other works. He was a great favorite of the emperor Andronicus.

NICEPHORUS, Callistus, a Greek historian who flourished in the same age as the preceding. His ecclesiastical history extends from the birth of Christ to 610, the best edition of which is that of Paris, 1630.

NICEPHORUS, Blemmidas, a monk of mount Athos in the 13th century, who, as attached to the Romish church, refused to accept the dignity of patriarch of Constantinople. His two treatises concerning the precession of the Holy Ghost were printed at Rome, 1659.

NICEPHORUS I. chancellor of the Eastern empire, seized the throne 802, and banished the empress Irene to Mitylene. Though attacked by his seditious subjects who raised Bardanes one of his generals to the throne, he overcame all opposition, till the Bulgarians appeared against him. He fell in battle 811.

NICEPHORUS II. Phocas, a nobleman of Constantinople, so popular that his virtues elevated him to the throne, 963, on the death of Romanus the younger, whose widow he married. He attacked the Saracens with spirit and success, but at last was assassinated by John Zimisces, 969.

NICEPHORUS III. a Roman general raised to the throne of Constantinople by his army. He was three years after, 1081, deposed by Alexis Comnenus his general, and soon after died of grief in a monastery.

NICERON, John Francis, an eminent mathematician, born at Paris 1613. He took the habit of the Minims, but though regularly employed in their ecclesiastical affairs, either as visitor or professor, he devoted much of his time to his favorite study of optics. He died at Aix in Provence, 22d Sept. 1646, but though only 33 years of age, he was author of some valuable works, especially l'Interpretation des Chiffres, &c. — Thaumaturgus Opticus, five Admiranda Optices, Captoprices, & Dioptrices.

NICERON, John Peter, the celebrated author of "Memoirs of Men Illustrious in the Republic of Letters," was born at Paris, March 11th, 1685, of an ancient family. He early determined to forsake the world, and therefore took the habit of a Barnabite jesuit 1703, and then studied at Montargis, Loches and Poitiers. He became a very popular preacher, and to a great fondness for laborious studies, he brought an extensive knowledge of ancient and modern languages. He died after a short illness, 8th July, 1738. Besides his Memoirs, a valuable work, of which the first volume appeared in 1727, and the 39th in 1738, to which three more have been added, he wrote a translation of Hancock's book on the Virtues of Common Water, 2 vols. 12mo. — the Conversion of England to Christianity — Ovington's Voyages, &c.

NICETAS, David, author of the Life of Ignatius of Constantinople, in Greek, translated into Latin by Raderi, Ingoldstadt, 1604, was a Paphlagonian, and lived in the ninth century.

NICETAS, surnamed SERRON, author of Panegyrics on Gregory Nazienzen — of Commentaries on Scripture, and other works, was a deacon of Constantinople, and afterwards bishop of Heraclea in the 11th century.

NICETAS, Arbominates, a Greek historian, born at Chone, or Colossus in Phrygia. He fled from Constantinople when taken by the French 1204, and settled at Nice in Bithynia, where he died 1206. He wrote an History or Annals from 1118 to the death of Baldwin, 1205, of which a translation appeared at Basil, by Wolfius, 1557, and Geneva, 1593.

NICHOLAS, Abraham, an English penman, born in Bread-street, London. He is author of Examples of Penmanship — the Penman's Assistant, 1719 — Complete Writing-master, in 31 folio plates. He kept a school at Clapham, and died abroad about 1744, aged 52.

NICHOLS, William, an English divine, born at Donnington, Bucks, 1664. He was of Magdalen hall, Oxford, afterwards of Wadham, and in 1684 was elected fellow of Merton, where he took the degree of D. D. 1695. He was chaplain to lord Montague, and became rector of Selley, near Chichester; but it appears from a letter of his to Robert, earl of Oxford, that he was disappointed in his expectations of a promised prebend in the church of Westminster. His life was usefully devoted to study, and to acts of piety. He died about 1712. His works were numerous and valuable; the best known are Conference with a Theist, 2 vols. 8vo. — Defensio Ecclesie Anglicanae, 1707, 12mo. afterwards published in 8vo. and in English — a Commentary on the Liturgy of England, in 8vo. and folio, a very useful book — Religion of a Prince, &c.

NICHOLLS, Frank, a physician, born in London 1699. He was educated at Westminster, and Christchurch, Oxford, where he took his degree of M. D. 1729, and became reader of anatomy. His lectures were popular, but it has been observed that his remarks on subjects of anatomy tended to inculcate infidelity in his pupils. He married in 1743, Dr. Mead's daughter, by whom he had five children. He was physician to George II. and published an account of his his death in the philosophical transactions. He wrote besides, a tract de Animâ Medicâ — de Motu Cordis & Sanguinis in Homine, and died in 1779, aged 80.

NICIAS, an Athenian, who distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and was sent by his countrymen with Demosthenes and Eurymedon, to the conquest of Sicily. The expedition was unfortunate, and after two years' siege, the Syracusans attacked and defeated their invaders, and Nicias was cruelly put to death B. C. 413.

NICODEMUS, a learned Jew, who visited our Saviour privately, and became his disciple. On the death of Jesus, he assisted Joseph of Arimathea in preparing to pay honors to the remains of his master; but though the Jews marked him for destruction for his attachment to the new doctrines, it is said that he was saved by the interference of his relation Gamaliel. The gospel ascribed to him is a forgery of the Manicheans.

NICOLAI, John, a native of Monza, near Verduin, who took the habit of the Dominicans, and was for 20 years professor of theology at Paris, where he died 1673, aged 79. Besides an edition of the works of Thomas Aquinas, in 19 vols. folio, he published some Dissertations on Ecclesiastical Discipline — a tract against Arnould, and other theological works.

NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch, who became, on being converted, one of the seven first deacons of the church of Jerusalem. He is accused by some authors as the founder of the Nicolaites, a sect which admitted a community of wives, and practised all the impious rites of paganism. It is, however, more probable that this sect owed its origin to another person.

NICOLAS, St. bishop of Myra in Lycia, is supposed to have lived in the age of Constantine the Great, and to have assisted at the general council of Nice.

NICOLAS I. surnamed the Great, was elected pope after Benedict III. 858. He sent ambassadors to Constantinople, and pronounced an anathema against Photius, the patriarch, which proved the cause of the schism which separated the Greek and the Latin churches. He died 867, much respected for his zeal, firmness, and charity. His letters were published at Rome, 1542, in folio.

NICOLAS II. Gerard of Burgundy, became archbishop of Florence, and in 1058 was elected pope. He is the first whose coronation is mentioned in history. He was opposed by John, bishop of Veletri, under the name of Benedict X. but he soon destroyed the power of his rival. He extended the papal authority over some of the Norman princes in Lombardy and Naples, and died 1061.

NICOLAS III. John Gaetan, was elected pope after John XXI. 1277. He sent missionaries into Tartary, but with little effect; and he was guilty of some oppressive actions to enrich his family. He died of an apoplexy, 22d Aug. 1280.

NICOLAS IV. N. de Rubis, was a native of Ascoli, and was raised to the papedom 1288, an honor which he accepted with much reluctance. He published a crusade against the infidels for the recovery of Jerusalem, but died before the plan was brought to maturity, 4th April, 1292. He was a man of learning, and wrote some Commentaries on Scripture, &c.

NICOLAS V. Thomas de Sarzanne, bishop of Bologna, was a native of Luni, and was elected pope 1447, on the death of Eugenius IV. He succeeded in restoring peace to the church, which had been torn to pieces by the interests and the intrigues of rival popes, and he gained universal respect by his great wisdom and moderation. He celebrated this happy era by a jubilee in 1450, which drew to Rome an immense multitude of people. The conspiracy which was formed against him by Stephen Porcario, and the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the consequent calamities of the Christians, are said to have afflicted him so heavily that he died of grief, 24th March 1455, aged 57.

NICOLAS of Damascus, a philosopher and historian in the age of Augustus, some fragments of whose works remain.

NICOLAS of Cusa, son of a fisherman, rose by his merit, and assisted at the council of Basil 1431, and showed such eloquence that Eugenius IV. employed him as his ambassador at Constantinople, in Germany and France. He was patronized by succeeding popes, and made bishop of Brixen. He died at Todi, 11th Aug. 1454, aged 53. He wrote several works on theological subjects.

NICOLAS of Lyra, so called from the place of his birth, near Evreux in Normandy, was a Jew, but was converted to christianity 1291, and took the habit of the Minors. He taught divinity with great reputation at Paris, and obtained the confidence of Jane, queen of Philip V. and was one of the executors of her will. He died at Paris, 23d Oct. 1340. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, edited at Antwerp, 1634, in 6 vols. folio. — a Disputation against the Jews, folio — treatise against a Jewish Rabbi.

NICOLAS of Munster, founder of a sect, called the Family, or House of Love, about 1540, pretended to be inspired by the Holy Spirit, and therefore declared himself greater than Jesus Christ. He had many followers, and supported his doctrines by various publications, such as the Land of Peace — the Gospel of the Kingdom, &c. Some of the followers of this sect appeared in England 1604, and they presented to James I. a profession of their faith.

NICOLAS of Pisa, an architect and sculptor of eminence, who built a church and convent at Bologna, for the fraternity of the preachers, and a marble tomb for the body of St. Dominic. He flourished in the 13th century.

NICOLAS EYMERICK, a Dominican of Gironne, inquisitor against the Vaudois, under Innocent VI. was author of the Directory of Inquisitors, printed in folio, 1687, and died in his native county 1399.

NICOLAS, Augustin, an advocate of Besançon, counsellor to the duke of Lorraine. He died at Besançon, 1695. He wrote several things in verse and prose, of no great merit.

NICOLE, John, a French lawyer, born at Chartres, 1600. He acquired some reputation as a bold haranguer, but he was a bad advocate. He died 1678, at at Chartres. Nothing of his compositions were preserved, though his friend Marolles saw his translation of Quintilian.

NICOLE, Claude, related to the above, was born at Chartres, 1611, and became king's counsel, and president in the elections of Chartres. He died there, 22d Nov. 1685. He was a good linguist, and wrote poetry, though his compositions were rather licentious. His works were printed at Paris, 1660, in 2 vols. 4to. and again, 1693, 2 vols. 12mo.

NICOLE, Peter, an eminent French divine, son of John, above-mentioned, was born at Chartres, 10th Oct. 1625. He studied at Paris with great assiduity, and was for some time engaged in instructing youth under the society of Port-royal. He assisted his friend Arnauld in the composition of some of his pieces; but his letter to Innocent XI. in the defence of the bishops of St. Pont and Arras, exposed him to persecution, and he withdrew from Paris. He afterwards returned, but soon quitted it for a residence in Flanders. He returned afterwards under a feigned name to Chartres, and died there of an apoplectic fit, 16th Nov. 1695. He was a man of great abilities; his erudition was extensive, his judgment solid, but he was little acquainted with the world; and his defence of the Jansenists, and latterly his support of Bossuet against the Quietists, raised him enemies in France, and caused an unpopularity which his private virtues did not deserve. His works are not less than 100 in number, but chiefly on controversial subjects. His Moral Essays, and his treatise on preserving Peace in Society, are much admired.

NICOLE, Francis, a native of Paris, distinguished for his extensive knowledge of mathematics. His essay sur la Theorie des Roulettes — his Traité du Calcul des Differences Finies — and his Traité des Lignes du Troisième Ordre, are most convincing proofs of the accuracy of his researches, and of the depth of his genius. He was member of the academy of sciences, and died 10th Jan. 1758, aged 75.

NICOLÒ DEL ABBATE, a painter, born at Modena, and called Abbate, because brought up by Primatic, abbot of St. Martin. He went with his patron to France, 1552, and his pencil was employed in adorning Fontainebleau, and the noblest edifices of Paris. His style is said to resemble strongly that of Julio Romano, and that of Parmesan.

NICOLSON, William, a learned bishop, born at Orton, Cumberland, 1655. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he became fellow 1679. He was patronized by the bishop of Carlisle, who gave him a prebend and the archdeaconry of that church, and in 1702, he succeeded his patron in that see. He was translated in 1718, to Londonderry in Ireland, and in Jan. 1726-7, he was raised to the see of Cashell, but died the 13th Feb. following, before he took possession of his new dignity. He was a learned man, well skilled in antiquities. He published several things, the best known of which are his descriptions of Poland, Denmark, &c. — the English Historical Library — Tracts on the Bangorian Controversy, &c.

NICOMEDES, a mathematician of the second century, known as the discoverer of the conchoid curve.

NICON, patriarch of the Russian empire, was born of mean parentage about 1613. He had a strong prejudice in favor of a monastic life, and the loss of his children determined him to assume the habit of a monk, and to send his wife to a convent. His austerities, as well as his learning, by degrees raised him to public consequence; he was patronized by his sovereign, and at last made archbishop of Novogorod, and patriarch of Russia. Some innovations which he introduced into the church, and the publication of the bible in the Russian language raised him enemies among the clergy, and at last by intrigue and violence he was obliged to abdicate his high office, 1658, and to be imprisoned; but the emperor Feodor permitted him to retire to the privacy of his original cell. He died 1679, after enduring much undeserved persecution. He is the author of a chronicle of Russian affairs, to the reign of Alexiowitz, printed at Petersburg, 2 vols. 4to. 1767.

NICOT, John, master of requests to the French king, was born at Nismes. He was ambassador from France to Portugal, from whence he brought tobacco, which in compliment to him was called by the French, Nicotiana. He wrote a French and Latin dictionary, folio — a treatise on Navigation — the Treasure of French Language, &c. and died 1600 at Paris.

NIDHARD, John Everard, a jesuit, born at Falkenstein in Austria. He accompanied the archduchess Mary when she married Philip IV. of Spain, and in this new situation he became a great favorite with the Spanish monarch. After the death of Philip, he was made by the queen's mother inquisitor general, and minister; but his abilities were not adequate to the administration of the political affairs of a kingdom. Flushed with the pride of power, he treated the nobles with insolence. You ought to respect me, said he one day to his rival, the duke of Lerma, for I daily have your God in my hands and your queen at my feet. The weakness and incapacity of his government appeared by the successes of Lewis XIV. in the Netherlands, and in Franche Comté, and the favorite at last gave way to the intrigues of his enemies, and retired to Rome, as ambassador from Spain. He was made a cardinal by Clement X. and bishop of Edeffa. He died 1st Feb. 1681, aged 73. He wrote a discourse on the immaculate conception of the Virgin, &c.

NIEUHOFF, John de, a Dutchman who went as ambassador from the Dutch East India company, to the emperor of China, in the middle of the 17th century, of which he wrote an interesting account, translated into French by Le Carpentier. It is also to be found in Churchill's collection.

NIEUWENT, Bernard, a learned Dutchman, born at Westgraafdyk, North Holland, 10th Aug. 1654. He studied with unusual assiduity, and became a great philosopher and mathematician, and obtained high reputation as a physician, and as the upright and respected chief magistrate of Purmerende. He died 1730, having been twice married. He wrote in Latin, Considerations on the Analysis of Quantities infinitely small — Analysis of Curves by the Doctrine of Infinites — on the Principles of the Differential Calculus — Contemplations on the Universe, translated into English, in 3 vols. 8vo. called the Religious Philosopher.

NIGER, C. Pescennius Justus, governor of Syria, proclaimed emperor of Rome by his army, 193. He was defeated and slain by his rival Severus two years after.

NIGIDIUS FIGULUS, Publius, a Roman who assisted Cicero in the extirpation of Catiline's conspiracy. He sided with Pompey, and died in exile, B. C. 45.

NIGRISOLI, Jerome, an Italian physician, author of Progymnasmatum Medica, printed at Gualtala, 1655. He died at Ferrara 1689, aged 69. His son Francis was also an able physician, author of some useful works, and also de Veterum Charta, ejusque Usu, &c. He died 1727, aged 79.

NINUS, founder of the Assyrian empire, was son of Belus, and husband of Semiramis, to whom he left his kingdom, B. C. 2164.

NIPHUS, Augustin, a famous philosopher, born at Jopoli in Calabria. His works became so popular, that Leo X. created him count palatine, and permitted him to blazon his arms with those of the Medicis. He died about 1550. His works are in Latin and various, and contain commentaries on Aristotle and Averroes, 14 vols. folio — treatises de Amore — de Falsa Diluvii Prognosticatione, &c.

NISBET, sir John, lord advocate of Scotland in the reign of Charles II. became popular by pleading against the standing militia, and was one of the commissioners appointed about the union of the two kingdoms.

NIVELLE DE LA CHAUSSEE, Peter Claude, a French poet, born of an opulent family at Paris, 1692. Though favored by fortune he preferred the honors of literature to all other distinctions, and acquired some celebrity by his epistle to Clio, and his dramatical pieces. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris, 14th March, 1754. His pieces possess great merit, and are much esteemed in France. The best are the School of Mothers — Melanides la Gouvernante, comedies — Maximian — Prejugé à-la-mode — George Barnwell, tragedies. These works have appeared in 5 vols. 12mo. 1763.

NIVERNOIS, Lewis Julius Mancini duke of, minister of state, member of the French academy, and of belles lettres, and well known as a poet, and a writer, was born at Paris 16th Dec. 1716. He left the military profession to serve his country as ambassador, and he represented his sovereign at Rome, at Berlin, and afterwards in London, where he negotiated the peace of 1763. Distinction at the court, however, had less charms for him than literary fame, and on his return to Paris, he withdrew from political life, and devoted himself to the muses. His poetical imitations of Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Tibullus, Ariosto, and Milton, possess great merit, and singular beauty, and his songs and fables were popular productions in France. During the revolution he was dragged to prison, but he had the good fortune to be liberated, and he died at Paris 1798, at the great age of 82. His other works are Dialogues of the Dead — Letters on the Use of the Mind — Reflections on the Genius of Horace, of Boileau, of J. B. Rousseau — the Life of Abbé Barthelemi — Reflections on Alexander the Great, and Charles XII. — Translation of Tacitus' Life of Agricola — Pope's Essay on Man, translated —

NIZOLIUS, Marius, an Italian grammarian, who published Thesaurus Ciceronianus, or a dictionary of the words and expressions of Cicero, &c. folio — de Veris Principiis, et Verâ Ratione philosophandi, &c. 1553, much admired by Leibnitz. The time of his death is not mentioned.

NOAH, son of Lamech, was born 2978; B. C. and was saved from the destruction of the deluge, by building an ark, in obedience to the directions of the Almighty. With him were saved his wife, his three sons, and their three wives, and by them the earth was afterwards peopled. The place where the ark first rested after the sinking of the waters of the flood, was mount Ararat in Armenia. Noah died 2029, B. C.

NOAILLES, Lewis Antony de, cardinal and archbishop of Paris, was born of an illustrious family, 27th May, 1651. Though by birth duke of St. Cloud, and a peer of France, and the possessor of large domains, he preferred the ecclesiastical state to political distinction, and became D. D. of the Sorbonne, 1676. In 1679, he was made bishop of Cahors, and the next year translated to Chalons, and in 1695, to the archbishopric of Paris. In this high dignity he framed excellent regulations for the government of his clergy, and zealously opposed the prevailing doctrines of Quietism, and of Jansenism. In 1700, he was raised to the rank of cardinal, at the request of Lewis XIV. who observed to him, that he felt more pleasure in obtaining for him the hat, than he would in receiving it. The manner in which he sanctioned "the Moral Reflections," of Pasquin Quésnel on the New Testament, brought him unwarily into trouble. Some of the jesuits accused the author of heresy and sedition, and the archbishop shared in the censure, and after appeals to pope Clement XI. there was issued from Rome 1713, the famous bull called "Unigenitus," which condemned the Moral Reflections as improper and dangerous. The clamor of the jesuits increased by the intrigues of father Tellier prevailed, the cardinal was exiled, but afterwards restored to favor, and his persecutor Tellier disgraced. The cardinal died at Paris, 4th May, 1729, and his remains were intombed in the cathedral. His brother Gaston succeeded him at Chalons, and died 1720.

NOAILLES, Adrian Maurice, duke de, son of Anne Julius duke of Noailles, was born 1678. He early devoted himself to the military service, and attended his father in the campaigns of Catalonia in 1693, and 1694. He was afterwards employed under Vendome, and then served in Flanders in 1696, and in 1700 he accompanied the young king of Spain to Madrid, and in the war of the Spanish succession maintained the honor of his nation and the prowess of his family. His intimacy and alliance with Madame de Maintenon secured his favor with the monarch, and in 1708, he was named general of the French armies in Roussillon, where he obtained some important advantages. He took the strong town of Gironne in 1710, and contributed to the submission of all Arragon, and for his services he was made a Spanish grandee by Philip V. and also raised to the honor of duke and peer of France.

France. After the death of Lewis XIV. he was made by the regent, president of the council of the finances and admitted into the council of the regency, but the elevation of cardinal du Bois to the ministry proved his disgrace. He was recalled on the death of du Bois, by the regent and restored with increased honors to the ministry, and in the campaign of 1733, he was invited to serve in the army. He distinguished himself at the siege of Philippsburg, and was rewarded with the rank of marshal, and the year after he drove the Germans from Worms. He was in 1735, placed at the head of the French army in Italy, where he gathered fresh laurels, but in the war of 1741, he was less successful. He afterwards abandoned the military profession, and served his country in assisting as a minister at her counsels, and died universally respected 24th June, 1766, aged 88. By his wife, who was niece to Madame Maintenon, he had two sons, both of whom rose to the rank of marshals of France.

NOBLE, Eustache de, a native of Troyes, who rose by his abilities to the appointment of procureur general of the parliament of Metz. An accusation of being guilty of mal-practices all at once robbed him of his reputation and office, and after being imprisoned in the Chatelet, he was banished for nine years. He appealed against this sentence, and was in consequence removed to the prison of the Conciergerie, where he became acquainted with Gabrielle Perreau, generally called la Belle Epiciere, a woman of great beauty, and many mental accomplishments. He escaped from his confinement, and was followed by his frail but faithful mistress, by whom he had three children, and at last he finished a life of adventures, wretchedness, and poverty, 31st Jan. 1711, aged 68, and was buried by public charity. He wrote several things divided into serious pieces, poetry, and romances, collected together in 10 vols. 12mo. The best known of these are the History of the Dutch Republic, 2 vols. — Account of Genoa — Dissertation on the Year of Christ's Nativity — Secret History of the Conspiracy of the Piazzi against the Medici — L'Ecole du Monde — History of the dethroning of Mahomet IV. — tales and fables, &c.

NOGAROLA, Isotta, a learned lady of Verona. She was well acquainted with philosophy, theology, and the learned languages, and her reputation was so universally known, that cardinal Bessarion went to Verona to converse with her. In a dialogue on the question whether Adam was a greater sinner than Eve in eating the forbidden fruit, she ably defended the cause of the mother of mankind, against Louis Foscaro who maintained a different opinion. She died 1468, aged 38, universally respected. Not less than 566 of her letters were preserved in De Thou's library. Her sisters Genevieve and Laura were equally eminent for their learning and piety. One of the same family, called Antoinetta, was also distinguished for her learning and beauty. She married Salvatico Bonacolti a nobleman of Mantua; and her daughter Angela inherited her virtues and learning, and acquired celebrity by her explanation of the prophecies and difficult passages of scripture.

NOGAROLA, Lewis, a noble Venetian, well skilled in the Greek language. He translated into Latin, various Greek authors, in a style elegant and correct. He was at the council of Trent, and served his country in several important offices. He died at Verona 1559, aged 50.

NOINVILLE, James Bernard de, member of the academy of inscriptions, was a man of great information, and author of the History of the Opera, 2 vols. 8vo. — Dissertation on Dictionaries, &c. He died 19th July, 1768.

NOIR, John le, an ecclesiastic of Sees, who was persecuted for his heretical opinions, and at last condemned to perpetual imprisonment. He died at Nantes 22d April, 1692. His works are numerous, and all on subjects of divinity and ecclesiastical discipline, and possess great merit, notwithstanding the charge of heresy, produced against them.

NOLDIUS, Christian, a Danish divine, rector of Landseerod college, and divinity professor at Copenhagen, was born at Hoyboyen in Scania, 22d June, 1626. He travelled over Germany, Holland, and England, and was universally respected for his learning and virtues. He wrote Concordantia Particularum Hebræo-Chaldaicarum Veteris Testamenti, Jena 1734, 4to. — Historia Idumæa — Sacrarum Historiarum & Antiquitatum Synopsis — Logica — Leges distinguendi, &c. and died at Copenhagen 1673.

NOLIN, Denys, advocate of the parliament of Paris, quitted his profession for the study of divinity. He wrote Letters of N. Indes, on the Septuagint Version, &c. dissertations on the French Bibles, &c. He died 1710.

NOLIN, John Baptist, a geographer of Paris who died 1st July, 1762, aged 76. He bestowed great attention in the execution of his maps, which are still held in high estimation in France.

NOLLET, Dominic, an historical painter, born at Bruges. His battles and landscapes were much admired. He died 1736, aged 96.

NOLLET, John Anthony, a learned man, born at Pimbre, in the diocese of Noyon, 17th Nov. 1700. He studied at Clermont, Beauvais, and Paris, and with such success, that he soon became known to men of science and celebrity. Though an ecclesiastic, he devoted himself assiduously to philosophical pursuits. He visited England with Dufay, Duhamel, and Jussieu, in 1734, and was admitted into the London Royal society, and in a subsequent excursion to Holland, he was honored with the friendship of Desaguliers, Gravesande, and Musschembroeck. On his return to Paris he gave lectures on experimental philosophy, with illustrations of chemistry, anatomy, and natural history, and with such effect, that in 1738, the ministry at the request of Maurepas established a professorial chair of experimental philosophy purposely for him. He was, in 1739, admitted member of the academy of sciences, and a few months after he was invited by the king of Sardinia to fill the philosophical chair in the university of Turin. He was in 1744, recalled from Turin by the court to instruct the young dauphin in experimental philosophy, and in reward for his services he was appointed in 1753, first professor of experimental philosophy in the college of Navarre, and in 1757, philosophical instructor to the Royal family. This able philophilosopher, who by his experiments and discoveries contributed so much to the advancement of science, died at Paris, 25th April, 1770, aged 70. Besides lectures in 6 vols. 12mo. he published valuable treatises on Electricity, 5 vols. — on the Art of making Experiments, 3 vols. 12mo. and contributed ingenious papers to the memoirs of the academy.

NOLLIKINS, Joseph Francis, a painter, born at Antwerp. He copied Watteau, and his pieces of landscapes, children's amusements, &c. were in high repute. He settled at London, and was patronized by lords Tilney and Cobham. He died 21st Jan. 1748.

NONIUS, Marcellus, a learned grammarian and peripatetic philosopher, whose treatise "de Proprietate Sermonum" is highly esteemed. It was printed 1471, and in 8vo. 1614, with J. Mercier's notes.

NONNIUS, Lewis, a learned physician of Antwerp, in the 17th century, author of a curious treatise, called "Dieteticon, five de Re Cibaria," with useful remarks to explain some passages in Horace, Juvenal, &c. He wrote also a Commentary on Greek Medals — Hispania — Ichthyophagia — Epicedium Lipsiæ, &c.

NONNIUS, Peter, or NUNES, a mathematician, born in 1497, at Alcazar in Portugal. He taught mathematics at Coimbra, and was preceptor to Henry, son of king Emanuel. He was author of Latin treatises, de Arte Navigandi — de Crepusculis — Annotationes in Aristotelem — and a work on Algebra, written in Portuguese and in Spanish, and much esteemed. He died 1577, aged 80.

NONNUS, a Greek poet of Panopolis, in Egypt. He wrote in the fifth century, an Account of his Embassy in Æthiopia, &c. — a Paraphrase on St. John's Gospel — Dionysiaca, &c.

NOODT, Gerard, an eminent civilian, born 1647, at Nimeguen. He studied in his native town with great reputation, and after visiting the other universities of Holland, Leyden, Utrecht, and Franeker, where he was created L.L. D. he returned to practise the law. He distinguished himself so much as a pleader, that he was honorably elected to the law professorship of Nimeguen, and in 1679 to that of Franeker. He afterwards accepted the invitations of the magistrates of Utrecht, and in 1686 those of the curators of Leyden university, of which he was chosen rector in 1698. He died of an apoplexy at Leyden, 15th Aug. 1725. He was highly respected for his knowledge of the law, and that philosophical ease with which he discussed subjects of right and jurisprudence. His works are all on law subjects, and have been collected in one vol. 4to. 1713.

NORADIN, son of Sanguin, or Emadeddin, sultan of Aleppo and Nineveh, inherited with Sefseddin, his brother, his father's dominions, when that monarch was slain by his eunuchs at the siege of Calgembar, 1145. He enlarged by his valor the kingdom of Aleppo, which he had obtained to his share, and he bravely attacked the crusaders, who invaded his territories, and defeated Josselin, count of Edessa, and after seizing his dominions, he killed Raymond, prince of Antioch, in a dreadful battle. He next turned his arms against Iconium, and then subdued Egypt under his power, and caused himself to be acknowledged sultan of the country. He died 1174, universally respected as a man of generosity, prudence, and virtue.

NORDBERG, I. A. was the chaplain and the companion of Charles XII. in his military adventures. He wrote an account of his master's life in Swedish, little regarded by Voltaire. He died 1745.

NORDEN, Frederic Lewis, a learned Dane, born at Gluckstadt in Holstein, 22d Oct. 1708. He was like his father bred to the military service, and displayed in the profession great assiduity, and excelled in mathematics, and particularly in correct drawing. He was employed by the king of Denmark in travelling, and in examining the construction of ships, especially the galleys and vessels which navigate the Mediterranean. He visited with the curiosity and the judgment of a philosopher and of a man of science, Holland, Marseilles, Leghorn, Florence, and Rome, and every where was received with marks of high distinction. From Italy he passed to Egypt, and on his return to Denmark, he published an account of his "Travels in Egypt and Nubia," which is interesting, correct, and valuable. In the war between England and Spain, Norden came to London, where he was treated with great kindness, and he went on board the fleet of sir John Norris as a volunteer, and afterwards in 1740, went with sir Chaloner Ogle in the fleet to reinforce admiral Vernon. When he found his health declining, he passed over to France, but died at Paris 1742, much lamented. When in London he was elected a member of the Royal society, and in return for the honor, he presented the public with drawings of some ruins and colossal statues at Thebes in Egypt, 1744. His travels, with plates and drawings, are published in 2 vols. folio.

NORDEN, John, an able topographer, surveyor to the king's lands in the reign of James I. He wrote various works, and was the first author of a pocket-companion. Some of his books had curious titles, as the Sinful Man's Solace — Contrariety between the Wicked and the Godly set forth in a Pair of Gloves fit for every Man to wear, 1517. He wrote also, Labyrinth of Human Life, a poem — a Survey of Middlesex and of Hertfordshire, &c. He was, according to Wood, born in Wiltshire, and studied at Oxford. He died about 1625.

NORDEN FLEICHT, Chederig Charlotte de, a native of Stockholm, celebrated among the Swedes for her elegant poems. Besides an ingenious Apology for Women, a poem, she wrote the Passage of the Belts, two traits in the Baltic, over which, when frozen, king Charles Gustavus marched his army 1658. She died 29th June 1793, aged 44.

NORDENSCHOLD, a Swede, governor of Finland, and knight of the order of the sword, is known for his extensive knowledge of political œconomy, which he evinced in the many valuable communications made to the academy of Stockholm. This learned and intelligent man died 1764.

NORES, Jason de, a native of Nicosia in Cyprus. He left his country when it was ravaged by the Turks, and came to Padua, where he taught moral philosophy.

philosophy. He wrote various works in Latin and in Italian. His "Interpretatio" on Horace's Art of Poetry, was much esteemed. He died 1590.

NORGATE, Edward, an ingenious artist. There is still preserved in the Stirling family, a grant of the government of Nova Scotia to lord Stirling, by Charles I. in the initial letter of which the king is represented sitting on his throne, delivering the patent to the earl; while around the border appears a miniature of the customs, mode of fishing, hunting, &c. of the country. This very able illuminator died 1649.

NORIS, Henry, an Augustine monk, born at Verona 1631. He was carefully educated by his father, who was a native of Ireland, and after studying with great success at Rimini, he came to Rome where he continued his improvement, and by a constant and regular application of 14 hours every day, he acquired extensive knowledge and equal celebrity. He was liberally appointed ecclesiastical professor at Pisa, by the duke of Tuscany, and he obtained great reputation by his History of Pelagianism. This work, however, was not without its enemies; he was attacked and even denounced before the pope as a heretic; but Innocent XII. sensible of the merit of the author, appointed him sub-librarian of the Vatican, and at last in 1695, gave him a cardinal's hat. His abilities were afterwards engaged in all ecclesiastical affairs of moment, and in 1702 he was named among others, to reform the calendar. He died at Rome of a dropsy, 1704. His works, which are elegantly written, and abound with erudition, have appeared together in 5 vols. folio, Verona, 1729 and 1730.

NORMANT, Alexis, advocate of the parliament of Paris, acquired deserved celebrity in his profession by his love of justice, his wisdom, and his integrity. This universally respected and most amiable man died 4th June 1745, aged 58.

NORRIS, John, an English divine and Platonic philosopher, born 1657, at Collingborne-Kington, Wilts, where his father was minister, and educated at Winchester school, and Exeter college, Oxford. In 1680 he was chosen fellow of All-Soul's, and in 1689 he succeeded to the rectory of Newton St. Loe, Somersetshire, where he married. In 1691 he was made rector of Bemerton, near Sarum, where he died a martyr to intense study, 1711, aged 54. Mild, humble, and amiable in his manners, he was an enthusiast as a man, a mystic in theology, and in philosophy an idealist. He attacked Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, and wrote against Dodwell on the Immortality of the Soul. His works are chiefly on moral and theological subjects, and against the quakers, Calvinists, and other seceders of the day, and his sermons are written in a clear, pleasing, and pathetic style. He wrote also some poems.

NORRIS, John, a native of Norfolk, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He showed himself a grateful benefactor to his university, by the grant of an estate of 190l. a-year for a theological professorship, and for annual prizes on divinity subjects among the students of Cambridge. He was twice married, and left only one daughter. He died 1777, aged 43.

NORTH, Francis, lord keeper of the great seal under Charles II. and James II. was the third son of the second Dudley lord North. He was educated at Bury school, and St. John's college, Cambridge, and afterwards entered at the Middle Temple, and soon rendered himself eminent not only as a good lawyer, but as a great proficient in mathematics, history, music, and philosophy. He attended as counsel the Norfolk circuit, and soon distinguished himself as an able, acute, and discerning lawyer, and gradually rose through the offices of solicitor and attorney-general to the place of chief justice of the Common Pleas. On the death of lord Nottingham he succeeded to the seals, and in 1683 was raised to the peerage by the title of lord Guildford. He died at his house Wroxton, 1685. He wrote an Index of Verbs Neuter, finished while at school, and printed with Lily's Grammar—a paper on the Gravitation of Fluids, considered in the Bladders of Fishes, printed in Lowthorp's Philosophical Transactions abridged—an Answer about sir S. Moreland's Statu Barometer.—an Essay on Music—Concertos—Political Papers, &c.

NORTH, Dr. John, next younger brother to the preceding, was born Sept. 1645. He was educated at Bury school, and Jesus college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1672 he was made Greek professor of the university, prebendary of Westminster 1673, and in 1677 he succeeded Dr. Barrow as master of Trinity college. In this office he met with some opposition from his fellows, but his integrity remained unshaken. He completed the college library begun by his predecessor, and died 1683, after being for some time unhappily robbed of his understanding by a dreadful palsy. He edited Plato's Socratis Apologia—Crito—Phædo, &c. 1673.

NORTH, George, a native of London, educated at St. Paul's, and at Benet college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree. He was made vicar of Codicote, Herts, by the bishop of Ely, and some time after, for an able treatise in defence of the Antiquarian society, he was admitted fellow of that learned body. He died on his living, 27th June 1772, and was buried there. He wrote a table of English Silver Coins from the Conquest to the Commonwealth—Remarks on the Money of Henry III.—and he began a History of the Antiquarian Society, which, however, he destroyed in his last illness.

NORTH, Frederic, earl of Guildford, better known as lord North, the minister under whose administration England lost her American colonies. He succeeded Charles Townshend as chancellor of the exchequer; and in 1770 the duke of Grafton, as first lord of the treasury, and continued in that high but laborious office till the conclusion of the war. As a public character, lord North was a flowing and persuasive orator, well skilled in argumentation, and master of great presence and coolness of mind, and in private life he was very amiable, cheerful and jocular in conversation, the friend of learned men, and correct in his conduct. The last years of his life were afflicted with blindness. He died July, 1792, aged 60, much and universally lamented.

NORTON, Thomas, an English writer, born at Sharpen-

Sharpenhoe, Bedfordshire. He was a barrister, and in his principles a strong Calvinist. He assisted Sternhold and Hopkins in their version of the psalms; and to the 27 which he turned to metre, appear the initials of his name. He also translated into English some Latin poems — Calvin's Institutions — and Nowell's large Catechism, and assisted Thomas Sackville in his play called Ferrex and Porrex. He wrote besides, an Epistle to the Queen's poor deluded Subjects of the North, 1569 — a Warning against the Practices of the Papists — and other pieces against popery. He died about 1600.

NORTON, John, author of "the Scholar's Vade Mecum," in which he attempted to alter the orthography and structure of the English language in the most capricious manner, flourished in the age of Charles II.

NORTON, lady Frances, was descended from the Frekes of Dorsetshire, and married sir George Norton of Somersethire, by whom she had three children. On the death of her daughter, who had married sir Richard Gethin, she wrote the Applause of Virtue, 4to. 1705 — and Memento Mori, or Meditations on Death. She took for her second husband colonel Ambrose Norton, and for her third Mr. Jones, and died 1720, aged about 70.

NOSTRODAMUS, Michael, a celebrated French physician and astrologer, born at St. Remy in Avignon, Dec. 14th, 1503. He studied at Avignon and Montpellier, and took his doctor's degree in the last city 1529. He practised for four years at Agen, where he married and lost his wife, and afterwards went to Marseilles, and then to Aix, where his abilities were displayed in a very successful manner in checking the progress of the plague, by a powder of his own invention. These friendly services were acknowledged by the gratitude of the town, and during some years he received from them a liberal pension. After some time he quitted physic for the more captivating reputation of a prophet and astrologer, and in 1555 he published his prophecies in verse. He was in consequence noticed by the public as an extraordinary man; but while some regarded him as a foolish visionary, and others as an impious associate of the devil, he was sent for to the court of Henry II. and of Catherine of Medicis, and was dismissed loaded with presents. Upon this he increased his work from 300 quatrains to a complete milliade; and when it was discovered that on the king's death he had foretold it in some enigmatical way, his fame was spread over Europe, and he was now consulted not only by the vulgar, but by great men and by princes. He chiefly lived at Salon, where Charles IX. visited him, and declared himself particularly his patron. He died, however, soon after this mark of royal favor, at Salon, July 2d, 1566. By a second marriage he left three sons and three daughters.

NOVARINI, Lewis, an ecclesiastic of Verona, of the order of the Theatins. He wrote Commentaries on the Four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, 4 vols. fol. — Electa Sacra, 6 vols. fol. — Adagia Sanct. Patrum, 2 vols. &c. He died 1650, aged 56.

NOUE, Francis de la, a native of Brittany, born of an ancient family in 1531. He served in Italy with distinction, and on his return embraced the party of the Calvinists. He took Orleans in 1567, contributed to the victory of Jarnac two years after, and then took Fontenai, Oleron, Marennes, Soubise, and Bronages. At the siege of Rochelle he lost his left arm, and had one made of iron, in consequence of which he was called Iron Arm. In 1571 he served in the Low Countries, where he took Valenciennes, and afterwards he was employed at Rochelle. He entered into the service of the States General in 1578, and took count Egmont prisoner, but was himself taken in battle two years after, and remained in confinement five years. He afterwards served against the league, and at last perished at the siege of Lamballe by a musket ball, 1591, universally and deservedly lamented. He wrote Discourses, Military and Politic, 4to. His son Odet served with distinction under Henry IV. and died 1618. He is author of Christian Poems, &c.

NOUE, Stanislaus Louis de la, of the same family as the preceding, was count of Vair, and was born at Nazelles, near Chinon, 1729. He served with great reputation in the French army, in the campaigns of 1741 and 1756, and at last fell in the affair of Saxenhausen 1760. When Louis XV. heard of his death, he exclaimed, "then we have lost the Loudon of France." This brave warrior wrote New Military Constitutions, &c. printed at Frankfort, 8vo. 1760, with plates. His life was written by Touffain.

NOUE, John Saure de la, a native of Meaux, who acquired some celebrity as an actor. After playing at Rouen and Lille, he came to Paris, and exhibited his powers at Fontainebleau 1752. He was patronized by the duke of Orleans and by the court, and obtained a pension. Voltaire wrote the Princess of Navarre on his account, that he might act the chief character of the piece. He died 15th Nov. 1761, aged 60. He wrote Mahomet II. a tragedy — Zelica, a comedy — the Return of May — the Corrected Coquette, &c. His works were collected together at Paris, 1765, in 12mo.

NOUE, Denis de la, a printer of great eminence at Paris. He published a Concordance of the Bible, &c. and died 1650.

NOUE, N. la, a famous financier in France in the 17th century. Though of obscure origin, he raised himself to consequence, and by the immense riches which he possessed, he constructed superb mansions for his residence, which excited the envy of the nobility, and procured his downfall. He was accused of mismanagement and rapacity, 1705, and condemned for nine years to the galleys, and to be pilloried.

NOVATIAN, a pagan philosopher in the third century, who was converted to christianity, and privately ordained a bishop. He attempted to seize the see of Rome, but when opposed by Cornelius, he declared himself the head of a new heresy, which considered it as sinful to admit to the Eucharist persons who had once fallen into idolatry. The followers of this new doctrine were called Novatians, or Catharites, i. e. pure. Some of Novatian's works are extant, published by Jackson, London, 1728, in 4to.

NOVATUS, a priest of Carthage, who supported the pro-propriety of admitting to the communion, even without penitence, persons who had fallen into idolatry. He afterwards rejected the doctrine, and adopted that of Novatian, which was directly opposite to his former opinion. This great inconsistency caused a violent schism in the church in the third century.

NOWEL, Alexander, an English divine, born at Read, in Lancashire, and educated at Brazen-nose, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He was made master of Westminster school, prebendary of Westminster, and dean of St. Paul's, and in the reign of Elizabeth he was elected member of parliament, but did not sit in the house, as being a clergyman. His Catechism in Latin, printed 1572 and 1578, was of universal use, and much admired, so that it was translated, not only into English, but into Greek. He died 1602. His brother Lawrence died dean of Lichfield, 1576, and left in MS. a Saxon-English Dictionary, now in the Bodleian library.

NOY, William, a lawyer, born at St. Burian, in Cornwall, and educated at Exeter college, from whence he entered at Lincoln's Inn. He was member for Helston, in James's reign, and afterwards for St. Ives, and was a violent opponent of the measures of the court. In 1631 his opposition ceased; he was made, by Charles I. attorney general, and then all his abilities were exerted to support the king's attempts to levy money without the parliament. To his advice the project for ship money, so fatal to the royal prerogative, is attributed. Though abused for his attachment to the king, and his dereliction of former principles, Noy is universally acknowledged to have been a good lawyer, a tolerable orator, and a man of sound and strong judgment. He died Aug. 1634, at Tunbridge-wells, where he had retired for the benefit of the waters, and was buried at New Brentford. He wrote a Treatise on the Grounds and Maxims of the Laws of England, 4to. — Perfect Conveyancer, &c.

NUCK, Anthony, a Dutch physician. He practised at the Hague, and was professor of anatomy at Leyden, and wrote Adenographia — Sedlographia, & Operationes, & Experimenta Chirurgica, 3 vols. Lugd. 1722.

NUGENT, Robert earl, a native of Westmeath, Ireland, who abjured the Roman catholic tenets for the protestant, and obtained a seat in parliament in 1741, with the office of comptroller of the household of the prince of Wales. As the favorite of the court, he continued to hold offices of trust and great emolument, and in 1766, was created a peer of Ireland, and some time after advanced to an earldom. He wrote an Ode to Mankind in 1741 — verses addressed to the queen, with a new year's gift of Irish manufacture — Verses on the Memory of Lady Townshend, besides odes, epistles, &c. which possess considerable merit. He died 1788.

NUGENT, Thomas, LL. D. an Irishman, who acquired some celebrity by his useful publications, especially his Vocabulary of the Greek Primitives, 8vo. — a Pocket Dictionary of the French Language, &c. He also translated the Port Royal Greek and Latin Grammars, 4 vols. 8vo. and published a Tour in Europe, 4 vols. 8vo. His daughter married the celebrated Edmund Burke.

NUMA POMPILIUS, second king of Rome, is known for the laws which he established, and the respect for religion and religious ceremonies which he introduced among his subjects. He died B. C. 672.

NUMENIUS, a Greek philosopher in the second century. He was a follower of the doctrines of Pythagoras and Plato; but called Plato, Moses speaking Greek, as he considered him as having borrowed much from the Jewish legislator.

NUMERIANUS, Marcus Aurel. son of the emperor Carus, succeeded, with his brother Carinus, 284, but was soon after assassinated by his father-in-law Arrius Aper.

NUNEZ, Ferdinand, a Spanish critic, born at Pincia, near Valladolid. He was professor of belles letters at Alcala and Salamanca, and died very old, 1552. He wrote Commentaries on Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Seneca, &c.

NYE, Philip, a nonconformist, born in Suffex, about 1596. He entered at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, and removed to Magdalen hall, where he was admitted to his master's degrees, 1622, about which time he took orders. He was for some time curate of St. Michael's church, Cornhill, but rejecting the doctrines of the church of England, he retired to Holland, and resided at Arnheim, in Guelderland. On the decline of the royal power, he returned to England, and was made minister of Kimbolton, Huntingdonshire, and afterwards was one of the assembly of divines, and became a great champion of the presbyterians, and an asserter of the solemn league and covenant. His services were rewarded with the living of Aſton, near London; but he now deserted to the independents, and was confidentially consulted and flattered by them, while he converted his influence and popularity to his own aggrandizement, and the emolument of his family. At the restoration he was forbidden to hold any offices whatever. He died in the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, 27th Feb. 1672. He wrote several sermons, and political tracts, and his seditious views, and hypocritical conduct, are humorously alluded to by Butler, who mentions in his Hudibras, Philip Nye's thanksgiving beard.

NYE, Nathanael, a mathematician under Charles II. master gunner to the city of Worcester, and author of "Art of Gunnery," 1670, and a treatise on Artificial Fire Works.

NYMANNUS, Gregory, author of a treatise on Apoplexy, 4to. — a Dissertation on the Life of the Fœtus, 12mo. &c. was professor of botany and anatomy at Wittemberg, and died 1638, aged 43.

O.

OBS

OATES, Titus, known for his infamies and plots under Charles II. was son of an anabaptist, and born about 1619. He was at first a conformist, then a papist, and again a conformist, but in his conduct, though a clergyman, very vicious. He was chaplain to a man of war, but dismissed for unnatural practices; and when honest resources failed, he contrived with Dr. Tongue, to disclose a pretended plot against the king, in consequence of which, several respectable persons were not only accused, but upon his evidence, condemned and executed. This succeeded so well, that he was rewarded for the discovery, with a pension of 1200l. a-year, and an honorable residence at Whitehall. Under James II. his infamous conduct was reviewed, and he was, upon the testimony of 60 witnesses, convicted of perjury, and sentenced to be whipped and pilloried. He bore the punishment with great fortitude, and when released from imprisonment, at the revolution, he sunk into contempt, and died 1705.

OBADIAH, the fourth of the lesser prophets, was the servant of Ahab, according to Jerome, and the protector of Elijah, though some authors place him in a more recent age, as the contemporary of Hosea.

OBRECHT, Ulric, a learned German, born July 23d, 1646, at Strasburg. He studied at Strasburg, Montbeillard, and Altorf, and made the most astonishing progress in the sciences, as well as in the languages, ancient and modern. After finishing his travels, he settled at Strasburg, where he married the daughter of professor Boecler, whom he succeeded in the chairs of eloquence and history. Upon the conquest of Strasburg by Lewis XIV., Obrecht changed his religion from protestant to Roman catholic, and was in consequence, made by the victorious monarch, in 1685, president of the senate of his native town, with the title of prætor royal. In the midst of his numerous employments as a lawyer and president, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits. He died of a fever, 6th Aug. 1701. He wrote, among other things, Prodromus Rerum Alsaticarum, 4to. — Excerpta Historica, de Naturâ Successionis in Monarch. Hispan. 3 vols. 4to. — Quintilian, edited with notes, 2 vols. 4to. — the Life of Pythagoras, from Iamblicus — De Vexillo Imperii — an edition of Dictys Cretensis.

OBSEQUENS, Julius, author of a treatise De Prodigiiis, best edited by Scheffer, 1679, flourished about 395 A. D.

OBSEPEUS, John, a German physician, born at Brettin, 1556. He was made professor of physic at Heidelberg, and died there, 1596. He published some pieces of Hippocrates, with remarks, &c. His brother Simon was also professor at Heidelberg, and died 1619, aged 44.

OCK

OCCAM, or OCCHAM, William, a scholastic divine of the fourteenth century; the disciple of Duns Scotus, and so renowned as to acquire the name of the Invincible Doctor. As he belonged to the Cordeliers, he was engaged by Michael de Cefena, the general of his order, to attack the church of Rome, and pope John XXII. and in consequence of this dispute, which gave rise to the question about the bread of the Cordeliers, both Occam and his friend were excommunicated by the pontiff. Occam was afterwards reconciled to the see of Rome, and died 1374. His works, which display both wit and subtilty, were published, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1476, are now little regarded.

OCELLUS, a Greek Pythagorean philosopher, born in Lucania, and hence called Lucanus. His work on the universe is extant, edited at Amsterdam, 8vo. 1688.

OCHINUS, Bernardin, an Italian, born in Siene, 1487. He was at first a Cordelier, but afterwards studied physic, and again, in a moment of inconsistency, returned to the church, and in 1534, became a strict Capuchin, and rose to be the vicar-general of the order. His eloquence as a preacher recommended him to the notice of pope Paul III. who made him his confessor; but still inconsistent, he became a convert to the tenets of Luther, and preached openly in favor of them. Thus an enemy to Rome, he made his escape from Italy, and after visiting Geneva, Lucca, and Augsburg, he came to England with his friend Peter Martyr, 1547, and was by Cranmer, made prebendary of Canterbury. On the death of Edward VI. he retired from England to Strasburg, to avoid persecution, and then went to Basil; and at last settled at Zurich. After presiding eight years over the Italian church in that city, he was banished by the magistrates of the town, 1563, for publishing some dialogues in favor of polygamy. He fled to Moravia and Poland, where he joined the Socinians. He died of the plague at Slakow, 1564, aged 77. He was author of some controversial works, and of some sermons in Italian, in 5 vols. 8vo. some of which have been translated into English.

OCKLEY, Simon, an able divine and orientalist, descended from a respectable Norfolk family, but accidentally born at Exeter, 1678. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B. D. and in 1705 was made vicar of Swaveley, Cambridgeshire, and in 1711, Arabic professor to the university. He died at his living, 9th Aug. 1720, much respected, but leaving his family in distressed circumstances. He was a very learned man, and well skilled in oriental literature. He published, 1706, Introductio ad Linguas Orientales — the History of the present.

present Jews throughout the World, 1707 — the Life of Hai Ebn Yokhdan, from the Arabic of Abu Jaafar Ebn Tophail, 8vo. 1708 — the History of the Saracens, 2 vols. 8vo. a most valuable work — some single sermons, &c.

OCTAVIA, sister of Augustus, married Marcellus, and after his death, was given to Antony, to reconcile him and her brother. The death of her son Marcellus is pathetically described by Virgil. She was a woman possessed of great virtues, and died B. C. 11.

OCTAVIA, daughter of Claudius and Messalina, married Nero, by whom she was divorced, and afterwards put to death at the age of 20.

ODAZZI, John, a painter and engraver, born at Rome. He was member of the academy of St. Luke and deserved by his services to be knighted by the pope. He died 1731, aged 68.

ODELL, Thomas, a gentleman of Buckinghamshire. He ruined his estates by supporting the cause of the court, and afterwards obtained the permission to erect a theatre in Goodman's-fields, 1729; but when his theatrical efforts promised to be successful, the city magistrates opposed him, and he disposed of his property to Mr. Giffard. He was in 1738 made deputy master of the revels, and died May 1749. He wrote four dramatic pieces which were for a little while favorably received.

ODENATUS, king of Palmyra, was admitted as the associate of Gallienus on the imperial throne for his services against Sapor king of Persia. He was assassinated by a favorite, 267, and his wife Zenobia assumed the reins of government at his death.

ODIN, a northern hero who united in his person the characters of priest, king, and poet, and died about 70 B. C. He was worshipped as a god after death.

Odo, Saint, second abbot of Clugni, was born at Tours, 879. The sanctity of his life greatly contributed to the reputation, and increase of his abbey, and even kings and popes referred their disputes to his unbiassed judgment. He was a man also of great learning, and wrote some religious books. He died 943.

Odo, of Kent, was a Benedictine monk and prior, and abbot of his order in the 12th century. He was the friend of Thomas à Becket, of whose miracles he wrote an account, besides Commentaries on the Pentateuch, &c.

ODORAN, a monk of St. Peter-le-Vif at Sens, author of "Chronica Rerum in Orbe Gestarum" till 1302. He died some time after.

OEOLAMPADIUS, John, a German divine, born at Reinsperg, Franconia, 1482. He studied at Heidelberg, Bologna, and Tubingen, and was for some time preceptor to the son of the elector Palatine. He was honored with the degree of D. D. at Basil, and soon, upon embracing the principles of Luther, was made divinity professor, and preacher in that city. He married in 1528, in consequence of which his friend Erasmus jocosely speaks of his change of situation. He died Dec. 1531, leaving a son and two daughters. He engaged against Luther in support of Zuinglius concerning the Eucharist, and his book on the occasion is mentioned by Erasmus with credit. He translated Chrysostom's commentaries on Genesis, and some of the works of Nazianzen and other fathers, and wrote besides some notes on Scripture, &c.

ECUMENIUS, a Greek writer in the 10th century. He is called by some an able interpreter of scripture, while others speak with indifference of him. His works appear with those of Aretas at Paris, 2 vols. folio.

OFFA, king of Mercia, on the death of Ethelbald 755, was successful against the kings of Kent, and Wessex, and perfidiously murdered Ethelbert king of the East Angles and seized his kingdom. His crimes which were great, induced him to pay his court to the clergy for their support and forgiveness. He not only made a pilgrimage to Rome, but was the first who gave the tenth of his goods to the church, and established the Peter-pence tribute. He founded the monastery of St. Alban's, which he endowed most liberally. He reigned 39 years, and died 794.

OGDEN, Samuel, an English divine, born at Manchester 1716, and educated at the grammar school there, and at King's college, Cambridge, from which he removed to St. John's, where he became fellow 1739. In 1744 he was elected master of Halifax school, which he resigned 1753 to reside at Cambridge. He took his degree of D. D. and in 1764 was made Woodwardian professor, and 1766 presented to the rectory of Lawford, Essex, and a month after to Stansfield, Suffolk. He died 23d March, 1778. It is said that his manners were rustic, and his features occasionally disagreeable and ferocious, but his heart was most amiable and humane. His sermons have been published 2 vols. 8vo. and defended by bishop Halifax against the attacks of Mainwaring. They are popular discourses, elegant, striking, and pathetic.

OGILEY, John, a Scotch writer born near Edinburgh, Nov. 1600. Though of a respectable family, he was obliged for his maintenance to pursue the profession of dancing-master, and in this capacity he recommended himself to the duke of Buckingham and other noblemen. In 1633 he was in the family of lord Stafford, and was by that nobleman appointed deputy master of the revels in Ireland. He in consequence built a theatre in Dublin, and met with great encouragement; but at the breaking out of the Irish rebellion 1641, he lost his property and returned to England, poor. He then went to Cambridge on foot, and applying himself with great industry to the learned languages, he was enabled to translate the works of Virgil, which appeared 1649-50, and produced both money and reputation. He continued to exert his abilities as a writer, and gave the world poetical translations of Homer's Iliad, and Odyssey, and in 1660 published a fine edition of the English Bible, with plates, which he presented to the king, and also to the House of Lords, by whom he was handsomely rewarded. In 1661 he was employed to conduct the poetical part of the king's coronation, and all the speeches, mottoes, &c. were thus submitted to his inspection, and of this he drew a striking relation in ten sheets folio, and afterwards published it in a magnificent style as a pattern for future similar solemnities. He obtained in 1692 the patent place of master of the revels in Ireland, against the application of sir W.

Dave-

Davenant, and afterwards, though ruined by the fire of London, he erected another fortune as cosmographer and geographic printer to the king. He died after a life of great labor and chequered fortunes, 4th Sep. 1676, and was buried in St. Bride's church Fleet street. He published besides, an Account of Japan, folio — an Atlas, folio — Fables of Æsop in verse. 2 vols. 8vo. — a Book of Roads, 8vo. afterwards improved by Bowen, and latterly by Paterfon, and Cary, &c.

OGLETHORPE, James, an English general. He was born in Westminster and early entered the army, and was aid-de-camp to prince Eugene. In 1732, he settled the colony in Georgia, and laid the foundations of the town of Savannah; but his attack on Augustine in Florida proved unsuccessful, and his conduct was submitted to the examination of a court martial which acquitted him. He was engaged against the rebels, in 1745, and was again tried by a court martial as if guilty of cowardice in the adoption of dilatory measures, but he was honorably acquitted. He died 1785, at the great age of 97.

OISEL, James, professor of civil law at Groningen, was born at Dantzic 1631. He wrote corrections and notes on various authors — Thesaurus Selector. Numismatum Antiquor. Ære expressorum, 4to. — catalogue of his valuable library. He died 1686.

OKOLSKI, Simon, a Polander, author of Orbis Polonus, or History of Poland, 3 vols. folio, Cracow, 1641, a valuable work. He was provincial of the jacobins in Poland, 1649.

OKSKI, Stanislaus, a Pole, who studied divinity under Luther and Melancthon, and preached with such zeal the tenets of the reformation among his countrymen, that he was called the Polish Demosthenes. He afterwards turned catholic and published his profession of faith at Warsaw, 1561. He wrote besides controversial tracts, Latin Annals of the Reign of Sigismund Augustus, 12mo.

OLAF, a king of Norway in the 10th century, who sent missionaries to Greenland to convert the barbarous natives to christianity.

OLAHUS, Nicolas, made by Ferdinand king of Hungary, bishop of Zagrab, chancellor of the kingdom, and afterwards archbishop of Stregonia, was born at Hermanstadt, and died at Tyrnau, 1568, aged 75. He wrote a Chronicle of his Time — a History of Attila — a Description of Hungary.

OLAVIDES, N. count de, a native of Spanish America, educated at Madrid, where his abilities soon began to display themselves. He accompanied, as secretary, count de Aranda, the Spanish ambassador to France, and at his return was made a count by Charles III. and appointed superintendant of Seville. In this new office he directed his attention to fertilize the hitherto barren and unprofitable spot called the Black Mountain, or Sierra Morena, and by his perseverance, and by offering liberal invitations to German colonists, he converted a desert region into a populous district. The success of his labors, however, was too great to escape envy, he was accused by his enemies, and for three years mourned the cruelty of his treatment in a dungeon. He escaped at last to Venice, where he died aged 65. The Triumph of the Gospel, in 4 vols 4to. in Spanish, a work of merit, is attributed to him.

OLDCTASLE, sir John, the good lord Cobham, was the first nobleman who suffered martyrdom for his religion. He was born in the reign of Edward III. and distinguished himself as the friend of public liberty. He was a general in the French campaigns, and obliged the duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris; but as he was a follower of Wickliffe's doctrines, and maintained itinerant preachers for their greater dispersion, he incurred the hatred of the Romish clergy, and was accused of heresy and disaffection to Henry V. Henry endeavoured to reason with him, but when Cobham declared the pope antichrist, the monarch shocked at his impiety, delivered him up to the archbishop, who sent him to the tower. He had the art to escape from confinement, but so violent and watchful were his persecutors, that after four years' concealment in Wales, he was seized and dragged to London. As a heretic and traitor, he was hung up on a gallows alive, and a fire lighted under him, so that he was thus cruelly roasted alive, in St. Giles's fields, 1417. He wrote 12 conclusions addressed to the parliament of England.

OLDENBURG, Henry, a German, born in the duchy of Bremen. He was consul for his countrymen at London, under Cromwell's usurpation, and was afterwards tutor to the lords Obryan and Cavendish, and during his residence at Oxford, he was acquainted with the founders of the Royal society of which he was elected fellow, and assistant secretary with Dr. Wilkins. He published in this capacity the 36 numbers of the philosophical transactions, and had a most extensive correspondence with various learned men. He wrote besides translations, &c. and died at Charleton near Greenwich, Aug. 1678, and was buried there.

OLDENBURGEN, Philip Andrew, author of "Thesaurus Rerum Publicarum totius Orbis," 4 vols. 8vo. and other works, was professor of history and law at Geneva, where he died 1678.

OLDERMAN, John, a German writer, Greek professor at Helmstadt, where he died of a dropsy 1723, aged 37. He was author of some ingenious and valuable dissertations, de Imperfectione Sermonis Humani — de Phraarte Flavio — de Ophir — de Mari Algoro, &c.

OLDFIELD, Anne, a celebrated actress, born in Pall Mall, 1683. Her father who was an officer, left her in dependent circumstances, but her fondness for plays and the sweetness of her voice, accidentally heard and commended by Farquhar, introduced her to sir John Vanburgh, and to Mr. Rich the patentee of the king's theatre, where she first exhibited herself. She soon shone in the characters of Leonora, in sir C. Nice, and of lady Betty Modish, in the Careless Husband; but as virtue and continence are seldom the inmates of a theatre, she yielded her reputation to the solicitations of Mr. A. Maynwaring, and after his death was the mistress of general Churchill. By each of these she had a son, and it is to be observed, that, whilst devoted to them she was remarkable for her constancy, exemplary conduct and fidelity, and in her private character she was humane and benevolent in the highest degree, as the patroness of indigent merit in Savage. She died Oct. 23d, 1730, and her body, after lying in state in the Jerusalem chamber, was buried in Westminster abbey with great pomp. Her wit and vivacity were said to be very engaging; her figure delicate and pleasing, and her manners fascinating in the extreme. The becoming neatness of her dress, as well as the acquired graces of her person, and of her understanding have been elegantly noticed by the Tatler.

OLDHAM, John, an English poet, born Aug. 9th, 1653, at Shipton, Gloucestershire. He was educated at Tetbury school, and removed to Edmund hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. and began to cultivate the muse. He was afterwards usher of the grammar school at Croydon, but the excellence of his poetry was noticed by lords Rochester and Dorset, and other wits of the age, and he was removed from the laborious drudgery of a school in 1678, and placed as tutor to the grandsons of sir Ed. Thurland. He afterwards was tutor to the son of sir William Hickes, and then settled in London as a wit and poet. Lord Kingston afterwards patronized him, and wished to make him his chaplain; but though the poet refused to submit to the dependance of the ecclesiastic, he continued in his house till his death, occasioned by the small pox, 9th Dec. 1683. He was buried in the church of Holme Pierrepont. His writings were chiefly satirical, and though a man of temperance and virtue, he is frequently licentious in his poetry. The whole consists of 50 pieces, the most valuable of which are the four satires on the jesuits, written 1679. His works were printed by captain Thomson, 3 vols. 12mo.

OLDISWORTH, William, joint writer in the Examiner, a periodical paper, and author of a Vindication of the bishop of Exeter, of state tracts, of state and miscellaneous poems, &c. of the odes and epodes of Horace translated, &c. died 15th Sep. 1734.

OLDMIXON, John, a political writer, born near Bridgewater, Somersetshire. As a party writer he was violent and severe in the extreme, he opposed with unusual virulence the Stuart family, and attacked the great writers of the time with envy and ill nature. His conduct exposed him to the resentment of Pope, who has given him a conspicuous place among the sons of dulness in his Dunciad. He obtained by his party zeal a post in the revenue at Bridgewater, where he died 9th July, 1742, at an advanced age. He wrote History of the Stuarts, folio—a volume of Poems—the Life of A. Maynwaring, Esq.—the Life of Queen Anne—a tragedy—an opera, and other things.

OLDYS, William, an eminent English writer, natural son of commissary Oldys, the chancellor of Lincoln, born about 1687. Few particulars of his life are known, though it is too apparent that he was intemperate, profligate, and licentious. He was for some time librarian to lord Oxford, and made a catalogue of that celebrated collection, which Osborne the bookseller purchased for 13,000l. He was also Norroy king at arms, as being well acquainted with heraldry. He died at the Herald's office, 15th April, 1761, aged 74, and was buried in St. Benet's church, Paul's wharf. His chief works were a Life of sir Walter Raleigh—various articles in the General Historical Dictionary—those Lives marked G. in the Biographia Britannica—Introduction to Hayward's British Muse—Observations on the Catalogue of English Lives—Poetical Characteristics—Health's Improvement, &c.

OLEARIUS, Godfrey, a learned German, born at Hall in Saxony, 1639. He became professor of Greek and of divinity at Leipsic, and in consequence of his great abilities was 10 times rector of that university. He married professor Muller's daughter, by whom he had six sons and six daughters, and died Aug. 1713. He was a great contributor to the "Leipsic Acts," and wrote various works on theology, philosophy, &c.

OLEARIUS, Godfrey, son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic, 23d July, 1672. He possessed great abilities, and after visiting Holland for some time, studied at Oxford, and became professor of Greek and Latin, and afterwards of divinity at Leipsic. He died in the flower of life, 10th Nov. 1715. He published a Dissertation on the Worship of God, by J. C.—a History of Rome and Germany—besides a Latin translation of Stanley's History of Philosophers, 4to.—and an edition of Philostratus, folio.

OLEARIUS, Adam, a German writer, secretary to the embassy, from the duke of Holstein, to the duke of Muscovy, and the king of Persia. He was six years in this employment, and at his return he published an account of his journey, with maps and figures, folio, translated into French by Wicquefort. He also published an Abridgement of the Chronicles of Holstein, from 1448, to 1663, 8vo. and 4to. He was afterwards librarian to the duke, and died 1671, aged 68.

O'LEARY, Arthur, a native of Cork, educated at St. Omer's, after which he entered into the order of the Franciscans, and became chaplain to a French regiment. As he refused to engage against his country he was dismissed from his employment in the regiment, and permitted to return to Cork, where some time after his zeal in rousing up the catholics to take up arms during the American war, procured him the notice of the government and a pension. He afterwards came to London and displayed great abilities as a pulpit orator. He died 1801, author of some valuable political tracts, 8vo. 1783—some sermons, &c.

OLEASTER, Jerom, a Portuguese Dominican, chaplain to John III. king of Portugal. He was at the council of Trent, and for his services was offered a bishopric, which he declined for the office of grand inquisitor. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, fol.—Commentary on Isaiah, fol. 1628, Paris, and died 1563.

OLEN, an ancient Greek poet, author of hymns, &c. no longer extant. His age is fabulous.

OLESNIKI, Ibigneus, a noble Pole, who from being secretary to king Ladislaus, entered into orders, and was made bishop of Cracovia and a cardinal. He was also engaged in the service of his country as an ambassador. He died 1455, aged 66.

OLIMPO, Balthazar, an Italian poet in the 16th century. His Pegasea in Stanse Amorofo, 1525, and his Gloria del Amore, 8vo. 1530, &c. have appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1559.

OLIVA, Alexander, general of the Augustine monks, was born at Saxoferato, 1408. He studied at Rimini, Bologna, and Perugia, and when at Rome, as general of his order, his great learning was much admired, and his eloquence in the pulpit so applauded that at last the pope Pius II. created him a cardinal, 1460, and made him bishop of Camerino. He died at Tivoli 1463, and was buried in the Augustine church at Rome. His works are de Christi Ortu Sermones Centum — de Cœnâ cum Apostolis Factâ — de Peccato in Spiritum Sanctum.

OLIVA, John, a learned ecclesiastic, born at Rovigo, in the Venetian territory, 1689. He was librarian to cardinal Rohan, and secretary to the conclave. He wrote dissertations on subjects of antiquity, and edited Poggio's works, and Silvestri's book on Pollux and Callor. He died at Paris 1757.

OLIVARES, Gasper de Guzman, count de, an illustrious Spaniard under Philip IV. He succeeded the duke of Uzeda as prime minister, and gained popularity by his wife and salutary regulations, and improvements in the state. His pride, however, created him many enemies, and not only occasioned the revolt of the Catalonians, but the total separation of the Portuguese from the Spanish dominions. Olivares was dismissed from office with disgrace, and died of a broken heart at Toro, in 1643.

OLIVER, Isaac, an English painter and designer. His historical pieces, and also his miniatures were much admired as patterns of superior excellence. He died 1617, aged nearly 60 years, and was buried in Blackfriars. His pictures are marked ϕ .

OLIVER, Peter, eldest son of the preceding, was also eminent as a miniature painter, and died 1661, aged 59. Some of his pictures were afterwards sold by his widow to Charles II.

OLIVER, of Malmesbury, a Benedictine monk. He was an able mechanic, but in attempting to fly from a tower with wings which he had made, he fell down and fractured his legs. He died 1660.

OLIVER, William, an able physician of Bath, author of treatises on the Bath Waters, and on Tar Water. He pretended to be an atheist, but in his last moments he saw his error, and died very penitent 1764.

OLIVER, Claude Matthew, a native of Marseilles, advocate in the parliament of Aix. He contributed much to the establishment of the academy of Marseilles, and he was one of its first members. He possessed great powers of mind, and a most retentive memory, so that with little premeditation he supported the most intricate causes at the bar, with the most captivating eloquence, and the most convincing arguments. He died 1736, aged 35. He wrote the History of Philip of Macedonia, the father of Alexander, 2 vols. 12mo. a work of merit, though negligently written — Memoir on the assistance given to the Romans by the people of Marseilles, during the second Punic war, and the war of Gaul, &c.

OLIVET, Joseph, a learned jesuit, born at Salins, 1682. He is chiefly known for his learned and valuable editions of Cicero's works printed at Paris, and then at Geneva, 9 vols. 4to. He published besides, translations of some of the orations of Demosthenes, and Cicero, and of Cicero's treatise de Nat. D. and various other works. He was member of the French academy, of which he wrote the history, and died 1768, much and universally respected.

OLIVETAN, Robert, a relation of the great Calvin, who printed at Neufchatel, 1535, fol. a French translation of the bible, the first executed from the Hebrew and Greek texts. It is said that Calvin contributed much to the work. It was called the Bible of the Sword, because the printer assumed a sword as his emblem. The work is now very scarce. Olivetan died the year after at Rome, where it is said he was poisoned by the catholics on account of his publications.

OLIVEIRA, Chevalier Francis de, a noble Portuguese. He was employed in various embassies and negotiations, but his enlightened mind was disgusted with the religion and politics of a bigoted court, and therefore abandoning the popish tenets he retired to Holland and afterwards to England, where he lived in learned ease and security. He published in French, "a Pathetic Discourse, addressed to his countrymen," in consequence of the earthquake which overwhelmed Lisbon. He died 18th Oct. 1783, aged 83, much and deservedly respected.

OLONNOIS, John David, a native of Olonne, near Poitou, famous for his bold adventures in the 17th century. He passed early into America, and afterwards joined the Buccaneers on the coast of St. Domingo. After spreading devastation and terror on the coasts of the Spanish settlements, he was at last attacked by the native Indians who cut his body to pieces and devoured it.

OLYBRIUS, Flavius Anicius, husband of Placidia, the sister of Valentinian III. was sent into Italy with an army against Ricimer, who had rebelled against Anthemius. Instead of fighting him, however, Ricimer proclaimed him emperor, and deposed his master Anthemius, and Olybrius thus raised to the throne of the West, gave hopes of a vigorous and peaceful reign, but died a few months after, 23d Oct. 472. He left one daughter, Juliana, married to the patrician Areobindus, who refused the purple of the Eastern empire.

OLYMPIODORUS, a peripatetic philosopher of Egypt, in the age of the second Theodosius, author of commentaries on Aristotle's Meteors, &c.

OLZOFFSKI, Andrew, a learned Polish divine. He travelled to France and Italy, and afterwards was in the service of the king of Poland, where he served as an able secretary, and as ambassador to Vienna. He was made bishop of Culm, and afterwards high chancellor, and primate of the kingdom, and while his wisdom, prudence, and patriotism, influenced and regulated the affairs of the kingdom, he showed himself satisfied with the honors of his country, and refused the dignity of a cardinal offered by the court of Rome. He died in 1678, after an illness of three days, aged 60. He published in Latin some political tracts esteemed in his time.

OMAR I. successor of Aboukerque, and second caliph after Mahomet, began to reign 634. After defeating Ali, whom Mahomet had appointed his successor, he spread his conquests over Syria and Phœnicia, and took the city of Jerusalem after an obstinate siege.

While successes attended him in Judæa, his generals extended his conquests over Persia and Egypt, and increased the worshippers of Mahomet by the terror of fire and sword. The fall of Alexandria under his power, was marked by the destruction of its celebrated library, which the Ptolemies had enriched with so many valuable works; but if Egypt mourned the loss of the monuments of human learning, she saw the canal of communication between the Nile and the Red sea, restored to its ancient useful form by the persevering labor of her conquerors. While he promised himself more extensive conquests, Omar was stabbed at Jerusalem, by Firouz, a Persian slave, 644, in his 63d year. During his reign the Mahometans conquered 36,000 towns or villages, destroyed 4000 Christian temples, and built 1400 mosques. Omar was, in his character, a great warrior, in his manners austere and virtuous; and regarding merit as the only title to superiority, he declared the crown elective, and placed his son in an inferior situation. He laid the foundations of Grand Cairo.

OMAR II. 13th caliph of the race of the Ommiades, succeeded his relation Solymán, 717. He laid siege to Constantinople, but his attempts to take it, supported by all the arts of military warfare, and the courage of a brave army, failed; and the destruction of his fleet by a terrible tempest, obliged him to retire from the walls. His conduct towards the Christians was very cruel and vindictive. He was assassinated at Edeffa, 720, by his own family, who dreaded lest his partiality for the house of Ali should deprive them of the throne. He had reigned two years and five months.

OMEIS, Magnus Daniel, author of Ethica Pythagorica — Ethica Platonica — Theatrum Virtutum & Vitiū ab Aristotele Omisso. — Juvenci Historia Evangelica cum Notis, &c. was professor of belles lettres at Altorf, and died there 1708, aged 63.

ONESICRITUS, a cynic philosopher among the attendants of Alexander the Great in Asia. He wrote an history of his royal patron.

ONESIMUS, a Phrygian slave, converted to christianity by St. Paul, and according to some, made bishop of Berea, where he suffered martyrdom.

ONKELOS, a Jewish rabbi, in the age of Christ, was author of the Chaldee Targum on the Pentateuch.

ONOMACRITUS, a Greek poet about 516 B. C. The poems which bear the name of Orpheus and Musæus are ascribed to him.

ONUPHRIUS, Panvinus, an Augustine monk, born 1529 at Verona. He continued the Lives of the Popes, begun by Platina, and dedicated them to Pius V. 1566. He published also other works, and was so skilled in historical knowledge, that he was called the Father of History. He died at Palermo in Sicily, 1568, aged 39.

OORT, Adam Van, an eminent painter of perspective and architecture. He was born at Antwerp 1557, and had among his pupils Rubens, and also Jordaens, who married his daughter.

OOST, James Van, a painter, born at Bruges 1600. He studied the manner of Annibal Caracci with great success, and his historical pieces, landscapes, &c. were much admired. His best piece is a descent from the cross, in the Jesuits' church, Bruges. He died 1671. His son James distinguished himself also as an artist, and died 1713, aged 76.

OPITIUS, Henry, a lutheran divine, born 1642, at Altemberg, Misnia. He was professor of oriental languages and theology at Kiel, where he died 1712. In his fondness for Hebrew literature, he wished to reconcile the grammar of the Greek to the rules of the Hebrew, and wrote some fanciful treatises on the subject. He edited also the bible in Hebrew, 2 vols. 4to.

OPITIUS, Martin, a poet, born at Buntflow in Silesia, 1597. He died of the plague at Dantzic 1639. His poems in Latin and in German, are much admired for their elegance and spirit. The best edition is that of Amsterdam, 1638.

OPORINUS, John, a German printer, born at Basil, 1507. He studied physic for some time, but afterwards applied himself to Greek and Latin, and then began the business of printer. Though careful, yet he was involved in debt, and died hardly solvent, 1568. He published no book which he did not himself correct. Besides the classical books which he printed, he wrote Notes on Plutarch — on Cicero's Tusculan Quæst. and other authors.

OPPEDE, John Meynier, baron d', president of the parliament of Aix, rendered himself odious by the atrocities which he committed against some heretics called Vaudois. Not only the 19 who had been condemned by the parliament to the stake, were destroyed, but 22 villages were devoted to the flames, and above 4000 persons perished by the sword or by fire, during that horrible persecution. In other respects Oppede was an upright magistrate, but religious zeal tarnished his character. He was acquitted when brought to trial, by asserting that he executed the orders of his sovereign Francis I. and that God had commanded Saul to destroy those princes the Amalekites. He died 1558.

OPPIAN, a Cilician, known as a Greek poet and grammarian in the second century. His poem on fishing is still extant, &c.

OPSOPÆUS, John, a German critic. From a corrector of the press, he became a physician of eminence, and was elected professor of medicine at Heidelberg. He edited some of the works of Hippocrates, with learned notes; but his best known work is an edition of the Sibylline Oracles, published at Paris, 1607. He died 1596, aged 40. His brother Simon was also a physician, and died 1619, aged 44. Vincent, a poet of the same age, wrote a Latin poem on the Art of Drinking, 1578, 8vo.

OPTATUS, an African bishop, author of an able treatise on the Schism of the Donatists. He died 384.

ORELLANA, Francis, a Spaniard, who accompanied Pizarro in his conquest of Peru. From the love of adventure he deserted his companions, and penetrated into the country, and was the first European who saw the great river Amazon, the best part of whose course he observed, till he reached the Spanish settlements of Cubagua, from which he departed for Europe. In the relation of what he had seen, he united united the marvellous and the true, and by reporting that he had passed through a country peopled by Amazons, he gave that name to the great river which he had discovered. He afterwards endeavoured again to discover the mouth of that river, and perished in the attempt about 1550.

ORGANA, Andrew, an Italian painter, born at Florence 1329. He was also distinguished as a sculptor and architect, and as a poet. His works are preserved at Pisa. In his picture of the last judgment, he represented all his friends in Paradise, and placed his enemies in hell. He died 1389, aged 60.

ORIBASIUS of Pergamus, was physician to the apostate Julian, and wrote a medical collection from Galen's works, edited in 4to. Leyden, 1745.

ORIGEN, a father of the church, born at Alexandria 185. He was a man of austere manners, but of great virtue, and his abilities as a preacher were displayed with success at Alexandria, Rome, and Caesarea. He suffered persecution under Decius, and died 254. His works, in 4 vols. folio, are valuable.

ORIGEN, a Platonic philosopher, the friend of Porphyry. — An Egyptian philosopher of that name, regarded marriage as an invention of the devil.

ORIGNY, Peter Adam, author of an History of Ancient Egypt — and of a System of Egyptian Chronology, was also distinguished in military life, and died at Rheims, his native place, 1774.

ORKAN, son of Othoman, made himself emperor of Turkey 1326, by the destruction of his elder brothers, and extended his dominions by the conquest of Gallipoli, and other provinces. He married the daughter of the emperor John Cantacuzenus, and died 1360.

ORLANDI, Pelegrini Anthony, author of the Origin and Progress of Printing from 1457 to 1500 — a History of Bolognese writers, 4to. in Italian — and Abecedario Pittorico, 4to. &c. was an eminent Italian bookseller, who died 1730.

ORLAY, Bernard Van, a native of Brussels, eminent as a painter, and as the disciple of Raphael. His pieces, which possess merit, adorn the churches and public edifices of the Netherlands. He died 1560, aged 70.

ORLEANS, Louis of France, duke of, son of Charles V. was born 1371, and he had a great share in the affairs of the kingdom during the reign of his brother Charles VI. He was basely murdered by his uncle John, duke of Burgundy, 1407, and this foul deed became the source of long and fatal disputes between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy.

ORLEANS, Charles, duke of, son of Louis of France, was called duke of Angouleme in his father's life time. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and after a captivity of 25 years in England, he returned to France, and undertook the conquest of Milan, which he claimed in right of his mother. He was, however, able to conquer only the county of Ast. He died at Amboise 1465, leaving one son Charles, who married Louisa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I. He was a liberal patron of letters, and wrote some poetical pieces.

ORLEANS, Louis, duke of, prince of the blood, son of Philip the Regent, was born at Versailles, 4th Aug. 1703. The first part of his life was spent in idle dissipation; but after the death of his father, and that of his wife, better thoughts succeeded, and he abandoned the world and its follies to devote himself to a life of penitence, austerity, religion, and literature. He settled at the abbey of St. Genevieve, and employed himself in works of charity and benevolence till the time of his death, which happened 4th Feb. 1752. He was an accomplished scholar, and was not only well skilled in the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Greek languages, but a perfect master of botany, chemistry, and painting, besides history, geography, and divinity. He wrote translations, paraphrases, and commentaries on Scripture — a Literal translation of the Psalms — Dissertations against the Jews — a liberal translation of St. Paul's Epistles — treatise against Plays, &c. His son Philip, who was born 12th May, 1725, is said to have inherited the virtuous qualities of his father. He died 18th Nov. 1785.

ORLEANS, Philip Louis Joseph, duke of, was born at St. Cloud, 13th April, 1747, and had the title of duke de Chartres during his father's life. From his earliest years he devoted himself to low pleasures, but with the desire to acquire consideration in the fleet, he entered in the navy, and he obtained the command of the St. Esprit, of 84 guns, in 1778, under the orders of admiral Orvilliers. The sight of the English fleet, it is said, terrified the cowardly prince, and during the action, which was fought off Ushant with admiral Keppel, it is reported that he concealed himself in the hold of the ship till the danger was over. This conduct was ridiculed not only by the wits of Paris, but by the court, and the duke felt the severity of the satire so deeply that he determined on revenge. His immense fortune gave him every opportunity to raise disturbances and create dissatisfaction, and he followed the iniquitous propensities of his heart. In 1787 he succeeded to his father's title, and soon after the revolution afforded him occasions to gratify his revenge against the court. Though exiled and threatened, he maintained his rancorous opposition; he became one of the members of the national assembly, and as if ashamed of his family and of his birth, he took the name of Egalité. While the factious and the vile used his great opulence, and his powerful influence for their own vicious and diabolical purposes, he was satisfied if every measure tended to dishonor the monarch, and to overturn the throne, on which he hoped to seat himself. At the trial of Lewis XVI. he gave his vote, with the greatest indifference, for the death of the king, a conduct which shocked even the most abandoned Jacobins; but soon his own fate was determined by those who had squandered his riches, and abused his confidence. He was accused, and though he escaped to Marseilles, he was seized and brought back to Paris, and led ignominiously to the scaffold, 6th Nov. 1793. He suffered death with more courage than could be expected from a man whose character and morals were so infamous.

ORLEANS, Louis, an advocate of Paris, who boldly defended the cause of the league against Henry IV. The virulence of his writings at last caused his apprehension; hension; but the mild monarch ordered him to be liberated from prison. This compassionate conduct of the monarch made a convert of the advocate, who became loud in the praises of his benefactor. He died at Paris, 1627, aged 87. He wrote a Defence of the United Catholics against the Protestants, 8vo. — Address to the English Catholics — Commentaries on Tacitus and Seneca — besides other political pieces, now deservedly forgotten.

ORLEANS, Peter Joseph, a Jesuit, born at Bourges 1641. He professed belles lettres, and afterwards became preacher to his society, and died at Paris, 31st March 1698. He is author of an History of the Revolutions of England, 3 vols. 4to. and 4 in 12mo. — History of the Revolutions of Portugal, 5 vols. 12mo. — History of the two Tartar Conquerors, Chunchi and Canhi, 8vo. — the Life of Father Cotton, 12mo. — Lives of Lewis de Gonzaga, and other Jesuits — two volumes of sermons — Life of Constance, Minister of the King of Siam, 12mo.

ORLEANS DE LA MOTTE, Louis Francis Gabriel d', a native of Carpentras, who became bishop of Amiens 1733. He was a most pious and charitable prelate, and died 10th July 1774, aged 91. His Spiritual Letters appeared at Paris, 1777, in 12mo. — and his Life by Proyart, in 1788, in 12mo.

ORME, Robert, an English writer, born at Bombay, where his father was a surgeon. From Harrow school he went as writer to India; and to the friendship of lord Clive he was indebted for his consequence in the East. He was in 1755 fourth member of the Madras council, and commissary-general, but returned to Europe in 1759, and was some time after honorably appointed by the East India company their historiographer, with a salary of 300l. per annum. He was author of the Military Transactions of the British in India, 3 vols. of which the first volume appeared in 1763, and the second in 1775. He wrote besides, Historical Fragments of the Mogul Power, during the reign of Aurengzebe. He died in 1801, not in very opulent circumstances, aged 73.

ORONIO, Baltazar a Spanish Jew, born at Seville. Though educated secretly as a Jew, he outwardly professed the Roman catholic faith, and became professor of metaphysics at Salamanca. He afterwards studied physic, and practised it at Seville; but as he was suspected of Judaism, he was seized by the inquisition, and treated with the greatest cruelty to oblige him to confess. His obstinacy in denying his religion at last procured his liberation, after three years' confinement, and he escaped from the Spanish dominions to Toulouse, where he was made professor of physic. He afterwards went to Amsterdam, and there openly professed himself a Jew, was circumcised, and took the name of Isaac. He here practised medicine with great success, and died 1687. He wrote against Spinoza in his "Certamen Philosophicum," and his interview with Limborch on the subject of the Christian religion, occasioned his writing a book in support of Judaism, in which he displayed much ingenuity, and great metaphysical subtilty. His antagonist afterwards published an account of the controverly in a pamphlet called Amica Collatio cum Judæo Erudito, 4to.

OROSIUS, Paul, a Spaniard, the disciple of St. Augustin, by whose advice he wrote an History of the World to the year of Christ 316 — a treatise on Free Will, &c. He flourished in the fifth century.

ORPHEUS, a Thracian poet, before the age of Homer. His history is fabulous, and the works ascribed to him are by more modern hands.

ORSATO, Sertorio, an Italian writer, well skilled in antiquities and in ancient inscriptions. He was born at Padua, and became professor of philosophy there. He died of a suppression of urine, 1678, aged 61. He wrote besides lyric poems in Italian, "the History of Padua," — commentaries de Notis Romanorum, and other works.

ORSATO, John Baptist, an eminent physician and antiquary, born at Padua, 1673. His dissertations de Lucernis Antiquis — de Strenis Veterum — de Patetâ Antiquorum, &c. were much esteemed. He died 1720.

ORSI, John Joseph, an ingenious philologer and poet, born at Bologna 1652, of a noble family. He studied every branch of polite literature, in which he distinguished himself. He died 1733. He wrote sonatas, pastorals, and other poems in Italian — a Defence of Italian poets, and of Tasso — Letters — the Life of Lewis de Sales, &c.

ORSI, Francis Joseph Augustin, an able writer, born in Tuscany 1692, and raised to the purple by Clement XIII. He is author of an "Ecclesiastical History" in Italian, 20 vols. 4to. — Infalibilitas Act. Rom. Pontificis, 3 vols. 4to. He died 1761.

ORTE, N. viscount d', governor of Bayonne, distinguished himself by his humanity, and refused to put the protestants to death on the fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew. He wrote back in answer to the sanguinary orders of Charles IX. that he had only good soldiers and good citizens in his garrison, and no executioners.

ORTELIIUS, Abraham, a famous geographer, born at Antwerp, April, 1527. He travelled with the eyes of a philosopher over England, Ireland, France, Italy, and Germany, and was so respectable for his knowledge of geography, that he was honorably called the Ptolemy of his age. His "Theatrum Orbis Terræ," in folio, procured for him the place of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. He died at Antwerp, June, 1598. He published besides, Synonyma Geographia — Aurei Seculi Imago — Syntagma Herbarum Encomiasticum — Itinerarium per Gallie & Belgie. Partes, &c.

ORTON, Job, a native of Shrewsbury. He was educated in his native town, and afterwards under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. When of the proper age he took care of a dissenting congregation at Kidderminster, and then removed to Shrewsbury, where he died 1783, aged 66. He had for some years retired from the pastoral duties to private life. He is author of an excellent Life of Dr. Doddridge — Sermons to the aged, 12mo. — Sacramental Meditations, 12mo. — Discourses on Christian Worship, 12mo. — Discourses on Practical Subjects, 8vo. — Practical Exposition of the Old Testament, published after his death, 6 vols.

8vo. He was a frequent correspondent with his friend Mr. Stedman, a clergyman of Shrewsbury, who has lately published some of his letters, which prove him to have been a man of the most liberal sentiments, and active supporter of piety, virtue, and devotion.

ORVILLE, James Philip de, a Dutch critic, of French parentage, born at Amsterdam, 1696. He improved himself by travelling over England, France, and Germany, and on his return was elected professor of eloquence, history, and Greek, at Amsterdam, which he held 12 years, and resigned 1742. He died 1751. He continued with Burman, Observationes Miscellaneæ, 10 vols. to which four more were added after his death. These contain a Dissertation on Delos, and Remarks on the Greek Romance of Chariton. He wrote besides a satire against De Pauw, called Critica Vannus — Observations on Sicily.

OSBORNE, Francis, an eminent English writer, born at Chicksand, Bedfordshire, 1588. He became master of the horse to William lord Pembroke, but in the civil wars he sided with the parliament, and obtained some offices under them, and under Cromwell. He wrote, while resident at Oxford, near his son, Advice to a Son, which was very popular, and was therefore inveighed against by the puritans of the time, besides other things in prose and verse. His works were published, 8vo. 1689, and again 1722, 2 vols. 12mo.

OSIANDER, Andrew, a native of Bavaria, who studied at Wittemberg and Nuremberg, and was one of Luther's first disciples. He was appointed minister and professor in the university of Königsberg, and he distinguished himself by a new opinion on justification, which he asserted to arise not from the imputation of Christ's justice, but the union of God's justice with our souls. He defended these sentiments with great vehemence, even against Luther, and chiefly rested on the words of Isaiah, the Lord is our Righteousness. His learning was so respectable, that his tenets were tolerated, that no schism might be kindled among the protestants. He died 17th Oct. 1552, aged 54. He was so violent in his temper, that he treated all his opponents in the grossest language of satire and illiberality. His works are Harmonia Evangelica, fol. — Epistola ad Zwinglem de Eucharistia — Dissertationes duæ de Lege & Evangelio et Justificatione — De Imagine Dei quid sit. His son Luke was also a Lutheran minister, and died at Tübingen, 1604. He was author of Commentaries on the Bible — Institutions of the Christian Religion — Abridgment of the Centuriators of Magdeburg, 4to. — Enchiridia Controversiarum, &c. Another Luke was chancellor of Tübingen university, and died 1638, aged 68. He wrote on the Omnipresence of Christ, in two Latin pamphlets — Funeral Orations — De Baptismo — De Regimine Ecclesiæ, &c. — There were two others, Andrew and John Adam, who wrote some Latin treatises. The first died 1617, aged 54, and the last 1697.

OSIUS, bishop of Cordova, presided at the council of Nice, which had been assembled 325, by Constantine, agreeable to his advice. He shared the confidence of Constantius as he had shared that of his father; but in those turbulent times he was persecuted by the Arians, though nearly 100 years old, and at last, by threats and by blows, he was prevailed upon to subscribe to their confession of faith. This had such effect upon him that he led a life of penitence and sorrow, and soon after died, renouncing the tenets which he had embraced, and declaring them unchristian and heretical.

OSIUS, or OSIO, Felix, professor of rhetoric at Padua, was born at Milan, 1587. He published Romano Græcia — Tractatus de Sepulchris & Epitaphiis Ethnicor. & Christianor. — Elogia Scriptorum Illustr. — Orationes — Remarks on Mussati's History — Collection of Historians at Padua. He died at Padua, 1631.

OSMAN I. son of Achmet I. succeeded his uncle Mustapha, 1618, on the Turkish throne. His expedition in 1621, against Poland, was very unfortunate, and after the loss of 80,000 men, and 100,000 horses, he submitted to a disadvantageous peace. These misfortunes were attributed to the Janissaries, and therefore a new militia of Arabs was substituted in their room; but this violent measure produced a revolution, and Osman was hurled from his throne, and strangled by the rebellious soldiery, 19th May, 1622, and Mustapha placed in his room.

OSMAN II. emperor of Constantinople after his brother Mahomet V. 1754, died after a short reign, 29th Nov. 1757, aged 59. He renewed, under severe penalties, the Mahometan law, that his subjects should drink no wine.

OSMOND, St. a Norman, who followed the fortunes of William the Conqueror, and was made by him, chancellor of England and bishop of Salisbury. The liturgy which he introduced in his diocese was universally adopted, and called the liturgy of Salisbury. He died 1099, and was canonized by Calixtus III.

OSORIO, Jerome, a learned Portuguese, born at Lisbon, 1506. He studied at Salamanca, Paris, and Bologna, and at his return home was appointed professor of divinity at Coimbra. His abilities recommended him to the court, and he was made bishop of Sylva, by the queen regent. He went afterwards to Rome, and in consequence of the disasters of his country, brought on by the death of king Sebastian in the field of battle, and against his advice, he died, it is said, of a broken heart, Aug. 1580. He wrote commentaries, paraphrases, and other works, and by the elegance and correctness of his diction, deserved to be called the Cicero of Portugal. His works were published at Rome, 1592, in 4 vols. folio, by his nephew.

OSORIO, Jerome, nephew to the above, was canon of Evora. He wrote his uncle's life, besides Annotations on his Paraphrase — and Paraphrasis in Canticum Canticorum, &c.

OSSAT, Arnaud d', a learned cardinal, born of obscure parents, at a small village in Alagnac, 23d Aug. 1536. He was left poor and destitute at the death of his parents in his ninth year; but Thomas de Maria, a neighbouring gentleman, saw and patronized his abilities, and by his own assiduous application, he soon became capable to be tutor to his patron's nephew, and other noblemen. He afterwards studied at Bourges, and applied to the law; and was called to the bar at Paris. In 1580 he went to Rome, as secretary to the archbishop of Toulouse, the ambassador from France, and on his death he passed into the service of cardinal d'Este, d'Este, and then of cardinal de Joyeuse. When Henry IV. of France, quitted the religion of the protestants, d'Ossat, then French resident at Rome, obtained the papal absolution, and for this service, was made bishop of Rennes. He was afterwards raised by the pope to the dignity of cardinal, and made by Henry, bishop of Bayeux. He, however, still continued at Rome, as protector of the French nation, and died there, March, 1604, aged 68. He was buried in St. Lewis's church at Rome. He was a most able, skilful, and sagacious negociator, and in every thing which he undertook, succeeded to increase the influence of his master, and the glory of his nation. His "Letters," have been frequently published, of which the best edition is that of Amsterdam, 5 vols. 12mo. 1708.

OSSIAN, the son of Fingal, an ancient Scotch bard, who flourished about the beginning of the third century. He accompanied his father in his wars, and in the latter part of life, which was protracted to a good old age, he became blind. In 1758 some poems appeared in a flowery and poetical style, said to be translated from the original Gaelic poems of Ossian, by the hands of Mr. Macpherson; and as they immediately excited the attention of the learned, by their beauty and simplicity, they produced an animated controversy about their authenticity. The ablest writers of the age were engaged in the contest, which never, perhaps, can be decided, and the poems have acquired a deserved celebrity through Europe.

OSTADE, Adrian Van, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Lubec, 1610. He studied at Haerlem, under Frank Hals, but he was endued with such powers, by nature, that he equalled all other painters in the representations of droll and vulgar scenes. He perfectly understood the chiaro oscuro, and his smoking rooms, ale-houses, kitchens, and stables are particularly admired. He died at Amsterdam, 1685, much regretted. His prints, engraved by himself in aquafortis, make a set of 54 pieces. His brother Isaac studied under him, and would have acquired reputation, but died young at Haerlem.

OSTERVOLD, John Frederick, a protestant minister, born at Neufchatel, 1663. He was learned, pious, and humane, and from his friendship with Turretin and Werenfels arose the common expression of the triumvirate of Swiss theologians. He died 1747. He wrote a Catechism of the Christian Religion, 8vo. — Arguments and Reflections on the Books of the Bible, 2 vols. 8vo. — Treatise against Uncleannefs, 8vo. — on the Sources of Corruptions, 12mo. — sermons, 8vo. &c. His son, John Rodolph was minister of the French church at Basil, and was universally esteemed. He wrote a Discourse on the Duties of Communicants, 12mo.

OSTERWY, Maria Van, a native of Delft. She excelled as an elegant artist, and her flowers, fruits, and scenes of still life possessed particular beauty, and displayed great ease and delicacy. She died 1693, aged 63.

OSWALD, king of Northumberland, fled to Ireland at the death of his father Ethelfred, to avoid the execution of his uncle Edwin, who usurped the throne. He returned, became a christian, defeated and slew Cerdowalla, king of the Britons, and was afterwards killed in battle with Penda, king of Mercia, 643. His virtues have been recorded by monkish writers, who declare that miracles were wrought at his tomb.

OSWALD, Erasmus, professor of mathematics and Hebrew at Fribourg, published a translation of the New Testament in Hebrew, and other learned works, and died 1579.

OSYMANDYAS, an Egyptian king, said to be the first who erected a public library.

OTHO, Marcus Salvius, became emperor of Rome 69, after the murder of Galba and Piso, and three months after he was defeated near Cremona, by Vitellius, who also aspired to the throne. He killed himself not to fall into the hands of the conqueror.

OTHO I. surnamed the Great, eldest son of Henry the Fowler, was crowned emperor of Germany at Aix la Chapelle 936. He was an active prince, he defeated the Danes, subdued Bohemia, and carried his arms into Italy against Berenger, who had assumed the title of emperor. Berenger was easily routed, and Otho crowned again at Rome, by the hands of the pope, John XII. assumed the title of Cæsar and Augustus. Displeased with the chains imposed upon him, John XII. revolted against the power of Otho, but he was soon attacked and deposed, and Leo VIII. elected in his room, promised submission to the imperial decrees. The Romans, however, again revolted, and were severely punished by the offended emperor. Afterwards Otho was engaged in a war with the Eastern empire, because his ambassadors had been treated with insult and cruelty, by Nicephorus, and he therefore invaded Apulia, and Calabria which belonged still to the Greek emperors, and after desolating the country, he sent his prisoners to Constantinople with their noses cut off. Peace was at last restored between John Zimisces, the successor of Nicephorus, and Otho, and it was cemented by the marriage of Theophania, the niece of the eastern prince, with the son of Otho. Otho died 7th May, 973, aged 62.

OTHO II. son and successor of the great Otho, was surnamed the Bloody. Though his elevation was opposed by the arts of his mother Adelaide, he had the courage, though young, to expel her from the court, and to defeat her partizans, who had raised Henry, duke of Bavaria, to the throne. After routing the Danes and the Bohemians, who wished to take advantage of the troubles of the empire, he invaded the French territories with an army of 60,000 men; but peace was restored in 980. The next year Otho crossed the Alps, to reduce the Calabrians to subjection; but he was defeated in a battle by the Saracens, who supported the cause of his enemies; and in his escape he fell into the hands of pirates, who restored him to liberty, for a large ransom. Undismayed by calamity, he assembled another army, and attacked the Calabrians and Saracens, and obtained a great victory. He died soon after, on his return to Rome, according to some, by poison, 7th Dec. 983.

OTHO III. only son of Otho II. was crowned emperor at Aix la Chapelle, 983, though only three years old. His elevation was opposed by the duke of Bavaria, who before had rebelled against his father; but the energy of his ministers defeated the measures of his rivals. When he took the reins of government, Otho went into Italy, where he was crowned by the hands of pope Gregory V. and soon after he re-visited the country, to repress the insurrection of Crescentius, and of the anti-pope John XVI. On his return to Germany, Otho made Boleslaus king of Poland, and soon after again went to Italy, to defend it against the Saracens. He died at the castle of Paterno, in the Campagna, 28th Jan. 1002, aged 22; after having enlarged the power of the pope, and enabled the see of Rome to dispute for temporal sovereignty with his imperial successors.

OTHO IV. surnamed the Proud, son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, was elected emperor 1197. After being consecrated at Rome by Innocent III. he laid claim, against his solemn promise, to the territories of Ancona and Spoleto, which had been left by Matilda, to the Holy see. In consequence of this he was excommunicated, and the princes of Germany exhorted by their bishops, elected Frederic, king of Sicily, emperor. Otho in vain attempted to resist the power of his enemies. Though he leagued with the court of Flanders, he had the misfortune to see his army defeated at the battle of Bouvines, in 1214, and therefore he retired in disgrace and despair to the castle of Hantzburg, where he died 19th May, 1218.

OTHO, bishop of Frisingen, was author of a chronicle in seven books, of some merit, though abounding in fables. He died at Morimond, 12th Sept. 1158.

OTHO, Venius, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden, 1556. He studied at Liege, and afterwards resided seven years at Rome, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was next patronized by the emperor of Germany, the duke of Bavaria, and the elector of Cologne, and then returned to Antwerp, and afterwards was appointed master of the mint at Brussels, by the archduke Albert. He died at Brussels, 1634, aged 78. He had Rubens among his pupils. His brother Gilbert was eminent as an engraver, and Peter as a painter.

OTROKOTSKIFORIS, Francis, a Hungarian, who studied at Utrecht, and became a protestant minister in his native country. He afterwards embraced the catholic faith, and was professor of law at Tirnau, where he died 1718. He wrote Origines Hungaricæ, 2 vols. 8vo. — Antiqua Religio Hungorum verè Christiana & Catholica, 8vo. besides some polemical works, which he refuted after he became a member of the church of Rome.

OTT, Henry, a learned Swiss divine, born at Zurich, where he became professor of eloquence, Hebrew, and ecclesiastical history, and where he died 1682, aged 65. As an orientalist, his abilities were very great, and he was the correspondent of several learned men in Europe.

OTTER, John, author of Travels in Turkey and Persia, with an account of Kouli Khan's expeditions, was born at Christianstadt, 1707, and died 1748.

OTWAY, Thomas, a celebrated dramatic writer, born at Trotting, Suffex, March, 1651. He was educated at Winchester school and Christ-church, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and repaired to London, where he became a writer and actor of plays. By the friendship of lord Plymouth, natural son of Charles II. he obtained a cornetcy in the army, and embarked with the forces for Flanders, in 1677; but a military life proved disagreeable to him, and he returned to London, poor, and necessitated to write for his support. He died April 14th, 1685, in a manner, says Dr. Johnson, which I am unwilling to mention. Having been compelled by his necessities, to contract debts, and hunted by the teniers of the law, he retired to a public house on Tower-hill, where he died of want, or, as related by one of his biographers, by swallowing, after a long fast, a piece of bread, which charity had supplied. He went out, as reported, almost naked, in the rage of hunger, and finding a gentleman in a neighbouring coffee-house, asked him for a shilling; the gentleman gave him a guinea; and Otway, going away, bought a roll, and was choaked with the first mouthful. As a writer, he had extraordinary powers, in touching the heart, in his tragedies, of which his Orphan, and Venice Preserved, are noble instances. Besides ten dramatic pieces, he wrote some miscellaneous poems and translations. His works have appeared in 3 vols. 12mo. 1757.

UDENARDE, Robert Van, a native of Ghent, who learnt painting under Carlo Maratti, and exercised his art in his native town, where he adorned the churches, and public and private edifices with valuable paintings. He died 1743, aged 80.

UDIN, Casimir, a French monk, born at Mezieres, 1638; son of a weaver. He burst from the obscurity of his father's profession, and became a recluse in the abbey of Boucilly, in Champagne, where Lewis XIV. accidentally passed, and discovered his abilities, which were soon after employed in visiting the archives of the monasteries of Lorraine, Alsace, Burgundy, &c. In 1690 he left France, turned protestant, and was made under librarian at the university of Leyden, where he died 1717. He wrote Commentarius de Scriptoribus Ecclesiæ Antiquis & eorum Scriptis, 3 vols. folio — Veterum aliquot Galliarum & Belgicarum Scriptorum Opuscula Sacra, &c. 8vo. — Supplement to Ecclesiastical Authors, omitted by Bellarmine, 8vo. — the Monk of Premontre unfrocked.

UDIN, Francis, a native of Vignori, in Champagne, who studied at Langres, and was admitted among the jésuits, 1691. He became professor of humanity and theology, and settled at Dijon, where he died of a dropsy in the chest, 28th April, 1752, aged 79. He was well versed in divinity and in the ecclesiastical history of the fathers. He published Somnia, an elegant Latin poem, odes, elegies, &c. printed in his Poemata Didascalica, 3 vols. 12mo. — Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu — Celtic Etymologies — Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans — Historia Dogmatica Conciliorum — Lives of several Persons included in Niceron's Collection, &c.

UDINET, Mark Anthony, a French medallist, born at Rheims 1643. He quitted his professorship of law at Rheims, to go to Paris with his relation Raillant, as keeper of the medals in the king's cabinet. The order and arrangement which he introduced in this valuable collection, obtained for him a pension from the king, and the honor of a seat in the academy of belles lettres. He died at Paris 1712. He wrote three dissertations, of great merit, on medals.

ODRI, John Baptist, a French painter, who studied under Largillieres, and acquired great celebrity in his correct representation of animals. Some of his hunting pieces adorn the palaces of France. His adoration of the Magi is in high esteem. He was treated with distinction by the French king, and received a pension. He died at Paris, his native town, 1st May 1755, aged 69.

OVERALL, John, an English prelate, born 1559. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, and removed to Trinity, where he became fellow. In 1606 he was made regius professor of divinity, D. D. and master of Catherine hall, and in 1601 he succeeded to the deanery of St. Paul. In 1614 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1618 translated to Norwich, where he died May, 1619. His tomb remained neglected till 1669, when his pupil Cofin, bishop of Durham, erected a monument over it. Overall was a learned divine, distinguished by wisdom, erudition, and piety, and connected by literature with the most eminent men of the times. He wrote a "Convocation book," and other works.

OVERBEKE, Bonaventure Van, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a designer and an antiquarian. He went three times to Rome, to take correct copies of her ancient monuments, and he made beautiful engravings of his pieces. The description with which he accompanied his plates, written in Flemish, was translated into Latin and French, 3 vols. folio, and possesses great merit. He died at Amsterdam, 1706.

OVERBURY, sir Thomas, a polite English writer, born in 1581, at Compton-Scorfen, Warwickshire. He was of Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then entered at the Middle Temple; but he soon relinquished the law for literature, and for the favors of the court. He became the confidential friend of Car, earl of Somerset, by whose influence he was knighted; but he stained his character in promoting the amours of that profligate nobleman with the licentious countess of Essex; and as if ashamed of his conduct, he boldly attempted to dissuade him from marrying so worthless a woman. Car was weak enough to reveal the friendly advice, and the enraged countess meditated revenge. By the means of Car, Overbury was appointed ambassador to Russia, and by his insidious advice, encouraged to refuse the office, in consequence of which the king caused him to be sent to the Tower as a disloyal man. In this place poison was administered to him, and he at last thus fell a sacrifice to the diabolical intrigues of his perfidious friend and his guilty mistress, 15th Sept. 1613. The murder, though noised abroad, was hushed by the power of the offender; but two years after it was fully disclosed; the under-agents were tried, condemned, and executed, but the earl and the countess, after being found guilty, were pardoned by the king. Sir Thomas, who has been compared in his learning, his wisdom, and his melancholy fate, to Germanicus Cæsar, was the author of some works in prose and verse, of considerable merit, reprinted 1753, 8vo.

OUGHTRED, William, an English divine born 1573, at Eton, and educated on the foundation there, from whence he was removed as fellow of King's college, Cambridge. In 1603, he was presented to the living of Aldbury, near Guilford, where he devoted himself to mathematical studies. During the usurpation of Cromwell, he was frequently molested, though a peaceful and harmless resident in his parish, and he was liberated from the danger of sequestration only by the interference of Lilly, Whitelocke, and other friends. He died the beginning of May 1660, aged 86. On hearing the news of Charles's restoration, he expired, it is said, in a sudden extacy of joy. He was the friend and correspondent of the most learned men of the times, and as a mathematician his works are numerous and valuable. He published in 1631, his "Clavis," a most valuable work, containing many new theorems in algebra and geometry, which have been adopted by Newton, and other learned philosophers. This little volume became a standard book at Cambridge, by the introduction of Seth Ward. His "Opuscula" were published after his death, at Oxford, 1676.

OVID, Pub. Naso, a celebrated Latin poet, born at Sulmo, B. C. 43. He was bred up for the bar, but poetry had greater charms for him, and under the patronage of Augustus, he acquired celebrity and honors. He was afterwards banished by his imperial patron, for causes not satisfactorily known, and died on the borders of the Euxine sea, A. D. 17. His works, which are elegant, polished, and animated, though often licentious, are well known.

OVEDO, John Gonfalso de, a learned Spaniard, born at Madrid 1478. He was one of the pages of Ferdinand of Arragon and Isabella, and was at Barcelona in 1493, on the return of Columbus from the discovery of the new world. The adventures of this extraordinary man raised his attention; he became his friend, and accompanied him in his next voyage. As he had rendered important services to Spain in the wars of Naples, Ferdinand considered him as the fittest man to examine the commerce and resources of the new world; and on his return from the island of Hayti, he published the result of his intelligent inquiries, called the General and Natural History of the West Indies, afterwards enlarged to a folio volume, Salamanca, 1535. In this work he paid particular attention to the venereal disease, which was lately become known in Europe, and which some thought was introduced from America; and he ascertained that the use of guaiacum was very salutary in the relief of this terrible disorder.

OUSEL, Philip, a native of Dantzic, descended from a family originally from France. He became protestant minister at Leyden, and afterwards was appointed theological professor at Frankfort on Oder, where he died 1724, aged 53. He was well skilled in Hebrew literature, and published Introductio in Accentuationem Hebræorum Metricam, 4to. in which he supports that the Hebrew points and accents are as old as the bible — de Accentuatione Hebræorum Prosaicâ, 8vo. — de Leprâ, 4to. — His relation James wrote valuable notes on the Octavius of Minutius Felix, inserted in the variorum edition of 1672.

OUWALER, Albert, an historical painter of Haerlem, who died 1515, aged 71.

OWAIN, a prince of Powys, who fled to Ireland, in consequence of carrying away Nefs, the wife of Gerald, constable of Pembroke. He succeeded his father Cadwygan ap Bleddyn in 1110, and was slain by Gerald four years after. He was in the service of Henry I. of England in Normandy, for some time, and was knighted by him.

OWAIN, son of Mæwen Wledig, a brave warrior, who broke the intimacy which existed between the Britons and their Roman conquerors, and was elected king. His services were such that he became a saint in the British calendar.

OWAIN, or OWEN TUDOR, lord of Pebrmynydd, in Anglesea, married Catherine, the widow of Henry V. in 1426, and was father by her of three sons, the eldest of whom embraced the monastic life; the second was Edmund, earl of Richmond, father to Henry VII. and the third Jasper, earl of Pembroke. After the death of his wife, he was confined in Newgate, but escaped, and died in Wales.

OWAIN CIVEILOG, a Welch warrior, who attacked Hywel of Cadwygan, and Rhys of Gruffydd, and died about 1197. He was also a poet, and some of his verses are preserved in the Welch Archæologia.

OWAIN GLANDWR, or OWEN GLENDOWER, last of the Welch princes, was in the service of Richard II. but was disgraced by Henry IV. In consequence of this he took up arms, burnt Ruthyn, and defeated lord Grey, who had, by false accusation, obtained his lands from the king; but afterwards he restored him to liberty for a large ransom. He continued his hostilities, and in 1402 routed Edward Mortimer in Radnorshire, and caused himself to be proclaimed by the voice of his assembled and unanimous people, independent sovereign of Wales. Though assisted by the French, his affairs, however, became desperate, and unable to withstand the incursions of the English, he led a life of retirement, and died at last in 1415, in the disguise of a poor shepherd.

OWEN, Dr. John, an eminent divine among the independents, of whom he is sometimes called the prince, the oracle, and the metropolitan. He was born 1616, at Hadham, Oxfordshire, and was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, which he left in 1637, as unwilling to submit to the regulations introduced by Laud, the university chancellor. He afterwards became chaplain to lord Lovelace, and at the breaking out of the civil war, embraced the party of the parliament with such warmth, that his uncle discarded and disinherited him. His "Display of Arminianism," published in 1642, rendered him very popular among the nonconformists; he was a frequent preacher before the parliament, and obtained the friendship of Cromwell, whom he served faithfully, and by whose influence he was made in 1650, dean of Christ-church. In 1652 he was, by Cromwell, chancellor of the university, nominated vice-chancellor, and the next year took his degree of D. D. On the protector's death he was removed from the office of vice-chancellor, and at the restoration, he was deprived of his deanery, and retired into the country. He lived for some time in London, and then at Kenfington, and died at his house at Ealing, Middlesex, 24th Aug. 1683, aged 67. Though violent as the friend of party and of usurpation, it is said, however, that he possessed moderation and kindness, and frequently exerted his influence in favor of such royalists as were distinguished for virtue and learning. His works were numerous, amounting to 7 vols. folio, 20 in 4to. and 30 in 8vo. the best known of which are, an Exposition of the Hebrews, 4 vols. folio — Discourse on the Holy Spirit, folio — treatise on Original Sin, 8vo. — sermons and tracts, folio.

OWEN, John, an English epigrammatist, born at Armen, Caernarvonshire, and educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. He took the degree of L. L. B. 1590, and then taught school at Trylegh, near Monmouth, and at Warwick, on the foundation of Henry VIII. He had such a vein for satire and epigram, that he even wrote in ridicule of a rich uncle on whom he depended, in consequence of which he was excluded from his will. He was afterwards supported by his friend Williams, bishop of Lincoln. He died poor 1622, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. His epigrams have been often printed. They are in Latin, and much esteemed, and possess the elegance and humor of Martial's pieces. They have been translated into English, French, and Spanish.

OWEN, Dr. Henry was born in Merionethshire, and educated at Ruthyn school, and Jesus college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. D. He had applied himself to mathematics, and afterwards studied and practised physic, and then took orders and obtained the livings of Edmonton, and St. Olave's, Hartstreet, London. He left by his wife, daughter of Butler, bishop of Ely, one son and five daughters, and died at the close of 1795, aged 80. He was an able and pious divine, and wrote Observations on the Scripture Miracles — Remarks on the four Gospels — Inquiry on the Septuagint Version — Sermons at Boyle's Lectures, 2 vols. 8vo. — Introduction to Hebrew Criticism — Modes of Quotation by Evangelical writers explained, &c. — Posthumous Sermons, 2 vols. &c.

OWEN, George, a physician, born in Worcestershire, and educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he became fellow, and took the degree of M. D. 1527. He was physician to Henry VIII. who left him a legacy of 100l. and afterwards to Edward VI. and to Mary, whom he brought into the world by the Cæsaean operation. He died 10th Oct. 1558, and was buried at St. Stephen's, Walbrook. He published a meet Diet for the new Age, folio, 1558.

OWEN, Charles, a dissenting divine, born in Montgomeryshire, and educated at Shrewsbury. He was minister of a congregation at Bridgnorth, but was obliged to remove to London by the violence of party, till the toleration of James II. permitted him to return. He afterwards went to Ellefmere, and died 1712, aged 58. He wrote some controversial tracts in favor of his persuasion.

OWTRAM, William, prebendary of Westminster in the reign of Charles II. was eminent as a preacher, and as a scholar in rabbinical learning. He died 1679. He published a learned book, "de Sacrificiis," and after his death a volume of sermons was published by bishop Gardner.

OXENSTIERN, Axel, grand chancellor of Sweden, and prime minister to Gustavus Adolphus, deserved his elevation by his merit and his abilities. After the unfortunate battle of Lutzen, 1632, in which his master lost his life, he was placed at the head of affairs, and rewarded this confidence of the nation by the most consummate wisdom, and the strictest integrity exerted for the happiness of Sweden. He died universally respected, 28th Aug. 1654, aged 71. The second volume of the History of Sweden in German, is attributed to him. Of his sons, John was plenipotentiary at the peace of Munster, where he distinguished himself by his firmness and talents; Gabriel was marshal of Sweden, and Benedict grand chancellor, and prime minister of the kingdom. His grand nephew N. was distinguished as a man of letters. He travelled over the greater part of Europe, and published Thoughts on different Subjects, with Moral Reflections, printed 2 vols. 12mo., and died at an advanced age, 1707, governor of the duchy of Deux-ponts.

OXANHAM, James, a French mathematician, born at Boligneux in Brescia, 1640. He studied divinity in compliance with the wishes of his father; but after his death, he applied himself to mathematics, in which he was doomed to distinguish himself. He left his country, and taught mathematics at Lyons, and afterwards at Paris; where, though occasionally given to gaming and gallantry, he acquired some little property. The Spanish war, however, reduced his income by lessening his scholars, and the death of his wife, by whom he had 12 children, none of whom survived him, embittered with sorrow the last years of life. He died of an apoplexy, 3d April 1717, aged 77. The best known of his works are, a Dictionary of Mathematics, 4to. — a Course of Mathematics, 5 vols. 8vo. — Mathematical Recreations, 4 vols. 8vo. — Use of the Compass of Proportion, 12mo. — Elements of Algebra, 4to. — Practical Geometry.

OZELL, John, an indefatigable English writer, educated at Ashby-de-la-Zouch school, and afterwards at Christ's hospital. His friends designed him for a college education, but disdaining the restraints of university discipline, he qualified himself by a most perfect knowledge of arithmetic for a public office, and obtained the appointment of auditor-general of the city and bridge accounts, and auditor of the accounts of St. Paul's cathedral, and of St. Thomas's hospital. He died 15th Oct. 1743, and was buried in St. Mary Aldermanbury parish. Though he wrote nothing original, he yet showed great assiduity and judgment in his translations of foreign authors; and Moliere, by his labors, appears in an English dress far from inelegant and disinteresting. In his conversation and manners, Ozell was agreeable; he had a good knowledge of modern languages, and had improved himself by travelling. He was one of those heroes whom Pope immortalized in his Dunciad; and in consequence of this Ozell published a warm and self-consequential comparison between himself and his antagonist, more deserving ridicule than approbation.

PAAS, Crispin, a native of Cologne, eminent as an engraver, and as the pupil of Cornehard, whose celebrity he equalled. He was patronized by the king of Denmark, and died at Copenhagen in the beginning of the 17th century. His engravings were numerous and highly finished, especially those of the bible, &c. His daughters Magdalen and Barba, also acquired celebrity as engravers; and there were besides two engravers of the same family, Simon, and Crispin the younger, who were equally distinguished by their merit.

PAAW, Peter, a native of Amsterdam, known as a physician and botanist. He practised with great reputation at Leyden, where he died 1617, aged 53. His works, once much admired, were a Commentary on Vesalius, 4to. — a treatise on the Plague, 4to. —

Hortus Lugduno-Batavus, 8vo. — and other works, mentioned by Nicéron.

PABO, a British prince in the fifth century. It is said that after a defeat he retired to the court of the king of Powys, and afterwards became a monk and a saint. The church of Mona was founded by him, and there his remains were deposited according to the inscription which still records his adventures.

PACATIANUS, Titus Julius Marinus, a Roman general, who revolted in Gaul against the authority of the emperor Philip, and assumed the purple. He was defeated and slain 249.

PACE, Richard, a learned Englishman, born 1482. He was patronized by Langton bishop of Winchester, and cardinal Bainbridge, and recommended himself by his great abilities to Henry VIII. who employed him in in several negociations. He then took orders, and was raised to a prebend of York, and to the deanery of St. Paul's, London, and also that of Exeter. He was afterwards employed in an embassy to Rome to solicit the popedom for Wolsey, and was next sent as ambassador to Venice. In this distant employment he felt all the weight of Wolsey's jealousy and resentment, no directions were sent him for his guidance, and no remittances of money made, and in consequence of this his spirits were so affected that he became delirious. He returned home, but the ill treatment which he had received was not sufficient to open the king's eyes to the cruelties and oppression of his favorite. He resigned his deaneries sometime before his death, and expired at Stepney, where he had retired for his health, 1532, aged 50. He was a man universally beloved, and by his meritorious services deserved, and enjoyed the friendship of cardinal Pole, sir Thomas More, Erasmus, and other learned men. He wrote Epistles — de Fructu Scientiarum, 4to. — de Lapfu Hebraicorum Interpretum, &c.

PACHECO, John de, marquis de Villena, was brought up with Henry IV. of Castille, and became his favorite. He acquired in consequence so much power that all offices of trust and honor were at his disposal; but so venal is the attachment of flatterers, that he was bribed by Lewis XI. of France, and on the peace of 1443, he consented to various articles which betrayed the interests of his master, and were prejudicial to the honor of his crown. The injured monarch expostulated with the guilty subject, but Pacheco full of resentment revolted against him, and placed the prince Alphonso on the throne of his brother. Alphonso, though proclaimed king of Castille, 1465, soon after died, it is said by poison administered by the too powerful favorite who now was reconciled to his lawful sovereign, and continued in the office of prime minister to the end of life. This artful sycophant died of an abscess in the throat, 1473, and it is reported was sincerely lamented by Henry, who forgot his perfidy in the vigor of his measures for the welfare of the kingdom.

PACHYMERUS, George, a Greek historian, born at Nice. He was patronized by Michael Palæologus, and his son Andronicus, and obtained honors in church and state. He died 1310. His history of the East, inserted among the Byzantine historians, has been published with a Latin translation at Rome, 1669, folio.

PACIAUDI, Paul Marie, a native of Turin, of the order of Theatins. He was correspondent of the Paris academy of belles lettres, and librarian to the duke of Parma. He was an able and learned antiquarian, and wrote Monumenta Peloponnesiaca, 2 vols. 4to. — Memoirs of the Grand Masters of the order of Jerusalem, in Italian, 3 vols. 4to. — Letters between him and count Caylus, 8vo. He died of an apoplexy, 1785, aged 75.

PACIFICUS, Maximus, born of a noble family, at Ascoli 1400, was an elegant Latin poet. His poems called "Hecatalegium," were printed at Florence, 1489, 4to. and it is remarkable that in them he makes mention of the venereal disease, supposed not to have been known before Columbus failed to America. The best edition of his works is that of Parma, 1691, 4to. which is free from all licentious passages.

PACIUS, Julius, a native of Vicenza, who travelled over Switzerland, Germany, and Hungary, where he maintained himself by giving lectures on jurisprudence. He was afterwards at Sedan, Montpellier, Aix, &c. and distinguished himself so much that he was offered a professor's chair at Leyden, at Pisa, and Padua. He settled at Padua, and was honored with the collar of St. Mark, and afterwards went to Valence, where he died 1635, aged 85. He is author of a treatise on Arithmetic, written when only 13 years old — de Contractibus, fol. 1606. — de Jure Maris Adriatici, 8vo. 1669 — in Decretales Libri quinque, 8vo. — Corpus Juris Civilis, fol. 1580 — Aristotelis Organum, 8vo. 1598 — an excellent translation of Aristotle's Logic. Pacius was a firm protestant, though it is said that by the representations of his pupil Peiresc he embraced the catholic tenets a little before his death.

PACORUS, son of Orodes king of Parthia, is known in Roman history for his defeat of Crassus. He afterwards espoused the cause of Pompey, and was slain in battle by Ventidius B. C. 39.

PACUVIUS, Marcus, a Latin poet nephew to Ennius. He wrote satires and plays, now lost. He died at Tarentum B. C. 154.

PADARN, a British bishop to whose honor several of the churches of Wales are dedicated. He is one of the three blessed visitors who preached the gospel to the astonished inhabitants. His two companions were Dewi, and Teilo.

PADERNA, Paul Anthony, a native of Bologna, eminent as an historical and landscape painter. He died 1708, aged 59.

PADUAN, Lewis Leo, surnamed the, was a native of Padua who acquired celebrity as a painter, and as an engraver of medals. He died 1615, aged 75. His son Octavian excelled as a portrait painter.

PADUANINO, Francisco, an historical painter of Padua, who died 1617, aged 65. His best piece, preserved at Venice, is the Deliverance of two malefactors at the earnest solicitation of a saint.

PADILLA, Mary de, a Spanish lady who became the favorite of Peter the Cruel, king of Castille. She possessed such influence over him that three days after his marriage with the virtuous and beautiful Blanche, of Bourbon, he abandoned his lawful wife for the company of his guilty mistress. After his divorce from Blanche, and his marriage with Jane de Castro, Peter showed himself an equally capricious lover, and two days after he was again at the feet of the all powerful Padilla, who died soon after, and was buried with all the magnificence due to a crowned head.

PAEZ, Francis Alvarez, a Portuguese divine, of the order of the Cordeliers. He was patronized by pope John XXII. who made him bishop of Coron, afterwards of Sylves, and sent him as his legate into Portugal. He died at Seville, 8th May, 1532. He is author of a famous treatise de Planctu Ecclesie, in which he boldly supports the temporal powers of the see of Rome, — a Summary of Theology — Apology of John XXII. fol.

PAGAN, Blaise Francis, count de, a French mathematician born at Avignon in Provence, 3d March, 1604. He entered into the army, and early distinguished himself in various actions, but at the siege of Montauban he lost his left eye by a musket shot. At the passage of the Alps, and at the siege of Suza he bravely led on his soldiers to glory, and in the year 1642 he was sent by Lewis XIII. with the rank of field-marshal to gather fresh laurels in the service of Portugal. Here, however, he had the misfortune to lose his eye sight by a distemper, and with the volume of the world thus closed upon him he retired to study and meditation. The mathematics and fortification were his favorite pursuits, and on these sciences he wrote some valuable works consisting of a treatise on Fortification — Geometrical Theorems — Astronomical Tables — Theory of the Planets — Historical Relation of the Amazon River, 8vo. — Homme Heroique, &c. This great man beloved by his sovereign, respected by his country, and by all learned and virtuous men, for his genius, his abilities, and his benevolence, died at Paris, 18th Nov. 1665.

PAGAN, Peter, professor of poetry and history at Marburg, died at Wanfrid 1576. He wrote miscellaneous poetry — Praxis Metrica — History of the Horatii and Curiatii in elegant Latin verse.

PAGANI, Gregorio, a native of Florence, whose pictures were so highly finished as to be regarded equal to those of Michael Angelo. He died 1560, aged 31.

PAGANO, Paul, a painter of Milan, whose picture representing the Christian attribute of Mercy, in cloathing the naked, is preserved at Venice, and much admired. He died 1716, aged 55.

PAGE, William, an English divine, author of Animadversions on John Hale's Tracts of Schism — Genuflexionis ad Nomen Jesu Defensio, Oxon. 1631 — Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, translated into English, &c. He was a native of London, and was in 1619 fellow of All Souls, Oxford. During the civil wars he was exposed to great persecution for his attachment to the royal cause, and he died about 1669.

PAGET, William lord, though but the son of a serjeant at mace, was noticed by Henry VIII, and on account of his abilities was patronized and made successively clerk of the signet, of the council, and afterwards of the privy seal. He afterwards went as ambassador to France, and on his return was knighted by the king in approbation of his conduct. He was soon after made secretary of state, and was one of those who were executors of the monarch's will. His consequence increased, in the next reign he was sent ambassador to Charles V. but his intimacy with Somerset proved injurious to his interests, and he shared his disgrace, and was sent a close prisoner to the tower, and fined 6000l. On the accession of Mary he was restored to favor, and continued in the service of the court under Elizabeth. He died 1564, and the queen in gratitude for his public services ordered his remains to be conveyed to London at the national expence, and to be magnificently buried.

PAGI, John Baptist, a native of Genoa, author of a treatise on Painting, in Italian, fol. He was eminent not only as a painter, but as an engraver, and died at Genoa 1629, aged 74.

PAGI, Anthony, a Cordelier the ablest critic of his time, was born at Rognan in Provence, 1624. He was provincial of his order, and distinguished himself by his writings. His great work is "a Critique on the Annals of Baronius," a most valuable performance, the first volume of which appeared at Paris 1689, and the rest was completed after his death, containing 4 vols. folio. Geneva, 1705. He wrote besides a Latin Dissertation on the Consular Office, and other things, and died at Aix 1699. His character was that of a learned chronologer and historian, candid and moderate in his expressions, and simple in his style.

PAGI, Francis, nephew to the preceding, was born at Lambesc in Provence, 1654. He followed his uncle's example, and entered among the Cordeliers, and greatly assisted him by his learning in the completion of his Critique on Baronius, of which he published the three last volumes. He wrote besides in Latin "an History of the Popes," 4 vols. 4to. He died Jan. 21st, 1721. His nephew was also a man of letters, and published a History of Cyrus, the younger, 12mo. 1736 — a History of the Revolution in the Low Countries, 1727, 12mo. &c.

PAGNINUS, Sandes, a Dominican, born at Lucca, 1466. He was well skilled in the knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, and for 25 years years he was engaged in examining the Vulgate bible with the originals, and in consequence of these labors published a new translation of it from the Greek and Hebrew, in which he was liberally patronized by pope Leo X. and his two successors. The work, however, is blamed by father Simon, as being too closely and servilely translated, and in language barbarous, obscure, and full of solecisms. He wrote besides a Hebrew Lexicon, and a Hebrew Grammar, much commended by Buxtorf. He died 1536, aged 70.

PAJON, Claude, a protestant divine, born at Romorantin, 1626. His abilities highly recommended him, at the age of 24 he entered into orders, and soon after was made professor of theology at Saumur, and afterwards Calvinistic minister at Orleans. He was engaged in controversy with Jurieu, on the power of grace, and on the conversion of sinners; and his followers, who were numerous and respectable, assumed the name of Pajonites. He died 1685, aged 59. He wrote a Defence of the Calvinists, 2 vols. 12mo. — Remarks on l'Avertissement Pastoral, &c. works of merit.

PAJOT, Lewis Leo, count of Osembray, was born at Paris 1678. He enjoyed, in consequence of his learning and abilities, the favor of Lewis XIV. and his cabinet, on account of its curiosities in mechanics and natural history, was visited with attention by the Czar Peter, by prince Charles of Lorraine, and other great men. He contributed much to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was a member, and left his valuable collection to that learned body for the use of the public. He died universally lamented, 1753.

PAKINGTON, Dorothy, lady, daughter of lord Coventry,

Coventry, and wife of sir Thomas Pakington of Worcestershire, is supposed by Dr. Hickes to be the author of the Whole Duty of Man, though some ascribe the work to other authors. She was eminently distinguished for her learning, and had among her friends several celebrated divines, such as bishop Fell, Hammond, Sanderfon, Hickes, &c. She died 1679, and was buried in Hampton Lovett church, in Worcestershire.

PALÆMON, Q. Rhenm. a Roman slave, who by his application and ingenuity, acquired celebrity as a rhetorician and grammarian in the age of Tiberius.

PALÆPHATUS, a Greek philosopher, author of a book de Incredibilibus. He lived before the christian era.

PALAFOX, John de, a Spaniard of illustrious birth, born in Arragon 1600. He studied at Salamanca, and was patronized by Philip II. and when he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, he was appointed bishop of Los Angeles, in America, with the title of judge of the administration of the three viceroys of the Indies. In his new office he behaved with great humanity, and though he had to encounter the prejudices, and the virulence of the jesuits, he maintained his character of moderation and of benevolence towards the unfortunate natives, and was rewarded by the king with the bishopric of Osma, 1653. He died 30th Sep. 1659, universally respected. He wrote the History of the Siege of Fontarabia, 4to. — History of the Conquest of China by the Tartars, 8vo. — sermons, homilies, and other religious tracts. His works have been published altogether at Madrid, 1762, in 13 vols. fol.

PALAGE, N. de la Curne, a native of Auxerre, member of the French academy, and that of inscriptions and belles lettres, and author of valuable memoirs of Ancient Chivalry, 3 vols. 12mo. — Memoir on Glaber's Chronicle, inserted in the papers of the academy of inscriptions. He died at Paris 1781, aged 84.

PALAPRAT, John, a French writer, born at Toulouse, 1650. He distinguished himself as a lawyer, and as a poet, and in 1684, was made judge of the consistory. He paid his court to queen Christina at Rome in 1686, and afterwards resided at Paris. He wrote eight pieces for the stage, and other things comprised in 5 vols. 12mo. He was employed as a negotiator, and acted with great sagacity, and died at Paris 1721.

PALATI, John, a Venetian historian of the 17th century, whose principal work is Monarchia Occidentalis, five Aquila inter Lilia, et Aquila Saxonica, 2 vols. folio, ornamented with figures of medals, &c.

PALEARIUS, Aonius, an eminent writer, born at Veroli, near Rome. He studied in various parts of Italy, and at last fixed his residence near Sienna where he married, and maintained himself by instructing some pupils in the learned languages. Here he had an unfortunate quarrel with a rival in literature, and afterwards in consequence of the able defence which he made of a certain nobleman, against the accusation of the monks, he became an object of persecution, and retired to Lucca, and next to Milan. In this place where he hoped to pass his days in peace, he found himself exposed to fresh persecution, he was again accused by the monks of heresy, and being carried to Rome was condemned for saying that Luther's followers were to be commended in some degree, and he was accordingly burnt to death, 1566. The best known of his works is his Latin poem on the Immortality of the Soul, 3 vols. Amsterdam, 1696, 8vo.

PALEY, William, an eminent English divine, born at Peterborough, July 1743. He was educated under his father, who after removing from Peterborough, where he was minor canon of the cathedral, became master of Giggleswick school, Yorkshire, and then entered at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1763. He was for three years after assistant at Greenwich school, till he was elected fellow of his college where he now became an active and popular tutor, and had for his coadjutor Dr. Law, afterwards bishop of Elphin. By the kindness of this friend's father, who was bishop of Carlisle, he obtained a living in Cumberland, and next Appleby, in Westmorland, to which were afterwards added a prebend in Carlisle cathedral, and the living of Dalton. In 1780, he was made chancellor of Carlisle, and in 1785, he proved to the world how well entitled he was to the patronage of the great, by the publication of his Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy, in 4to. a most valuable work, often reprinted, in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1789, he declined the mastership of Jesus college, Cambridge, which the bishop of Ely, sensible of his great merit, wished to confer upon him. He was afterwards presented to a prebend at St. Paul's by the bishop of London, to the subdeanry of Lincoln by Dr. Prettyman, and to the valuable living of Bishop Wearmouth, by the bishop of Durham. He published in 1790, Horæ Paulinæ, or the Truth of the Scripture, History of St. Paul, &c. 8vo. — a View of the Evidence of Christianity, 3 vols. 8vo. 1794, dedicated to the bishop of Ely — Natural Theology, 8vo. 1802, besides some single sermons, &c. His Moral Philosophy is become a popular book, and its chapters are frequently subjects for disputation in the schools of the universities, yet it did not establish its reputation, without being exposed to the censures of contemporaries, and remarks upon it have been published by Mr. Gisborne, and Mr. Pearson. The preferment which Dr. Paley held was justly due to his merits, as the friend of virtue, and the eloquent advocate of christianity, and he must be ranked among the few whose services to literature, to morality, and to religion, are honorably rewarded by the patronage of the great. This truly illustrious divine and accomplished scholar, died at Sunderland, 25th June, 1805, in his 62d year. His father, who was 54 years master of Giggleswick school, had the happiness of seeing the distinction and the honors which his son had deservedly acquired, and he died 29th Sep. 1779, aged 88.

PALEIN, John, an eminent surgeon, born at Ghent, where he acquired great reputation as reader of anatomy and surgery. He died there advanced in life 1730. He wrote Osteology, much esteemed — Anatomy of the Human Body, translated into French by himself and with additions, by his friend Davaux, 1713, 2 vols. 12mo.

PALINGENIUS, Marcellus, an Italian poet of the 16th

16th century, born at Stellada, in Ferrara. His real name was Pierre Angelo Manzoli. He wrote and dedicated to his patron Hercules II. duke of Ferrara, his poem in 12 books, called Zodiacus Vitæ; but he spoke with such freedom of the popish clergy that not only the book was prohibited, and publicly burnt as heretical, but the body of the author was ordered to be dug up and burnt, which indignity was, however, prevented by the dukes of Ferrara.

PALISSY, Bernard de, a native of Agen, eminent as a potter, a chymist, and skilful painter on glass. He was patronized by Henry III. who wished him to embrace the Roman catholic religion, which he as a stern Calvinist refused to do. He was an able philosopher, he first explained the true theory of springs, and made many valuable discoveries in natural history. He wrote books on subjects of agriculture, fire, earth, salts, &c. collected and published at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo. and again in 4to. 1777, with the notes of Faujas de St. Fond. He died about 1590.

PALLADINI, Arcangela, a native of Pisa, instructed in the art of painting by her father. She acquired great celebrity as a portrait painter, and died 1622, aged 23.

PALLADINO, James, an ecclesiastical writer, called also James of Taramo because born there. He was successively bishop of Monopoli, Tarentum, Florence, and Spoleto, and papal nuncio in Poland. The best known of his works is a pious romance often printed, and possessing some merit, in the midst of many incongruities, called Compendium per-breve, Consolatio Peccatorum nuncupatum et apud nonnullos Belial vocitatum, id est Processus Luciferi contra Jesum, Augsburg, 1572, fol.

PALLADIO, Andrew, a famous Italian architect, born at Vicenza, in Lombardy. He was early instructed in architecture, his favorite study, by George Trissinus, and by visiting Rome he had an opportunity of viewing, and of studying the venerable relics of ancient times, which had been despoiled by barbarian ignorance. He made very beautiful drawings of these precious monuments of departed genius, and published them with commentaries, and afterwards gave to the world his four books of architecture, in 1570, a work translated into French, and also into English, and commented upon by the excellent remarks of Inigo Jones. The most magnificent monument of his architectural genius is the theatre called Degli Olimpici at Vicenza. He died 1580, and after his death appeared his work on the antiquities of ancient Rome.

PALLADIUS, Rutilius Taurus Æmilian, a Latin writer, author of a treatise de Re Rusticâ, published among the Leipzig collection, 2 vols. 4to.

PALLADIUS, a Cappadocian, who from a hermit became bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia, 401. He was the friend of Chrysostom, and wrote the History of Anchorets, printed, 4to. Paris, 1455.

PALLAJUOLO, Anthony, and Peter, two Florentine brothers, eminent for their mutual affection, and their reputation as painters. They were among the first who painted successfully in oil. They both died 1498, aged above 70.

PALLAS, a freedman of Claudius. It is said that he caused the death of his master, at the instigation of Agrippina. He was put to death by Nero. Felix, before whom Paul appeared, was brother to this Pallas.

PALLAVICINI, Anthony, a native of Genoa, descended from a noble family. His abilities as well as his birth recommended him to the pope, who employed him in several embassies, and in affairs of importance, and made him bishop of Pampeluna, and a cardinal. He died 1507, aged 66.

PALLAVICINI, Ferrante, an eccentric Italian, born at Placentia of a noble family. He was early distinguished by his learning, and mental endowments, and assumed the habit of an Augustine friar; but instead of a regular life, he devoted himself to the amours of courtezans, and the most libidinous gratifications. Rendered poor by his incontinence, he had recourse to his pen for support, and wrote his "Courier robbed of his Mail," a periodical work, which for a while was read with avidity, but soon, from its satirical nature, attracted the notice of the inquisition. For a while he avoided the dangers of persecution by travelling into Germany; but upon his return to Venice, he again resumed his courier, and in greater violence vented his satire, not only against the secretary of the republic who had been his enemy, but against the pope Urban VIII. and all the Barberini family. In consequence of this he was seized, but he made his escape by means of one of his mistresses, and he might have avoided the impending storm, had not Morfu, a creature of the pope's nuncio, prevailed on him to go to France, in hopes of meeting there encouragement and protection from Richelieu. Pallavicini was caught in the snare, but instead of being conducted by his perfidious friend to Paris, he was brought to Avignon, where his person and papers were seized. After some severe and inhuman treatment he was brought to trial; but though he made an able defence he was condemned to lose his head, which took place at Avignon 1644. Morfu who was liberally rewarded for his villainy was afterwards murdered by one of Pallavicini's friends. This extraordinary character who debased the best faculties of the mind by a whimsical fondness for low company, and the most abandoned of prostitutes, wrote some books of merit which were printed at Venice, 4 vols. 12mo. 1655, the most curious of which is the Celestial Divorce, or separation of Jesus Christ from the Roman church.

PALLAVICINI, Sforza, an eminent cardinal, born at Rome 1607. Though eldest son of a noble family he preferred the ecclesiastical state, and he entered into the order of jesuits, among whom he taught philosophy and theology, and by his regular and exemplary life he gained the esteem and respect of the world. He was honored with the confidence of Innocent X. and made a cardinal by Alexander VII. He died 1667, aged 60. He wrote an Italian treatise on Style, and on Dialogue — some letters — but his best known work is the History of the Council of Trent, in opposition to that of father Paul, written in a correct style, but considered as partial. The best edition is that of Rome, 2 vols. folio, 1656.

PALLIOT, Peter, a native of Paris, eminently known as a bookseller and a printer. He settled at Dijon, where where he died 1698, aged 90. He was well skilled in genealogies and in heraldry, and wrote some curious works, le Parlement de Bourgogne, ses Origines, Qualités, Blazon, fol. 1649 — Science des Armoiries de Celliot, avec 6000 Ecuillons, Paris 1660, folio, with plates engraved by himself. He left in MS. 13 vols. in folio, on the families of Burgundy.

PALLISER, sir Hugh, an English admiral who is known for his dispute with admiral Keppel in the battle off Ushant, 27th July, 1778, which unfortunately prevented the total defeat of the enemy's fleet. These circumstances which proved so disagreeable to the nation produced two courts martial. Keppel was tried at the instance of sir Hugh, and acquitted, and sir Hugh, as second in command, was next brought to trial, and censured by his judges. His bravery, however, was never impeached, and he was rewarded by the ministry with the appointment of governor of Greenwich hospital, where he died 1786, aged 65. In the former part of life sir Hugh had served in the Mediterranean under admiral Matthews, and he was also at the storming of Quebec. He was made post 1746, and afterwards was comptroller of the navy, and in 1773, created a baronet.

PALLUEL, Francis Crette de, a native of Duguy in France, son of the post master of St. Denis. He was educated at Paris, and as he possessed a strong propensity for agricultural pursuits, he applied his attention to the improvement of this important branch of national prosperity. He was, on the revival of the Paris agricultural society by Malesherbes chosen one of its first members, 1779, and in the revolution he became a member of the national assembly, and directed his labors to the collection of useful papers for the improvement of agricultural knowledge. He was also a justice of peace, in which office he published a dissertation. He died 1799, aged 57. Some of his papers have appeared in the learned memoirs of the Paris academies, and reflect great honor on his abilities. His observations on draining marshes were universally admired.

PALMA, James, the elder, a painter, born at Sermaletta in Italy. He was the pupil of Titian, whose style he adopted, and also the manner of Giorgione, though not with equal success. His pictures, though inferior to those of the great masters, are yet esteemed. He died 1588, aged 40.

PALMA, James, the younger, was nephew to the preceding, and was born at Venice. He studied under Tintoret, and possessed graces and beauties of his own. The expression of his figures, the boldness and delicacy of his characters are much admired, and his draperies display great taste and judgment. He died 1628, aged 84.

PALMER, Samuel, an eminent printer of London, in whose office for some time the celebrated Benjamin Franklin was employed. He wrote an History of Printing, 4to. of some merit, and died 1732.

PALMER, John, son of the door-keeper of Drury-lane theatre, imbibed from his earliest years a strong partiality for the stage, and despising the meaner occupation of a fruiterer to whom he had been bound, he began his theatrical career in a low character at Norwich; he rose to provincial eminence, and there married, and instead of fixing himself in some respectable company, he preferred the uncertain profits of an itinerant player and lecturer on heads. He afterwards acquired distinction as a comic actor at the Hay-market and at Drury-lane; but his erection of the Well-cloze square theatre ruined his fortunes, as he was, through the opposition of the other theatres, unable to obtain a licence from the lord chamberlain. Thus reduced from a comfortable situation to indigence, he again engaged in provincial companies, and died suddenly while performing on the Liverpool stage in the Stranger, 1798, aged 57. The last remarkable words which he uttered when he dropped down were engraved on his tomb, "there is another and a better world!"

PALMIERI, Matthew, a native of Florence, distinguished in the council of his country, where he died 1475, aged 70. He wrote a treatise Della Vita Civile, 8vo. 1529 — Citta Divina, a poem in three books, in which he maintained that our souls are those angels which in the revolt of Lucifer against God stood neuter, and that in punishment for this they are sent into the world, where their good or evil conduct is to entitle them hereafter to eternal happiness or misery. This work was condemned as dangerous, and was publicly burnt. He wrote besides a continuation of Prosper's Chronicle to 1449, which was afterwards continued still further to 1483, by Matthias Palmieri of Pisa, in that age, who was the translator of Aristeas' History of the Septuagint Version, printed with the bible, 2 vols. folio, Rome, 1471.

PALONINI, Anthony, a native of Cordova. Though an ecclesiastic he employed himself sedulously in painting, and many of his pieces which possess great merit, still adorn the churches of Spain, especially Valencia. He wrote the lives of painters — a work on painting, 2 vols. folio, &c.

PALSGRAVE, John, an English writer, born in London. He studied at Cambridge and afterwards at Paris, and when Mary of England sister to Henry VIII. was married to Lewis XII. he was nominated her tutor in the French language. He afterwards returned to England, became chaplain to the king and settled at Oxford, where he took the degree of B. D. He was an able French grammarian though an Englishman, and published very useful rules for the pronunciation of that language. He translated also into English the Latin comedy called Acolastus, by Fullonius. He died after 1540.

PALUDANUS, John, a native of Malines, divinity professor at Louvaine, and minister of St. Peter's church there, died 1630. He was an able divine, and wrote Vindiciæ Theologicæ adversus Verbi Dei Corruptelas, 2 vols. 8vo. 1620 — Apologeticus Marianus, 4to. — de S. Ignatio Concilio Sacra, 8vo. — Officina Spiritualis Sacris Concionibus adaptata, 4to.

PALUDANUS, Bernard, professor of philosophy at Leyden, travelled over the four quarters of the globe, and wrote valuable notes on Linschot's Voyages Maritimes, folio. He died at Leyden 1634.

PAMELIUS, James, a learned Fleming, born at Bruges, 1536. He became canon of Bruges, and archdeacon of St. Omer's, and was nominated bishop of St. Omer's, by Philip II. of Spain; but he died at Mons as he was going to take possession of his see 1587, aged 51. He wrote Liturgica Latinorum, 2 vols. 4to. — Micrologus de Eccles. Observationibus — Catalogus Commentariorum in Bibliam 8vo. — Conciliorum Paralipomena — besides editions of Tertullian's and Cyprian's works, and Cassiodorus' treatise de Divinis Nominibus, &c.

PAMMACHUS, St. a Roman senator converted to christianity. He married Paulina, daughter of St. Paula the friend of Jerome, and by his conduct and writings he displayed great zeal in favor of christianity. He founded an hospital at Porto, and died 410.

PAMPHYLIUS, a Macedonian under Philip the father of Alexander. He was an able painter, and established a school at Sicyon. He had Apelles among his disciples.

PAMPHYLUS, St. a priest of Cæsarea in Palestine, who suffered martyrdom under Maximin, 308. His explication of the Acts of the Apostles was published by Montfaucon.

PANAGIOTI, a Greek of Chios, interpreter to the grand signior. He was a zealous opponent of the patriarch Cyril Lucar, and wrote in modern Greek the orthodox confession of the catholic and apostolic eastern church, printed in Holland. He died 1673.

PANARD, Charles Francis, a French poet, born at Couville, near Chartres, 1691. He was drawn from obscurity by Le Grand, the player, and was universally beloved for his probity and sweetness of manners. He died at Paris, of an apoplexy, 1765. His works, consisting of comedies, comic operas, epigrams, songs, anacreontic odes, &c. were published in 4 vols. 12mo. 1763.

PANCIROLLUS, Guy, a famous lawyer, born of an illustrious family at Reggio, 1523. He studied law under his father, and improved himself further at Ferrara, Pavia, Bologna, and Padua, under the best masters; and in consequence of his great celebrity, was nominated by the republic of Venice, in 1547, second professor of institutes in the university of Padua. He succeeded to the chair of Roman law, but at last, under pretence of ill-treatment, he retired to Turin, 1571, and was there made also professor of the Roman law. He was, however, recalled by his grateful countrymen, and in 1582, he was honorably replaced in his professorial chair at Padua. He died 1599, universally respected. He wrote De Rebus Inventis & Perditis, in Italian, translated by H. Salmuth into Latin — Commentarius in Notitiam Utriusque Imperii, & de Magistratibus, folio — De Magistrat. Municipal. & Corporibus Artificum. — De XIV. Regionibus Romæ, earumque Ædificiis, &c.

PANCKOUCKE, Andrew Joseph, a bookfeller of Lille, who died at Paris, 1753, aged 53. He was an indefatigable writer; the best known of his works are the Best Studies for Young Ladies, 2 vols. 12mo. — Chronological Epitome of the History of the Counts of Flanders, 8vo. — a Collection of Bon Mots, 2 vols. 12mo. — Dictionary of French Proverbs, 8vo. — Philosophical Manual, 2 vols. 12mo. — Elements of Geography and Astronomy, 12mo. — Essay on Philosophers, 12mo.

PANCKOUCKE, Charles Joseph, son of the preceding, was born at Lille, 1736. He followed his father's profession, and as he possessed genius and perseverance, he acquired celebrity in the typographical art at Paris. He wrote Mathematical Memoirs, addressed to the academy of sciences — Translations from Lucretius, Tasso's Jerusalem, Orlando Furioso, &c. 10 vols. 12mo. — Philosophical Discourse on the Beautiful, 8vo. — another on Pleasure and Grief — Methodical Encyclopedia, &c. He died at Paris, 1799.

PANEL, Alexander Xavier, a native of Franche Comté, who embraced the order of the jesuits, and then passed into Spain, where he became preceptor to the royal family. He wrote a Letter on the Medal of Le Bret, 4to. — Dissertation on Alexander's Medal — de Cistophoris, 4to. — de Colonix Tarraconæ Nummo, 4to. and other treatises on Coins and Antiquities. He died in Spain, 1777, aged 82.

PANETIUS, a stoic of Rhodes, who settled at Rome, and had among his pupils Lælius, Scipio, and other illustrious Romans. He exerted his influence at Rome in favor of his countrymen. He flourished about 150.

PANIGAROLA, Francis, a native of Milan, who was made by Sixtus V. bishop of Asti in Piedmont, and was sent in 1590 with Gaetan and Bellarmine into France, to support the interests of the league against Henry IV. His eloquence was powerfully exerted in encouraging the Parisians to resist their sovereign, and to submit to every privation, and to all the horrors of famine and pestilence, rather than to yield. On his return to Italy, he was so zealous in reforming the abuses of his clergy and of his diocese, that he was poisoned, as is generally supposed. He died at Asti, 1594, aged 46. His sermons appeared at Rome, 1596, in 4to. but of all his works his 11 Predicatore, or on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, published at Venice, 1609, in 4to. is the best.

PANIN, Nikita Ivanowitz, count de, a Russian statesman, one of the lieutenant-generals of the armies of the Czar Peter, originally of Lucca, was born 15th Sept. 1718. From being a horse soldier in the guards of the empress Elizabeth, he became by the friendship and patronage of prince Kourakin, gentleman of the imperial chamber, and rose gradually to offices of trust and dignity. In 1747 he was sent as ambassador to Copenhagen, and two years after to Stockholm, and on his return he was appointed governor of the grand duke Paul, and soon after became the prime minister of the great Catherine. During his residence at Stockholm he was so warm an admirer of the constitution, and of the aristocratical senate of the country, that he formed the plan of introducing it into Russia, which, however, he had not the courage to effect. With great powers of mind, and a comprehensive knowledge of the affairs and political connections of independent states, he was, nevertheless, indolent in business, haughty in his conduct, and in his manners luxurious and intemperate. He died March, 1783; but though long at the head of affairs, so disinterested had been his conduct, that his property was inadequate to pay his debts. His brother distinguished himself as a general against the Prussians and the Turks, and by the taking of Bender. He also established the independence of the Crimea, and crushed the rebellion of Putgatseff, and died soon after, respected as an able general.

PANINI, Paul, a native of Placentia, eminent as a painter. His pieces in architecture are deservedly admired. He died 1758, aged 67.

PANNARTZ, Arnold, a German, who left Mayence with Ulric-Han, to come and establish a printing office in Italy, in the beginning of the pontificate of Paul II. They first published Donatus, and then Lactantius, 1465, and Augustin 1467, and afterwards the Letters of Cicero, &c. issued from their press, which was set up, from the monastery of Sublac, their first residence, in the house of Francis de Maximis, a rich Roman.

PANNONIUS, James or John, a Hungarian bishop, author of some elegant epigrams, elegies, and poems, printed Venice, 8vo. 1553, and among the Deliciæ Poetarum Hungaror. 1619. He died 1472, aged 38.

PANOPION, a Roman, saved from death by the fidelity of his servant, who assumed his dress, and suffered himself to be killed for his master.

PANORMITA, Anthony, a Sicilian, secretary to Alphonsus, king of Naples. He possessed great poetical powers, and had such veneration for classical works, that he sold an estate to purchase a copy of Livy. He died 1471.

PANSA, C. Vibius, a Roman consul, killed in battle against Antony.

PANTÆNUS, a stoic of Sicily, at the head of the Alexandrian school in the reign of Commodus. He wrote Commentaries on Scripture, and was an able supporter of Christianity.

PANTIN, William, a physician of Bruges, author of a Commentary on Celsus' treatise De Re Medicâ, fol. &c. He died 1583. His great nephew Peter was born at Thiel, in Flanders, and taught the learned languages with reputation at Louvain, Toledo, &c. and was dean of the church at Brussels, where he died 1611, aged 56. He wrote a treatise De Dignitatibus & Officiis Regni, & Domus Regiæ Gothorum, &c. besides translations from Greek authors, &c.

PANVINIUS, Vid. ONUPHRIUS.

PANZACHIA, Maria Helena, a lady of Bologna, of noble birth, born 1668. She possessed great abilities as a painter, and her pieces on subjects of history, and in landscapes, are much and deservedly admired.

PAOLI, Sebastian, an ecclesiastic, born at Lucca. He was well skilled in antiquarian history, and contributed to the Italian journals, various dissertations, full of learning and deep research, on subjects of physic, history, sacred criticism, and antiquity. He wrote besides, the lives of several illustrious Italians, &c. He died of a dropy, 1751, aged 67.

PAOLI, Hyacinth, a native of Corsica, who acquired great weight among his countrymen, and was one of their chief magistrates, 1735. In consequence of the civil dissensions which distracted his country, and the oppression of the Genoese, he left Corsica and retired to Naples, where he died. His son Pascal was distinguished by his zeal in the cause of Corsican freedom, but all his struggles against the Genoese and the French were unavailing, and when the island became the conquest of France, he retired in 1769, to England, where he gained an honorable asylum, and where he died in privacy.

PAOLUCCIO, Paul Anafeste, a noble Venetian, elected for his services, first doge of Venice, 697. He died 717. Before his time the government had been administered by annual tribunes for 200 years.

PAPEBROCH, Daniel, a jesuit of Antwerp, born 1628. He was a respectable professor of belles lettres and philosophy, and assisted Bollandus and Henschenius in their collection of the acts of the saints. In these labors he proceeded with great caution and impartiality, and rejected the improbable legends of former ages, but in consequence of this he drew upon himself the violent persecution of the Carmelites, because he had called Berthold, their first general, and refused to ascribe the foundation of their order to the prophet Elijah. Notwithstanding this persecution, which dragged him as a criminal before the pope, and caused the Spanish inquisition to condemn 14 of the volumes of the acts of the saints, in which he was concerned, he continued his literary labors, and died 1714, aged 86, universally respected for his learning and his virtues. He wrote also Propylæum ad Acta Sanct. Maii, fol. which gives an account of the popes.

PAPHNUTIUS, bishop of Thebais, treated with great severity under the persecutions of Galerius and Maximinus. He opposed the celibacy of the clergy, and warmly supported the cause of Athanasius at the council of Tyre.

PAPIAS, a bishop of Hierapolis, author of the doctrine of the Millennium, or the reign of Christ on earth, a thousand years before the resurrection. Some suppose him to be the disciple of St. John the Evangelist. A grammarian of that name lived 1053, and wrote Vocabularium Latinum, Milan, 1476, fol.

PAPILLON, Thomas, a native of Dijon, celebrated for his knowledge of jurisprudence, and his popularity as a pleader. He was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and died at Paris, 1596, aged 82. He wrote Libellus de Jure Accrescendi — De Directis Hæredum Substitutionibus, 8vo. — Commentarii in quatuor priores Titulos Libri Primi Digestorum, 12mo. &c.

PAPIN, Isaac, a French divine, born at Blois, 1657. He studied divinity at Geneva, and also at Saumur, under his uncle Pajon, whose opinion he espoused and defended, concerning the doctrine of efficacious grace, in opposition to the reformed church, and also to Jurieu. This measure proved offensive to the protestants, and Papin, to avoid contempt and persecution, came over to England, 1686, and was ordained according to the forms of the Anglican church. He afterwards left England and went to Hamburgh, where the resentment of Jurieu followed him, and from thence he was invited to Dantzic, to fill a chair among the French refugees. His refusal, however, to subscribe to the decrees of the Walloon churches in Holland, brought on him fresh troubles, and at last he, in 1690, embraced the Roman catholic tenets, for which he was accused, not only of inconsistency, but of all disregard for religion. He died at Paris, 19th June, 1709. His theological works were published by his relation Pajon, of the oratory, 1723, in 3 vols. 12mo. His cousin Isaac was a physician, and the author of several medical works; and his uncle Nicholas was also an eminent physician, whose treatises on the Saltiness of the Sea, its Flux and Reflux, and on the Origin of Rivers and Fountains, &c. were much admired.

PAPINIAN, a learned lawyer of the third century. He was put to death by Caracalla, for refusing to vindicate that tyrant's murder of his brother Geta, 212. His works on jurisprudence are much esteemed.

PAPIRIUS, Curfor, a Roman dictator who triumphed over the Samnites, &c.

PAPIRIUS PRÆTEXTATUS, a Roman youth, who was admitted into the senate, and refused to reveal to his mother, the secrets of that august assembly.

PAPON, John Peter, a native of Pujet, near Nice, who was a priest of the oratory, and died at Paris in the winter of 1803, aged 65. He was a man of amiable manners and regardless of the calls of ambition, concealed himself during the storms of the revolution. He wrote an Ode on Death — the Art of the Poet and Orator — and an Essay on Education, five times edited — Funeral Oration on Charles Emanuel, king of Sardinia, 8vo. — History of Provence, 4 vols. 4to. — Travels in Provence, 2 vols. 12mo. — History of the French Government, from the Assembly of the Notables, 22d Feb. 1787, to the end of 1788, 8vo. — Memorable Epoch of the Plague, &c.

PAPPUS, a philosopher of Alexandria in the fourth century, whose works consist of Commentaries on Ptolemy's Almagest — a Description of the Rivers of Libya — Treatise on Military Engines, &c.

PARABOSCO, Girolamo, a comic writer, born at Placentia, in the 16th century. He was author of six comedies, which possess merit and originality, and he also wrote some romances in the style of Boccaccio and Bandelli, besides letters, &c. All these were published at Venice, 1558.

PARACELSUS, Aureolus Philippus Theophrastus Bombast de Hohenheim, a celebrated physician, born at Einsiedlen, a village near Zurich, 1493. His father, the natural son of a master of the Teutonic order, himself distinguished as a practitioner in medicine, educated him with great attention, and permitted him to pursue his inclination towards alchemical studies. The young student, eager after fame, travelled through the various countries of Europe in pursuit of knowledge, and carefully treasured up the medical information respecting cures, which he could collect from physicians, barbers, old women, chemists, and conjurors. On his return to Switzerland he was honorably received by the magistrates of Basil, who in 1527 made him professor of medicine. He soon became eminent here by the number, respectability, and attachment of his pupils; and by the many extraordinary cures in the leprosy, itch, dropsy, and particularly the venereal disease, which he performed by the prudent use of mercury and of opium, whose powers, till then, were little known, or unskillfully applied. In the midst of his medical celebrity he was called to the bed of a sick caron of Liechtenfels, who had been given over by his physicians, and so successful were his applications, that by the taking of three pills of laudanum, he recovered; but when he demanded the 100 crowns which the patient had promised, he was rejected with contempt. The offended physician brought his cause before a court of judicature; but the judge, regarding more the medicine given than the skill of the practitioner, awarded him but a small gratuity, and Paracelsus, indignant of the treatment, left the court and the country with the highest disdain. He went to Alsatia, where he led a wandering, unsettled life, accompanied by his friend and follower, Oporinus; but while he pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone, and to have invented an elixir which would prolong his days to the age of Methusalem, he found himself poor, and he fell a sacrifice to a fever at a public inn at Saltzburg. He died Sept. 1541, aged 48, and was buried in St. Sebastian's hospital, Saltzburg. The works of Paracelsus have been frequently edited. The best edition is that of Geneva, 1658, 3 vols. folio. The celebrity of Paracelsus is to be attributed as much to the ignorance and superstition of his contemporaries, as to the successful cures which he performed by the proper use of his empirical art. He pretended that there was a regular agreement between the planets and the various parts of the human body, and considered the seven planets as equally corresponding with the seven metals, or minerals. With such and similar chimerical opinions, the effect of a heated and disordered imagination, which depended more upon revelations from departed or evil spirits, than the results of sound and clear experiment, he thus raised himself to consequence, and obtained a reputation for a while regarded as the fruit of superior intelligence, and of a divine agency.

PARADIN, William, a laborious French historian, dean of Beaujeu, who died about 1582, aged 81. He published Antreas' History of the Septuagint Pentateuch, 4to. — Latin History of his own Times, 1552 — Annals of Burgundy, in French, folio — De Moribus Galliarum Historia — Memoirs of Lyons — De Rebus in Belgio — Historia Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ — Chronicle of Savoy, &c.

PARAMO, Lewis de, a Spanish inquisitor, who published "the Holy Office," at Madrid, in fol. 1598. This work is an account of the inquisition, and is curious and valuable.

PARCELLES, John, a native of Leyden, eminent as a painter, born 1597. His sea pieces, his storms and shipwrecks possessed singular merit. His son Julius was also an artist of eminence, and in the same walk of science.

PARCIEUX, Anthony de, a French mathematician, born at Clotet de Cessoux, in the diocese of Uzès, 1703. He studied at Lyons and Paris, and acquired reputation by his valuable and intelligent publications, as well as by his lectures. He was member of the learned societies of Berlin, Sweden, &c. and died universally regretted, 2d Sept. 1768. His works are a Treatise of Trigonometry, 4to. — Essays on the Probability of the Duration of Human Life, 4to. — Memoirs on the Practicability of bringing to Paris the Water of the Yvette, 4to. His nephew, of the same name, possessed equal abilities. He was brought up at the college of Navarre, at Paris, and at the age of 24 became a public lecturer. He was in 1779, professor of experimental philosophy in the military college of Brienne, and afterwards succeeded to a chair at the Lyceum at Paris. He was author of Orezo, a tragedy, written when young, and an elementary book on geometrical geometrical and astronomical calculations, &c. He died at Paris, 1798.

PARDIES, Ignatius Gaston, a French jesuit, born at Paris, 1636. He for some years devoted his time to polite literature, and afterwards applied himself to the more laborious studies of mathematics and philosophy, in which he became a distinguished professor. He died at Paris, at the early age of 37, in consequence of a contagious distemper. He wrote Horologium Thaumasticum Duplex, 4to. — Dissertatio de Motu & Natura Cometarum, 8vo. — Discourse on Local Motion, 12mo. — Elements of Geometry, 12mo. — the Science of Moving Bodies, &c.

PARÉ, Ambrose, an eminent surgeon, born at Laval. Though a protestant he was surgeon to Henry II. of France, and to his three successors; and his services were so highly valued, that at the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Charles IX. saved his life by shutting him up in his own closet. He made some useful discoveries in anatomy, and died much respected, Dec. 1590, at an advanced age. His works were translated into Latin by Guillemeau, of which the best edition is that of Paris, 1614, folio.

PARÉ, David, a protestant divine, born 1548, at Francolstein, in Silesia. By the jealous treatment of his step-mother, his studies were checked, and he was placed with an apothecary, and afterwards with a shoemaker; but his father at last recovered to a sense of his duty, and permitted him again to cultivate literature. By the advice of his master Schilling he exchanged his German name of Wangler for the Greek word Pareus, which was equally derived from the substantive cheek; and he recommended himself so much by his abilities, that he was patronized by the elector palatine, and made theological professor at Heidelberg. The best part of his life was engaged in controversy, in which he displayed learning, spirit, and moderation. He died June, 1622, in his Pareanum, a house which he had in the suburbs of Heidelberg. Besides some tracts against the pope, and Bellarmine, he published a commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which, when translated into English, was, for its anti-monarchical expressions, condemned by the university of Oxford, and burnt publicly, by order of James I. His exegetical works were published, 3 vols. folio, Frankfurt, 1617.

PARÉ, Philip, son to the above, was a celebrated grammarian, born at Hembach, 24th May, 1576. He was early eminent for his abilities, and was received in various universities of Germany with respect. He was rector of the college of Neustadt, and afterwards of Manau, and died 1650. Besides publishing his father's works, and defending them against David Owen, he wrote Lexicon Criticum, 8vo. — Lexicon Plantinum, or a Vocabulary of Plautus' Comedies — Calligraphia Romana, 8vo. — Anales Plautianæ — a valuable edition of Plautus — El Cui Symmachiana, &c.

PARÉ, Daniel, son of Philip, was equally known as an able classical scholar. He was unfortunately killed by some highwaymen, in his father's life time. He published the Hero and Leander of M. de S., with notes — Mellicium Atticum, 4to. — Medulla Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ — Lexicon on Lucretius, &c.

PEREIRA, Juan de, a native of the West Indies, originally the slave of Diego Velasquez, the painter. With strong natural genius for painting, he copied by stealth, the finished pieces of his master, and he acquired such skill, that he ventured to show one of his performances to Philip IV. of Spain, who often visited the house of Velasquez. The monarch was pleased with the abilities of the slave, and obtained his liberty; but the faithful Pereira would not abandon the service of his master, to whom he owed his own celebrity, and from whom he had received every mark of kindness and protection. He died 1670, aged 60. His pieces are highly finished, and deservedly admired.

PERENNIN, Dominic, a jesuit of Lyons, who went in 1698 as missionary to China. He was kindly treated by the emperor Cam-Hi, for whom he translated into Chinese, some of the most interesting articles on geometry, anatomy, astronomy, &c. from the memoirs of the French academy. His interference was honorably exerted in producing a reconciliation between the courts of Moscow and Peking. He published the Chart of the Chinese Empire, and wrote besides, several curious letters on the Chinese, which appeared in 1759, with the letters of Mairan. He died at Peking, 27th Sept. 1741, in a good old age, and the emperor, in respect for his great learning and his many virtues, ordered his funeral expences to be defrayed by the public, and his remains to be honorably attended to the grave by the noblest of the Chinese mandarins.

PARENT, Anthony, a French mathematician, born at Paris, 1666. His propensity to mathematical studies was so great, that even at the age of 13, he filled the margins of his books with notes on the subject. His friends indeed wished him to pursue the law; but though he went through a course in that faculty, he returned to his favorite studies in the college of Dormans, and soon after gave lectures on mathematics and fortification. He was made member of the academy of sciences, to whose memoirs he communicated some valuable papers, and was cut off by the small pox, 1716, aged 50. His works were Mathematical and Philosophical Researches, 3 vols. 12mo. — Theoretical and Practical Arithmetic, 8vo. — Elements of Mechanics and Natural Philosophy, 12mo, &c.

PARFAIT, Francis, the historian of the French drama, was born of an ancient family at Paris, 1693, and died 1753, much respected for his good nature, innocent conviviality, and original fund of anecdotes. He wrote General History of the French Theatre, 15 vols. 12mo. — History of the Ancient Italian Theatre, 2 vols. — Theatrical Dictionary, 7 vols. 12mo. — Dramatic Pieces, never represented, &c.

PARIS, Matthew, an English historian, who was a Benedictine of the order of Clugny, in the monastery of St. Alban's, in the 13th century. He was an universal scholar, and confessedly possessed in that dark age, great and astonishing erudition. His abilities, and his well known integrity were usefully employed in visiting and reforming the monasteries, and in re-establishing the ancient unsullied discipline of the church, even against the influence and power of the pope. His great work was "Historia Major," in two parts, from the creation of the world to William the Conqueror, and and from the Conqueror to the year 1250, which he afterwards continued to 1259. The work was afterwards brought down to 1273, by Rishanger, a monk of the same monastery. This valuable work was first published by archbishop Parker, London, 1571, folio, and by Dr. W. Watts, 1640, 2 vols. folio.

PARIS, Francis, a native of Chantillon, near Paris. From poverty and servitude in the house of Varet, grand vicar of Sens, he rose to distinction, and by the friendship of his master, he was admitted into orders, and procured the benefice of St. Lambert. He wrote the lives of the saints, and other works, and died at Paris, 1718.

PARIS, Francis, an abbé at Paris, of the order of the Jansenists. He was the son of a counsellor of parliament, but he renounced the honors and emoluments which, by means of his family, he might have obtained; and after bestowing all his property on his brother, and rejecting the preferment offered by cardinal Noailles, he devoted himself to the austerities of an ecclesiastical life. He died May 1st, 1727, at the early age of 37, and was buried in the church-yard of St. Medard, where his brother erected a monument to his honor. Those who had admired his sanctity visited his tomb in reverence, and at last pretended that their diseases were cured by the touch of his holy monument. The report no sooner spread, than thousands flocked to the hallowed spot, through superstition or curiosity, till the government, apprehensive of the enthusiastic madness of the people, ordered the church-yard to be shut; and the miracles of Paris ceased. He wrote Annotations on the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews.

PARISEAU, N. a native of Paris, distinguished as a dramatic writer. The seven plays which he produced were received with great approbation by the public, but his popularity was unable to save him from the horrors of the revolution, as he was guillotined among thousands of other victims, 1794.

PARKER, Matthew, the second protestant archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich, 1504, and educated at Benet college, or Corpus Christi, Cambridge, where he became fellow. He was not only eminent as a scholar well versed in antiquity, but as a preacher, and he was made chaplain to queen Anne Boleyn, and to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He was chosen master of Corpus college by the recommendation of Henry VIII. and under Edward VI. he was elected dean of Lincoln; but under Mary he was stripped of all his ecclesiastical honors, on pretence that he was married. On the accession of Elizabeth, over whose education he had presided, he was recalled from privacy, and made archbishop of Canterbury. His consecration took place in Lambeth chapel, though the malevolence of the Romanists spread the report that his consecration took place at the Nag's head, Cheapside, a wicked falsehood, warmly refuted by some able writers. In his new character he behaved with great spirit and firmness, and zealously promoted the cause of the reformation not only in his own diocese, but over the whole kingdom. This venerable character died May 17th, 1575, aged 72. He published an edition of Matthew Paris, folio — an historical work on the Antiquity of the English Church, besides other works, and he also improved the translation called the Bishop's Bible.

PARKER, Samuel, an English prelate, born at Northampton, Sept. 1640. His father was a practitioner of the law, and by his servility to the parliament and to Cromwell, he obtained a place in the high court of justice, and was made one of the barons of the exchequer, and serjeant at law at the restoration. The son was educated among the puritans, and in 1659 was admitted at Wadham college, Oxford, and became known in the university as a strict and regular student, more given to fasting and prayer, than to the amusements of the age. Soon after, however, interest or conviction induced him to renounce his favorite opinions; he became a zealous anti-puritan, was patronized by archbishop Sheldon, and continued a servile and temporising follower of the court. Under James II. his hypocrisy was rewarded, he was made bishop of Oxford, privy counsellor, and by royal mandamus, appointed president of Magdalen college in the university, against the statutes of the society. Thus elevated in dignity, he sacrificed his religion to his interests, and became contemptible to his clergy. Though thus devoted to the papists, in compliance with the times, it is said that he wrote a letter to James II. to persuade him to return to the protestant faith. He died at Magdalen college, unlamented, 20th March, 1687. He wrote various things, respectable in themselves, in favor of the papists, besides an history of his own times, which has appeared in Latin and English. His descendants have continued to reside in Oxford.

PARKER, George, earl of Macclesfield, son of Parker the first earl and lord chancellor of England, is known for his knowledge of mathematics, which he evinced in preparing the bill by which the style in 1752 was to be altered according to the Gregorian calendar. The speech which he spoke on the occasion was published, and shows him in a very respectable light. He was at one time president of the Royal society, and died 1766.

PARKER, Richard, a native of Exeter, who served in the navy as midshipman, but was dismissed from the service for ill conduct. He was afterwards as a common sailor on board of the fleet, and with all the mean arts which dissatisfaction could suggest, he obtained universal influence over the sailors during the unfortunate rebellion which distracted and dishonored the fleet at the Nore in 1797. The address, ready elocution, and above all, the deep dissimulation which he possessed, marked him for a desperate leader; but after he had for some days exercised the sovereign power over his associates, in the character of admiral of the fleet, he was delivered up by his penitent associates. When tried by a court martial, he answered to his accusation with great firmness, and when condemned, implored mercy on his accomplices. He was hanged on board the Sandwich, the scene of his short glory, 30th June, 1797.

PARKHURST, John, an able divine, born in London, and educated at Clarehall, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1751. He devoted himself much to classical literature, especially Greek and Hebrew, and published an excellent Greek and English Lexicon, 4to. and also a Hebrew and English Lexicon, 4to. reprinted in 8vo. These works display great learning and deep critical knowledge. He published also a pamphlet against J. Wesley — an answer to Dr. Priestley on the pre-existence of Christ, &c. and he ably defended with bishop Horne, and other celebrated characters of those times, the popular opinions of Hutchinson. He settled at Epsom, in Surrey, and died universally respected, 1797.

PARKINSON, John, an eminent botanist, born 1567. He was bred an apothecary in London, and obtained such reputation in his profession and such botanical knowledge, that he was appointed botanist to Charles I. He published Paradisus in Sole, Paradisus Terrestris, a valuable book, in which he described nearly 1000 plants, and was thus the first who gave figures of the subjects of the flower garden. By the words Paradisus in Sole, he quaintly Latinized his own name, Park-in-sun. He published besides, Theatrum Botanicum, in which he describes above 3800 plants, and in this and in his other work he shews himself, according to Dr. Pulteney, more of an original author than Gerard or Johnson. He died about 1645.

PARMENIDES, a philosopher of Elis, disciple of Xenophanes, B. C. 436. He maintained the rotundity of the earth, &c.

PARMENIO, one of Alexander's generals. His attachment was cruelly rewarded by the conqueror, who ordered him and his son to be put to death.

PARMEGIANO, Vid. MAZZUOLI.

PARMENTIER, James, a Frenchman, eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He came to England, and settled in Yorkshire, where his abilities were exerted and liberally patronized. The altar piece of St. Peter's church by him is much admired. He died 1730, aged 72.

PARMENTIER, Jean, or Jehan, a native of Dieppe, celebrated as a merchant and a navigator. He was the first who fitted out vessels to the Brasils, and also the first Frenchman who discovered the Indies as far as the island of Sumatra, where he died 1530, aged 36. His knowledge of astronomy and of cosmography was very great, and he constructed maps with much skill.

PARNELL, Thomas, an eminent poet, the friend of Pope, was born in Dublin, 1679. He was educated at Dublin university, where he took his degree of M. A. 1700, and was ordained. He came to England in 1706, where his fame had preceded him, and he was introduced among the Scriblerus club, with Gay, Pope, Arbuthnot, Swift, and Jervas. He obtained a prebend in Ireland, and the vicarage of Finglass by the recommendation of his friend Swift, from archbishop King, and might have risen to higher dignities had not the death of his wife rendered the latter part of his life melancholy. He fled to society for relief, but acquired, instead of consolation, habits of intemperance, which proved fatal. He died at Chester, on his way to Ireland, July, 1717, in his 39th year, and was buried in Trinity church there. His poetical pieces were selected by Pope, and published 1721, 8vo. to which a volume was added at Dublin 1758. As a man his character was benevolent, mild, and amiable; as a poet he possessed not the higher powers of the muse, but elegance, delicacy, and grace every where abound. The moral tendency of his poems be-fides, cannot be sufficiently admired; and if he had written only his Hermit, Parnell would have ranked among the most pious and useful poets in the English language. He contributed also to the Spectator, Guardian, &c. and the Life of Homer, prefixed to Pope's version, was written by him. He had by his wife, two daughters, who died before him, and a daughter who survived him. His estates in Ireland were inherited by his nephew sir John.

PARODI, Dominico, a painter of Genoa. He was also eminent as a statuary. His portraits possess merit, and his altar pieces are much admired. He died 1740.

PARR, Catherine, sixth queen to Henry VIII. was daughter of sir Thomas Parr, and widow of lord Latimer. She was carefully educated in polite literature, in the fashion of those days, and was well skilled in divinity, upon which she frequently conversed with the king. She labored much for the establishment of the reformation, and her interference proved at one time so disagreeable to the capricious monarch, that he permitted Gardiner, and her other catholic enemies to draw articles of impeachment against her, but her prudence restored her to the confidence and affection of the king. After Henry's death she married sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who treated her with great harshness, so that she died the next year in child-bed, not without suspicion of poison, 1548. She published her Lamentations of a Sinner — prayers and meditations, &c.

PARR, Thomas, a peasant of Shropshire, who lived to the great age of 152 years and nine months. It is remarkable that he performed penance in his parish church at the age of 100, for a bastard child, and at the age of 120 he married a second wife, by whom he had a child. He was in 1635 brought to London, and introduced by lord Arundel to Charles I. but the change of situation, and his altered mode of life, and particularly drinking wine, soon proved fatal to a constitution hitherto supported by more temperate and abstemious habits, and he died the same year.

PARRHASIUS, a celebrated painter of Athens, the rival of Zeuxis, B. C. 420. From his great success in his art, he was crowned king of painters.

PARRHASIUS, James, an Italian grammarian, born at Cosenza, near Naples, 1470. According to the affectation of the times, he exchanged the name of Parisio for the more learned word Parrhasius, and taught belles lettres and rhetoric at Milan, where he was much admired for his graceful delivery. On a charge of improper converse with his pupils, he retired to Vicenza, and afterwards to Rome, where he was patronized by Leo X. His great application, however, soon rendered him incapable of acting as professor, and upon his return home he fell into a fever, which proved fatal. He wrote some Fragments of Antiquity — Commentaries on Horace's Art of Poetry — Ovid's Ibis — Claudian, &c.

PARROCEL, Joseph, a native of Brignoles in Provence, eminent as a painter and engraver. He studied at first under one of his brothers, and afterwards under Bourignon, and deserved to be admitted member of the French academy of painting. His portraits, and also his historical pieces, and his battles, were executed with great taste and effect. He died 1704, aged 56. His son Charles, was also an eminent artist, and member of the academy, and died 1752, aged 53. His conquests of Lewis XV. possess merit. Peter, the nephew and pupil of Joseph, was also distinguished as a painter of merit, and died at Avignon, 1739, aged 74.

PARRY, Richard, rector of Wichampton, Dorsetshire, and preacher at Market Harborough, Leicestershire, was a student of Christ-church, Oxford, where he took the degree of M. A. 1747, and that of D. D. 1757. He died at his cure, Leicestershire, very poor, 9th April 1780. He wrote some sermons, besides divinity tracts — a Dissertation on Daniel's seventy Weeks — Remarks on Dr. Kennicott, &c.

PARRY, Richard, an able divine, educated at Oxford, and made master of Ruthyn school, Denbighshire, after which he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, 1604. He revised the first edition of the Welsh bible, which was published 1620.

PARSONS, Robert, or PERSONS, an English jesuit, son of a blacksmith of Netherstoway, near Bridgewater, was born 1546, and educated at Baliol college, Oxford, at the expence of the vicar of his parish. He soon distinguished himself as an able disputant, and became fellow and tutor of his college; but being accused by his society of incontinence, and of embezzling the college money, he left the university, and retired to Antwerp, then to Louvain and Padua, and afterwards to Rome, where he renounced the protestant faith, and entered among the jesuits. Here he acquired such reputation, that the pope permitted him to establish an English college at Rome, for the instruction of missionaries to attempt the conversion of the English nation to the catholic religion. He came himself in disguise to London, and in the character of preacher, he strongly and efficaciously recommended the Romish faith to his auditors, and prevailed upon the papists never to frequent or join in the service of the protestant church. This violent attack against the established religion of England, and the doctrine that Elizabeth might safely be deposed, were too daring to be long concealed from the penetrating knowledge of Burleigh, but Parsons escaped his pursuers, though some of his associates were seized. On the preparations of Philip to invade England, the good father was laboriously active in stirring up not only foreigners, but natives abroad against their country; and when the armada was destroyed, he endeavoured by means of lord Derby, to excite a rebellion in the kingdom. This turbulent, insidious, and intriguing jesuit, who proved so virulent an enemy to his country, died on the 18th April, 1610, and was buried with all the honors due to a cardinal, a dignity to which he aspired, but which he did not obtain. His writings were numerous, amounting to 33 tracts, chiefly on divinity and controversial subjects, and in favor and support of his religion and politics.

PARSONS, James, an eminent physician, born at Barnstaple, Devon, March 1705. His father, the youngest of nine sons, was soon after his birth, appointed barrack-master at Bolton in Ireland, and removing with his family into that kingdom, his son received his education at Dublin college. He studied medicine with great assiduity, and after improving himself in the celebrated schools of Paris, he took his degrees at the university of Rheims, and returned to London 1736. He became physician to the St. Giles' infirmary, and was made member of the Royal society in 1740, licentiate to the college of physicians 1751, and he acquired deserved reputation, especially in the obstetrical art. He was the intimate friend of Dr. Douglas, sir Hans Sloane, Mead, and other celebrated men, and the learned correspondent of Buffon, and other great literary characters on the continent. He died in London, 4th April, 1770, and was buried at Hendon, 17 days after, as he had required that his remains should not be intombed before a visible alteration took place in his corpse. He had by his wife, Elizabeth Reynolds, two sons and a daughter, who died young. He was a man of great and extensive erudition, as Dr. Maty, his successor in the office of secretary to the Royal society, has, in the language of truth and friendship observed; and he has obliged the world with various publications, the best known of which is his "Remains of Japhet, or Historical Inquiry into the Affinity and Origin of European Languages."

PARTHENAY, John de, lord of Soubise, was born 1512. While commanding the French troops in Italy, he imbibed the principles of the protestants, which he afterwards maintained with much firmness and constancy. He was made governor of Lyons 1562, by the prince of Condé, the head of the Huguenots, and he bravely defended it when besieged by the duke de Nevers. He died 1566, aged 54.

PARTHENAY, Catherine, daughter and heiress of the preceding, is eminent for her wit, her beauty, and her writings. In 1568, at the age of 14, she married du Quellence, baron du Pont, a man distinguished in the wars of those times, but accused of impotency by the malice of his mother-in-law. While the suit was pending, the husband was slaughtered among those who fell in the Bartholomew massacre; and his widow, who paid great respect to his memory, took for her second husband, 1575, Renatus, viscount Rohan, who died 1586, leaving her two sons and three daughters. She was at Rochelle when the town was besieged, and she shared with magnanimity all the calamities of that disastrous siege, and refusing to be included in the capitulation, she was, with her surviving daughter Anne, conveyed a prisoner of war to Niort. She died 1631, aged 77. She wrote some poems, printed 1572, besides a tragedy, called Holofernes, acted at Rochelle, and the Precepts of Isocrates, translated into French, and other works. Her eldest son was the famous duke de Rohan, who supported the cause of the protestants with such intrepidity in the reign of Lewis XII. Her daughter Catherine, who married the duke of Deux-ponts, was the celebrated female who so nobly met the amorous addresses of Henry IV. in these words: "I am too poor, fire, to be your wife, and too nobly born to be your mistress."

PARTHENAY, Anne de, a lady of illustrious birth. She married Anthony de Pons, count de Maremmes, and was the most distinguished ornament of the court of Renata, duchess of Ferrara. She was a protestant, and well skilled in Grecian and Roman literature.

PARUTA, Paul, a noble Venetian, who usefully served his country in various embassies, and was afterwards governor of Brescia, and procurator of St. Mark. He died 1598, aged 58. He was the author of notes in Italian on Tacitus — Political Discourses — a History of Venice, from 1513, to 1572, and other works.

PAS, Manasses de, marquis de Feuquierres, was born at Saumur, after the death of his father who was slain at the battle of Ivry. He trode in the steps of his father for valor, and distinguished himself at the siege of Rochelle, where he was taken prisoner, but liberated after a month's confinement. His abilities were equally displayed in the cabinet, and he went as ambassador to the courts of Sweden and of Germany. He was placed at the head of the French army with the duke of Saxe Weimar in 1635, and died of the wounds which he received at the siege of Thionville, 14th March 1640. The account of his negotiations in Germany was published 1753, in 3 vols. 12mo.

PAS, Anthony de, marquis of Feuquierres, a famous French officer, whose military merits remained unknown till his 40th year. In 1688, at the head of 1000 men in Germany he so eminently distinguished himself, and afterwards in Italy, that his promotion was very rapid. He was so strict a disciplinarian that the wits said of him he was the boldest man in Europe, since he daily slept in the midst of 100,000 enemies, meaning his soldiers. He died 1711, aged 63. His memoirs, which, as containing the History of the generals of Lewis XIV. are considered very interesting, were published in 4to. and in 4 vols. 12mo.

PASCAL, Blaise, a celebrated French divine, born at Clermont in Auvergne, 19th June, 1623. He was educated by his father, who was president of the court of aids in his province, and possessed great mathematical abilities; but while his father fought for distinction as the friend of Descartes, he forbade his son the use of all books of geometry, that his attention might not be diverted from belles lettres, and classical knowledge. Young Pascal from his infancy displayed extraordinary abilities; he inquired into the reasons and causes of every thing, and never was satisfied but with what appeared most probable and rational. His father who knew he had no opportunity of studying mathematics, accidentally discovered him surrounded with figures in charcoal on the floor of his chamber, and found on inquiry that he was engaged in what makes the 32d proposition of Euclid's first book, which the unassisted powers of his genius, by a connected series of ideas and of demonstrations had pointed out to him. At 16 he wrote his treatise of Conic Sections, and so ably composed that Descartes attributed it to the labors of the father and not of the son. At 19 he contrived an arithmetical machine, much admired for its ingenuity, and at 23 he saw, corrected, and improved the Toricellian experiment, and soon after solved a problem proposed by Merfennus, which had hitherto perplexed the ablest mathematicians of Europe. But in the midst of this encreasing reputation, Pascal all at once renounced literary and mathematical pursuits for religion, and after being one of the greatest of philosophers, he became the most humble and penitent of devotees. He rejected all the pleasures of life, and frequently wore an iron girdle with sharp points towards his skin that he might thus mortify himself, and by inflicting pain on his body banish the vain or profane thoughts which might intrude on his holy meditations. Though, however, regardless of the world, he embraced the cause of the jansenists against the jesuits, and in his "Provincial Letters," attacked them with all the shafts of genuine wit, yet with the force of truth and conscious virtue. These letters, according to Voltaire, who calls him the first, and Boileau the second, satirist against the jesuits, are a model of eloquence and wit, equal to the finest comedies of Moliere, and possessed of the sublimity of the finest of Bossuet's orations. These celebrated letters have been frequently published, and have appeared in all the languages of Europe. Pascal died at Paris 19th Aug. 1662, aged only 39. He was in the last year of life engaged in a work against atheists and infidels, which, however, he did not complete. After his death were published from among his papers, "Pensées," on religion and other subjects, much admired, and also the "Equilibrium of Fluids," and the weight of "the Mass of the Air." Pascal was undoubtedly a very extraordinary man. If rivalled in talents, says his biographer, no one, however, of equal eminence, can be found who lived with such exemplary innocence. His works were printed Paris, 5 vols. 8vo. 1799.

PASCHAL, I. St. Paschasius, a Roman who succeeded Stephen IV. on the papal throne 817. He was benevolent in his conduct, and received with great humanity the Greeks who had been exiled for their attachment to image worship. He crowned Lothaire emperor at Rome, and died 12th May, 824.

PASCHAL II. Reinier, a Tuscan who succeeded Urban II. on the papal throne 1099. He excommunicated the antipope Gilbert, and claimed with the most unyielding pertinacity the right of investitures, which was opposed by Henry I. of England, and Henry IV. emperor of Germany. Henry visited Italy in hopes of receiving from the sovereign pontiff the imperial crown; but Paschal refused to officiate till he renounced his claims to the investitures. The emperor incensed, seized the person of the pope, and though the Romans immediately took up arms in defence of their sovereign he carried him away captive, and refused to restore him to liberty, till he had renounced his pretensions to the disputed rights. This extorted concession was cancelled by two councils held at Rome, in 1112, and 1116. The pope tired with the dissensions which harassed him wished to resign the sovereignty, but died before, 22d Jan. 1118. Some of his letters are preserved in the councils of P. Labbé. There were two antipopes of that name, one in the age of Sergius II. and the other in the reign of Alexander III.

Modis Moralia Tractandi, 4to. was the son of a merchant of Dantzic, and became professor of moral philosophy at Kiel, and died 1707, aged 56.

PASOR, George, a protestant, Greek professor at Franeker, where he died 1637. He wrote Lexicon Novi Testamenti, a useful work. — Manuale Testamenti, &c. 12mo. — Collegium Hesiœdæum, &c.

PASOR, Matthias, son of the preceding, was born at Herborne, April 12th, 1599. He studied at Heidelberg and Marburg; but in consequence of the wars which disturbed his countrymen, he left Germany and came to England, and was incorporated A. M. at Oxford 1624. He here resided at Exeter college, and read lectures in oriental languages, and with great reputation and success, but in 1629, he was induced to go to Groningen, where he was presented to some of the professorial chairs. He died there Jan. 1658. He wrote several things but never published them.

PASQUALINO, an Italian painter, whose conversations, and groupes of common people were highly finished, and particularly interesting. He died 1700, aged 59.

PASQUIER, or PAQUIER, Stephen, an eminent advocate in the parliament at Paris, rewarded by Henry III. with the office of advocate general to the chamber of accounts, in consequence of his able pleadings against Verforis, the defender of the jesuits. He resigned this honorable place to his eldest son Theodore, and died at Paris, Aug. 31st, 1615, at the great age of 87. As a man his character was mild and benevolent, as a writer acute and sensible, and as a poet graceful and sublime. Of his poems the best known is his "Puce," or flea, in consequence of a flea which he saw on the breast of the learned Catherine de Roches, 1569. His other works consist of epigrams, epitaphs, letters, researches, portraits, &c. He left three sons worthy of him.

PASSEMANT, Claude Simeon, a native of Paris, brought up to trade, which he quitted to pursue the bent of his genius in the construction of optical and mathematical instruments. Among his ingenious labors are mentioned an astronomical pendulum with a moving celestial sphere, presented to Lewis XV. a burning mirror, and some globes. He wrote a treatise on the reflecting telescope, and another on the use of telescopes. He died suddenly 6th Nov. 1769, aged 67.

PASSERAT, John, professor of eloquence in the Royal college, at Paris, was born at Troyes in Champagne, 1534. He studied law at Bourges under Cujacius, and became professor of eloquence upon the assassination of Ramus, 1572. He acquired great and deserved eminence in this employment, and died of the palsy 1602. His works are numerous, and his poetry is particularly admired: besides some French and Latin poems he published, Commentaries on Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius — Orationes et Præfationes — Conjecturarum Liber — de Literarum Cognatione, &c.

PASSERI, Giovanni Battista, a painter, the pupil of Dominichino, and author of the lives of the painters, sculptors, and architects, of his time, died at Rome 1679, aged 70. He wrote also poetry. His nephew Joseph studied under him and Maratti, and was much admired for his portrait painting. He died at Rome 1714, aged 60.

PASSERI, Gio. Battista, an Italian antiquary, born at Gubio, in the duchy of Urbino, Nov. 1694. He studied the law at Rome for four years, and began to make collections of Etruscan antiquities; but in 1738, the loss of his wife had such influence on his feelings, that he embraced the ecclesiastical state. He became apostolic prothonotary, and vicar general of Pesara, and died Feb. 1780, in consequence of being overturned in his carriage. He wrote Lucernæ Fictiles Musci Passeris, 3 vols. — on the History of Fossils — Pictura Etruscorum in Vasaalis in unum collectæ, Differentiationibus Illustratæ, 3 vols. — Theaurus Gemmarum Astrii Ferarum Antiquarum, tom. 2 and 3. in continuation of Gori's first vol. — Theaurus Gemmarum Selectissimarum, and other works mentioned in Saxius' Onomasticon.

PASSEROTTI, Bartholomew, a painter of Bologna, the disciple of Zuccherò. His portraits were highly finished, and his church pieces were also much admired. He died 1595. His sons Tiburzio and Ventura were also eminent as painters.

PASSINELLI, Lorenzo, a Bolognese painter. Several of his historical pieces of great value are preserved in his native city. He died 1700, aged 71.

PASSIONEI, Dominico, an Italian cardinal, born at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino, 1682. He studied at Rome, where he made a most valuable collection of books and manuscripts, and in 1706, he came to Paris where he became acquainted with Mabilion, Montfaucon, and other learned men. In 1708, he went to Holland and continued there, and attended the congress of Utrecht, 1712, as the pope's secret agent. He was afterwards employed by the pope in various negotiations, and every where displayed his zeal, sagacity, and talents. He published an Account of his Embassy in Switzerland, with the title of "Acta Legationis Helveticæ," fol. 1738. While nuncio at Vienna, he pronounced the funeral oration of prince Eugene, and for his many services was made archbishop of Ephesus, and raised to the dignity of cardinal by Clement XII. This learned man particularly distinguished as the friend and patron of literature, died 15th July, 1761, aged 79. His nephew Benedict published his collection of Latin and Greek inscriptions, &c. Lucca, 1765, folio.

PATEL, a celebrated French painter, of whose birth and age nothing is known. He is called by his countrymen, the French Claude, as he imitated most successfully that able master. His buildings, scenery, and trees, are particularly admired.

PATER, Paul, a native of Menerfdorf in Hungary, who was exiled from his country for his attachment to the protestant faith. He became successively librarian to the duke of Wolfenbuttle, mathematical professor at the college of Thorn, and afterwards at Dantzic, where he died 1724, aged 68. He was an able mathematician, and so ardent in the pursuit of knowledge that he slept only two hours in the summer, and four in the winter. He wrote Labor Solis, five de Eclipsi Christo patiente Hierosolym. Vifa. — de Astrologia Perficâ — de Mari Caspio — de Cœlo Empyrio — de Insignibus Turcicis ex Variis Superstitionum Tenebris Orientalium maxime Illustratis, &c.

PATER,

PATER, John Baptist, a painter, born at Valencennes. He studied under Watteau, with whom he unfortunately quarrelled. He excelled in the coloring of his pieces, though his designs were often incorrect. He was more anxious after money and independence than after fame, and therefore his landscapes were often executed with hurry and inelegance. He died at Paris 1736, aged 41.

PATERSON, Samuel, a native of London, chiefly educated in France. He settled as a foreign book-seller in the Strand, but did not succeed in business, in consequence of which he retired to the continent in 1776, and made a valuable collection of books, which on his return to England he recommended to the public in his catalogue called Bibliotheca Universalis Selecta. This performance was so much approved by the public that he acquired some celebrity as a bibliographer, and was not only engaged as a librarian by lord Landsdown, but was employed by the London book-sellers in forming their catalogues, several of which, especially of the Beauclerk, Crofts, Pinelli, and other collections he completed in a very satisfactory manner. He was author of Curfory Remarks on a Journey through the Netherlands by Coriat, 3 vols. 12mo. — Joineriana, or Scraps, 2 vols. 8vo. — the Templar, a periodical paper — Speculation on Law and Lawyers, 8vo. At one time of life he was engaged as an auctioneer, and had the good fortune to save from destruction sir Julius Cæsar's manuscripts, which from mere waste paper were made productive to him of 350l. He died 1802, aged 74.

PATERCULUS, Caius Velleius, a Latin historian, general of cavalry in Germany under Tiberius. He wrote an epitome of Roman history still extant.

PATIN, Guy, an eminent French writer and physician, born at Houdon, near Beauvais in Picardy, 1602. His father intended him for the active life of an advocate, but he soon found medicine more congenial to his feelings, and after studying that science with great application, he became professor of physic in the Royal college of Paris, and distinguished himself by his defence of the ancients against the moderns. He also violently opposed the use of Antimony as a medicine, and wrote a book on it called, "Martyrology of Antimony, &c." His "Letters," published in 3 vols. after his death, acquired him great celebrity; they were read, says Voltaire, with avidity, because they contained things which every body loves, and satires liked still more. He died 1682. It is said that his features greatly resembled those of Cicero, as represented in his statues.

PATIN, Charles, second son of the preceding, was born at Paris 23d Feb. 1633. His abilities were so early displayed, that at the age of 14 he maintained for five hours a disputation in Greek and Latin, and was admitted M. A. with great applause. He studied the law, but had a stronger inclination for physic, in which faculty he at last took his degrees. He practised with great success, and read lectures to numerous and admiring auditors; but dreading persecution and imprisonment for some unknown causes, he suddenly left France, 1668. After visiting England and the North of Europe he fixed at Basil, and afterwards removed to Padua, where he became professor of physic, and was honored with the title of knight of St. Mark. He died there 2d Oct. 1693, of a palsy in the heart. His two daughters were distinguished for their learning. They were, with their mother, members of the Ricovrati academy at Padua, of which their father was president, and they wrote some respectable books. His chief works are Itinerarium Comitibus Brienne — Familie Romanæ ex Antiquis Numismat. fol. — Introduction to History by Medals, 12mo. — Imperatorum Romanorum Numismata, fol. — Travels in different Parts of Europe — Practica della Medaglia — Suetonius ex Numismat. Illustratus, 4to — de Optimâ Medicorum Sectâ — de Avicennâ — Lycæum Patavinum, &c. His works, says Voltaire, are read by men of learning, as his father's are by men of leisure.

PATKUL, John Reginald de, a Livonian gentleman, who resisted the oppressions which his country suffered from the power of Charles XI. and XII. of Sweden. He appeared before Charles XI. 1689, at the head of six other deputies, who were empowered by their country to lay their grievances at the feet of their sovereign, but the circumstance was regarded as treasonable, and he escaped with difficulty into Russia, from his persecutors, who condemned him to death. Though afterwards invested with the sacred office of ambassador of Russia in Saxony, Charles XII. refused to make peace with Augustus of Poland, except Patkul was delivered into his hands, and by this base treachery the unfortunate man was seized, and broken on the wheel, and quartered, at Casimir, 1707. This cruel measure, so outrageous to humanity and to the independence of nations, has deservedly fixed an indelible stigma on the character of the otherwise heroic Charles of Sweden.

PATRICK, St. the apostle and guardian saint of Ireland, was, as is supposed, a native of Wales or of Cornwall, who was seized by pirates, and carried to Ireland, where he converted the inhabitants to Christianity. He was made the spiritual head of Ireland, and fixed his residence at Armagh, which is become the metropolitan see; and further to establish the doctrines which he taught with such eloquence and effect, he built several churches and religious houses. He died about 460, aged 83. Some pieces in Latin, under his name, have been published in London by sir James Ware, 1658, in 8vo.

PATRICK, Peter, a native of Thessalonica in the age of Justinian, whom he served as ambassador to Amalafonte queen of the Goths, and Chosroës king of Persia. For his services he was made master of the palace. He is author of the history of ambassadors in the collection of Byzantine historians, folio, Louvre, 1648.

PATRICK, Samuel, a learned English divine. He was one of the masters of the Charter house, and is known for his edition of Hederic's Greek Lexicon, which has since been improved by Ernesti, Morell, and others.

PATRICK, Simon, a learned prelate, son of a mercer at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, where he was born 8th Sep. 1626. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and of which in 1661, he was elected master, against Sparrow, appointed by Royal mandamus. His opponent, supported by power, prevailed, whilst he himself retired from Cambridge, and became rector of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, where he continued an active parish priest during the whole of the plague. He took his degree of D. D. as a member of Christ-church college, Oxford, 1666, and was made chaplain to the king. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Westminster, and in 1679 dean of Peterborough. During the reign of James II. he showed himself an active advocate for the protestant cause, and though flattered and courted by the king, was steady and sincere in his principles. At the revolution his abilities were employed in settling the affairs of the church, and in reviewing the liturgy. In 1689 he was made bishop of Chichester, two years after translated to Ely, where he died 31st May, 1707, aged 80. This worthy prelate, so highly commended by Burnet, wrote sermons — tracts against Popery — Commentaries on the Scriptures, 3 vols. folio, which with Lowth on the prophets, Arnold on the apocrypha, and Whitby on the New Testament, contain a regularly continued commentary on the bible.

PATRUX, Peter, a French poet born at Caen 1585. He became a favorite at the court of Gaston, duke of Orleans, by his wit and his social conversation. His poems are little above mediocrity, some are licentious, and gave much sorrow to the author in his old age, when reflecting on the fatal consequences which his lines might have produced by the corruption of morals. He died at Paris 1672, aged 88. Among his poems, that called the "Dream," though of a serious cast, is known to most English readers by being introduced into our common jest-books. "I dreamt that buried in my fellow clay," &c.

PATRIZI, Francis, author of Dialogues in Italian, on the Manner of studying and writing History, 4to. — de Institutione Reipublicæ — de Regno & Regis Institutione, fol. — del Vero Regimento — Poemata de Antiquitate Sinarum, was bishop of Gaeta in Italy, and died there 1494.

PATRIZI, Francis, a native of Cherlo in Istria, who became professor of philosophy at Ferrara, Padua and Rome, and distinguished himself by his learning, and his bold opposition to the philosophy of Aristotle. He wrote some poems in Italian — a Parallel of the Military Art, between the Ancients and Moderns, and edited the works of Mercurius Trismegistus. He died at Rome 1597, aged 67.

PATRU, Oliver, a polite scholar, born at Paris 1604. He became eminent for his knowledge of literature, and as an advocate, he was the first, says Voltaire, who introduced correctness and purity of language in pleadings. When admitted into the French academy in 1640, he pronounced an animated speech, and from that circumstance the same adulatory address has continued to be expected from every new member. As a critic Patru was well informed and judicious, but rigid, so that he was called the Quintilian of France, and his grammatical decisions were submitted to, as oracles. His abilities were universally respected not only by the learned, but the great, and even by Colbert, and by the king. He died 16th Jan. 1681. His miscellaneous works were printed at Paris 1670, 4to. of which the third edition appeared 1714, and the whole in 1732, 2 vols. 4to.

PATTEN, Thomas, fellow of Corpus Christi, Oxford, and D. D. 1754, died 1790, rector of Childrey, Berks. He wrote the Christian Apology, a sermon — St. Peter's Christian Apology, a sermon against the Objections of Ralph Heathcote, 8vo. — the Sufficiency of the external Evidence of the Gospel against Heathcote — Opposition between the Gospel and the Religion of Nature — David's Character vindicated, 1762, &c.

PATTISON, William, an English poet, born at Peasmarsh, Suffex, 1706. He was educated at Appleby school, where his rising talents were noticed and encouraged by Mr. Noble, a neighbouring clergyman, and from thence he went to Sidney college, Cambridge, which, from a spirit impatient of discipline, he left without taking a degree. He came to London, but as he had nothing to support him he soon experienced all the horrors of indigence and distress. An intimate acquaintance with the wits of the time, and repeated solicitations for the cold and tardy patronage of the great were little calculated to dispel the miseries which poverty, intemperance, and imprudence, gathered around him, and therefore we find him describing himself as destitute of friends, of money, a prey to hunger, and passing his nights on a bench in St. James' park. The success of some of his pieces recommended him at last to Curl, who took him into his house, but a month after, the small-pox came to put an end to the sufferings of a dejected and broken heart. He died 1727, in his 21st year, and was buried in St. Clement Danes' church-yard. He possessed great genius, but without the cheering patronage of a friend his blossoms withered under an unpropitious sky. His works appeared, 2 vols. 8vo. 1728.

PATU, Claude Peter, a native of Paris, author of some poems, dramatic pieces, and also plays translated from the English. His works possessed merit, and were received with applause by the public. He died 1757, aged 28.

PAUCTON, Alexis, a French mathematician born of obscure parents near Laffay in Mayenne. He studied at Nantes where he paid great attention to mathematics and navigation, and afterwards he came to Paris, where with some difficulty he recommended himself and obtained patronage in the military school. He was amiable in his manners, and possessed of great erudition. He died at Paris 1799, aged 67. He is author of Theory of the Force of Archimedes, 12mo. — Metrology, or a treatise on the Weights, Measures, and Monies of all Countries Ancient and Modern — Theory of the Laws of Nature, with Dissertations on the Pyramids of Egypt, 8vo. It is said that he left in MS. a translation of the Hymns of Orpheus.

PAVILLON, Nicholas, a French ecclesiastic whose abilities were distinguished at Paris, and became known to cardinal Richelieu, who made him bishop of Alet. In his diocese he labored with zeal for the suppression of vice, and the dispersion of ignorance, but though he founded schools, and in every respect devoted himself to enlighten the people, his conduct was misrepresented at court, and the king sent commissioners to examine the complaints preferred against him. Though acquitted, a fresh offence, and his unwillingness to submit to the royal mandate incensed the monarch against him, and he was deposed from his see, and died in exile, 8th Dec. 1677, aged above 80. His works are a Ritual for his Diocese — Synodal Statutes, and Ordinances, &c.

PAVILLON, Stephen, a French poet, born at Paris 1652. He was advocate general in the parliament of Metz, but the laborious office was too difficult for his weak constitution, and he retired to literary ease. He was a member of both the academies, and received a pension from Lewis XIV. His poems which are after the manner of Voiture, and possess some merit, were published 1720, 2 vols. 12mo. He wrote also in prose, the Portrait of Pure Love, disinterested counsels, and other moral pieces, &c.

PAUL, Mark, or MARCO PAULO, a Venetian traveller. He penetrated 1272 as far as the capital of Cublai Chan, the sixth descendant of Genghis Chan, of which he published an interesting account. Some authors imagine that Cambalus which he mentions is the town of Pekin. It is remarkable that he makes no mention of the great wall of China.

PAUL, St. originally called SAUL, was a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, and educated among the Pharisees of Jerusalem under the care of Gamaliel. He imbibed among this sect a most violent hatred against the Christians, and when Stephen was stoned, he kept the raiment of his murderers, and assented to his death. He afterwards set out for Damascus with authority from the chief priests to imprison the Christians, but in the way a supernatural vision, and a voice from heaven, converted his rancor into zeal for the persecuted faith, and he entered into the city the adherent, and not the foe of the Christian name. From Damascus he went into Arabia, Jerusalem, Tarsus, Cæsarea, and Antioch, and assumed the name of Paul. He preached the gospel with such eloquence and efficacy that he was called the apostle of the Gentiles. When accused by the Jews before Felix, whom in his spirited address he made to tremble, he appealed to the emperor and was conveyed to Rome; but after two years of captivity he was liberated, without any punishment, from his persecutors. He afterwards travelled over various parts of the world, where he founded churches, and increased the number of the saints. He was at last imprisoned at Rome, and put to death by Nero the emperor, 29th June, 66. A magnificent church, still in existence, was built on the spot where his remains were deposited. His 14 epistles are nervous and persuasive. Among his converts were the learned Dionysius the Areopagite, and according to some, king Agrippa and many others.

PAUL I. pope after his brother Stephen II. 757, died 10 years after, respected for his wisdom and learning.

PAUL II. Peter Barbo, a Venetian noble, elected pope after Pius II. 1464. He permitted the cardinals to wear a purple habit, and the red cap of silk, and the mitre which hitherto had distinguished the sovereign pontiff. He died 26th July, 1471, aged 54.

PAUL III. Alexander Farnese, bishop of Ostia, was elected pope 1534, after Clement VII. In his time began the famous council of Trent, whose first sitting was in 1545. He made a treaty with the Venetians and the emperor against the Turks, and he established the inquisition, and approved of the institution of the jesuits, but condemned the interim of Charles V. and pursued measures of severity against the defection of Henry VIII. He was a pontiff of high character, respectable in private life, and at all times anxious to procure concord among the Christian princes. He died 10th Nov. 1549, aged 82.

PAUL IV. John Peter Caraffa, succeeded Marcellus II. on the papal throne 1555, aged near 80. He behaved with great haughtiness on his elevation; he not only issued a bull against all heretics, but he threatened with his severest displeasure Charles V. because he did not oppose sufficiently vigorous measures against the protestants; and when Elizabeth by her ambassador announced to him her accession, he complained that she had ascended the throne, especially as she was illegitimate, without the concurrence of the holy see, on which all the crowns of Europe were dependent. His reign tended little to advance the true interests of Rome, so that he died unlamented, 18th Aug. 1559. He wrote treatises de Symbolis — de Emendanda Ecclesiâ, &c.

PAUL V. Camillus Borghese, a native of Rome, made a cardinal by Clement VIII. and raised to the popedom after Leo XI. 1605. He was engaged in a dispute with the Venetians, and as he had humbled the Genoese, he expected the same success with this powerful republic; but though he excommunicated the doge and the senate, he found his decrees little regarded. He had recourse to arms, but without intimidating the Venetians, till at last by the friendly interference of Henry IV. of France, a reconciliation was effected. Paul deserved the gratitude of the Romans for the various embellishments which he introduced, the collections of paintings, sculpture, &c. which he made, and the erection of public fountains and aqueducts. Greater as a priest than as a politician, Paul acquired the esteem of the learned whom he patronized. He died 28th Jan. 1621, aged 69.

PAUL, Petrovitch, emperor of Russia, son of the great Catherine and Peter III. was born 1st Oct. 1754. He married 1774 the daughter of the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, who died two years after, and for his second wife he took a princess of Wirtemberg, niece to the king of Prussia. He began to travel in Europe in 1780, and during 14 months visited Poland, Austria, Italy, France, and Holland, and every where displayed an amiable character, and a strong desire of understanding the various establishments which guide the destinies of Europe. On the death of his mother in 1796, he ascended the throne, and then began to take an active part in the general confederacy of Europe, against the tyrannical and ambitious conduct of France. He sent the brave Suwarrow into Italy, where victory followed his steps, and he attacked the northern frontiers of France, in conjunction with the English; but all at once, while the world expected still higher exertions in the cause of the allies, the fickle monarch was reconciled to his enemies. To show more strongly his change of sentiments, he seized the property of the English, and with unparalleled cruelty, banished their unhappy sailors to Siberia, while his own subjects experienced all the misfortunes of distracted councils and of capricious measures. This extravagance was stopped by the sudden death of the unfortunate Paul, who was assassinated in April, 1801, by some of his discontented nobles. The cause of his extraordinary change of politics has been ascribed to the influence of a beautiful French mistress, who was sent by the cabinet of Paris to second the labors of diplomatic intrigue, by the prostitution of her charms to the capricious monarch.

PAUL, a celebrated heresiarch of Samosata, a city on the Euphrates. He was raised to the see of Antioch in 260, and soon after he was invited to the court of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, who favored the Jewish religion, but could not comprehend the mysteries of christianity. Paul represented to the queen that the Trinity consisted not of three real persons, but only three attributes; and that the Saviour had appeared on earth not as a god, but as a man endowed with a superior portion of wisdom. This doctrine, which at first was propagated to convert Zenobia, was more fully defended by Paul, and therefore drew upon him the censures of the church. He was deposed from his dignity by a synod at Antioch, 270, and excommunicated. His followers, who were called Paulinists, did not encrease, and few of them remained at the end of the fifth century.

PAUL, of Tyre, a rhetorician, who went as ambassador from his country to Adrian, 120, and obtained the title of metropolitan to his native city.

PAUL, the silentary, a Greek writer, so called from the office which he held in the palace of the emperor Justinian. He wrote in Greek verse a curious History of the Church of St. Sophia, besides epigrams, — a poem on the Pythic Baths, &c.

PAUL, of Sancta Maria, a learned Jew of Burgos, who, it is said, was converted to christianity by reading a work of St. Thomas Aquinas. After the death of his wife he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and by his merits obtained places of honor and trust. He was preceptor to John II. king of Castille, and was afterwards successively archdeacon of Trevigno, bishop of Carthagenia, and then of Burgos, where he died 29th Aug. 1445, aged 82. Some authors report that he was patriarch of Aquileia. He was a learned prelate, and wrote Scrutinium Scripturarum, fol. 1474 — Additions to Nicholas de Lyra's works, &c. His three sons were baptized at the same time with him, when he became a christian convert, and they all distinguished themselves by their merit. The eldest, Alphonso, bishop of Burgos, wrote an Abridgment of Spanish History; the second, Gonsalvo, died bishop of Placentia, and the third, Alvares, published an History of John II. king of Castille.

PAUL, deacon of Aquileia, was secretary to Didier, the last king of Lombardy. He was afterwards in the service of Charlemagne; but when accused by his enemies, of conspiring against the life of his protector, he was banished to the island of Tremiti, in the Adriatic. He left his exile for the court of the duke of Benevento, after whose death he retired to a monastery. He died 801. He is author of an History of the Lombards, in 6 books, to the death of Luitprand 744 — History of the bishops of Metz, and he contributed much to the composition of the Historia Miscellanea, in continuation of the work of Eutropius.

PAUL, an ecclesiastic of Merida, in Estramadura, in the seventh century, author of an History of the Spanish Fathers, edited at Antwerp, 1635, 4to.

PAUL, a physician of Ægina, in the seventh century, author of a treatise de Re Medicâ, an Epitome of Galen's works, and other Greek works.

PAULA, St. a Roman lady of noble birth, and of great learning. She embraced christianity, and when become a widow, she retired to Bethlehem, where she built a monastery, and displayed in the sight of her female associates, all the virtues and mortifications of ascetic life. St. Jerome was the director of her charitable institutions, and he also taught her to understand the Hebrew scriptures. She died 407, aged 60. It is said that she was descended from the illustrious families of the Gracchi and Scipios.

PAULET, William, marquis of Winchester, son of sir John Paulet, of Somersetshire, was one of the courtiers of Henry VIII. and of his three successors. He had the art during those times, when religious opinions and political sentiments were so liable to persecution, to retain his places, and when asked how he had so securely weathered the storm, he replied, by being a willow, and not an oak. He died 1572, aged 97, and transmitted his honors and fortunes to his family, 103 of whom he saw descended from his loins.

PAULI, Simon, author of treatises on Malignant Fevers — against Tobacco and Tea — Flora Danica, 4to. and other medical works, was professor of medicine at Copenhagen, and physician to Christian V. who rewarded his services by making him bishop of Arrhus. He died 1680, aged 77.

PAULIAN, Aimé Henry, a jesuit, born at Nîmes, 1722. He was a learned man, and wrote some valuable works, the best known of which are Dictionnaire de Physique, 5 vols. 8vo. — Système General de Philosophie, 4 vols. 12mo. — Dictionnaire Philosopho-Theologique, 4to. &c. He died at the advanced age of 80.

PAULINUS, St. a native of Bourdeaux, whom his learning and virtues recommended to the highest offices of the state. He was made consul in 378, and soon after married Therasia, a Spanish lady of great opulence and high birth. He settled in Spain, and by the persuasion of his wife became a convert to christianity, and he applied his large resources to charitable uses, and the most benevolent munificence. To increase the labors of his christian calling he took orders, 393, and soon after coming to Italy, was chosen bishop of Nola, where he died 431, aged 74. Some authors ascribe to him the invention of church bells. Some of his Latin poems, letters, and other works are extant. There was another who was bishop of Treves, and the defender of Athanasius. He died an exile in Phrygia, 359. Another was bishop of Aquileia, and distinguished himself at the council of Frankfort, in 794. He was author of a Treatise on the Trinity — a book of salutary instructions, &c. and died 804.

PAULMIER DE GRENTMESNIL, Julien de, a French physician, educated under Fernel. He was physician to Charles IX. whom he succeeded to restore to health. He was afterwards in the service of the duke of Anjou, and died at Caen, 1588. He wrote treatises de Viro & Pomaceo — De Lue Venerea — De Morbis Contagiosis, &c. His son James was also a physician, but educated in the protestant faith. He wrote Observationes in Optimos Auctores Græcos, 4to. — a Latin Description of Ancient Greece, 4to. — poems in Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish, not very valuable. He died at Caen, 1st Oct. 1670, aged 83.

PAULMY, Marck Anthony René de Voyer, marquis de, son of the marquis of Argenfon, is known for his valuable library, which he sold to the count of Artois, brother to Lewis XVI. He was also distinguished as a man of letters, and was honored with a seat in the French academy, and raised to the dignity of minister of state. He published Melanges d'une grande Bibliothèque, 69 vols. 8vo. and also essays in the style of Montaigne, 9 vols. 8vo. 1778. He died 1787, aged 65.

PAULZE, N. a native of Montbriffon, made one of the farmers general of France by the influence of his relation Terray. He was a man of great intelligence and erudition, and he formed a company for the improvement of Guyenne, which was not however fully adopted. He was imprisoned during the revolution, and guillotined, 1794. The commercial details on the Indies in Raynal's History, are attributed to his pen.

PAUSANIAS, governor of the kingdom of Sparta, during his nephew's minority, was brave in war, and intriguing in the cabinet. After serving against the Persians, he grew discontented with his country, and made a secret treaty with the enemy. The measure was discovered, and to escape punishment he took refuge in a temple, where, on account of his perfidy, his mother first brought a stone to ensure his confinement. He was starved to death, B. C. 474.

PAUSANIAS, a celebrated Greek orator and historian, who settled at Rome in the second century. Of his Account of Greece, the best edition is that of Kuhnus, 1696, folio.

PAUSIAS, a painter of Sicyon, about 352 B. C. He first applied colors to wood and ivory, by the power of fire, called encaustic painting. His pictures were purchased by Scæurus, and preserved at Rome.

PAUTRE, Anthony le, an architect of Paris, whose abilities were patronized by Lewis XIV. He built the church of the nuns of the Port Royal at Paris, and contributed by other works to the embellishment of Paris. He was made member of the academy of sculpture, 1671, and died a few years after. His works appeared at Paris, 1652, in folio, with 60 engravings. One of his relations, John, was also a native of Paris, and eminent as a designer and engraver, especially in architectural ornaments. He was member of the academy of painting and sculpture, and died 2d Feb. 1682, aged 65. His works appeared in 3 vols. folio, adorned with above 1000 plates. His son Peter, who was born at Paris, 4th March, 1659, directed his attention to sculpture, and was made director of the academy of St. Luke. His Æneas and Anchises, which adorn the Thuilleries, and his Lucretia stabbing herself in the presence of her husband, are very valuable specimens of his great genius. He died at Paris, 22d Jan. 1744.

PAUW, N. de, a German ecclesiastic, uncle to the famous Anacharis Cloutz. Though bold and singular in his opinions, he was respected for his learning and virtues, and was much noticed by Frederic the Great, of Prussia. He wrote Enquiries on the Greeks, the Americans, the Chinese, and Egyptians, 7 vols. 8vo. a work full of curious details, bold conjectures, and energetic description, mixed with occasional weakness of thought and paradoxical sentiments. He died at Xanten, near Aix la Chapelle, in the summer of 1799.

PAUW, Cornelius, a native of Utrecht, eminent for his learning. He published some valuable editions of several Greek authors, especially of Anacreon, 1732, 4to. Calaber, Æschylus, &c.

PAYNE, Nevil, a dramatic author in the reign of Charles II. He wrote the Fatal Jealousy — the Siege of Constantinople, tragedies — the Morning Rambles, or Town Humors, a comedy, 1675.

PAYNE, Roger, an English book-binder, who ended a life of labor, poverty, and intemperance, in St. Martin's lane, 1797, and was buried at the expence of Mr. Payne the bookseller, his friend, though no relation. His workmanship was in a very superior style, and consequently procured him high prices, so that for the binding of an Æschylus for lord Spencer, it is said, that he received not less than 15 guineas. He was very singular in his conduct; he made himself all his tools, and never would work before any person, but always in some dark cellar, and when his necessities called upon him for exertion.

PAYS, René le, a French poet, born at Nantes, 1636. He was comptroller of the imposts of Dauphiné and Provence, and rendered himself known at court, and the favorite of the ladies, by his miscellanies, called "Amitiés, Amours, & Amourettes," published 1685. He died 30th April, 1690. He wrote besides Zelotide, a romance, some colloquies, sonnets, &c.

PAZZI, James, a banker of Florence, of illustrious family. He headed the faction which opposed the Medicis, and he conspired with Salviati, archbishop of Pisa, and with cardinal Riario, to cut off the two brothers, Julian and Laurent, and to seize upon the sovereign power. The elevation of the host, 26th April, 1478, was the signal for this murderous action, and at the moment of this solemn ceremony, Julian was stabbed to the heart by a brother of Pazzi; but Laurent escaped with a slight wound. The popularity of the Medicis, and the atrocity of the deed soon armed the people in their favor, and the conspirators were seized, and punished with death, and among them Pazzi suffered. The house of the Pazzis was afterwards reconciled to the Medicis, and became allied to them by marriage marriage. One of their descendants, Cosmo, was archbishop of Florence, 1508, and would have risen to the dignity of cardinal, if he had not died before the elevation of his uncle Leo X. to the chair of St. Peter. He translated Maximus Tyrius into Latin. His brother Alexander wrote some tragedies, and translated the Poetics of Aristotle.

PEACOCK, Reginald, an Englishman, made by the interest of his friend Humphry, duke of Gloucester, bishop of St. Asaph, and afterwards of Chichester, from which he was banished in disgrace, for opposing the papal authority, and denying transubstantiation. He was obliged to make a public recantation, and then retired to an abbey, where he died 1486. His books were burnt publicly, as profane and heretical.

PEAPS, William, a dramatic writer, educated at Eton, where, it is said, he wrote the only piece mentioned of his composition, Love in its Extacy, or the Large Prerogative, 1649, in 4to.

PEARCE, Zachary, an English prelate, son of a distiller in Holborn, born 1690. He was educated at Westminster school and Trinity college, Cambridge, and distinguished himself at the university by some light compositions, and by some entertaining papers in the Guardian and the Spectator. He was patronized by lord Parker, earl of Macclesfield, to whom he dedicated his edition of Longinus, and from whom he obtained some preferment. He received in 1724, the degree of D. D. from Lambeth; but though noticed after the disgrace of his friend lord Macclesfield, by lord Hardwicke, by Potter, Pulteney, Newton, and even the queen, he was not raised to any ecclesiastical dignity till 1739, when he was made dean of Winchester. In 1748 he was made bishop of Bangor, and in 1756, bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster. These last honors were conferred unsolicited, and the bishop, who longed for the privacy of retired life, was anxious to resign; but as some of the ministry objected to the person thought of for his successor, he was permitted to divest himself only of the deanery of Westminster, in favor of Dr. Thomas. He died June, 1774. Dr. Pearce was eminent as well for his philological learning, as his classical knowledge. He wrote a Vindication of the Miracles against the attacks of Woolston, besides an Account of Trinity college, Cambridge — Letters against Conyers Middleton, &c. — a Review of Milton's Text — an Essay on the Origin of Temples — sermons, &c. After his death appeared his Commentary on the Four Evangelists, and the Acts, 2 vols. 4to. — and 4 vols. of sermons, 8vo.

PEARSON, John, an English prelate, born 12th Feb. 1612, at Snoring, Norfolk, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. In 1639 he resigned his fellowship at King's, and afterwards became chaplain to lord keeper Finch, and to lord Goring, and obtained the living of Torrington, Suffolk, and of St. Clement's, Eastcheap, London. In 1661 he became Margaret professor at Cambridge; in 1662 was made master of Trinity college, and in 1673 succeeded Dr. Wilkins in the see of Chester. He died at Chester, 16th July, 1686. He is particularly known for his valuable "Exposition of the Creed," which appeared 1659, in 4to. and has often been republished. He wrote besides

"Vindiciæ Ignatii," against Daille — Annales Cypriani, &c. and some posthumous works.

PECHANTRE, Nicolas de, a French poet, born at Toulouse, 1638. He obtained three times the laurel at the academy of Floral games, and acquired great popularity by his tragedy of Geta, acted at Paris, 1681. He wrote besides the tragedies of the Sacrifice of Abraham — Joseph sold by his Brethren — the Death of Nero — Jugurtha, &c. He died at Paris, 1709.

PECHLIN, John Nicholas, a native of Leyden, who studied medicine and became professor of it at Kiel. He was afterwards physician to the duke of Holstein Gottorp, and preceptor to the prince, his son. He wrote treatises De Purgantium Medicament. Facultatibus — De Vulneribus Sclopetorum — De Aeris & Alimenti Defectu & Vita sub Aquis — De Habitu & Colore Æthiopum — Observationum Physico-Medicarum — a poetical Panegyric on Tea, in Latin, &c. He died at Stockholm, 1706, aged 39.

PECHMEJA, John de, professor of eloquence in the college of La Fleche, was born at Villa Franca, in Rouergue, and died April 1785, aged 44. His Eulogium on Colbert merited and received the approbation of the French academy in 1773. His best work is his Telephus, in 12 books, in which he draws a beautiful description of true friendship, of which he gave, with his friend Du Breuil, so interesting an example, that the two friends were called the Pylades and the Orestes of France.

PECK, Francis, an eminent antiquary, born May 4th, 1692, at Stamford, Lincolnshire. He was educated at Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and soon after obtained the living of Godeby, near Melton, Leicestershire, where he died 13th Aug. 1743. He published 1727, in folio, "the Antiquarian Annals of Stamford," &c. inscribed to the duke of Rutland — Memoirs of Cromwell and of Milton, 2 vols. 4to. He published besides "Desiderata Curiosa," 2 vols. containing curious pieces of English history, &c. and it is said, that before his death he had in contemplation no less than nine different works on historical and antiquarian subjects.

PECKWELL, Henry, an English divine, rector of Bloxham, Lincolnshire, and a popular Calvinistic preacher. He chiefly resided in London, where he studied physic and anatomy for the benefit of poor persons of his persuasion. He died of a mortification, caused by a wound in the dissection of a young woman who had died of a putrid fever, 1787, aged 40. He published some sermons, &c.

PECQUET, John, a physician, born at Dieppe. He is distinguished for discovering the receptacle of the chyle, which he perceived to be conveyed by the lacteal vessels to the heart, and thence to the subclavian vein. This ingenious author died at Paris, Feb. 1674. He published his Discoveries in Anatomy, 4to. 1654 — De Thoracis Lacteis, 1661.

PECQUET, Anthony, a French writer, grand master of the water works, and the forests of Rouen. He presided also over the military school there. He wrote Analysis of the Spirit of Laws and of Political Maxims, 3 vols. — the Forest Laws of France, 2 vols. — Thoughts on Man, besides French translations of Guarini's ini's Pastor Fido, and other Italian works. He died 1762, aged 58.

PEELE, George, a native of Devonshire, in the reign of Elizabeth, entered at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and thence was elected student of Christ-church, where he took his master's degree 1579. From Oxford he went to London, where he became the city poet, and had the management of the pageants. He died before 1598. He is mentioned by Wood as no inconsiderable poet, whose tragedies and comedies were acted at Oxford with great applause. His pastorals were also in high esteem. Only five of his plays are known, Edward I. — King David and fair Bethsabe — the Turkish Mahomet and Hyren — the Old Wives' Tale, &c.

PEIRESC, Nicolas Claude Fabri, descended from a noble family at Pisa, was born 1580, and studied at Avignon, Aix, and Tournon, under the care of the jesuits. He devoted himself with uncommon assiduity to mathematics, and particularly to antiquities, though he studied the law to please an uncle from whom he expected some considerable property. In 1599 he began to travel in Italy, and after visiting Padua, Venice, Naples, Rome, and all the curiosities of that celebrated country, during a residence of three years, he returned to France, loaded with valuable collections of antiquities, and accompanied by the friendly wishes of men of learning and science. In 1604 he took his degree of doctor of laws at Aix, and succeeded his uncle, who fondly resigned to him his senatorial dignity. In 1606 he visited England, where he was honored with the friendship and attentions of Camden, Cotton, Saville, and other men of celebrity, and even of James I. himself, and then returned through Antwerp, Brussels, and Paris, to his residence at Aix. Though a layman he was made by Lewis XIII. abbot of Santa Maria Aquitrensis. He died at Aix, 24th June 1637, aged 57, of a retention of urine; and as he was a member of the Humorists' academy at Rome, his eulogium was recited by Bouchier, and verses in his praise were publicly repeated, which were afterwards printed in a collection of funeral elegies, in 40 different languages, called Panglossia. This learned man, so deservedly esteemed by Casaubon, by de Thou, by Grotius, by J. Scaliger, and other eminent men, was a most amiable and benevolent character, and not improperly compared by one of his biographers to the Roman Atticus. He wrote Historia Provinciæ Gallicæ Narbonensis — Nobilium ejusdem Provinciæ Familiarum Origines — Commentarii Rerum omnium Memoriam dignarum suâ Ætate gestarum — Liber de Ludicris Naturæ Operibus — Mathematica & Astronomica Varia — Nummi Gallici, Saxonici, Britannici, &c. — Lingux Orientales, Hebræa, &c. — Observationes in Varios Auctores, and other learned works. His library was very choice and valuable, and from it his friends were at liberty to take whatever pleased their taste or fancy.

PELAGIUS I. a native of Rome, elected pope 555. He was a moderate and pious pontiff, but labored ardently in reforming the manners of his clergy, and in promoting the true spirit of christianity. When Rome was besieged by the Goths under Totila, and at last plundered, he softened the calamities of war among his subjects, by his interference with the enemy's general, who respected his virtues. He died 2d March 560. He wrote sixteen epistles, still preserved.

PELAGIUS II. a Roman, who succeeded on the papal throne after Benedict I. 578. He maintained with spirit the rights of the church, and opposed the pretensions of John, patriarch of Constantinople, who had assumed the title of Œcumenical bishop. He died 12th Feb. 590, of a pestilential disorder, which proved very fatal at that time, and was so violent in its effects, that the patients expired suddenly, either in sneezing or in gaping, whence arose, as is supposed, the custom still observed of saying, God bless you! to persons who sneeze, and of making the sign of the cross on the mouth of those who gape.

PELAGIUS, an illustrious Spaniard, related to the king of the Visigoths. He was driven from his possessions by the Moors, but after an obscure exile of three years, he attacked his enemies, and defeated them in 716, and assumed the title of king of Leon and the Asturias. He died 737, universally respected for valor, piety, and prudence.

PELAGIUS, a celebrated heresiarch in the fifth century. He was a native of Wales, and as is supposed, a monk of Bangor, and he went to Rome, where he dropped his name of Morgan for the more classical Greek name of Pelagius. In his zeal to make converts, and to rouse those who pleaded temptations and human infirmities for their lukewarm conduct in the cause of practical religion, he became the supporter of new opinions, and rejected the doctrine of original sin, while he maintained free will in its fullest extent, and asserted that man may be saved by his own merits and virtuous exertions. His opinions, which he published in his book against St. Jerome, drew upon him the censures and condemnation of the synod of Carthage, and of several other councils. Pelagius left Rome with Celestius, the ablest of his followers, and retired to Jerusalem, but it is unknown where and when he died. He wrote besides letters, Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, &c. The History of the Pelagian schism has been written in a very able manner by cardinal Noris, and also by Patouillet, 12mo. 1751.

PELETIER, Claude de, counsellor of the Chatelet, and of the parliament, president of the chamber of requests, provost of merchants, and builder of the quay which still bears his name at Paris, was born in that city, 1630. He was educated for the law, and was the intimate friend of Boileau, Bignon, Lamoignon, and other great men, and he succeeded in 1683 the famous Colbert, as comptroller-general of the finances. After six years' laborious application, he resigned this office, and exchanged the court for a life of retirement and devotion. He died Aug. 1711, aged 81. Though much engaged in public affairs, he however found time to publish Extracts and Collections from the Fathers, &c. — Comes Senectutis — Comes Rusticus — Pithou's Comes Theologus & Comes Juridicus cus — the Body of the Canon Law, &c. His brother Michael was counsellor of state, and member of the academy of inscriptions, to whose memoirs he contributed. He resigned his offices at the age of 80, and retired to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died 1725.

PELL, John, an English mathematician, born at Southwyke, Suffex, 1st March, 1610. He was educated at Stenning school, and at 13 entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he applied himself to mathematics with unusual assiduity. After taking his master's degree, he was incorporated at Oxford in 1631, and by his various publications he acquired so much reputation that he was invited in 1639 to fill up a professor's chair at Amsterdam, to which he succeeded 1643. In 1646 he settled at Breda as professor of philosophy and mathematics at the request of the prince of Orange, and in 1652 returned to his native country. In 1654 he was sent by Cromwell as English resident to the protestant cantons of Switzerland, and returned a little while before the protector's death. In 1661 he was ordained by the bishop of Lincoln, and obtained from the crown the rectory of Fobbing in Essex, to which the bishop of London afterwards added the rectory of Lavingdon in that county. Though respectable as a scholar, and a man of science, Dr. Pell was unfortunately very inattentive to the state of his domestic affairs, and consequently became poor in his old age, and was even confined in the king's bench as a debtor. He died Dec. 12th, 1685, and was interred by the charity of Busby, master of Westminster school, and Sharp, rector of St. Giles'. He had by his wife four sons and four daughters. He published Controversia cum Longomontano de Verâ Circuli Mensurâ, 4to. — an Idea of Mathematics, 12mo. — Table of 10,000 Square Numbers, folio. — Demonstration of the second and tenth book of Euclid — Description of the Use of the Quadrant — Letter on Logarithms — Astronomical History of the Heavenly Motions and Appearances — Eclipticus Prognostica, &c. and he left various MSS. which by means of Dr. Birch, were obtained for the collection of the Royal society.

PELLEGRIN, Simon Joseph, a French ecclesiastic, born at Marseilles, 1663. He was of the society of the Servites, and obtained in 1704 the prize of the French academy, for his poetical "Epistle to the King on the glorious Success of his Arms." This made him known at court, and by means of madame de Maintenon, he was permitted to remove to the ecclesiastical order of Clugny; but as he kept a shop for the sale of poetical pieces, amorous odes and ballads, and even wrote for the stage, he drew upon himself the animadversion of cardinal de Noailles, who insisted upon his relinquishing either his theatrical employments, or the privilege of officiating at the mass. He chose the latter, and subsisted afterwards by his pen. He died 5th Sept. 1745, aged 82. His works consist of dramas from the Old and New Testament — the Psalms of David — besides a translation of Horace, 2 vols. with notes, &c.

PELLEGRINI, Antonio, a native of Padua, celebrated as an historical painter. He visited England through the friendship of the duke of Manchester, and several specimens of his excellent execution are preserved in this country. He died 1741, aged 67.

PELLEGRINO, Tibaldi, or PELLEGRIN of Bologna, where he was born 1522, was eminent as an architect and painter. He displayed his abilities at Rome and Pavia, and also at Milan, where he built the cathedral of St. Ambrose, and afterwards he was invited to Spain, to direct the paintings and architecture of the Escorial. His services were liberally rewarded by Philip II. who made him a marquis, and sent him back loaded with presents. He died at Milan 1592, aged 70.

PELLEGRINO of Modena, a painter, born 1511, was bred under Raphael, and employed in adorning the Vatican. He died of some wounds received in relieving his son, who had unfortunately committed a murder in the streets of Modena.

PELLERIN, Joseph, commissary-general and chief clerk of the French marine, is famous for his fine and valuable collection of medals, which was purchased by the king in 1776. He published his interesting Observations on Medals, in 9 vols. 4to. with plates, a work of great beauty. He died Aug. 1782, aged 99.

PELLETIER, John le, a native of Rouen, who studied painting, which he afterwards abandoned for literature. Blessed with strong powers of mind, he made himself completely acquainted with the learned languages, Italian, Spanish, mathematics, chemistry, astronomy, &c. without the assistance of a master; and in the latter part of life, he devoted himself to religious studies. He died 1711, aged 78. He wrote a Dissertation on Noah's Ark — on St. Benedict's hermitage — on the Journal of Trevoux — the Life of Sixtus V. by Leti, translated — Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, or Queen Elizabeth's History translated, &c.

PELLETIER, Gaspard, physician and counsellor of Middleburg in Zealand, acquired reputation in his profession, and died in his native town, 1659. He is author of Plantarum tum Patriarum, tum Exoticarum in Wallachia, Zealand, nascentium Synonyma, 8vo. 1610.

PELLETIER, Bertrand, a native of Bayonne, distinguished for his knowledge of chemistry and pharmacy. He settled at Paris as an apothecary, and deserved to be admitted member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the Institute. He wrote various dissertations in the memoirs of the French academies, and had a share in the Journal of Natural History, and wrote besides, Observations on Arsenic. He died 1797, aged 36.

PELLETIER, James, a French physician, born at Mans, became principal of the colleges of Bayeux and Mans at Paris, where he died 1582, aged 65. He published Latin Commentaries on Euclid — Description of Savoy — treatise on the Plague — Curious Dialogue on Orthography — Poetic works — a French Art of Poetry, and other works.

PELLICAN, Conrad, a native of Rufac in Alsace, who became a cordelier in 1494, and afterwards presided over the convent of Basle. He embraced the tenets of Luther, and abandoning the religious habit, in 1526, came to Zurich, where he settled and taught Hebrew, and married. He died 1556, aged 78. He was the friend of Erasmus, and published some controversial works, and commentaries illustrative of scripture, in 7 vols. folio, much commended by Richard Simon.

PELLISON-FONTANIER, Paul, a French writer, born of an ancient family at Beziers, 1624. He studied the law, which he afterwards abandoned for belles lettres. He settled at Paris, where he became the friend and correspondent of madame Scuderi, and in 1662 was made secretary to the king, and admitted into the French academy, in consequence of his excellent "History" of that society. He was much patronized by Fouquet, superintendent of the finances; but upon the fall of that minister, he shared his disgrace, and was sent for four years to the Bastille. When set at liberty 1666, he was honored with the attention of the learned and the great, and his merits as well as his innocence soon restored him to the favor of Lewis XIV. whom he accompanied in his expedition against the United States, of which he wrote an interesting account. In 1670 he renounced the protestant religion, and embraced the ecclesiastical life, and thus obtained preferment. He died at Versailles, 7th Feb. 1693. His works are very respectable, consisting of the History of Lewis XIV. — the Life of Anne of Austria — History of the Conquest of Franche Comté — poems — Historical Letters — Reflections on Religious Differences — treatise on the Eucharist — Pleadings in favor of his friend Fouquet, &c.

PELLOUTIER, Simon, a protestant divine, descended from a Lyonesse family, but born at Leipsic. He was member of the Berlin academy, and became there an active pastor, and distinguished himself also as an able writer. His History of the Celts, particularly of the Gauls and Germans, is a valuable work, edited in 2 vols. 4to. and 8 in 12mo. He died 1757, aged 63.

PELOPIDAS, a celebrated Theban, the friend of Epaminondas. Devoted to the interest of his fellow citizens, Pelopidas, with the assistance of his friend, raised Thebes from a dependent state to glory and victory. He was at last slain in battle, B. C. 364.

PEMBERTON, Henry, an English physician of eminence. His treatise on Chemistry, and his View of sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy, in 4to. display his abilities as a man of science and erudition, in a very favorable view. He was fellow of the Royal society, and died in an advanced old age, 1771.

PEMBLE, William, an English ecclesiastic, tutor and divinity reader at Magdalen hall, Oxford. His abilities as a scholar and a divine, were of a superior rank, but unfortunately he did not live long to display them. His works appeared in 1 vol. folio. He died 1623, aged 32.

PEMBROKE, Thomas, an English painter, the pupil and imitator of Larroon. He painted much for the earl of Bath, and excelled chiefly in historical pieces and portraits. He died at London 1730, aged 28.

PENINGTON, Isaac, son of a lord mayor of London, was born 1617. He was well educated, and much given to religious meditation; and by the conversation and preaching of George Fox, he became a zealous and active quaker. Not only as a writer, but as a travelling minister, he spread the tenets which he had embraced, and at last drew the attention of the magistrates so severely upon his conduct, that he was imprisoned not less than six times in the reign of Charles II. After suffering much undeserved persecution, this man, who was of inoffensive manners, and of a meek and quiet spirit, died at Goodnestone court, Suffex, 1679. His publications were numerous, and all in favor of the quakers. They are mostly dated from Aylesbury, where he chiefly lived, and were collected into one folio volume, 1681, and afterwards reprinted in 2 vols. 4to. and 4 in 8vo. The persecution exercised against the son arose, it is said by some, from the conduct of Isaac Penington, the father, who was an alderman, violent against Charles I. and who headed some of the riots against the court. He sat also as one of the king's judges, and at the restoration, was tried and condemned, but respited, and kept a prisoner in the Tower, where he died.

PENN, William, a native of Bristol, distinguished in the British navy as an able admiral. He was commander of the fleet in the reduction of Jamaica in 1655 by Venables, but he lost for a time the good opinion of the protector who confined him in the Tower for absenting himself from the American station without leave. He was member for Weymouth, and after the restoration he obtained a high command under the duke of York, and greatly contributed to the defeat of the Dutch fleet 1664. He was knighted by Charles II. for his services, and died at his house, Wanstead, Essex, 1670, aged 49.

PENN, William, a celebrated quaker, son of the above, was born in London 1644. From a private school at Chigwell, Essex, he entered in 1660 as a gentleman commoner at Christ-church, Oxford; but as he withdrew from the national forms of worship with other students, who like himself had listened to the preaching of Thomas Loe, a quaker of eminence, he was fined for non-conformity, and the next year, as he pertinaciously adhered to his opinions he was expelled from the college. This disgrace did not promote his comfort, his father considered his singularly sober and serious conduct as tending to impede his elevation to the favors of the licentious court, and therefore after being, as he says, whipped and beaten he was turned out of doors 1662. His father, however, sent him to France, and on his return he entered at Lincoln's inn as a law student. In 1666 he was sent to manage an estate in Ireland, and during his residence there he renewed his acquaintance with Loe, and showed such partiality to the quakers, that he was in those days of persecution, taken up at a meeting at Cork, and imprisoned by the mayor, who at last restored him to liberty at the request of lord Orrery. His return to England produced a violent altercation with his father, who wished him to abandon those singular habits so offenfive to decorum and established forms, and when he refused to appear uncovered before him and before the king, he a second time dismissed him from his protection and favor. In 1668, he first appeared as a preacher and as an author among the quakers, and in consequence of some controversial dispute he was sent to the Tower, where he remained in confinement for seven months. The passing of the conventicle act soon after again sent him to prison in Newgate, from which he was released by the interest of his father, who about this time was reconciled to him, and left him on his decease some time after a valuable estate of about 1500*l.* per ann. In 1672, he married Gulielma Maria Springett, a lady of principles similar to his own, and then fixed his residence at Rickmanfworth, where he employed himself zealously in promoting the cause of the Friends by his preaching, as well as by his writings. In 1677, he went with George Fox, and Robert Barclay to the continent on a religious excursion; and after visiting Amsterdam, and the other chief towns of Holland, they proceeded to the court of princess Elizabeth, the grand-daughter of James I. at Herwerden or Herford, where they were received with great kindness and hospitality. Soon after his return to England, Charles II. granted him in consideration of the services of his father, and for a debt due to him from the crown, a province of North America, called the New Netherlands, but now denominated Pennsylvania. In consequence of this acquisition he invited, under the Royal patent, settlers from all parts of the kingdom, and drew up in 24 articles the fundamental constitution of his new province, in which he held out a greater degree of religious liberty, than had at that time appeared in the christian world. A colony of people, chiefly of his persuasion, soon flocked to share his fortunes; the lands of the country were cleared and improved, and a town was built, which, on the principle of brotherly love, received the name of Philadelphia. In 1682, Penn visited the province and confirmed that good understanding which he had recommended with the natives, and after two years' residence, and with the satisfaction of witnessing and promoting the prosperity of the colonists, he returned to England. Soon after Charles died, and the acquaintance which Penn had with the new monarch, was honorably used to protect the people of his persuasion. At the revolution, however, he was suspected of treasonable correspondence with the exiled prince, and therefore exposed to molestation and persecution. In 1694, he lost his wife, but though severely afflicted by the event, he in about two years married again, and afterwards employed himself in travelling in Ireland, and over England in disseminating as a preacher the doctrines of his sect. He visited in 1699, his province with his wife and family, and returned to England in 1701. The suspicion with which he had been regarded under William's government, ceased at the accession of queen Anne, and the unyielding advocate of quakerism was permitted to live with greater freedom, and to fear persecution less. In 1710, he removed to Rushcomb near Twyford, Berks, where he spent the rest of life. Three repeated attacks of an apoplexy at last came to weaken his faculties and his constitution, and after nearly losing all recollection of his former friends and associates, he expired 30th July, 1718, and was buried at Jordan near Beaconsfield, Bucks. The character of Penn is truly amiable, benevolent and humane; his labors were exerted for the good of mankind, and with the strictest consistency of moral conduct and religious opinion, he endured persecution and malice with resignation, and guided by the approbation of a pure conscience, he showed himself indefatigable in the fulfilling of what he considered as the law of God, and the clear demonstration of the truth of the gospel. He published various works to advance and support his religious opinions, which were widely disseminated among the friends of his persuasion. The best known of these are No Cross, No Crown, to show that the denying of self and daily bearing the Cross of Christ is the only way to the kingdom of God—a Brief Account of the Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers—Primitive Christianity revived—Innocency with her Open Face, written in his vindication when confined in the Tower.

PENNANT, Thomas, an able naturalist and antiquary, born at Downing, his family estate in Flintshire, 1726, and educated at Wrexham school, and Oxford. He early distinguished himself by his application to natural philosophy, and after examining with judicious attention whatever was curious and valuable in England, he travelled on the continent, and was introduced to the wits and learned men of Europe, especially, Buffon, Voltaire, Linnæus, &c. Soon after his return to England he commenced author, and from the year 1750, when his British Zoology appeared, to the time of his death, he was usefully employed in elucidating the history, geography, and natural curiosities of his country. This truly amiable and virtuous man, whose learning was equalled by his goodness of heart, died at Downing 1793. His works are numerous and very respectable, the best known of which are Tour in Scotland, 1771, often edited—Tours in Wales, from Chester to London—Account of London—Literary Memoirs of himself—A Geographical Account of India, of which only the first volume appeared before his death, and other publications.

PENNI, John Francis, surnamed Il Fattore, as the prudent steward of his master Raphael's affairs, was a painter, born at Florence. His landscapes were much admired. He died 1528, aged 40. His brother Lucas was also eminent as a painter, and was patronized by Henry VIII. in England, and also by Francis I. at Fontainebleau.

PENNICUIK, Alexander, a Scotch physician, born at New Hall, Edinburghshire. His father who was of a very respectable and ancient family, had been surgeon under general Bannier in the Swedish army, and the son after travelling abroad settled in his native country, where he published a topographical account of Tweedale, some poems, descriptive of the manners of his countrymen, &c. He died 1722, aged 70. It is said that he communicated to Allen Ramsay the incidents which he hath clothed in such interesting beauty of language in his Gentle Shepherd.

PENNY, Thomas, an English naturalist of celebrity. He travelled over England and other various countries in search of botanical knowledge, and brought from from Majorca the curious plant called Hypericum Valerianicum, which Clusius in honor of him names Myrto Cistus Pennæi. He was very communicative of his information to his friends, especially to Lobel, Gerard, Gesner, and other botanists. He wrote letters on insects, inserted in Trew's collection. He was fellow of the college of physicians London.

PENRUDDOCK, John, son of sir John of Wiltshire, was zealous in the cause of his sovereign during the civil wars, and obtained the rank of colonel in the royal army. He was defeated by colonel Croke, who, after he had solemnly promised him pardon, caused him to beheaded in 1655. He was a man of great piety, and equally distinguished for the virtues of private life. The letters which passed between him and his wife after his condemnation, have been published by Steele, and display him in the most affecting language, in the amiable light of the good christian and the loyal subject.

PENRY, John, or APHENRY, a native of Brecknock, who studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, where he took his master's degree. In consequence of some offence he altered his religious principles, and became an anabaptist or Brownist, and not only preached, but wrote with great virulence against the episcopacy. His writings under the assumed name of Martin Mar-Prelate, gave great offence to the ministry; and in consequence of their seditious tendency he was arrested, and condemned and executed in 1593. His publications were numerous and all on divinity subjects.

PENS, George, a native of Nuremberg in the 16th century. He greatly distinguished himself as a painter and engraver.

PEPIN, the Short, son of Charles Martel, was the first monarch of the second French dynasty, and was elected at Soissons 752. Though small of stature he commanded the respect of his people, by the valor and heroic firmness of his conduct. He listened to the complaints of the pope Stephen II. and marched to attack Astolphus king of the Lombards who besieged Rome, and after he had routed him, he turned his victorious arms against the dukes of Saxony, and of Aquitaine, whom he defeated and made tributary to his power. He died at St. Denys, 23d Sep. 768, aged 54, and divided his possessions among his two sons, Charlemagne and Carloman.

PEPIN, the Fat, mayor of the palace, governed Austrasia, Neustria, and Burgundy, and maintained his power by firmness, vigor, and wisdom. He died 16th Dec. 714, after governing more as a master than as a minister 27 years.

PEPUSCH, John Christopher, an eminent musician, born at Berlin 1667. His abilities were so early displayed, that at the age of 14 he was employed at the Prussian court to teach music to the prince royal. In 1700, he came over to England, and was engaged at Drury lane, and acquired some celebrity and more fortune as a teacher. In 1713, he was admitted doctor of music at Oxford, and about 1725, he married Margarita de l'Epine, an Italian singer, of light character, but who had by her engagements on the stage amassed a fortune of 10,000 guineas. This woman, whose figure and complexion entitled her to the appellation of Hecate, by which her husband distinguished her, brought him one son, who died before his parents. Pepusch lost his wife in 1740, and died himself 20th July, 1752, aged 85, at the Charter-house, of which he was organist.

PEPYS, Samuel, a learned Englishman, known as the indefatigable secretary of the admiralty under the reign of Charles II. and his brother. He introduced order, regularity, and method in his department, and devoted much of his time to the collecting of memoirs of the navy, and other valuable documents, which have been preserved, together with his library, at Magdalen college, Cambridge. To his great exertions, his patriotic conduct, and his judicious arrangements the navy of Britain is much indebted for the superiority in naval affairs which it began to acquire after the fatal effects of the civil wars. This respectable man died 1703. He was related to the great earl of Sandwich, who fell gloriously while fighting against the Dutch fleet, and he was descended from an ancient family settled at Impington, Cambridgeshire.

PERANDA, Santa, a native of Venice, eminent as an historical painter. He imitated very successfully the style of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paul Veronese, and died 1738, aged 72.

PERAU, Gabriel Lewis Calabre, a French ecclesiastic of the Sorbonne, who continued d'Auvigné's lives of illustrious Frenchmen, and wrote the life of Jerome Bigno, besides an edition of Bossuet's works, &c. He died March, 1767, aged 67.

PERCIVAL, Thomas, an English physician, born and educated at Warrington, Lancashire. He studied medicine at Edinburgh and afterwards visited the continent and took his degrees at Leyden, 1765. He settled in 1767, at Manchester where he continued to practise with increasing reputation till his death in 1804. In private life Dr. Percival was a most amiable man, and to his zeal in the cause of philosophy Manchester is chiefly indebted for the establishment of its literary society, to whose memoirs he made many valuable contributions. He published besides moral and literary dissertations — medical ethics, &c. besides a Father's Instructions to his Children, &c. In his principles Dr. Percival was a dissenter, and it is remarkable that one of his sons, after receiving all the instruction which so able and so learned a father could communicate, became a convert to the principles of the church of England, and was made one of its most active ministers.

PERCY, William, the progenitor of the illustrious house of the Percys, was one of the courtiers of William the Conqueror, and attended him from Normandy on his invasion of England, and was rewarded for his services and attachment by the grant of lands in the counties of York and Lincoln. The Percys, distinguished by their zeal in the cause of their sovereigns, were raised in 1377, to the rank of earl of Northumberland by Richard II. The most celebrated of the Percys was Henry, surnamed Hotspur, who after being the firmest support of the throne of Henry IV. took up arms against him, and after various encounters was at last defeated at the battle of Shrewsbury in 1403. His father who had instigated him to hostilities made peace with the conqueror, but but again abandoned his allegiance, and at last three years after fell in the field of battle, fighting against the forces of his sovereign in Yorkshire.

PERDICCAS, one of Alexander's generals. He engaged after his master's death in the wars which were kindled among the ambitious generals, and was killed in Egypt, B. C. 322.

PEREFIXE, Hardouin de Beaumont de, author of an excellent History of Henry IV. of France, was patronised by Richelieu, made a doctor of the Sorbonne, preceptor to Lewis XIV. and in 1664, raised to the see of Paris. He died 1670, much respected. He wrote besides Institutio Principis, 1647.

PEREIRA-GOMEZ, George, author of Nova Veraque Medicina, Experimentis & Rationibus Evidentibus Comprobata, fol. 1558 — and a now scarce treatise, to prove the Brute Creation to be mere Machines, 1554, was a physician of eminence, born at Medina del Campo in Spain.

PEREIRA DE FIGUEIREDO, Anthony, a Portuguese divine, born at Macao, 14th Feb. 1725, died at Lisbon 14th Aug. 1797. In the dispute between the courts of Rome and Lisbon, he published various tracts to prove the independence of kings in ecclesiastical affairs, and received the applause of his countrymen for his learning, and spirited conduct. He wrote also a New Method of Latin Grammar, edited ten times — a Portuguese Translation of the Bible, 23 vols. 8vo. — Tentativa Theologica, 1769 — Elements of Ecclesiastical History in the form of dialogues, 2 vols. 8vo. 1765; left unfinished.

PEREZ, Anthony, a Spanish writer, nephew to the secretary of Charles V. When disgraced in Spain he retired to Paris, where he died 1611. He published "letters," which are well written and interesting. His works appeared at Paris 1598. There was also a Spanish lawyer of eminence of that name, who died at Louvain 1672, aged 89. Also another who was surgeon to Philip II. and wrote a treatise on the plague.

PERGOLESI, John Baptist, an Italian musician, born at Casoria, and educated under Gætano Greco at Naples. He was afterwards patronised by prince Stigliano, and his operas, when introduced on the theatre, were attended with extraordinary success. His Olympiad appeared at Rome, but by some accident did not meet the applause which its merits deserved. He died of a consumption at Naples, at the early age of 33, 1737. In compliment to his abilities he is called by the Italians the Dominichino of music. His chief works are "Stabat Mater," Dixit et Laudate, "Salve Regina," la Serva Padrona — Orfeo & Eurydice. Dr. Burney thinks very highly of his genius and of his compositions.

PERIANDER, tyrant of Corinth, is placed among the seven wise men of Greece, though he oppressed his country, murdered his wife Melissa, and banished his son Lycophron. He died B. C. 585.

PERIANDER, Giles, a native of Brussels, 1540, who became professor of belles lettres at Mentz, and published Germania, in qua Doctiff. Virorum Elogia et Judicia continentur, 12mo. 1567 — Nobilitas Moguntiaæ Diæcesis, Metropolitanæque Ecclesiæ, 8vo. 1568.

PERICLES, an illustrious Athenian, known as a general, orator, and statesman. By his arts and influence he gained an extraordinary ascendancy over his countrymen, and prevailed upon them to begin the famous and fatal Peloponnesian war. He was cut off by the plague, B. C. 429.

PERINGSKIOLL, John, a native of Stregni in Sudermania, who became professor of antiquities at Upsal, secretary to the king, and counsellor. He wrote an History of the Kings of the North, 8vo. 1720 — of the Kings of Norway, 2 vols. fol. 1697 — Historical and Chronological tables from Adam to Christ, 1713, folio, besides an edition of J. Meffenius' treatises on the kings of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, 14 vols. fol. 1700. He died 24th March, 1720, aged 66.

PERIZONIUS, James, a learned German, born at Dam in Holland, 26th Oct. 1651. He studied at Deventer, and afterwards at Utrecht under the learned Grævius, and in 1674, he removed to Leyden. He was afterwards made rector of the Latin school at Delft, and then professor of eloquence and history at Franeker. He went in 1693 to Leyden, to fill the chair of eloquence, history, and Greek, and died there 6th April, 1717. He was a man of extensive erudition, great application, and sound judgment. He published various works in Latin on history, classical literature, and antiquities, the chief of which are Animadversiones Historicæ, 8vo. — Dissertationes on various Points of Antiquity, &c. — orations — Origines Babilonicæ et Ægyptiacæ, 2 vols. 8vo. — an edition of Ælian, 2 vols. 8vo. — Historical Commentaries — an edition of Q. Curtius — notes on Sanctius' Minerva, &c.

PERKINS, William, a native of Marston, Warwickshire, educated at Christ-college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was in his principles a strict Calvinist, and his writings when translated into Dutch, drew upon him the attack of Arminius, and other polemics, and this occasioned the calling of the Synod of Dordt for the settlement of theological disputes. His works are comprised in 3 vols. fol. He died 1602, aged 46.

PERNETY, James, a native of Forez, historiographer of Lyons, and member of the academy there. He was an able writer, and assumed the pompous title of Miles Ecclesiæ Lugdunensis. He wrote History of Cyrus, 3 vols. 12mo. — Counsels of Friendships — Letters on Phyllognomy, 3 vols. — Abuses of Education, 12mo. — Picture of Lyons — Lyonesse worthy to be recorded, 2 vols. 8vo. He died 1777, aged 81.

PERNETY, Anthony Joseph, a relation of the preceding, born at Roanne en Forez, 13th Feb. 1716. He became librarian to the king of Prussia, and after residing for several years at Berlin, he returned to France, and died in the bosom of his family. He wrote a Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving, 12mo. — Dissertation on America against Pauw, 2 vols. 8vo. — History of a Voyage to the Maldives, 8vo. &c.

PEROUSE, John Francis Galoup de la, an illustrious navigator, descended from a noble family at Toulouse, and born at Albi 1741. He early entered into the French navy, and distinguished himself by his services for 17 years in the Indian seas, and in 1778, was employed in America under d'Estaing. He was present at the taking of Grenada, and in 1782, he destroyed the English factories which were established in Hudson's bay. At the peace he was selected by Lewis XVI. to command the Astrolabe and the Bouffole, on a voyage of discovery, and the expedition was so popular that the monarch himself traced out the places which he wished the bold adventurer to examine. After following the tract of Cook, visiting the North West coast of America, and advancing to Beechring's streights, Perouse came down the eastern coast of Asia along Japan, and in Feb. 1788, visited Botany bay in New Holland, where he was received with merited distinction by the English settlers. After leaving Botany bay no intelligence whatever has been received of this unfortunate navigator, but it is imagined that he perished with his valiant crew on some unknown shoals, or fell a sacrifice to the fury of some inhuman savages. In 1791, the national assembly ordered two ships under Entrecasteaux, and Petit-Thomas, to go in pursuit of him; but after exploring those seas which he had lately visited, they returned without being able to satisfy their countrymen and the friends of humanity with respect to the fate of these unhappy adventurers. His voyages, as far as he sent a report of them to Europe, have been published in 4 vols. 4to.

PERRAULT, Claude, an eminent author, born at Paris, 1613. He was bred up a physician, but he practised only in his own family, and for the poor, and abandoned the profession for the more pleasing pursuits of literature and the fine arts. In architecture he was particularly great, and the entrance into the Louvre, as Voltaire observes, is one of the most august monuments of architecture in the world. At the request of Colbert he translated Vitruvius, and adorned the work with plates. He also contributed some valuable papers to the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was member. He was unfortunately engaged in a quarrel with Boileau, against whom he maintained the superiority of the moderns against the ancients; but though the poet ridiculed the artist, and was consequently abused in his turn, they were afterwards happily reconciled. Perrault died 9th Oct. 1688, aged 75. He wrote besides, Abridgment of Vitruvius, 12mo. — Description of Machines of his own Invention — Memoirs for a Natural History of Animals, folio — on the Ancient Columns of Architecture and their Ornaments, &c. Though he never practised physic, the faculty of Paris placed his picture by the side of those of Fernelius, Riolanus, and others, in respect not only for his knowledge of medicine, but for his superior acquirements in physics, and in the fine arts.

PERRAULT, Charles, brother of Claude, was born at Paris, 1626. His abilities early recommended him to Colbert, by whom he was made clerk of the buildings, and afterwards comptroller general of the finances. This high situation enabled him to gratify the wishes of his heart. He patronized learned men, and encouraged the arts and the sciences, and to his honorable influence the establishment of the academies of painting, sculpture, and architecture, was owing. The death of Colbert, however, in 1683, produced his disgrace, and he retired from an ungrateful court, to a life of solitude and study. He wrote various works in verse and prose, and his poem called La Peinture, was received in 1668 with great applause. Le Siecle de Louis le Grand, which appeared in 1688, was a declaration of war against the opinions of learned men, and by elevating the moderns to a rank superior to the ancients in every species of composition, he brought on a controversy, in which he had to oppose the powerful abilities of Boileau, Menage, and other respectable writers. The opposition of Boileau was guided by interest as well as pride, and when the prince of Conti threatened to write on his seat in the academy, "tu dors, Brutus," thou sleepest, Brutus, the poet considered himself seriously called upon to combat Perrault, which he did most ably, in his work annexed to Critical Reflections on Longinus. These two great antagonists were reconciled in 1699, and Perrault some time after published his Historical Eulogiums on the Great Men of the 17th Century, 2 vols. folio. Perrault died 1703, aged 77. He was a man of great respectability, since madam Dacier, who has censured him with severity as an author, describes him as a pious, sincere, virtuous, polite, and modest character, employing his influence not to serve himself, but his friends. He wrote besides Parallel of the Ancients and Moderns — the Cabinet of the Fine Arts, folio — Reflections on Longinus, 8vo. — poems — Taernus's Fables, &c. He had two other brothers, Nicolas and Peter, also distinguished in literature.

PERRIER, Francis, a French painter, born at Magon, 1590. He was dissipated in his youth, and ran away from his parents, and then joined himself to a blind beggar, whom he accompanied to Rome, and with whom he shared the alms obtained on the road from the hands of charity. In the midst of his distress at Rome he applied himself to his pencil, and soon was enabled to live independently. He then returned to France through Lyons, and after a second residence of 10 years in Italy, he came again to Paris, in high favor with the great. He painted the gallery of the Hotel de la Vrilliere, and died professor of the academy, 1650. He etched some of Raphael's works, and other pieces, and also engraved in the chiaro oscuro, some antiquities in an admired style, of which he was said by some to be the inventor. In his manner he chiefly imitated Lanfranc, and in his landscapes was little inferior to Carracci.

PERRIER, Charles, a French poet, nephew to the preceding, was born at Aix in Provence. As a Latin poet he possessed such excellence, that Menage, who had the settlement of a political dispute between him and his pupil Santeuil, honored him with the title of prince of lyric poets. He afterwards applied himself to French poetry, and with such success that he obtained twice the prize of the French academy. He died 1692. Though respectable as a writer, he was, as a man, very affected, self-conceited, and disagreeably proud of his poetical name.

PERRON, James Davy du, a cardinal, celebrated for his learning and his political knowledge. He was born of noble parents, 25th Nov. 1556, and educated in the protestant faith; and he displayed so much attention to his studies, that he was early distinguished as a scholar, and in 1576 he was introduced by Desportes, abbot abbot of Trion, to Henry III. at Blois, as a prodigy of great learning. As a theological disputant he acquired much celebrity at Paris; but he soon after abjured the tenets of the protestants, and labored with great assiduity to convert others to the catholic faith. Henry IV. was in the number of those on whom his eloquence and subtilty prevailed, and so highly valued were his services, that he was made by the grateful monarch, at first bishop of Evreux, and afterwards grand almoner of France, archbishop of Sens, and at last raised to the dignity of cardinal, 1604. His abilities as a negociator were repeatedly employed by the king with the see of Rome; and with the most persuasive eloquence and inviolate integrity he served his master without injuring the interests of the church. The last years of his life were devoted to retirement and the revision of his works. He died at Paris, 5th Sept. 1618, aged 63. Du Perron was universally acknowledged to be a man of deep erudition, well versed in profane and ecclesiastical history, artful and penetrating, capable of painting his plans as plausible and reasonable, and so powerful and argumentative in disputes, that the ablest scholars were afraid of him, and even Du Plessis Mornay, himself so celebrated, appeared against him in the presence of Henry with almost inferior abilities. He wrote a treatise on the Eucharist — another against king James I. of England — letters — dissertations — Acts of Conference with Du Plessis Mornay, &c. all of which have been collected in 3 vols. folio, with an account of his life. The "Perroniana," published after his death, are unworthy of his fame, and probably were impositions on the credulity of the world.

PERRON, Anquetil du, a learned Frenchman, member of the academy of inscriptions and belles lettres, and of the national institute. He undertook a voyage to the East, and became acquainted with the original works of Zoroaster, and also the language of the ancient Persians; and after surmounting many difficulties he returned to Europe, loaded with the literary spoils of India, which were deposited in the king's library at Paris. An account of this journey, so interesting to science, was published in 1771, 3 vols. 4to.; but it is to be lamented, that he speaks with virulence and disrespect of the English, from whom he had received every mark of attention and courtesy. This learned man died at Paris, Nov. 1805, aged 73. He published several historical works besides, and left some valuable MSS.

PERRONET, John Rodolphus, member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the learned societies of London, Stockholm, &c. rose by his merit to the respectable office of director general of bridges and roads in France. He was a pupil of Beaufre, and for his services was rewarded with the order of St. Michael, and became inspector, and afterwards director of the school of engineers at Paris. The bridges of Neuilly, Nantes, Orleans, &c. were constructed under his direction, and the public roads of the kingdom were improved by his judicious plans. This worthy man, as respectable in private life, as he was esteemed for his public services, died 1794, aged 86. He published a Description of the Bridges which he had erected, 2 vols. folio — Memoirs on the Method of constructing Grand Arches of Stone from 200 to 500 feet; over Vallies, 4to. &c.

PERROT, Nicholas, a native of Sassoferrato, who became archbishop of Siponto, and died 1480. He was author of a Commentary on Martial — of a treatise on Hippocrates — and of a translation of Polybius into Latin, &c.

PERROT, for John, was born of a respectable Pembrokehire family, about 1527. Educated for the services of the court in the house of the marquis of Winchester, he quickly became one of the favorites of Edward VI. and was made a knight of the Bath at his coronation. Under Mary he was disgraced, and with difficulty escaped with his life, for extending his protection to some suspected protestants; but in the next reign he was recalled to court, and sent in 1572, as president of Munster, to quell a dangerous rebellion in Ireland. He also distinguished himself as admiral of the fleet, against the meditated invasion of Ireland by the Spaniards; but when appointed lord lieutenant of that kingdom, in 1583, he rendered himself very unpopular by the severity of his measures. His enemies had in consequence sufficient influence to procure his recall, and in 1588 he returned to England, and was sent to the Tower, and four years after tried for high treason, and condemned. His services pleaded so strongly in his favor with Elizabeth, that she acknowledged his innocence, and respited him. He died the same year in his confinement.

PERROT, Nicolas, fleur d'Ablancourt, a learned Frenchman, born at Chalons sur Marne, April 5th, 1606. He studied at Sedan and at Paris, and applied himself to the law, and was admitted advocate of the parliament. He soon after abandoned that profession, abjured the protestant faith, and devoted himself to literature. His preface to the "Honnête Femme," of du Bose procured him high reputation, and soon after he again was reconciled to the protestant tenets, and then visited Holland and England, till the clamor, excited by his religious inconsistency, had been hushed. In 1637 he was admitted into the French academy, and afterwards undertook a translation of Tacitus. He spent his last years in retirement, and died on his estate of Ablancourt, of the gravel, Nov. 17th, 1664. He translated into French Tacitus, Minutius Felix, Lucian, Cæsar, Arrian, Thucydides, and others. He wrote besides, a Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul, — and an History of Africa, 3 vols. 4to.

PERRY, John, an Englishman, captain in the navy, and celebrated as an engineer. He was employed by Peter the Great, of Russia, to form a communication between the Wolga and the Don, and in making the Veronise navigable; but though thus useful to the kingdom, and though laboriously engaged in improving the Russian navy, he was unhandsonely treated by the government, and when unable to obtain any remuneration for his services, he quitted the place, 1712, under the protection of the English envoy Mr. Whitworth. His abilities were next successively engaged in 1721, in stopping the breach at Dagenham, in Essex, of which he published an account. He wrote also the State of Russia, 1716, 8vo. and died 11th Feb. 1733.

PERSEUS, son of Philip of Macedonia, was defeated at Pydna, and his kingdom destroyed by Paulus Æmilius, B. C. 168. He was carried a captive to Rome.

PERSIUS, Aulus Flaccus, a celebrated Roman satirist in the age of Nero. Cornutus the stoic was his master. He died A. D. 62. His satires are very severe and obscure.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor of obscure origin. From an instructor of youth he became a soldier, and on the death of Commodus, 193, he was raised to the imperial purple. His virtues promised a happy reign for Rome, but the state was too deeply sunk into vice and debauchery, to suffer the rule of a magnanimous prince. He was assassinated by his soldiers a few months after his elevation.

PERUGINO, Pietro, an Italian painter, born 1446, at Perugia. He was the disciple of Verocchio, at Florence, and chiefly excelled in the natural and elegant expression of his female figures. He was the master of Raphael, and was patronized by Sixtus IV. for whose chapel at Rome he painted some beautiful pieces. He was remarkably fond of money, and the loss of his treasure, which he always carried about him, and of which he was robbed, caused his death, 1524, in his 78th year. His best piece is an altar-piece, in St. Peter's church, Perugia.

PERUZZI, Balthazar, eminent as a painter and architect, was born at Volterra, or Siena, 1481. He was patronized by the popes Alexander VI., Julius II., and Leo X.; and under the last he finished some designs and models for the ornamenting of St. Peter's, under the architect Bramante. He was taken prisoner at Rome, when that city was sacked by Charles V.; but he was restored to liberty by painting a portrait of the constable Bourbon. His execution of the perspective, and of the chiaro oscuro was so perfect as to excite the astonishment of Titian. He died poor, 1556.

PESELLI, Pesello, a painter of Florence, who died 1517, aged 77. He was the pupil of Andrea del Castagno, and his historical pieces, his animals, &c. were finished in such correct and elegant style, as to command universal approbation.

PESSÉLIER, Charles Stephen, member of the academies of Nancy, of Amiens, Rouen, and Angers, was born at Paris, 9th July, 1712. His parents wished to educate him for the law, but such was his partiality for literature and poetry that his leisure hours were assiduously devoted to the muses. He was united with Lallemand in the management of the finances of the kingdom, and the plans he proposed were applauded by the French ministry. His extreme application to financial affairs proved too powerful for his delicate constitution, and he fell a victim to excessive mental fatigue 24th April, 1763. He wrote "Ecole du Temps," a comedy — Esope au Parnasse, a comedy — la Mascarade du Parnasse, a comedy in one act, — Letters on education, 2 vols. 12mo. — General Idea of the Finances, folio. 1759 — Doubts addressed to the Author of Theory of Taxation, 12mo. — Fables after la Fontaine's manner, &c.

PETAVIUS, Diouysius, or DENIS PETAU, a French jesuit born at Orleans 21st Aug. 1583. His abilities were early observed and encouraged by his father, and after acquiring the most perfect knowledge of belles lettres, the classics, mathematics and philosophy, he was at the age of 19 made professor of philosophy at Bourges. He was admitted among the jesuits in 1605, and his great and extensive erudition was employed in the defence of the catholic religion against the protestants, and his criticisms were particularly directed against Scaliger, and even against his friend Casaubon. He died after a laborious life spent in the service of science and literature, 11th Dec. 1652, at Paris in the college of Clermont. He was according to Gassendus the most consummate scholar the jesuits ever had, and so high was his reputation that Urban VIII. and Philip IV. of Spain invited him with the most liberal promises to settle in their respective territories, which his attachment to his native country, and the precarious state of his health obliged him to decline. As a chronologist he was particularly eminent, and his Latina is universally acknowledged as elegant and refined. He wrote de Doctrina Temporum, 2 vols. fol. — Urano-logia, 3 vols. — Rationarium Temporum, fol. and Leyden, 2 vols. 8vo. a valuable work abridged by Le Clerc — Dogmata Theologica, 5 vols. fol. — the Psalms translated into Greek verse, 12mo. — de Ecclesia Hierarchia, folio, besides controversial pamphlets, and some valuable editions of some of the fathers.

PETHION DE VILLENEUVE, Jerome, a native of Chartres, who quitted the profession of the law to become a member of the constituent assembly. His conduct as a legislator was violent and factious, and as he possessed some powers as a speaker, he contributed much in extinguishing the splendor which surrounded the monarch. His popularity raised him to the dangerous office of mayor of Paris, and on the 20th of June he proved to the people how little he respected the unhappy Louis. His hatred against the king hastened the horrors of the 10th of August, and of the first days of September; but when he, as first magistrate of the city, might have checked or arrested the 30 assassins who murdered in cold blood the most innocent victims, he affected to permit the people to punish their enemies. The abolition of royalty and the fall of Louis completed the gratification of his guilty ambition, but while he aspired to the difficult office of guiding the destinies of a tumultuous republic, he found a powerful rival in Robespierre, and in the struggle was defeated by his antagonist. Outlawed by his victorious opponents, 31st May, 1793, he fled from the capital in disguise, and was some time after found lifeless in a corn field near St. Emilion in the Gironde, a victim to hunger and misery, and with his corpse disfigured and partly devoured by birds of prey. His friends and supporters have represented him as a man of obliging manners, and of strict undeviating integrity; but posterity must view him as an ambitious hypocrite, whose sole aim was to gain popularity, and to ascend to the sovereignty on the ruins of the throne. With a pleasing figure, and captivating manners he possessed deep dissimulation, and while he affected the justice and the sobriety of Aristides, his conduct betrayed the dark designs of the murderer and incendiary. His works, containing some Political Tracts, speeches, &c. have appeared in 4 vols. 8vo. 1793.

PETER, chief of the apostles was son of John and brother of Andrew, and of the city of Bethsaida. He was fishing on the borders of the lake Gennefareth when called by Christ to become an apostle, and he not only obeyed the benign invitation, but ever after showed his strong and decided attachment to the person of his master. He was one of the three apostles who were present at the transfiguration, and it was to him particularly that the Saviour recommended the care of his sheep. When Jesus was betrayed Peter displayed great courage, and drawing his sword cut off the ear of the high priest's servant; but when he saw that his master was detained as a malefactor, his courage failed him, and he followed with pusillanimous curiosity, and when questioned who he was, denied three times his blessed master, that the words of Jesus might be fulfilled, "before the cock crow thou shalt deny me thrice." After the ascension of Christ, Peter evinced great boldness in the cause of the gospel; by his preaching he converted to the faith 3000 souls at once, and manifested the truth of his doctrines by signs and miracles. When imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, he was set at liberty by an angel, and sent forth to preach the gospel out of Judæa. Under the persecutions of Nero, Peter was seized and put to death at Rome, by being crucified with his head downwards, A. D. 66. He wrote two epistles which are among the canonical books, but the gospel, the Acts, &c. said to have been written by him are pious inventions of the monks.

PETER, Sr. a bishop of Alexandria, 300, who suffered martyrdom 311. He was a learned prelate, and formed the penitential canons, and made some wholesome regulations for the suppression of vice in his diocese. Some of his letters are extant in Theodoret.

PETER CHRYSOLOGUS, Sr. archbishop of Ravenna 433, died about 458. His works, consisting of 176 sermons, &c. have been edited, Venice, 1750, fol. and Augsbourg 1758.

PETER III, king of Arragon, succeeded to his father James I, 1276. He laid claim to the dominions of Navarre; but was unable to establish his pretensions by force of arms. As he had married Constance, daughter of Mainfroy king of Sicily, he formed the plan of seizing the kingdom against the claims of Charles of Anjou, and to support the success of his designs he determined to assassinate at one blow all the French in the island. This horrid massacre, which was perpetrated on Easter day, 1282, and which was therefore called Sicilian Vespers, made him easily master of the kingdom; but the indignation of the people rendered his possession precarious. Martin IV. excommunicated him, together with all the Sicilians, and also placed his Spanish dominions under the same interdict. Peter attempted to ward off the public odium by challenging his rival of Anjou; but though the day was appointed he had not the courage to appear against him in the field. He died at Villefranche, 28th Nov. 1285, leaving Sicily to his second son James, and Arragon to his other son Alphonso.

PETER, the Cruel, king of Castille, succeeded at the age of 16 his father Alphonso XI. 1350. He was wanton and tyrannical, and three days after he had married Blanche, daughter of the duke of Bourbon, he repudiated her with every mark of disgrace, to renew his infamous connection with Maria de Pradilla his mistress. Another queen was treated with equal indignity, and Peter at last so irritated his subjects by his inhumanity that they rose up against him, 1366, headed by his natural brother Henry count of Transmare. Though for a while he withstood his enemies, by the assistance of the English, he soon found the general odium too great to be conquered, and in a battle which was fought 14th March, 1369, he was defeated and killed by his brother, who ascended the throne.

PETER ALEXIOWITZ I. surnamed the Great, son of Alexis Michaelowitz, Czar of Muscovy, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Theodore, to the exclusion of his elder brother Iwan, whose health and intellects were too feeble to support the cares and fatigues of government. This gave offence to the princess Sophia, his half sister, who roused into rebellion the Strelitzes a formidable body of militia, nearly resembling the Janissaries of the Ottoman Porte; but Peter was too wise to foment a civil war, and he consented to share the throne with his brother Iwan. Without education, yet endowed with the strongest powers of nature, Peter felt that much was still to be acquired before he could realize the vast projects which he had formed in his mind. To counteract the formidable power of the Strelitzes, who were not only devoted to the interests of the intriguing Sophia, but more inclined to dispute than to obey the commands of their superior, he determined to become the favorite of the army, and enlisting as a private soldier in a company which were dressed and disciplined in the German manner he gradually rose to command by his services, and by sharing the toils and the privations of the military life. The sight of some Dutch and English ships roused his attention to naval affairs, and while he meditated the aggrandizement of Russia he never abandoned his favorite scheme of erecting a navy. By the death of his brother, in 1696, he became sole emperor, and then increased his dominions by the conquest of Azoph from the Turks. Still, however, feeling his inferiority as a naval power, he sent in 1698 an embassy to Holland, and went in a disguised character in the ambassador's suite; and that he might personally be acquainted with the process of ship building, he enrolled himself at Amsterdam among the ship carpenters, and worked with unusual assiduity, under the name of master Peter. The next year he passed over to England, where in four months he acquired the complete knowledge of ship building, and after receiving every mark of respect from William III. he left the country, accompanied by several English ship builders, and artificers; whom he employed with great liberality and kindness in his naval yards. From England he went to Vienna; but the intelligence that Sophia had again intrigued with the Strelitzes, and roused them to rebellion, hastened his return to Moscow. The ringleaders were punished with severity; but the princess, who was the most guilty, was only confined with greater severity in the solitude of a monastery. Improved by the view of foreign countries, the forms of their government, and the knowledge of their commercial resources, Peter now displayed to the world the enlightened plans of his capacious mind. He not only sent his nobles to foreign countries, to improve and adorn their minds, but he liberally invited the wisest and the most learned among distant nations to come and seek an honorable residence in Russia, and to instruct his uncivilized subjects in the various arts which humanize and sweeten life. The hitherto barbarous coasts of Russia were therefore visited by sailors, artists, mechanics, mathematicians, and adventurers of every degree and profession; and though his subjects viewed these new settlers with jealousy, the policy of Peter soon mingled and united them by the strong ties of mutual dependance and social union. In 1700 he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, and though frequently defeated by the superior tactics and heroic valor of his enemy, he nevertheless persevered with undaunted courage, observing, "though I know I must be overcome for a great while, my armies will at last be taught to conquer." In the midst of his disasters in Poland, he formed the vast project of erecting a new metropolis on the Baltic sea, for his immense territories; and after he had added to his dominions the best part of Livonia and Ingria, he in 1703 laid the foundations of Petersburg, which he destined for the northern capital of his empire. Though often defeated, at last the battle of Pultowa, in 1709, came to crown his earnest wishes, and he saw the long victorious Swedes conquered, and their heroic leader Charles obliged to fly for safety into the Turkish dominions. Peter used this great victory like a wise man; the Swedish prisoners were induced, by liberal offers, to settle among their conquerors, and not less than 3000 officers were prevailed upon, by the kind treatment of the Czar, to fix their residence and spread civilization, improvement, and the arts of polished life, in various parts of his extensive empire. In consequence of the victory of Pultowa, Peter was enabled to secure the possession of Livonia and Ingria, to which he afterwards added part of Pomerania and Finland; but the intrigues of Charles XII. at the Turkish court, at last prevailed upon the Ottomans to break the truce, and in 1712 Peter was suddenly surrounded on the banks of the Pruth, and his army devoted to destruction. While he considered every thing lost, his wife Catherine had recourse to stratagem, and by offering a large bribe to the grand vizier, she saved her husband's honor, and his army, and in consequence of this meritorious action, the grateful Czar established the order of St. Catherine, into which only women are admitted. The defeat of the Swedish fleet near Holstein in 1714, and the subsequent treaty of peace with Charles XII. now enabled Peter to visit again foreign countries in pursuit of improvement and better knowledge. In 1716 he was in Denmark, and after visiting the schools, public places, and curiosities, he passed to Hamburgh, Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, and Holland, and the next year proceeded to Paris. In the capital of France

he was received with great ceremony, and admitted member of the academy of sciences; but despising the pomp and pageantry of greatness, he preferred the conversation of the learned and the intelligent, and returned home better pleased with the information which he had received, than with the unmeaning marks of homage which flattery had paid to his imperial rank. When at Paris he visited the tomb of Richelieu, exclaiming, "great minister, would it might have happened you had lived in my age, I would have granted you half of my dominions to learn from you how to govern the rest." Returned to Russia, Peter labored earnestly to reform and improve the character of his country. After breaking gradually to pieces the dangerous establishment of the Strelitzes, he established a regular body of 100,000 troops; he built a navy of 40 ships of the line; he established colleges and schools of medicine, botany, belles lettres, &c. in the chief cities of his dominions, and by purchasing pictures of value and celebrity from Italy, he introduced a taste for painting and the fine arts among his subjects; and to supply resources for their gradual improvement, he made the largest possible collections of books and manuscripts in various languages, which were wisely distributed where they could prove most useful. In other respects he was equally attentive to the happiness and morality of his people. Religion, pure and uncorrupt, was made, as far as his zealous endeavours could, to supersede superstition and ignorance; the patriarchate, which had once been formidable even to the sovereign, was abolished, and while canons the most salutary were made for ecclesiastical affairs, it was ordered that the people should be instructed in religious knowledge by their priests in their own, and not in a foreign language. The laws also were rendered more simple and less arbitrary, and the decisions of all law-suits, were to be announced before the expiration of 11 days; and in short every measure which could tend to meliorate the situation of the people, to increase their knowledge, to enlarge their understanding, and to contribute to their comfort, was, with the wisest and most liberal policy, adopted and enforced. This truly great and worthy prince died of a strangury, caused by an imposthume in the neck of his bladder, 28th Jan. 1725, in his 53d year. Peter had a son, Alexis, who lived to the age of manhood; but he unfortunately engaged in a conspiracy in 1717 against his father, and was condemned to die; and though the sentence was suspended, he died some short time after, not without suspicion of being cut off privately by the resentment of the Czar, as several of his accomplices suffered the severest punishment of the law. At his death, Peter appointed for his successor his widow the Czarina, Catherine, whom, from a soldier's wife, he had raised, in consequence of her great merits and heroic character, to share his bed and his throne. Peter is one of the few sovereigns who have been authors. He wrote several pieces on naval affairs; and as he was member of the Paris academy, he sent to that learned body a chart of the Caspian, which had been taken by his directions, and he always received with pleasure the volumes of their memoirs, which were regularly transmitted to him.

PETER II. emperor of Russia, son of Alexis Petrowitz, was declared grand duke of Russia 1726, and the next year succeeded the empress Catherine, at the age of 13. The prominent feature of his reign is the banishment into Siberia, of the great favorite and minister, Menzikoff. The emperor died of the small-pox, 1738, aged 15.

PETER III. emperor of Russia, son of Anne Petrowna, the eldest daughter of Peter the Great, and Charles Frederic, duke of Holstein-Gottorp, was born 1728, and declared grand duke of Russia 1742, by his aunt, the empress Elizabeth, after whom he ascended the throne, 25th Dec. 1761. The beginning of his reign was auspicious; he disregarded the measures of severity which his predecessors had practised, and sought for popularity in the mildness and justice of his government. He was a strong admirer of the character of the heroic king of Prussia, but unfortunately wanted the vigor and decision which marked that great man. His attempts therefore to reform his people proved abortive, and rendered him contemptible; so that his wife Catherine took advantage of his timidity, and dethroned him, 6th July, 1762, and assumed the reins of government under the name of Catherine II. Peter died seven days after this degradation; but though his death is attributed by some to an hemorrhoidal flux, it is too evident that violence terminated his existence. Little respect has been shown to his memory, and probably because he meditated the subversion of the religion of his country, and the introduction of the simpler worship of the protestants, in the stead of the more ceremonious and corrupt forms of the Greek church.

PETER NOLASQUE, a native of Languedoc, in the service of James, king of Arragon, under whose patronage he established, in 1223, the order of Mercy, whose sole business was the redeeming of Christian slaves from the power of the infidels. This worthy ecclesiastic, who so successfully and honorably contributed to soften the horrors of warfare and of captivity, died 1256, aged 67.

PETER of Sicily, was author, in the eighth century, of a curious and interesting History of the Manichees, published at Ingolstadt, by Mr. Raderus, in Greek and Latin, 1604.

PETER of Cluni, or the Venerable, was born in Auvergne, of a noble family, and embracing the ecclesiastical state, was made in 1121, general of the order of Cluni. He received with becoming magnificence at his abbey, pope Innocent II. in 1130, and he afterwards granted a kind and friendly asylum to the unfortunate Abelard. He died 24th Dec. 1156, aged 65. He was a man of great learning, and exemplary piety. He wrote among other things, treatises on the Divinity of Christ — against the Jews — on Infant Baptism — the Authority of the Church — the Sacrifice of Mass, &c.

PETER, an ecclesiastic of Blois, who studied at Paris and Bologna, and was preceptor and then secretary to William II. king of Sicily. He was afterwards invited by Henry II. to England, where he obtained the archdeaconry of Bath, and afterwards that of London. He was a strict disciplinarian in the church, and a man of great piety. He died in England, 1200. Of his writings, 183 letters, 65 sermons, &c. have been preserved, best edited by Goussainville, in folio, 1667.

PETER the Hermit, a gentleman of Amiens in Picardy, who quitted the military profession to become a hermit and pilgrim. He was actuated by the sentiments which pervaded the Christian world at the close of the 11th century; and under the expectation of the immediate dissolution of the world, he, with many other deluded men, hastened to the Holy Land in 1093, that there he might terminate his days in a spot which had given birth to the Saviour of the world. On his return he spoke in so affecting a manner of the cruel treatment which the Christian pilgrims experienced in Palestine, that pope Urban II. sent him over Europe to preach a general crusade to deliver the Holy Land from the oppression of the infidels. The eloquence of Peter, and the spirit of the times prevailed; a numerous concourse of people flocked together for the pious labor, and the holy hermit began his march at the head of above 40,000 men, all animated with the zeal of devotion, and the hopes of celestial protection. In crossing Hungary this religious army committed the most horrid excesses, and so provoked the inhabitants to revenge, that in skirmishes with them and with the Turks, many lost their lives, and only 3000 reached the gates of Constantinople. In advancing through Asia, the siege of Antioch delayed their progress, and Peter would have abandoned the hopeless enterprise had he not been bound by an oath by Tancred to share the dangers of the crusade. At the conquest of the Holy Land, and in the siege of Jerusalem 1099, Peter behaved with great valor, and for his services was appointed vicar-general of Palestine. He afterwards returned to Europe, and died at the abbey of New-Montier, of which he was the founder.

PETER the wild boy, a youth found in a savage state in the woods near Hameln in Hanover, 1726, where he had lived for some time on berries and roots. He was about 12 years old, but it is unknown how long he had been in that wild state; though from the remains of a shirt collar found about his neck, it is probable he had not been many years exposed. He came to England in 1727, by the direction of queen Caroline, and was placed at a farm-house at North Church, Herts; but neither care nor imitation could ever make him articulate words, and he died in 1785, a melancholy spectacle of savage idiotism, and uncivilized nature. He was in his conduct very tractable. The government very handsomely allowed a pension of 35l. a-year for his support.

PETER LOMBARD, Vid. LOMBARD.

PETER MARTYR, Vid. MARTYR.

PETER D'OSMA, an ecclesiastic of the 15th century, at Salamanca, who may be said to be the forerunner of the reformation, as he preached and wrote against the doctrines and the infallibility of the church of Rome.

Rome. The archbishop of Toledo ordered his writings to be burnt, and the pope confirmed the sentence in 1479.

PETERS, Gerard, a native of Amsterdam, 1580, who distinguished himself as a painter. His conversations, landscapes, &c. possess merit.

PETERS, Bonaventure, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter. His sea storms, and other marine pieces, are highly admired. He died 1652, aged 38. His brother John also excelled as an artist, in his representation of sea fights, landscapes, &c.

PETERS, Francis Lucas, a painter, born at Mechlin. He was the pupil of Gerard Segers, and deserved the patronage of the archduke Leopold. His landscapes are highly admired. He died 1654, aged 48.

PETERS, Hugh, a native of Fowey in Cornwall, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, from which he was expelled for irregularity. He next became an actor on the stage, and acquired some celebrity in low and buffoon characters, and afterwards was ordained by bishop Mountaine, and obtained the lectureship of St. Sepulchre's church in London. An intrigue with a married woman, drove him from England, and after joining the independents at Rotterdam, he passed to North America; but on the breaking out of the civil wars, he returned to England. His turbulent spirit quickly engaged him in the cause of the parliament, whose interests he greatly and powerfully promoted in the pulpit, by his vehement eloquence and vulgar buffoonery. He was so inveterate against the king, and so instrumental to his condemnation, that at the restoration, he was excepted from the act of pardon, and therefore was hanged and quartered 1660. He was then 61.

PETERS, Hugh, an English jesuit, known in history as the friend and confessor of James II. His advice contributed much to the rash measures which rendered the monarch so unpopular, and which at last hastened his ruin.

PETIS DE LA CROIX, Francis, interpreter of oriental languages to the French king, visited Turkey and Persia to perfect himself in the languages of those countries. He wrote the History of Gengis Khan, and other works on oriental history. He died at Paris, 1713.

PETIT, John Lewis, a celebrated surgeon, born at Paris, 1674. Under the kind directions of Littre, the anatomist, and Castel and Mareschal, the surgeons, he made such progress in anatomical and surgical knowledge, that he acquired a respectable practice in 1700. In 1726 he was invited to Poland, to cure the king, and he was equally successful in his attendance, in 1734, on Ferdinand, afterwards king of Spain. Though solicited to settle abroad on the most liberal terms, he preferred his native country, where he was noticed, and where he was honored with a seat in the academy of sciences, and with the rank of rector of the royal school of surgery. He died at Paris 20th April 1750, aged 77. He invented some valuable surgical instruments, and wrote also, Surgery, published in 3 vols. 8vo. by Lesne, 1774 — treatise on the Diseases of the Bones, 2 vols. 12mo. — Dissertations in the memoirs of the academy — besides Consultations on Venereal Complaints.

PETIT, Anthony, an eminent physician of Orleans. He wrote Chirurgical Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo. — Discourse on Surgery — Report in favor of Inoculation — Medical Consultations — Project of a Reformation in Medicine, &c. He was member of the academy of sciences, and after practising with great celebrity at Paris, he retired to Olivet, near Orleans, where he died 21st Oct. 1794, aged 72.

PETIT, Samuel, an eminent scholar, born at Nîmes, and educated at Geneva, where he became professor of theology, of Greek and Hebrew. He was a man of extensive learning, and very amiable manners, and died at Geneva, Dec. 1645, aged 51. He wrote Miscellanea — Eclogæ Chronologicae, 4to. — Variae Lectiones — Leges Atticæ, folio, a valuable work.

PETIT, Peter, a French mathematician, born at Montlucon in the diocese of Bourges, 1598. He came to Paris 1633, and was employed as engineer by Richelieu, and visited the sea ports to examine their state, and suggest improvements. These public employments did not prevent him from applying to philosophical experiments; he was the friend of Pascal, of Merfennus, and of Descartes, whose opinions he at first opposed, but afterwards warmly adopted. He died 1677. He was author of treatises on the Compass of Proportion — on the Construction and Use of the Calibre of Artillery — on Sight — on Eclipses — on preventing the Inundations of the Seine — on Comets, &c.

PETIT, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Paris 1617. He studied medicine, and took his degrees at Montpellier; but he neglected the profession when he came to Paris, and was tutor to Lamoignon's sons, and other great men. He was an excellent scholar, and wrote with great facility. He died 1687. His works are various. He wrote a treatise on the Motion of Animals — Homeri Nepenthes, 8vo. — a Latin treatise on the Amazons, 8vo. and in French, 2 vols. 8vo. — Miscellaneous Observations — a treatise on the Sibyl — de Novâ curandorum Morborum Ratione per Transfusionem Sanguinis — de Naturâ & Moribus Anthropophagorum, 8vo. — besides some poems, one of which, Codrus, in Latin, is mentioned with great applause.

PETITOT, John, a celebrated painter born at Geneva 1607. From a jeweller, and the trade of enamelling, he acquired a great taste in painting; and with Bordier his friend and afterwards his brother-in-law, he travelled into Italy, and by studying chemistry obtained a perfect knowledge of the useful preparation and management of colors. They afterwards came to England, and Petitot, whose pieces were now in universal esteem, was introduced by Mayerne the physician to Charles I.; and he had the honor to take portraits of the whole family. The unfortunate death of his royal patron, to whom he was particularly attached, obliged him to fly to Paris, where he was treated with kindness by the second Charles, and particularly noticed by Lewis XIV. who granted him a pension, and a lodging in the Louvre palace. The revocation of the edict of Nantes terrified the painter, who was a zealous lous protestant, and after 36 years of residence he quitted France for Geneva. He died at Vevay in the canton of Berne, where he had retired, 1691, aged 84. In his private character he was very amiable, and of the meekest disposition. He lived in the greatest harmony with his brother-in-law for 50 years, and separated from him only when their respective families became too numerous for the comforts and privacy of one house. Petitot had 17 children by his wife, but only one of his sons followed his profession. In the completion of his pictures he painted the heads and hands with astonishing effect of coloring, and his friend Bordier painted the hair, the draperies and the ground. He is deservedly regarded as the inventor of painting in enamel, in which he greatly excelled.

PETIVER, James, an English botanist, apothecary to the Charter house, and fellow of the Royal society, was distinguished as a judicious collector of natural curiosities. Sir Hans Sloane offered him 4000*l.* for his valuable museum, and he afterwards obtained it when disposed of after his death. He died 20th April, 1718, and was honorably attended to his grave by the most eminent men of the age. He published Musæi Petiveriani Centuriæ decem, 8vo. — Gazophylacii Naturæ & Artis Decades decem, folio — a Catalogue of the Plants on the Mountains near Geneva — Pterigraphia Americana, folio — Plantæ rariores Chineses, &c. — besides communications to the philosophical transactions, and assistance to Mr. Ray. His works altogether appeared 2 vols. folio, and one 8vo. 1764.

PETRARCH, Francis, a celebrated Italian poet, deservedly called the father of modern poetry, as his genius and great learning tended to revive ancient literature in Europe. His father, who was of noble birth, was driven from Florence by the superior influence of the party of the Neri, and retired to Arezzo, where the poet was born, 1304. Afterwards the father settled at Avignon, and sent his son to the school of Carpentras; and there, and then at Montpellier and Bologna he completed his education. The future bard was intended by his father for the law, but poetry, eloquence, and history, had more charms for him than all the writers on jurisprudence. Losing his mother in 1324, and his father the next year, he was left to his own independent choice, and soon fixed his residence at Vacluse, five miles from Avignon, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. This spot became more and more endeared to him from his love for the beautiful Laura de Noves, whom he first saw and passionately admired in 1627; but though the warm feelings of his heart were conveyed in the most rapturous language of elegant poetry, he could, it is said, make no impression on the heart of the unkind fair. Perhaps, to divert his affections, he now began to think of travelling, and after visiting Paris, Flanders, Germany, and Rome, he was at last persuaded to enter into the service of pope John XXII. The love of Vacluse and of Laura, however, prevailed over the temptations of greatness, and the favor of the powerful; and Petrarch, once more restored to his favorite seat, again devoted his hours to studious pursuits, and to the praises of his beloved mistress. The sweetness of his poetry, and the graces of his muse spread in the mean time his celebrity beyond the confines of Avignon, and at the same moment he was solicited by the senate of Rome, by the university of Paris, and by the king of Naples, to come and receive the poetical crown. The offers of Rome, once the mistress of the world, and the cradle of poets, historians, and orators, were too flattering to be withstood, and the modest bard appeared in the capitol, where the poetic crown was fixed on his head with the most solemn ceremony by the Roman senator Orso count d'Anguillara, on Easter-day, 1341, and he was declared a citizen of Rome. From Rome he visited Parma, and in 1343 was drawn from his favorite Vacluse by pope Clement VI., who sent him to compliment Joan on her accession to the Neapolitan crown. While at Verona, in 1348, he was informed of the death of his favorite Laura, a melancholy event which deeply affected him, and which he immortalized by all the powers of poetry. In 1352 he bid adieu forever to his beloved retreat of Vacluse, which the death of Laura had converted from a scene of pleasure and enjoyment, to corroding care and melancholy reflection; and he entered afterwards in the service of the Visconti at Milan, and was engaged in negotiations and political affairs. Though informed that his patrimony was restored by the Florentines, he preferred to these new honors from the city of Florence, the peaceful retreat of Arquà, near Padua, given him by his friend and patron, Francis de Carrara, and there he died July 1374, aged 70. Petrarch was an ecclesiastic, though he never took priests' orders, and he obtained an archdeaconry and two canonries. He was in private life a very amiable and respectable character; he neither coveted nor despised riches; but was guided by moderation, though flattered by the great, and honored by the powerful. His passion for Laura was of the purest kind, though some have ventured to assert, that it was not unmixed with the most licentious concessions. He had a natural daughter by a lady of respectable family. Petrarch as a poet is deservedly celebrated as one of the restorers of classical learning, and he displayed all the powers of genius and poetical inspiration, not only in his own native language, but in Latin. His sonnets are esteemed as the sweetest, the most elegant, and most highly finished verses ever written in Italian, and his songs possess equal beauty and grace. His Latin poems are not entitled to similar praise. His Africa, or the Punic War, is censured as faulty, incorrect, and unclassical. His other works are De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ, 4to. translated into French — De Otio Religiosorum — De Verâ Sapientiâ — De Vitâ Solitariâ — De Contemptu Mundi — Rerum Memorabilium Libri Sex — De Republicâ optime administrandâ — Itinerarium Syriacum — Epistolæ — Orationes. His works have been edited in 4 vols. folio. Of his poems the best editions are that of Venice, 2 vols. 4to. 1756. His life has been written by 26 different authors, and of these the most valuable are those by Muratori, by De Sade, and by Dodson.

PETRE, fr William, a native of Exeter, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and in 1523, elected fellow of All-Souls. He applied himself to the study of the law, and took his degree of LL.D. and was appointed pointed principal of Peckwater Inn. His abilities recommended him to lord Cromwell, who employed him in visiting the monasteries, and in the midst of the plunder of ecclesiastical property under Henry VIII. he received a considerable share. He had the art to continue in power under Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Mary, though the politics of the three reigns were very dissimilar; and under Elizabeth he added to his other employments, the office of secretary of state. Though dishonorably enriched by the plunder of the church, sir William was a man of great talents, and he evinced his respect for learning and piety by some munificent donations to Exeter college, and other charitable institutions. His large property in Essex has devolved to his descendants, who were ennobled by James I. 1603. He died 1571.

PETRONIUS MAXIMUS, a Roman senator, who assassinated Valentinian III. and seized the throne, 455. He married the widow, who, ignorant of his crime, soon after called to avenge the death of her husband, Genseric, king of the Vandals. Petronius was put to death, and his body thrown into the Tiber.

PETRONIUS ARBITER, Titus, a Latin poet, who enjoyed the favor of Nero. He was accused of a conspiracy against the tyrant, and destroyed himself by opening his veins, A. D. 65. His poems are very elegant, though licentious.

PETTUS, sir John, a native of Suffolk, who obtained the rank of deputy governor of the Royal mines, and was member of parliament for Dunwich, in the reign of Charles II. He wrote the History, Laws, and Places of the Chief Mines and Mineral Works in England and Wales, fol. 1670 — Volatiles from the History of Adam and Eve, 8vo. — England's Independency of the Papal Power, 4to. — Fleta Minor, or the Laws of Art and Nature in knowing, assaying, &c. of Metals, fol. 1683, from the German, and translated while the author was in the Fleet prison. This intelligent man died about 1690.

PETTY, sir William, an eminent writer born 16th May, 1623, at Rumsey in Hampshire, where his father was a clothier. In his native town at the grammar school by strong application he acquired a competent knowledge of Latin, Greek, and French, besides arithmetic, geometry, dialing, and navigation, and at the age of 15 he went over to Normandy to improve himself further in the university of Caen. On his return home he was preferred in the navy, and at the age of 20, being master, as he says himself, of three score pounds he determined to travel abroad to augment his stock of knowledge. He visited Leyden, Utrecht, Amsterdam, and Paris; where he studied medicine, and so managed his little property that at his return to Rumsey in 1646, he was richer by 10l. than when he set out three years before. In 1647 he obtained from the parliament a patent for 17 years for his invention of a machine for double writing; but though the scheme did not succeed, it yet recommended him to the notice of the learned, and procured him a settlement at Oxford, where he acquired some reputation as assistant to the anatomical professor. By the influence of the parliament he obtained a fellowship at Brazen-nose, and was created M. D. in 1649, and two years after appointed professor of anatomy, and soon after music professor at Gresham college. In 1652 he went as physician to the army in Ireland, under Lambert, Fleetwood, and Henry Cromwell; and in 1654 he obtained the permission of the government to measure the various estates of the island, so that by his perseverance and ingenuity, there was no estate worth 60l. per annum, but was accurately marked, and all its boundaries ascertained. He was in 1655 made secretary to Henry Cromwell, and three years after was elected member of parliament for West Looe; but he was at that time accused of some misdemeanors, and though he could have vindicated his innocence, and proved the malice and persecution of his enemies, he was dismissed from his employments. At the restoration he was treated with great attention by the king, and knighted, and by patent created surveyor general of Ireland. About 1663 he invented his double bottomed ship, which could sail against wind and tide, of which he gave a model to the Royal society, a learned body, of which he was one of the first members, and the most active promoter of its establishment. Sir William, whose mind was perpetually engaged in promoting the honor of his country, by useful projects and ingenious inventions, paid at the same time particular attention to his own interests, and acquired honorable opulence by being concerned in iron works, in a pilchard fishery, in lead mines, and in the timber trade. Though he was a considerable sufferer by the great fire of London, in 1666, he yet died very rich, and left to his family, estates of the value of not less than 15,000l. a-year, at 6 per cent. interest. He died of a gangrene in his foot, occasioned by the gout, in Westminster, 16th Dec. 1687, and was buried at Rumsey, in his family vault. His son was created lord Shelburne, by king William. Sir William was a most correct and intelligent writer, and his various pamphlets on subjects of political economy, national and commercial pursuits, and financial affairs, all amounting to nearly 30, display his abilities as a man of superior knowledge, extensive information, and the most consummate judgment, to which were united, the purest benevolence, and all the amiable virtues of private life.

PETYT, William, a native of Skipton, Yorkshire, eminent for his knowledge of law antiquities. He studied the law, and was bencher and treasurer of the Inner Temple, and keeper of the records in the Tower. He wrote the Ancient Rights of the Commons Asserted, 8vo. — a Summary Review of the Kings and Government of England, and of the Jus Parliamentarium, or Rights of Parliament, folio. He died at Chelsea, 1707. His valuable Collection of Parliamentary Tracts is preserved in the library of the Inner Temple.

PEUCER, Gaspard, an eminent physician and mathematician, born at Bautzen, in Lusatia, 1525. He was professor of medicine at Wittenberg, and married Melancthon's daughter, whose works he edited, 5 vols. folio; but his opinions brought him into trouble. He was for 10 years imprisoned, and during that time he committed his thoughts on the margins of old books by means of ink, which he made with burnt crusts of bread infused in wine. He died 25th Sept. 1602. He wrote De Præcipuis Divinationum Generibus — Methodus curandi Morbos Internos — de Febribus — Hypotheses Astronomicæ — Vita Illustrium Medicorum — the Names of Monies, Weights, and Measures.

PEUTEMAN, Peter, a painter, born at Rotterdam. It is said that he was roused by an earthquake from sleep, in the dissecting room of an anatomical school, which he had entered to become more familiarized with the appearances of dead bodies, in the representation of some scenes of mortality in which he was engaged; and when he saw, during the violent concussion, the skeletons all in motion from the ceiling, and the skulls rolling around him, he fled with terror and precipitation, and never recovered from the sudden shock, but died soon after, 1692, aged 42.

PEUTINGER, Conrad, a learned German, born at Augsburg, 1465. He studied in some of the Italian universities; and at his return home was appointed secretary to the senate of Augsburg. He was also useful to his country as an able negotiator in some of the European courts. He died 1547. He published Convivial Discourses, 8vo. — De Inclinatione Romani Imperii & Gentium Commigrationibus — De Rebus Gothorum, fol. — Romanæ Vetusitatis Fragmenta in Augusta Vindellicorum, fol. besides a Chart formed in the reign of Theodosius the Great, containing the roads of the Roman armies in the Western empire, edited at Vienna, 1753, with dissertations and notes by Scheib.

PEYER, John Conrad, a physician of Schaffhausen, in the 17th century, famous for giving first an account of the intestinal glands, and of the fluid which lubricates the intestines. He published Exercitatio Anatomico-medica, &c. 1677 — Methodus Historiarum, &c. — Experimenta circa Pancreas, &c.

PEYRERE, Isaac, a protestant writer, born at Bourdeaux. He was imprisoned at Brussels for publishing a book to prove that Adam was not the first man; but he was set at liberty by means of the prince of Condé his patron, and then went to Rome where he abjured his opinions and Calvinism before pope Alexander VII. He died 1676, aged 84. He wrote a Relation of Greenland, 8vo. — of Iceland, 8vo. — and a book on the Restoration of the Jews, and other things.

PEYROUSE, Vid. PEROUSE.

PEYSSONNEL, Charles, a French writer, born at Marseilles 17th Dec. 1700. He went as secretary to Villerneuve the ambassador to Constantinople, and travelled over Asia Minor, with the judicious observations of the philosopher and antiquary, and not only accurately marked the situation of some of the most famous cities of ancient times, but made the most valuable collection of medals, coins, and curiosities. He was afterwards consul at Smyrna, and with equal zeal advanced the interests of his country, and the progress of science. He was member of the academy of inscriptions, whose memoirs he enriched by several valuable dissertations. He wrote besides an Eulogy on Marshal Villars — a Dissertation on Coral, and other pieces on Commerce, &c. He died 1757, aged 69. His son was also consul at Smyrna, and a man of science and general information. He wrote Historical Observations on the Barbarians who once inhabited the shores of the Euxine and the Danube, 4to. — Observations on Baron de Tott's Memoirs, 8vo. — Les Numeros, 4 vols. 12mo. often edited — treatise on the Commerce of the Black Sea, 2 vols. 8vo. — Political Situation of France, 2 vols. 8vo. — Discourse on the Alliance of France with the Swifs and the Grifons, 8vo. — Examen of the Considerations on the Turkish War by Volney. This able and indefatigable author died 1790, at the age of 80.

PEZAY, Maffon, Marquis of, captain of dragoons, born at Blois. He instructed Lewis XVI. in military tactics, and was rewarded with the place of inspector general of the coasts. He behaved with haughtiness in this employment, and in consequence of complaints made against him was disgraced and banished to his estate, where he died soon after 1778. He wrote poetry with great success. His Zelis au Bain, in six cantos, Les Soirees Helvetiennes, &c. — and the Campaigns of Maillebois, 3 vols. are admired. He also translated Catullus and Tibullus in French verse, but not elegantly.

PEZENAS, Esprit, a learned jesuit, born at Avignon, where he also died 4th Feb. 1776, aged 84. He was professor of philosophy and hydrography at Marseilles, and published various things, the most known of which are a treatise on Pilotage, 8vo. — Theory of Gauging, 8vo. — Memoirs of Mathematics and Philosophy, &c. — besides translations of Maclaurin's Algebra and Fluxions — Defagulier's experimental Philosophy — Ward's Young Mathematician's Guide — Baker on the Microscope — Smith's Optics — Dyche's Dictionary of Arts, &c.

PEZRON, Paul, a learned Frenchman, born at Hennebion, in Bretagne, 1639. He devoted himself to the study of Greek and Latin historians, and employed much time in tracing the origin of the language of the Goths, and set up a new system of chronology, in which he supposed that the world was far more ancient than 4000 years; but nearer 6000 before the birth of Christ. He was of the order of Cîteaux, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and in 1697, abbot of Charmoye. He died 10th Oct. 1706. His works were l'Antiquité des Temps retable, 4to. in which he ingeniously defends the chronology of the septuagint against that of the Hebrew text — a Vindication of that work against Martianay et le Quien — Evangelical History confirmed by Jewish and Roman Histories — on the Antiquity of the Nation and Language of the Celts, 8vo. &c.

PFANNER, Tobias, called from his extensive knowledge, the living Archives of the house of Saxony, was secretary of the Archives to the duke of Saxe Gotha. He was born at Augsburg, and died at Gotha 1717, aged 76. He wrote the History of the Peace of Westphalia, 8vo. — the History of the Assemblies of 1652-4 — Theology of the Pagans — treatise on the Principle of Historic Faith, &c. all in Latin.

PFEFFERCORN, John, a famous converted Jew, who wished to persuade the emperor Maximilian to burn all Hebrew books except the bible, because they contained magic blasphemies and other dangerous things. This artful scheme would have been adopted, had not Caprio and Ulric de Hutten exerted themselves successfully fully against it. He wrote Narratio de Ratione celebrandi Pascha apud Judæos — de abolendis Judæorum Scriptis, &c. and died about 1520.

PFEIFFER, Augustus, a learned orientalist, born at Lawenbourg 1640. He was professor of oriental languages at Wittenberg, Leipzig, and other places, and became superintendent of the churches of Lubec, where he died Jan. 1698. He wrote Pan sophia Mosaicæ — Critica Sacra — de Masora — de Trihæresi Judæorum — Sciagraphia Systematica Antiquit. Hebræorum, and his philosophical works were collected at Utrecht in 4to. 2 vols.

PFEIFFER, Lewis, a native of Lucerne, distinguished as a famous general in the service of Charles IX. of France. At the retreat of Meaux, he preserved that monarch's life against the artful manœuvres of Condé, and by his valor contributed much to the victory of Montcontour in 1569. He influenced the Swiss to favor the cause of the duke of Guise, and afterwards retired to his native country, where he died 1594, aged 64, chief magistrate of Lucerne.

PHÆDON, a native of Elis, the disciple of Socrates. After his master's death he returned to Elis, where he formed the sect of Elean philosophers.

PHÆDRUS, a Thracian, the freedman of Augustus. He was an excellent poet, and his fables possess great merit, beauty and correctness. He was persecuted by Sejanus, in the reign of Tiberius.

PHÆDRUS, Thomas, professor of eloquence at Rome, and keeper of the Vatican library in the 16th century, obtained that name in consequence of performing the part of Phædra in Seneca's Hippolytus. He had prepared some learned works for the press; but he was unfortunately run over by a cart, and though not wounded died in consequence of the fright.

PHAER, Thomas, a physician born in Pembroke-shire, and educated at Oxford. He studied the law for some time at Lincoln's Inn, but afterwards took his medical degrees 1559, and published various works, chiefly compiled from the French. He also translated the nine first books, and part of the 10th of Virgil's Æneid, in Alexandrines of seven feet. The other books, together with Maphæus' 13th book, were afterwards finished by Thomas Twyne, a young physician, but with some carelessness, as he prints, "they whistled all," conticuere omnes, in the opening of the second book "they whistled all," a ludicrous mistake. He died soon after, the 12th Aug. 1560.

PHALARIS, a tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily. He was particularly cruel towards his enemies, and the bull in which he tormented those who had incurred his displeasure is well known. He was at last put to death by his subjects, in his brazen bull, B. C. 561. The letters extant under his name are supposed to be spurious.

PHARAMOND, first king of France, and author of the famous Salique law, which forbade the succession of females on the throne, reigned at Treves about 420. Some consider him only as a general of the combined forces of the Franks.

PHARNACÉS, son of Mithridates king of Pontus, cruelly revolted against his father. He was defeated by Cæsar with such facility, that he expressed the rapidity of the conquest by these words, veni, vidi, vici.

PHI

PHERECRATES, a Greek comic poet in the age of Aristophanes and Plato. His plays have perished.

PHERECYDES, a philosopher of Syros, B. C. 560, known as the master of the great Pythagoras. The invention of prosody is attributed to him by Diogenes. There was another of that name 456 B. C. author of an history of Athens.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated sculptor of Athens. He formed for his country the famous statue of Minerva, and when banished in disgrace, he determined to outdo himself in making for the people of Elis the beautiful statue of Jupiter Olympius, which was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. He died about 432 B. C.

PHILANDER, William, a native of Chatillon, secretary to cardinal d'Armagnac, and archdeacon of St. Antoninus. He wrote a commentary on Vitruvius, fol. 1552, and a commentary on part of Quintilian, and died at Toulouse 1565.

PHILELPHUS, Francis, a learned Italian, born at Zolentino in the march of Ancona, 1398. He was, after studying at Padua, made professor of eloquence at Venice, and went as secretary to an embassy to Constantinople, where he married the daughter of the learned Emanuel Chrysoloras, 1419. He was afterwards noticed by the emperor John Palæologus who sent him to Sigismund of Germany, to implore assistance against the Turks. He afterwards taught at Venice, Bologna, and other Italian universities with great popularity; but he was so sensible of his eminence in literature that he wished to tyrannize over the rest of the learned, and therefore he quarrelled not only with literary men, but with Cosmo de Medicis his patron and friend. He died at Florence 31st July, 1481, aged 83. He wrote treatises de Morali Disciplinâ — de Exilio — de Joci & Seris Conviviorum — dialogues, odes, and poems, &c. which were all collected and published, Basle, 1739, folio. His eldest son Marius, a man also of learning, died at Milan 1480.

PHILEMON, a comic poet of Greece, whose plays were it is said imitated by Plautus. He died B. C. 274, aged 97, in consequence of laughing at the sight of an ass eating figs.

PHILETAS, a Greek poet and grammarian of Cos, preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, and author of epigrams and elegies now lost.

PHILIDOR, N. a French musician of great eminence. He wrote several operas for the Parisian theatres, which were received with great applause, and still are repeated with increasing popularity. He also set to music the Carmen Seculare of Horace, which was much admired both at Paris and in London. As a calculator he had strong powers, and as a chess player he was superior to every other living person, so that a little before his death he, though blind, and aged 80, laid a wager against two skilful players, and beat them both at the same time. He died in London 30th Aug. 1795.

PHILIP, St. a native of Bethsaida on the borders of the lake of Gennefareth, was the first whom Jesus called to become his disciple. He was a fisherman, and was also a married man and had several daughters. He preached the gospel in Phrygia, and died there at Hierapolis, though some suppose that he suffered martyrdom.

tyrdom. The person who converted Candace's eunuch to the faith was also of that name, and was deacon in the church.

PHILIP II. king of Macedonia, was son of Amyntas, and ascended the throne 360 B. C. He had in his youth been educated at Thebes, and to the information and precepts which he received from the wisdom of Epaminondas he added the most heroic valor and the most ardent ambition. After defeating the Illyrians and other barbarians, he made war against Athens, and aspired to the sovereignty of Greece. His gold proved as powerful as his arms, and neither the eloquence of Demosthenes, nor the desperate courage of the Athenians could oppose the torrent of his victories. He was assassinated by Pausanias B. C. 336, whilst meditating the conquest of Persia, at the head of the Grecian forces, of which he had artfully been declared the general, and he left his projects to be pursued, to his son and successor Alexander the Great.

PHILIP V. king of Macedonia, succeeded B. C. 220. His jealousy of the Roman power, and his alliance with Hannibal proved the source of his misfortunes. His dominions were invaded by the consul Lævinus, and he was conquered. He is deservedly censured for putting his eldest son Demetrius to death, at the base instigation of his other son Perseus. He died B. C. 178.

PHILIP, Marcus Julius, the Arabian, from an obscure origin, and the low rank of a common soldier, ascended the imperial throne of Rome, by the assassination of the younger Gordian 244. Though guilty of murder he acquired popularity at Rome, by his conduct, and the magnificent manner in which he celebrated the secular games. He was assassinated by his soldiers near Verona 249.

PHILIP I. king of France, succeeded his father Henry I. 1060, at the age of eight. His minority was under the care of Baldwin V. count of Flanders, but he lost this virtuous guardian in 1067, and gave way to mad schemes of ambition. He was defeated by the Flemings at Mont Cassel, and opposed with success by William the Conqueror of England; but he forgot his misfortunes in intoxication and voluptuous pleasures. Dissatisfied with his queen Bertha, he carried away Bertrade the wife of the count of Anjou, and married her, for which flagitious conduct he was condemned by pope Urban II. and excommunicated by the council of Poitiers. He was afterwards, however, reconciled to the church, and his marriage with Bertrade declared valid. He died at Melun, 29th July, 1108, after a reign of 48 years.

PHILIP II. king of France, surnamed Augustus, succeeded his father Lewis VII. 1180, when 15 years old. His youth promised success to the machinations of his enemies, and therefore the king of England invaded his dominions; but Philip bravely met him, and obliged him to renounce his pretensions, and to renew the former treaties which existed between the two kingdoms. In the moments of peace he devoted himself wisely to improve the character of his subjects, and to meliorate their situation. Public robberies were repressed with severity, the respect for religion was enforced, the streets of Paris were rendered more commodious, and were paved, and the whole city was surrounded and fortified with walls and battlements. His conduct towards the Jews, however, tarnished the glory of his reign, and all their extortions could not justify his cruelty, nor permit that their just and lawful debtors should be discharged from their bonds. His disputes with the count of Flanders, and afterwards with Henry II. of England, were forgotten in his wishes to accompany the crusaders to the Holy Land. With the new king of England, Richard I. he laid siege to Acre, at the head of 300,000 men; but though victorious, he returned to Europe with little glory, and with no solid advantage. Jealousy between him and the king of England had produced a rupture, but though, on a mutual reconciliation, Philip had sworn on the gospels, not to make any attempt against his rival's dominions, in his absence, he had the cowardice to invade Normandy, and to take Evreux, and other places. A defeat at Rouen was followed by a truce, and the French monarch soon after married Engelburge, princess of Denmark, who was afterwards dishonorably divorced for Agnes, the daughter of the duke of Merania. This conduct roused the resentment of the pope, and for fear of excommunication, the monarch resigned his new bride, and was reconciled to his insulted queen. In 1199 Philip supported the pretensions of Arthur to the crown of England, against his uncle, the usurper, John, and on the base murder of the young prince, the guilty monarch was summoned before the peers of France, to answer for his unnatural conduct. Condemned for the atrocious murder, he was deprived of his dominions on the continent, and Philip, pleased to strip so powerful a vassal, was still further animated in his hostility by the pope, whom John had offended. The French monarch was empowered by Innocent II. to seize England; but while he prepared to execute this pleasing command, the cowardly John resigned his dominions into the hands of the holy see, and Philip was required to desist from attempts against the chief of the church. The numerous armaments which had been prepared for the conquest of England, alarmed the neighbouring princes, and Philip had a war to maintain against Germany; but the famous battle of Bouvines in 1214, restored peace to France. Still ambitious to possess England, the French king prevailed upon the English barons, who offered him the crown, to call to their assistance his son Lewis, who, consequently, with his support, invaded the British dominions, and was crowned king at London. The death of John, however, frustrated all the plans of Philip; the English renounced their allegiance to their foreign master, for their lawful prince, and Lewis returned a private man to France. Philip died soon after at Nantes, 14th July, 1223, aged 59. He was a wise and politic prince, intrepid as a warrior, enlightened as a legislator, and impartial as a judge. He was the most powerful of the French kings of the third race, and more than any other, enlarged his dominions by the acquisition of new provinces.

PHILIP III. or the Hardy, was proclaimed king, 1270, in Africa, on the death of his father Lewis IX. whom he had accompanied against the infidels. After defeating the Saracens, and making a truce for 10 years with with the king of Tunis, he returned to France. The murder of the French at Palermo, at the Sicilian vespers, roused his indignation, and as Peter, king of Aragon was the cause of this dreadful massacre, Philip marched against him with an army. He took the towns of Elna and of Gironne, and might have enlarged his conquests, had he not been seized by a violent fever, which proved fatal at Perpignan, 6th Oct. 1285, in his 41st year.

PHILIP IV. or the Fair, succeeded his father Philip III. at the age of 17. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Edward I. of England, and had, in consequence, to maintain a war against him, the count of Flanders, and the emperor of Germany. Philip proved victorious in Guienne and at Furnes, 1296, but six years after lost the battle of Courtrai, in which the count of Artois and 10,000 of the chosen troops of France lost their lives. Two years after the French army recovered their honor at Mont-en-Puelle, where 25,000 Flemings were slain, and to celebrate this important victory, the highly finished equestrian statue of the monarch was erected in the church of Notre Dame. The peace with the Flemings was followed by a new dispute with the pope Boniface VIII. and by opposing the claims of the holy see, in the collation of benefices, Philip saw himself excommunicated, and his kingdom under an interdict. The monarch, undismayed, ordered the pope's bull to be burned with every mark of indignity; but the differences were at last settled by the death of the pontiff; and the two next successors, Boniface IX. and Clement V., more peaceful and moderate, annulled the proceedings of their more violent predecessor, and a reconciliation was effected with France. More fully to please Philip, the pope assented to the abolition of the order of the knights templars, and these innocent victims to royal prejudice, were in consequence, treated with great cruelty and the most wanton persecution. Philip died by a fall from his horse, 29th Nov. 1314, aged 46. He had married Jane, the heiress of the kingdom of Navarre, by whom he had Lewis X. whose only daughter Jane brought the dominions of Navarre to the house of Evreux.

PHILIP V. king of France, surnamed the Long, was the younger son of Philip the Fair, and succeeded to the throne after his brother Lewis Hutin, 1316, to the exclusion of his niece, agreeable to the provisions of the Salique law. He made war against the Flemings, renewed the alliance with Scotland, and banished the Jews from his kingdom. He formed the plan of equalizing weights and measures all over his dominions, but could never effect it. During his reign leprosy was very prevalent, and as those afflicted with that terrible disorder were exonerated from certain taxes, and enjoyed peculiar immunities; instead of being lessened, the evil seemed to increase, till the general indignation was excited, and the wretched sufferers, accused of flagitious crimes, were either put to death, or confined in prisons. The king died 3d Jan. 1328, aged 28.

PHILIP DE VALOIS, first king of France, of the collateral branch of the Valois, was son of Charles count de Valois, the brother of Philip the Fair, and he ascended the throne on the death of his cousin Charles the Fair, 1328. His elevation was disputed by Edward III. of England, the maternal grandson of Philip the Fair, though he had lately done homage to the new monarch for the territories of Guienne, and in consequence of this a terrible war was kindled between the two nations. Assuming the title of king of France, Edward invaded the country, supported by the arms of the Flemings, and victory marked his steps. His fleet defeated the French ships in 1340, and in 1346 the celebrated battle of Cressy was fought, in which France lost nearly 30,000 men, among whom were the flower of the French nobility, and the gallant blind king of Bohemia. The loss of Calais, and other important places, were the rewards of this signal victory; but though Philip refused to accept the challenge of his rival to single combat, a short cessation of arms was agreed upon. Philip died soon after, 23d Aug. 1350, aged 57, leaving an impoverished kingdom, and a disputed succession.

PHILIP I. son of the emperor Maximilian, by his marriage in 1490, with Jane, queen of Spain, the heiress of Ferdinand of Arragon, and Isabella of Castille, obtained the Spanish crown. He was a man of very moderate abilities, but regarded as the fairest man of his age. He died at Burgos, 25th Sept. 1506, aged 28, in consequence of exerting himself too much in playing at tennis.

PHILIP II. son of Charles V. and Isabella of Portugal, was made king of Naples and Sicily in 1554, on his father's abdication, and also king of England by his marriage with queen Mary, and two years after he ascended the Spanish throne by the extraordinary resignation of his father. He made war against the French, and obtained a famous victory at the battle of St. Quintin, in 1557, during which, it is said, he was so terrified, that he made two vows; the one, never again to appear in a fight, and the next, to erect a monastery in honor of St. Lawrence, to whose powerful influence he ascribed the success of his arms. This celebrated victory, which might have made him master of France, was followed by the capture of only a few neighbouring little towns; so that Charles, his father, on hearing of the battle, asked if his son were at Paris, and being answered in the negative, turned his back with contempt on the messenger. Another victory at Gravelines was equally abused, till the treaty of Cateau Cambresis re-established peace between the two monarchies in 1559. On his return to Spain, Philip gratified himself with the exhibition of an auto-da-fe, when the inquisition condemned to the flames 40 wretches who were accused of heresy. Sanguinary in his conduct, and violent in his measures, he soon alienated the affections of his subjects; and the Flemings, harassed by his oppressions, threw off the yoke. In vain the duke of Alva, by valor as much as by severity, attempted to restore subordination; seven provinces were severed from the Spanish yoke, and under the name of United Provinces, established their rank and independence among nations. Though unsuccessful in the Low Countries, Philip had the good fortune to subdue Portugal to his power, and in the madness of his ambition he now formed plans for the subjection of England, which the death of Mary had placed under the administration administration of the heroic Elizabeth. In 1588 the Invincible Armada failed from Lisbon, for the conquest of England; but the storms and the valor of the English were enemies which the ambitious monarch was not prepared to encounter. The fleet was dispersed and cut to pieces, and when Philip heard of the loss of his 100 ships, and of 20,000 of his men, he replied with great resignation, I had sent my fleet against the English, and not against the winds; the Lord's will be done. Ever restless, Philip still fowed dissension among his neighbours, by encouraging the league in France against their lawful sovereign, and by assuming the title of protector of these rebels; but death, at last, came to terminate his ambition and his life. He died 13th Sept. 1598, aged 72. Though represented by some, ferocious and unprincipled as Tiberius, and by others, wife and discreet as Solomon, Philip may be considered as a man of great abilities, too much, indeed, guided by superstition, and too strongly attached to family pride, and the love of universal dominion, yet, endowed with sagacity, able and eager to distinguish merit, and during a long reign, if not the first man, yet the chief personage in Europe who could decide and regulate the interests of states, and command respect among all nations.

PHILIP III. son of Philip II. and Anne of Austria, succeeded his father on the Spanish throne at the age of 20. The war of the Netherlands was continued with increased virulence, and he made himself master of Ostend by his general Spinola, after a siege of three years, and the loss of 80,000 men; but vigor was wanted to guide his counsels, and by making peace with his enemies, he firmly established the house of Nassau in the possession of the rebellious provinces of Holland. Dissatisfied with the conduct of his Moorish subjects, who were accused of being Mussulmans at heart, though their general behaviour was peaceful, and their industry was the support of the kingdom, Philip, in an unlucky hour, issued a decree for their banishment in 30 days, and thus robbed his kingdom of the arts, the knowledge, and the laborious services of above a million of his subjects. This severe blow on the population and the industry of the country could never be recovered, though the monarch granted the most liberal privileges for the encouragement of agriculture and of the arts. He died soon after, a victim to court etiquette. While in the council with his ministers, he complained of the disagreeable smell of the brazier which warmed the room; but as the officer who took care of the fire was absent, no one ventured to remove the offensive utensil, and in consequence the king was taken ill, and soon after died, 31st March, 1621, aged 43.

PHILIP IV. son of Philip III. and Margaret of Austria, was king of Spain after his father, 1621. On his accession the war with Holland was renewed, as the truce was expired; but though the Spaniards were successful while commanded by Spinola, they were defeated at sea by the Dutch, near Lima. In 1635 Philip increased the number of his enemies by declaring war against France; but though at first victorious, his troops were defeated at Avenas and Casal, and Artois was taken. The Catalonians also rebelled against their sovereign, under the patronage of France, and Portugal shook off her foreign yoke, and re-established her monarch under the auspicious government of the house of Braganza, 1640. These severe losses, occasioned by the incapacity of the monarch, and the negligence of his minister Olivares, instead of rousing the nation to active exertions, were received with indifference. Olivares was indeed disgraced; but the war, instead of being prosecuted with vigor, was concluded with France by a dishonorable treaty, which separated Roussillon, Artois, and Alsace from the Spanish crown, 1659. The war with Portugal was still continued, but two unfortunate battles soon obliged Philip to acknowledge the independence of his rebellious subjects. This weak and effeminate monarch died 17th Sept. 1665, aged 60, and was succeeded by his son Charles II.

PHILIP V. duke of Anjou, second son of Lewis the dauphin of France, and Maria Anne of Bavaria, ascended the Spanish throne 1700, agreeable to the will of the last monarch Charles II. Though received with acclamations at Madrid, his elevation was opposed by the archduke Charles of Austria, supported by his father, the emperor, by England, Holland, Savoy, Prussia, and Portugal. The first events of the war were disadvantageous to the new king, he lost Arragon, Gibraltar, the Balears, Sardinia, and Naples, and was obliged to quit his capital; but while he thought of relinquishing his European dominions, and of passing to America, there to establish a new kingdom, he received powerful assistance from France, under the duke of Vendome, and in the battle of Villa Viciosa, in 1710, he recovered his losses, and was more firmly fixed on his throne by the conquests of Villars, in Flanders, and by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. Devoted to the improvement of his people, under the administration of Alberoni, Philip still sought the recovery of his lost dominions, and by degrees made himself master of Majorca, Minorca, Sardinia, and Palermo. The measures which he pursued, and the jealousy of his neighbours again kindled a new war in 1717, and the Spanish fleet was defeated with great loss in the Mediterranean, by admiral Byng. These and other disasters made the monarch anxious for peace, and the four allied courts of France, Germany, England, and Holland, insisted, as a preliminary, on the expulsion of the intriguing Alberoni, from the counsels of his master. Though peace was re-established in 1720, Philip no longer found happiness in the attachment of his people, but he became a prey to superstitious fears, and melancholy suspicions. Under this terrible mental calamity he resigned his crown, in 1724, in favor of his son Louis, and retired to a monastery; but the sudden death of the new monarch, a few months after, of the small pox, left the kingdom without a master. Roused from his retirement, Philip again resumed the reins of government; and leaving all his superstitious apprehensions behind, he became the watchful, attentive, and affectionate father of his people. In 1733 he joined France, against the emperor, in the war which was rekindled in Europe, by the nomination of Stanislaus to the Polish throne, and he had the good success to see his son Don Carlos, with an army of 30,000 men, conquer quer Sicily and Naples, and establish himself on the throne. These happy events from without were counterbalanced from within, by the dreadful conflagration which reduced the royal palace of Madrid, the archives of the kingdom, and the most valuable paintings, to ashes. Peace was restored in 1736, and Carlos confirmed in the possession of his Italian kingdoms. A new war was again kindled in 1739, but Philip died before its conclusion. He died 9th July, 1746, aged 63, after a reign of 45 years, and was succeeded by his eldest son Ferdinand VI.

PHILIP, the Good, duke of Burgundy, Brabant, and Luxemburg, succeeded on the death of his father John, who was killed at Montereau, 1419. To avenge the fate of his father he warmly embraced the party of the English against Charles VI. of France and his successor Charles VII. He defeated the dauphin at the battle of Mons-en-Vimeu, 1421, and attacked with success, Jacqueline, countess of Hainault, and obliged her to acknowledge him as the successor to her dominions. In 1435 he abandoned the English interest, and was reconciled to Charles VII.; but afterwards he embraced the party of Charles, duke of Berri, against his brother Lewis XI. and engaged in all the tumults of war. He entrusted the command of his troops to his son, the count de Charolois, who treated with unparalleled cruelty, the town of Dinan, near Liege, of which he burned the walls to the ground, and put the inhabitants to the sword; and instead of condemning such barbarity, the aged father caused himself to be carried from his bed of sickness to view with delight, the mournful spectacle. Philip, who by this lost all title to the appellation of Good, died at Bruges, 15th June, 1467, aged 71.

PHILIP DE DREUX, son of Robert of France, count of Dreux, was made bishop of Beauvais. Possessing, however, a strong inclination for military affairs, he joined the crusaders, and behaved with great valor at the siege of Acre, 1191. He afterwards joined Philip Augustus in his war against the English, and being taken prisoner, was treated with more harshness than was due to his rank. Philip complained of the severity of his confinement to pope Innocent III. who claimed him as his own son from Richard II. of England. The monarch in answer, sent to the pope the bishop's coat of mail all covered with blood, and asked the pontiff, in the words of Joseph's brethren, to Jacob, is this thy son's coat, upon which Innocent declined further to intercede. He was set at liberty, 1202, and afterwards fought at the battle of Bouvines, in 1214, and again distinguished himself against the Albigenes, in Languedoc. He died at Beauvais, 2d Nov. 1217.

PHILIP, duke of Swabia, and son of Frederic Barbarossa, was elected emperor after the death of his brother Henry VI. 1198; but a more powerful party placed the imperial crown on the head of Otho, duke of Saxony. This unfortunate division kindled a war in Germany; but at last the pope threw the weight of his authority on the side of Otho, and excommunicated Philip. Philip, however, made so respectful a submission to the sovereign pontiff, that he withdrew his anathema, and labored earnestly to effect a reconciliation between the two rivals. Arms, nevertheless, would have decided their different claims, had not Philip been basely assassinated at Bamberg, 25th June, 1208, after a reign of 11 years. He was a prince of great wisdom and strong powers of mind, and his memory is still respected in Germany.

PHILIP the Bold, fourth son of John, king of France, is celebrated for the valor with which he fought at the battle of Poitiers against the English, though only 16 years old, whilst his other timid brothers fled from the scene of slaughter. He was created duke of Burgundy, and during the confusion which prevailed in France, under his nephew Charles VI. he was called upon by the general voice of the nation to support the tottering power of the government. This elevation, and his marriage with the queen excited against him the jealousy of the duke of Orleans, and laid the foundation of that enmity which proved so fatal to those two illustrious houses, and to the kingdom. This brave and virtuous prince unfortunately was profuse in his liberalities beyond example, so that at his death his body was seized by his creditors, and with difficulty redeemed by his dukes. He died at Hall, in Hainault, 27th April, 1404, aged 63.

PHILIP of Orleans, Vid. ORLEANS.

PHILIP, infant of Spain, was placed by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, in possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia; and after signaling himself in war, he devoted himself to the happiness of his new subjects, and to the prosperity of the nation. He died 1765, aged 45, universally regretted.

PHILIP, a Phrygian, made by Antiochus Epiphanes, governor of Jerusalem. He behaved with great cruelty, and compelled the Jews to change their religion. He was appointed by Antiochus, on his death-bed, guardian of the minority of his son; but Lyfias seized upon the authority, and obliged him to fly. Philip returned and took Antioch, but was afterwards defeated and put to death by his rival.

PHILIP, the Solitary, a Greek author about 1105. He wrote Dioptra, or the Rule for a Christian.

PHILIP, of the Holy Trinity, a French ecclesiastic, who travelled into the Levant, Persia, and India, and afterwards visited all the convents of Europe. He died at Naples, 1671. He wrote Itinerarium Orientale, 8vo. — Summa Theologiæ, &c.

PHILIPS, Thomas, a native of Ickford, Bucks, educated at St. Omer's, among the jesuits, whose order he soon quitted. He was promoted to a prebend in Tongres cathedral, by the influence of the Pretender, and he died at Liege, 1774, aged 66. He published a Letter to a Student in Divinity, 8vo. 1756, a performance of merit, and three times edited — the Life of Cardinal Pole, 2 vols. 4to. 1764, and 2 vols. 8vo. 1767, a work of great celebrity, in which he supported the principles of the Romish church, and attacked the tenets of the protestants, and thus drew against himself a host of able and judicious opponents. He had a sister of the same persuasion, who died abbess of a convent of Benedictine nuns in the town of Ghent.

PHILIPS, Fabian, a learned antiquary born at Prestbury, Gloucestershire, 28th Sep. 1601. He studied in the the inns of court in London, and was a zealous supporter of the king's prerogative, which he ably defended with all the information he could collect as filazer of the records of London, Middlesex, &c. from those rich depositaries of ancient customs. He strongly protested against the beheading of Charles I. and posted up his sentiments in the most public places of the city. He wrote various pamphlets, and died 17th Nov. 1690.

PHILIPS, Catherin, a lady of great accomplishments, daughter of Mr. Fowler, a London merchant, born 1631. She married at the age of 16, James Philips of Cardigan, esq. and died much regretted, of the small-pox in London, 22d June, 1664. She translated Corneille's Pompey — and also the four first acts of his Horace, besides various poems which she published under the assumed name of Orinda, of which a second edition appeared, 1678. Her poetical talents were very respectable, and she deserved to be celebrated by the learned men of her age, by lords Orrery, Roscommon, and by Cowley and others. Her elegant correspondence with sir Charles Cotterel appeared in 1705, under the title of Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus.

PHILIPS, John, an English poet, born at Bampton, Oxfordshire, 30th Dec. 1676. He was educated at Winchester school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where extraordinary application marked his progress in literature. His first poem was the "Splendid Shilling," an excellent composition which describes the most trivial things in the lofty language of Milton. "Blenheim" was the next effusion of his muse, and the "Cyder" a happy imitation of Virgil's Georgics, appeared 1705. He wrote besides a Latin "Ode" to his patron St. John, and it has been remarked by one of his biographers, that such was his addiction to tobacco that he has introduced the praises of the fragrant fume in all his pieces except Blenheim. This excellent poet, whose character in private life was amiable and benevolent, died of a consumption and asthma at Hereford, 15th Feb. 1708, aged 32. A monument was erected to him in Westminster abbey by his friend chancellor Harcourt, with an inscription written by Atterbury, or as some say Dr. Friend.

PHILIPS, Ambrose, an English poet, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. While at college he wrote his "Pastorals," a species of poetry in which he is said to have excelled, though Pope ridiculed them, and to render his satire more poignant introduced into the Guardian a paper which in a delicate strain of irony compared the pastorals of the two rivals, and gave in an affected manner the superiority to Philips. Philips resented the attacks of the satirist, and unable to revenge himself by his pen, he stuck up a rod at Button's coffee-house which was frequented by all the wits and literati of the age, and threatened to chastise his antagonist wherever he saw him. In his circumstances he was very independent, as connected with persons high in the state, and as the friend of the Hanoverian succession he was made a justice of the peace, and in 1717 appointed one of the lottery commissioners. He was in 1734 made registrar of Dublin prerogative court by his friend Boulter the primate, and he sat in the parliament of Ireland for Armagh. He returned in 1748 to England to live on an annuity of 400l. which he had purchased; but a stroke of the palsy carried him off, 18th June, 1749, aged 78, at his lodgings near Vauxhall. He wrote three dramatic pieces of some merit, the Distressed Mother — the Briton — and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester — besides the Life of archbishop Williams, and a little poem called "a Winter Piece," which Pope condescended to commend, though he ridiculed all his other works. Dr. Johnson says he was eminent for bravery, and in conversation solemn and pompous.

PHILO, a Jew of Alexandria, sent by his countrymen to complain of the Greeks, before Caligula, A. D. 40. He wrote several things, and was called the Jewish Plato, as he was a platonist in principles.

PHILO, a grammarian of Byblos, who translated Sanchoniathon from the Phœnician into Greek.

PHILO, an architect of Byzantium, 300 B. C. He is author of a treatise on Military Machines, &c.

PHILOLAUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Crotona, who asserted the rotundity of the earth, &c. B. C. 392.

PHILOPOEMEN, a native of Megalopolis, celebrated as a general in the Achæan league against the Spartans and Ætolians. He was inhumanly poisoned by Dinocrates, the enemy's general, B. C. 183.

PHILOPONUS, John, an Alexandrian, author of a Commentary on the Creation, &c. and head of the tri-theists in the seventh century.

PHILOSTORGIUS, an Arian of Cappadocia in the fifth century, author of an Ecclesiastical History of his own time, &c.

PHILOSTRATUS, Flavius, a Greek sophist at the court of Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus. He is author of the Life of Apollonius Thyaneus, and other works.

PHILOXENUS, a dithyrambic poet, at the court of Dionysius of Syracuse, who died at Ephesus, 380 B. C.

PHILPOT, John, a native of Hampshire, educated at Winchester and New college. He was a strong friend of the reformation, and was made under Edward VI. archdeacon of Winchester, but in the next reign he was convicted of heresy before Gardiner, and burnt in Smithfield, 1555.

PHINEAS, son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the priest, was commended for his zeal in the cause of God, for killing the Israelite, and the Midianitish woman, who committed fornication in the camp of Israel, B. C. 1455.

PHIPPS, Constantine, lord Mulgrave, eldest son of lord Mulgrave, was born 1746. He early embraced the naval profession, and by the influence of friends was made post captain in 1765. In 1768 he was elected member for Lincoln, and distinguished himself in parliament by his bold and manly conduct in the several popular questions which then agitated the house, especially the Westminster election, and the libel laws. His abilities as a sailor were employed in a voyage a voyage of observation and discovery towards the north pole in 1773, and he set sail with captain Lutwidge in two ships, and at his return published an interesting narrative of his remarks and observations in 4to. He was also author of a Letter of a Member of Parliament to his Constituents on the Proceedings of the House of Commons in the Westminster Election. He succeeded to the Irish honors of his father in 1775, and in 1790 was created an English peer, and died 1792.

PHLEGON, a native of Tralles in Lydia, author of some historical tracts under Adrian. It is said that he mentioned the darkness which took place at the crucifixion of our Saviour.

PHOCAS, a Chalcedonian noble, who seized on the empire of the East, by the murder of the emperor Maurice, and of his children, 602. To maintain his power, he dispersed his spies all over the empire, and devoted to destruction those who presumed to speak against his tyranny. But though absolute, he dreaded the attacks of foreign enemies, and afraid to meet the Persians in the field, he had the art to bribe their general Narfes, and to draw him to Constantinople, where in reward for his treachery, he burned him alive. A conduct so flagitious at last roused the general indignation, and Heraclius, governor of Africa, boldly conspired against the monster, and cut off his head and his right hand, 5th Oct. 610.

PHOCAS, John, a monk of the 12th century, born in Crete, or according to others in Calabria. He for some time was in the military service of Emmanuel Comnenus, but quitted it for the monastic life; and after visiting the Holy Land, he built a small church on mount Carmel, where he fixed his residence, with other monks. He wrote a Description of the Holy Land, of Syria, Phœnicia, &c.

PHOCION, an Athenian general, who bravely fought against Philip and Alexander. Though 45 times placed at the head of affairs, he was accused at last of treachery, and cruelly put to death by his ungrateful countrymen, 318 B. C. His death was avenged by his son Phocus.

PHOCYLIDES, a Greek poet of Miletus, about 540 B. C.

PHORMIO, a peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus. He had once Annibal among his auditors, when ignorantly lecturing on the art of war.

PHORMIO, an Athenian general, who displayed great bravery during the Peloponnesian war. He sold his property to supply the pay of his army, but refused the rank of commander in chief.

PHOTINUS, bishop of Sirmium, was deposed for supporting that Christ was only a man. Though recalled by Julian, he was afterwards exiled by Valentinian, and died 376.

PHOTIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, for 10 years during which he was exposed to turbulent opposition and cabal. He was at last deposed, and died in a monastery, 891. He is author of a Commentary on Ancient writers, folio — a Collection of the Canons of the Church, folio — Letters, folio.

PHRAATES III. king of Parthia after Pacorus, was murdered by his two sons Orodes and Mithridates, B. C. 36.

PHRAATES IV. was raised to the Parthian throne by Orodes his father, whom he soon after murdered. His conduct was so tyrannical that his subjects revolted, but he was restored to his throne by the assistance of the Scythians, and at last perished by the hands of his own son.

PHRANZA, George, a Greek author, master of the wardrobe to the emperor of Constantinople. When the city was sacked by the Turks he fled to Corfu where he wrote an History or Chronicle of his own Times, to 1461.

PHREAS, or FREAS, John, an English writer, born in London about the close of the 14th century, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Baliol college. He settled at Bristol, but afterwards travelled to Italy, where learning was beginning to revive, and meeting with his countryman Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, he dedicated to him some of his performances. He translated into Latin, Diodorus Siculus, and Synesius, &c. He took his doctor's degree at Padua, where he read medical lectures, as well as at Florence, and Ferrara. He was presented by Paul II. to whom he dedicated his Diodorus, to the see of Bath, but survived the appointment only one month, being poisoned, it is said, by a competitor. It is said he acquired some fortune by practising physic in Italy. He died about 1456.

PHRYNE, a celebrated courtesan of Athens, the mistress of Praxiteles, B. C. 328. She wished to rebuild Thebes, provided her name was inscribed on the walls, which was refused.

PHRYNICUS, a Greek orator of Bithynia under Commodus, author of some treatises, &c.

PHRYNIS, a musician of Mitylene, who is said to have added two strings to the lyre, which before had only seven. B. C. 438.

PIA, Philip Nicholas, an eminent chemist, born at Paris 15th Sept. 1721. He was for some years chief surgeon of the hospital at Strasburg, and on his return to Paris, was named sheriff of the city in 1770. In this last place he exerted all his influence, and the knowledge which he derived from experience to establish a society for the recovery of drowned or suffocated persons. He furnished the establishment with the necessary apparatus, and the first year not less than 24 persons were saved and restored from the waters of the Seine; but the revolution unfortunately ruined his humane projects, and reduced him to extreme poverty. This benevolent and amiable man died 11th May, 1799. He wrote an account of his humane projects in several vols. 8vo. and 12mo. published 1770, and 1773.

PIAZZI, Jerome Bartholomew, an Italian born at Alexandria. He turned protestant from Dominican friar and came to England, where he published a curious account of the inquisition in Italy, with which he was well acquainted, as he had been one of its delegate judges. He maintained himself by teaching French and Italian at Cambridge, and died there 1745.

PIAZETTA, John Baptist, a painter of Venice, whose pieces possess great merit in the elegance, expression and grace of his figures. He studied much the the style of Michael Angelo; but in the midst of his great abilities he was intemperate and prodigal, and died so poor that his body was conveyed to the grave at the common expence of his friends. He died 1754, aged 72.

PIBRAC, Vid. FAUR.

PICARD, John, a French ecclesiastic, born at La Fleche. He was prior of Rille in Anjou, and member of the academy of sciences, and acquired great celebrity as an astronomer. By order of the French king, he visited in 1671, Uraniburg, and there assisted Tycho Brahe in his celestial observations, and after his return he was employed with Cassini in measuring an arc of the meridian in France. He died 1683. He wrote treatises on Levelling — on Measures — on Dioptrics — on the Measurement of the Earth — an Account of his Observations at Uraniburg, &c. — besides communications to the memoirs of the French academies. He was also the first who applied a telescope to a quadrant.

PICART, Bernard, a famous engraver, born at Paris 1673. He studied design under his father, and perspective and architecture under Sebastian le Clerc. As he was a protestant he settled in Holland, where he produced the best part of his admired pieces. He died at Amsterdam, 1733, 12 years after his father, who was then 90. His engravings were published, folio, Amsterdam, 1784. His best performance is an illustration of the various religious ceremonies of all nations, and his plates for the temple of the muses are also much admired.

PICART, Michael, a native of Nuremberg, who was professor of philosophy and poetry at Altorf, where he died 1620, aged 46. He was the friend of Isaac Casaubon, and published Commentaries on some of Aristotle's works — Disputes — Harangues — Critical Essays — a Latin translation of Appian, 1604. — His Liber Singularis Periculorum Criticorum, was published at Nuremberg by John Saubert, 37 years after his death.

PICCINI, Nicholas, a celebrated musician, born at Bari, in the kingdom of Naples. He was intended for the church by his father, but his fondness for music prevailed, and he had for his masters the famous Leo, and afterwards Durante, who saw and foretold his future celebrity. In 1754 he began to display his great abilities, and soon acquired the highest reputation in the cities of Italy. From Italy he came to Paris, and for a while divided the applauses of the public with Gluck; but the climate of France was too severe for his weak constitution, and he returned to Naples. Instead, however, of being received with kindness, he was treated as a revolutionist, and accused before the government as a jacobin, mischievous and violent. Without the possibility of vindicating himself, he escaped from Italy and returned to France, and died at Passy, overpowered by age and misfortunes, 7th May 1800, aged 72. In private life he was an amiable man, distinguished by benevolence, kindness, and affability. His operas, which he composed in Italy, are above 100 in number, besides those performed in France, the best known of which are, Roland — Atys — Iphigenia in Tauris — Dido, &c.

An account of his life and works has been published by his friend Ginguené at Paris.

PICCOLOMINI, James, an Italian ecclesiastic, born near Lucca. He became successively bishop of Massa, of Fiescati, was made a cardinal 1461, and exchanged his name of Ammati for that of Piccolomini, out of respect for Pius II. his patron. He died 1479, aged 57, of an indigestion. Sixtus IV. claimed the property which he had left at his death in the hands of his bankers, and appropriated part of it in the endowment of the hospital of the holy ghost. Piccolomini wrote Commentaries, or History of his own Times, from 1464 to 1469 — besides Letters, &c.

PICCOLOMINI, Alexander, author of several dramatic pieces, was born at Sienna, where he was coadjutor, and also archbishop of Patras. He died at Sienna, 12th March 1578. He was the first who used the Italian language in philosophical subjects. His works are numerous, the best known of which are a treatise on the Sphere — Moral Institutes — a Theory of the Planets — the Morality of Nobles, &c. The work called, "Della Bella Creanza della Donne," is attributed to him.

PICCOLOMINI, Francis, of the same family, was born 1520, and taught for 22 years philosophy in the Italian universities. He died at Sienna, 1604, and his death was mourned by the whole city. He wrote Commentaries on Aristotle, 4to. — Universa Philosophia de Moribus, folio.

PICHEGRU, Charles, a French general, born at Arbois in Franche Comté, 1761. Though of obscure birth, he received a good education among the monks of his native place, and then entering into the army, he rose from the ranks by gradual steps to command, and at the revolution obtained the office of general. His abilities were well known to his superiors, and therefore were usefully employed; and by the victory at Hagenau over the combined forces, he procured promotion, and was named commander in chief of the army of the north. The relief of Landau, the discomfiture of the Austrians under marshal Cobourg, and the able and rapid manœuvres by which he completed the conquest of Holland, tended strongly to recommend him to the national gratitude, and therefore he was elected in 1797 a member of the legislature. In this new office his conduct was firm and manly; but his opposition to the measures of the directory, drew upon him unpopularity, and he was one of those unfortunate victims who were accused of intentions to destroy the republic and restore royalty, and who were, without trial, and in the most arbitrary manner, sent with every mark of ignominy prisoners to Cayenne. He had the good fortune to escape from this climate which proved so fatal to several of his fellow sufferers, and came to England. Here he remained an honorable exile till 1804, when he ventured to visit Paris in disguise; but so vigilant is an arbitrary government, he could not escape the eyes of the police, and as rumors of plots against the ruler of France were industriously circulated, he was seized with others on suspicion of machinations against the safety of the country, and immured in the Temple. A little time after, 6th April 1804, he was discovered in his apartment, ment, strangled by means of a black silk handkerchief, twisted round his neck with a short stick, taken from the faggot which was to light his fire. The position of his body was such that no struggle seemed to have been made in the agonies of expiring nature; but though it could easily be concluded that he had been assassinated, and that he could not possibly have been himself the cause of his own suffocation, the corpse was examined before a select number of medical men, and a prolix report was drawn up to prove that he had destroyed himself. So improbable an imputation against a man who had braved death in a thousand dangers, could not be believed even in the streets of Paris.

PICHON, John, a native of Lyons, eminent among the jesuits. He was employed in Lorraine by king Stanislaus; but his zeal gave offence to his superiors, and his book called the Spirit of Jesus Christ and of the Church, &c. not only was condemned at Rome, but received afterwards the severe censures of the author himself. He died 5th May 1751, aged 68.

PICHOT, Peter, a physician of eminence at Bourdeaux, in the 16th century. He published treatises on the Plague — de Morbis Animi — de Rheumatismo, &c.

PICHOU, N. a French poet of Dijon, who was assassinated in 1631, in the flower of his age. He was author of some dramatic pieces of no great merit; l'Aminte, a pastoral — a poetical translation of the pastoral of la Filis de Scire.

PICTET, Benedict, a native of Geneva, who after studying in his native city with great reputation, and travelling over Holland, England, and other parts of the continent, was honorably solicited to fill the chair of theology at Leyden. He declined the liberal offer, and preferred the divinity chair of his native town, which he filled with great ability. He died at Geneva 9th June, 1724, aged 69. He was a most benevolent man, and a most pious and vigilant pastor. He was author of Christian Theology, 3 vols. 4to. in Latin — Christian Morality, 8 vols. 12mo. — History of the 11th and 12th centuries, 2 vols. 4to. — treatise against Religious Indifference — sermons — letters — and other religious tracts.

PICUS, Vid. MIRANDULA.

PIDOU, Francis, lord of St. Olan, a native of Touraine, became gentleman in ordinary to Lewis XIV. who discovered his abilities, and employed him as his ambassador to Madrid, Genoa, and Morocco. He acquitted himself much to the satisfaction of his master, and was made knight of St. Lazarus. He died at Paris 1720, aged 80. He wrote the present State of Morocco, 1694, 12mo. — the most remarkable Events in the Reign of Lewis XIV. 12mo.

PIERCE, Edward, an English painter in the reign of Charles I. and II. He excelled in drawings of architecture, perspective, altar pieces, &c.; but unfortunately the best part of his works was destroyed in the fire of London. He died in London about 1715, leaving three sons.

PIERCE, James, a native of Exeter, eminent as a presbyterian divine. He was at the head of a dissenting congregation in his native town; but in 1725 his preaching in favor of Arianism produced a violent dispute, in consequence of which he was expelled from his meeting, and opened another in conjunction with his friend Hallet. He also published a vindication of his conduct, and of his principles, in a pamphlet called Western Inquisition, which occasioned a tedious paper war. He wrote also a Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, 4to. — sermons — a Vindication of the Protestant Dissenters, English and Latin, &c. He died 1730.

PIERINO, or PIRINO DEL VAGA, a native of Tuscany, son of a soldier, and nursed by a she goat. He was taught painting by Vaga, and exchanged the name of Buonacorsi for that of his teacher. By great application he acquired extensive reputation, and was engaged by Raphael in the completion of his designs at Rome in the Vatican, and afterwards he embellished Doria's palace at Genoa, and adorned other cities of Italy with the extraordinary labors of his pencil. His passage of the Jordan, the fall of the walls of Jericho, the sun standing still at Joshua's command, are among his best pieces. He died of an apoplexy 1547, in his 47th year.

PIERQUIN, John, son of a lawyer at Charleville, studied at Rheims, where he took his divinity degrees. He was for 40 years minister of Chatel in the diocese of Rheims, and died there 1742, aged 70. He wrote on the Color of Negroes — on Raising Spirits — on the Sabbath of Witches — Magical Transformations — Proof of Innocence by Immersion — Amphibious Animals — on the Conception of Jesus Christ, a dissertation — Life of St. Juvin, &c.

PIERSON, Christopher, an historical and portrait painter, born at the Hague. His hunting pieces were particularly admired. He died 1714, aged 83.

PIETRO DI PETRI, an historical painter. He was a native of Rome, and the pupil and imitator of Carlo Maratti. He died 1716, aged 51.

PIETRO DE LA FRANCISCA, a native of Florence, distinguished as a painter, and as a popular writer on arithmetic and geometry. He was patronized by Nicolas V. and employed in adorning the Vatican. He died 1443.

PICALLE, John Baptist, an eminent sculptor, born at Paris 1714. By the liberality of the elder Conflon he was enabled to go to Italy, where with assiduous zeal he studied the works of the best masters. On his return to France he was patronized by Lewis, who made him knight of the order of St. Michael, and chancellor of the academy of painting. His best works are a Mercury and Venus, for the king, and presented by him to the king of Prussia — Saxe's Monument — the Statue of Lewis XV. — Voltaire — a Boy holding a Cage — a Girl extracting a Thorn from her Foot, &c. He died at Paris, 20th Aug. 1785.

PIGANIOL DE LA FORCE, John Aymar de, a native of Auvergne, who acquired some eminence as a writer on geography and history. He is author of a Description, Historical and Geographical, of France, 15 vols. 12mo. a work of merit, — a Description of Paris, 10 vols. 12mo. afterwards abridged in 2 vols. 12mo. — Description of Versailles and Marly, 2 vols. 12mo. — Voyage de France, 2 vols. &c. This re-respectable man, amiable in private life, died at Paris, Feb. 1753, aged 80.

PIGHIUS, Albert, a native of Kampen in Overijssel, who studied at Cologne, and Louvaine, and was provost of St. John's church at Utrecht, where he died 1542, aged 52. He was author of Affertio Hierarchiæ Ecclesiasticæ, fol. and controversial works against Luther, Melancthon, and the other great reformers.

PIGHIUS, Stephen Vinand, a learned German, nephew to Albert was born at Kampen in Overijssel 1520. He was well versed in Roman antiquities, and was patronized by Cardinal de Granvelle, and by the prince of Juliers and Cleves, to whose son he was tutor. He died at Santen, where he was canon, in his 85th year. He published an edition of Valerius Maximus — Latin Annals of Rome, 3 vols. fol. — Hercules Prodicus, a panegyric on the premature death of his illustrious pupil, and other works.

PIGNONI, Simon, a native of Florence, eminent as a painter. His pieces are on religious subjects, and are few, but very valuable. He died 1612.

PIGNORIUS, Laurentius, a learned Italian, born at Padua, 1571. He was canon of Treviso, and died of the plague at Padua, 1631. He wrote Menfa Ifiaca, to illustrate the Egyptian antiquities — poems — a treatise De Servis & eorum apud Veteres Ministeriis — Origini de Padoua, and other works.

PIGRAY, Peter, an eminent surgeon at Paris, employed in the armies of Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. He was the disciple and rival, and yet the friend, of the celebrated Ambrose Paré, and published Chirurgica cum aliis Medicinæ Partibus, &c. — Epitome Præceptorum Medicinæ, &c. He died 1613.

PILATE, Pontius, a Roman, governor of Judæa. It was before him that our Saviour was brought, and by him he was ignominiously condemned to death, through the fear of the Jews, though he asserted himself, from the tribunal, his innocence. Pilate was removed from Judæa by Tiberius for his cruelty and oppression, and sent an exile to Gaul, where he hanged himself, A. D. 37. The letter, said to be written by him, to Tiberius, giving an account of our Saviour and his miracles, is spurious.

PILATRE DU ROSIER, Francis, a native of Metz, who learned the business of an apothecary in his native town, and then came to Paris, where he established a museum, and studied chemistry. The discovery of balloons by Montgolfier, roused all his attention, and he was one of the first who ventured to ascend the air in those frail and dangerous vehicles. After various successful experiments in the presence of the learned of Paris, and also of the Royal family, Pilatre formed the bold plan of passing over to England. He came to Boulogne, and on the 15th June, 1785, he, accompanied by his friend Romain, rose in a beautiful balloon before thousands of spectators, with the hopes of crossing the channel. Half an hour after, however, the machine caught fire, and the two unfortunate aeronauts were precipitated from a height of above 1500 feet to the ground, and dashed to pieces. Pilatre was taken up dead; but his companion shewed signs of life for a few minutes. They were buried in the village of Wimille, where a monument records their merits and their misfortune.

PILES, Roger de, an ingenious painter, born at Clamecy, 1635. He studied at Nevers and Auxerre, and afterwards at Paris. He was tutor to Amelot, son of the president of that name, whom he attended when sent as ambassador to Venice, and other European courts, and thus had the opportunity of viewing the finest executions of art. After thus visiting Lisbon and Switzerland, he was in 1692, sent to Holland as a secret negotiator, but in the character of a picture virtuoso. His intrigues, however, were discovered, and he was thrown into prison, from which the peace of Ryfwick liberated him. In his confinement he wrote the lives of painters, and on his return to France received a pension. He died 1709, aged 74. He published besides a Translation of Dufresnoy — an Abridgment of Anatomy accommodated to Painting and Sculpture — Dissertation on the Works of Famous Painters — Dialogues on the Knowledge of Painting, &c.

PILKINGTON, Letitia, a lady of great wit and literary celebrity, daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, of Dutch extraction, was born in Dublin, 1712. She became early known for her poetical talents, and out of her many admirers she selected the Rev. Matt. Pilkington, author of some miscellanies, for her husband; but her union was attended with unhappiness. The husband grew jealous, and the wife rendered the quarrel more inveterate by her levity of conduct. They separated, but afterwards she followed her husband to London, and lived with him; but at last, the apprehension of a gentleman in her bed room, at two o'clock in the morning, rendered the breach between them incurable. She attempted to vindicate herself by saying, that this nocturnal intruder was waiting for her reading a book, which he refused to lend; but the apology is as improbable as it is indelicate. She afterwards lived on the generosity of the great and the learned, and especially of Cibber, and at one time set up with a stock of five guineas, a small shop for books, in St. James's street. She died soon after at Dublin, 29th Aug. 1750, aged 39. She wrote the Turkish Court, or London Apprentice, a comedy — the Roman Father, a tragedy — Memoirs of herself, &c. besides light poems of considerable merit.

PILON, Germain, a native of Maine, known as an able sculptor and architect. The ingenious productions of his chisel adorn the churches and the palaces of Paris. He died 1590.

PILON, Frederic, a native of Cork, in Ireland, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, under Dr. Cullen, but quitted it for the stage. Nature had not, however, formed him for eminence as an actor, and he had recourse to his pen, and commenced author, by the publication of an Essay on the Character of Hamlet, as performed by Henderson. He afterwards wrote the Invasion, or a Trip to Brighton, well received in 1778. He wrote besides the Humors of an Election, a farce, 1780. — He would be a Soldier, a comedy, represented with applause at Covent Garden, 1786. This author, whose merit began to be liberally patronized by the town, and whose company was courted by the witty and the fashionable of the times, unfortunately fortunately gave way to debauched habits, and died of intemperance, 1788, aged 38.

PILPAY, an ancient Bramin fabulist, whose fables, written above 2000 years ago, were translated into French from the Greek or Persian, by Galland, 1755. It is supposed that he was governor of Indostan, and counsellor to an Indian king. The "Shipwreck of the Floating Islands", is also attributed to him.

PINÆUS, Sewerinus, or PINEAU, an eminent surgeon, born at Chartres, 1550. He became surgeon to the king, and acquired reputation in cutting for the stone, an operation then little understood. He published a Latin Treatise on the Marks of Virginity, much read, besides a French Account of Stones extracted from the bladder. He died at Paris, 1619.

PINAS, John, a native of Haerlem, 1596, who studied painting in Italy. His beauties, and particularly his mode of coloring, were imitated with great success by Rembrandt. His brother James also acquired reputation as an eminent painter.

PINDAR, prince of lyric poets, was born at Thebes, in Boeotia. He was particularly happy in celebrating the conquerors at the public games of Greece, and his fame was so highly honored that when Alexander sacked Thebes, he spared the house where the poet was born. He died about B. C. 440.

PINEAU, Gabriel du, a native of Angers, who was called to the bar, and came to Paris, where he acquired great celebrity by his genius and eloquence. His abilities were so respectable, and his opinions so disinterested, that he was confidentially consulted in all affairs of moment, so that he was made master of requests by Mary de Medicis, and by her son Lewis XIII. mayor and captain general of the town of Angers. He was so universally respected, that he acquired the extraordinary appellation of father of the people. He died 15th Oct. 1644, aged 71. He was author of Latin Notes on the Canon Law in opposition to Du Moulin — Commentaries, Observations, and Consultations on various Questions on Custom and Law, with Dissertations, &c. 2 vols. fol.

PINEDA, John, a learned jesuit, born at Seville. He was well skilled in oriental literature, and taught philosophy and theology in several colleges. He died 1637, much regretted. He wrote Commentaries on Job, 2 vols. fol. — and also on Ecclesiastes — a learned work De Rebus Solomonis, fol. — an Universal History of the Church, in Spanish, 4 vols. fol. — a History of Ferdinand II. in Spanish, &c.

PINELLI, John Vincent, an Italian, son of a noble Genoese, was born at Naples, 1533. He settled at Padua, where he showed his taste, and the fruit of his excellent education by holding a learned correspondence with the most scientific men of Europe, and by making a noble collection of books, which, to his honor, was freely opened to the perusal of the curious. He died 1601, and his excellent library enriched with the most valuable MSS. and the most curious specimens of antiquity, medal, and botany, was removed from Padua to Naples, where his descendants preserved it. In 1785, on the death of Maphæus, his descendant, who had been a learned printer at Venice, this noble collection passed into the hands of an English book-feller, and was sold in London by public auction in 1790.

PINET, Anthony du, a native of Befançon, who defended, in the 16th century, the protestant tenets, which he had embraced. He also translated Pliny's Natural History into French, Lyons, 2 vols. fol. 1566, and Paris 1608, a work of great merit, on account of his learned notes.

PINET, N. a merchant of Paris, to whose intrigues the scarcity of grain, during the year 1789, was attributed. He was summoned to Marly, to discover to the king's ministers, the cause of this supposed monopoly; but a few days after the conference, he was found murdered in a wood near Passy, 29th July, 1789.

PINGERON, J. C. a native of Lyons, author of some works of merit, on commercial and political subjects. He also translated several works from the Italian and the English. He died at Versailles, 1795, aged 60.

PINGRE, Alexander Guy, librarian of St. Genevieve, was born at Paris, 14th Sept. 1711. His great abilities, and his partiality for astronomy soon recommended him, and he was sent by the French government, in 1760, to the South seas, to observe the passage of Venus over the sun's disc. He afterwards went with Courtanvaux, to Holland, to ascertain the accuracy of the sea-time pieces of Le Roy, and then embarked as historian on board of the Isis and Flora, on a voyage of discovery. He was, for his services to science, made marine astronomer, and admitted member of the academy of sciences, and afterwards of the Institute. This venerable philosopher died at Paris, 1796, aged 84. His works are State of the Heavens from 1755 to 1757 — Memoir on the Discoveries in the South Seas, 4to. — an Historical and Theoretical Treatise on Comets, 2 vols. 4to. — a translation of Manilius' Astronomy, 8vo. — History of Astronomy in the 17th Century — Memoirs of the Abbé Arnaud, &c.

PINON, James, a native of Paris, distinguished at the bar for his eloquence, his integrity, and extensive information. He was also a good Latin poet, and wrote De Anno Romano, a poem, dedicated to Lewis XIII. &c. His poetical pieces were published at Paris, 1615, and 1630, 8vo. He died 1641.

PINSON, Richard, a native of Normandy, in the service of Caxton. It is said, that like his master, he excelled as a printer, as he was honored by the patronage of Henry VII. and VIII. He printed the Magna Charta, and various books, which are now very scarce, but objects of great curiosity. He died 1530.

PINTOR, Peter, a native of Valentia, in Spain; physician to pope Alexander VI. He was an able writer, and died at Rome, 1503, aged 83. His works, now scarce, are Aggregator Sententiarum Doctorum de Curat. Pestilentia, fol. 1499 — De Morbo Fædo & Occulto, &c. 1550, 4to. a work in which he asserts that the venereal disease was known in Europe before 1496.

PINTURICCIO, Bernardino, an Italian painter, who was patronized by pope Innocent VIII. and Alexander VI. His historical pieces and portraits were much admired. He died 1513, aged 59.

PIPER, Francis le, an English painter, descended from a Walloon family, settled in Kent. He was early fond of designing, and took particular delight in drawing ugly faces. He was so happy in delineating the features, that he could draw from memory, so that he was said to steal a face, and every person either deformed, or averse to be exhibited on canvas, was afraid in his company, of having his imperfections made the subject of his pencil. His fortune was independent, therefore he never took any thing for what he drew; so that by frequenting the Mitre tavern, in Stock's market, he contributed to the celebrity of the house, by his humor and vivacity, and to its ornament by giving it many of his pieces. In the last part of his life he brought on a fever upon himself by free living, and upon being bled, the surgeon unfortunately pricked an artery, which accident proved mortal 1740.

PIPER, Count, counsellor of state and first minister to Charles XII. of Sweden, was taken prisoner by the Russians, at the fatal battle of Pultowa, and conveyed to Petersburg. His captivity was rendered more dreadful, as the Czar Peter suspected him to be the cause of the war which Charles had undertaken against Russia. He died in the fortrefs of Schlusfelburg 1716, aged 70, and his remains were delivered to the Swedish monarch, who by a magnificent funeral atoned for the hardships which his minister had endured.

PIRANESI, John Baptist, an eminent architect and engraver, born at Venice. He settled at Rome where he acquired great celebrity. His style of etching was so free that he generally drew all at once upon the plate without a previous sketch, so that his plates were very numerous and equally well finished. His engravings have been collected in several vols. folio, containing a very great number of most interesting and valuable plates. He was intimate with some of the English artists, especially Mylne the architect of Blackfriar's bridge, and promised to dedicate one of his works to lord Charlemont, but erased, in consequence of a quarrel, the name of his patron from his plates. He died about 1778. His daughter Laura, was also famous as an engraver after the manner of her father, and died 1785. One of his sons was employed in a diplomatic line.

PIROMALLI, Paul, a Dominican of Calabria, sent as a missionary into the East. During his residence in Armenia he converted to the catholic faith several Eutycheans and other heretics, and after visiting Persia and Georgia he returned to Europe to represent Urban VIII. as his nuncio in Poland. On his return to Italy he was seized by pirates and carried to Tunis, and when set at liberty he was received by the pope with every mark of kindness and esteem. After revising an Armenian bible, he was again sent into the East and appointed bishop of Nasilvan. After a residence of nine years there he returned to Italy, and died three years after, at Bisignano 1667. He was a zealous and most learned ecclesiastic. He was author of Controversial and Theological Tracts — two Dictionaries, the one Latin-Persian, and the other Armenian-Latin — an Armenian Grammar — and a Directory.

PIRON, Alexis, author of Metromanie, a comedy, and of other works, plays, poems, tales, &c. collected in 7 vols. 8vo. was born at Dijon 1689. His vivacity and the wit and agreeable manner of his conversation, rendered him the friend and favorite of the great at Paris. He died 1778. His comedies are said to be far superior to his tragedies, and the best of his works.

PISAN, Thomas, an astrologer of Bologna. He went to Venice at the solicitation of Forli, counsellor of the republic, whose daughter he married, and afterwards when invited by Charles V. of France he settled in Paris, and died there 1380, the very day it is said which he had foretold.

PISAN, Christina de, daughter of the above, was born at Venice 1363, and went with her father to Paris, where at the age of 15 her beauty and wit procured an excellent husband whom she lost 10 years after. She was patronised and pensioned by Charles V. whose history she wrote. She died about 1420. She wrote besides, an hundred stories of Troy in rhyme — a collection of poems — Treasure of the City of Ladies.

PISANI, Vidior, a Venetian general who distinguished himself against the Genoese and the Dalmatians. An unfortunate expedition turned his popularity into public odium, but the sentence of death was changed into imprisonment for five years. At the expiration of his confinement the sailors of Venice loudly demanded him to conduct them against the Genoese who threatened their country with a dreadful war, and he was received with acclamations, and led his countrymen to victory. He died in the midst of his successes 1380.

PISCATOR, John Fischer, professor of theology at Strasburg, was obliged to fly to Herborn, on embracing the tenets of the Calvinists. He was author of valuable Commentaries on the Old and New Testaments — Amica Collatio de Religione cum C. Vorstio, 4to. and died 1546.

PISISTRATUS, an Athenian general, who by artifice seized upon the sovereign power of his country. Though absolute he paid respect to the laws and privileges of his fellow citizens, and he died B. C. 528, in possession of the supreme power which was inherited by his sons, but soon after lost.

PISO CNEIUS, a Roman consul, accused of poisoning Germanicus in Syria, upon which he destroyed himself A. D. 20. A senator of that family assumed the imperial purple on Valerian's death, but was defeated by Valens, and put to death 261.

PISSELEV, Anne de, a woman of great beauty, born in Picardy. She was one of the maids of honor to Louisa the mother of Francis I. and she captivated the heart of the young prince. More freely to enjoy her company he married her to John de Brosles, who in thus assenting to a disgraceful union recovered some lands which his family had lost, and rose to the rank of duke of Etampes, that his guilty wife might shine with greater splendor in a corrupt court. Though the new duchess had a polished mind, and deserved to be called the fairest of the learned, and the most learned of the fair, yet she used her powerful influence to crush her enemies; and to enrich herself she hesitated not to betray the secrets of the state to the emissaries of Charles V. After the death of Francis she retired.

to one of her estates in the country, by order of the next king, Henry II. and there she died neglected and despised 1576. In the last years of her life she became a convert to the principles of the protestants.

PISTORIUS, John, a native of Nidda, who studied medicine and afterwards the law, and became counsellor to the margrave of Baden Durlach. Some time after he again changed his profession, and abandoning the protestant tenets embraced the catholic faith, and became a doctor of divinity, counsellor to the emperor, and provost of the cathedral of Breslaw, and prelate to the abbot of Fulda. He was author of treatises against the Lutherans — Artis Cabalisticæ Scriptores, a curious collection — Scriptores Rerum Polonicarum — Scriptores de Rebus Germanicis, 3 vols. fol. a valuable collection, &c. He died 1608, aged 52.

PITAU, Nicolas, a native of Antwerp, eminent as a painter and engraver. His portraits, especially that of St. Francis de Sales, and his engraving of the Holy family after Raphael were deservedly admired. He died 1671, aged 38.

PITCAIRNE, Archibald, an able physician, of an ancient family, born at Edinburgh, 25th Dec. 1652. From Dalkeith school he was removed to Edinburgh, and applied himself to divinity, and afterwards to civil law; but at last adopted physic and mathematics as his favorite profession. He studied for some time at Paris, and on his return to Scotland, excited the public attention by a small publication in which he disputed the right of Harvey to the discovery of the circulation of the blood, which he asserted was fully known to Hippocrates. In 1692, he was invited to Leyden where he accepted a chair as professor of medicine; but the next year he returned to Scotland and married. He acquired here greater reputation by his pen than by his profession. His Dissertationes Medicæ, appeared 1701, and were again edited 1713. He wrote besides some obscure Latin satirical poems, chiefly levelled against the friends of the revolution, which he by no means approved. He died 1713. His Leyden lectures were published after his death. His only daughter married the earl of Kelly.

PITHOU, Peter, a learned Frenchman, born at Troyes 1539. He studied at Paris under Turnebus, and at Bourges under Cujacius, and soon became distinguished at the bar as a learned and eloquent civilian. He escaped with difficulty the slaughter of St. Bartholomew, and as if the catastrophe influenced his opinions he immediately embraced the Romish faith. He visited England in the retinue of the duke of Montmorency, and so great was his character for learning and integrity that Ferdinand, duke of Tuscany, referred some intricate points to his impartial decision, and the third and fourth Henries employed his abilities, not only to oppose the league, but to support the Gallican church against the usurpations of the Roman pontiff. Pithou died on his birth day 1596. He published some valuable works on law, history, and classical literature, and to his indefatigable industry we are indebted for the discovery of Phædrus, of the Novella of Justinian, and other ancient books buried in obscurity. The best known of his works are treatise on the Liberties of the Gallican Church, 4 vols. fol. — Commentary on the Customs of Troyes, 4to. — notes on authors, &c.

PITHOU, Francis, brother of Peter, was born at Troyes 1544, and became procureur general of the chamber of justice under Henry IV. against the financiers, and afterwards was admitted into the king's council. He discovered the fables of Phædrus, which he published conjointly with his brother. He was a learned and amiable man, and published of his own a comparison of the laws of the Romans with those of Moles, 12mo. — an edition of the Salique Law with notes — treatise on the Greatness and the Rights of the French Monarchy, 8vo. — an edition of Comes Theologus — Observationes ad Codicem, fol. — Antiqui Rhetores Latini, Rutilius Lupus, Aquila Romanus, &c. He died universally respected 7th Feb. 1621.

PITISCU, Samuel, a learned man, born at Zutphen 1637. He studied at Deventer and Groningen, and was elected master of the school at Zutphen, and afterwards obtained the direction of the college of Jerome at Utrecht, where he died 1717. He was author of several learned works, Lexicon Latino Belgicum, 4to. — Lexicon Antiquitatum Romanorum, fol. — besides an edition of Rufinus' Rom. Antiquities — and editions of Suetonius, Q. Curtius, Aurelius Victor, &c.

PITISCUS, Bartholomew, the learned author of Theaurus Mathematicus, fol. and of a treatise on Trigonometry, died 1613.

PITOR, Henry, a French mathematician, who was born at Aramont in the diocese of Usès, 29th May, 1695, and died there 27th Dec. 1771. He was self-taught in mathematical knowledge, but so respectable that he gained the friendship of the great Reaumur, and in 1724, was admitted into the academy of sciences. He was in 1740, appointed by the states of Languedoc, their chief engineer, and he embellished the province with various monuments of his genius and abilities. He also conveyed water to Montpellier from a distance of nine miles, by canals which must ever excite the admiration of travellers. He was, in 1754, honored with the order of St. Michael, and he had been long before elected member of the Royal society of London, in consequence of his treatise on the Theory of the Management of Vessels, 1731, which was translated into English and much applauded. He enriched the memoirs of the French academies with valuable communications.

PITS or PITSEUS, John, an English biographer, born at Alton, Hants, 1560, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. After two years residence at Oxford he went to Douay, and thence to Rheims, and next to Rome, where he studied seven years and became a priest. The civil wars of France drove him from the country to Lorraine, and afterwards to Germany. By the patronage of cardinal Lorraine he obtained a canonry at Verdun, and afterwards was confessor to the dukes of Cleves for 12 years. He next was promoted to the deanery of Verdun, where he died 1616. He wrote an useful work collected from English history, containing the lives of the kings, bishops, apostolical men, and writers of England, in four large volumes; but of these only part was was published under the title of "de Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus," and some other works.

PITT, Christopher, an English poet, born at Blandford 1699, and educated at Winchester school, where he distinguished himself so much, that when chosen to college he presented to his electors a poetical translation of Lucan's Pharſalia, which unfortunately is not now extant. In 1722 he obtained from his relation Mr. Pitt of Stratfieldſea, the living of Pimpern, Dorsetshire, and after taking his master's degree in 1724, he went to reside in his native county. He closed a life of benevolence and virtue 1748, and was buried at Blandford, where a stone records the candor and simplicity of his manners, and asserts that he lived innocent and died beloved. He is chiefly known as the author of an eloquent translation of the Æneid, which rivals Dryden's, but of which it may be said, that while Pitt pleases the critic, Dryden charms the people, and that Pitt is quoted while Dryden is read; each indeed possesses peculiar beauties, but if Dryden is admired for his vigor, Pitt is entitled to the highest commendation for the excellence of his lines, and the correctness of his versification. He also translated Vida's Art of Poetry, and wrote besides some poems published in an 8vo. vol.

PITT, William, earl of Chatham, an illustrious statesman, born 15th Nov. 1708. His father was Robert Pitt of Boconnock in Cornwall, esq. and his grandfather Thomas, was the governor of Madras, who acquired some property in the East Indies, and purchased for 20,400l. a celebrated diamond, weighing 127 carats, which received the name of Regent, because sold by him to the duke of Orleans the regent of France for 135,000l. The young statesman was educated at Eton, and in 1726, he entered at Trinity college, Oxford, which he left for the military profession, and the rank of cornet. A different field of action, however, was destined for the exhibition of his powers, and in 1735, he was elected into parliament for Old Sarum, and soon began to distinguish himself as an eloquent and well informed speaker. He enlisted early in the ranks of opposition against Walpole, and in his speeches against the Spanish convention, and against the bill for registering seamen, displayed such acuteness, vehemence, and depth of argumentation as astonished the house, and marked him as worthy of the highest offices of the state. The duchess of Marlborough also the inveterate enemy of Walpole, applauded the patriotism of the young orator, and in her will left him an honorable legacy of 10,000l. for defending as she said, the laws of his country, and preventing its ruin. In 1746, his abilities were solicited to support the administration which had succeeded to Walpole, and he became joint vice-treasurer of Ireland, and soon after treasurer, and pay-master of the army, and privy counsellor. In 1755, he resigned; but though the next year he received the seals of secretary of state for the Southern department, his continuance in office was of short duration, the public voice of applause, however, accompanied him in his retirement, and had such effect on the government, that in June, 1757, he was reinstated in his office of secretary. The restoration of this favorite of the people to power, was the beginning of a new era of splendid conquests, and of national glory. The arms of England proved every where successful in consequence of the judicious plans of the new minister; Quebec was conquered, the French were defeated in Africa, and in the East, and the shores of Europe too witnessed the bravery and the victories of the British by sea and land. The death of George II. in the midst of these brilliant achievements, and the accession of George III. was soon followed by the resignation of the popular minister, who refused to co-operate with an administration, which by the influence of lord Bute, as it is supposed, thwarted his vigorous measures. His retirement was accompanied not only by the regrets of the nation, but by the honorable grant of a peerage to his lady, and a pension of 3000l. The peace of 1763, was censured by this sagacious patriot, who declared that England from the extent of her victories was entitled to more solid advantages; yet whilst he blamed the minister, he did not continue a petulant and capricious opposition, but remained silent till the question of general warrants in 1764, called forth all his eloquence, and the keenness of his satire against the illegality, and oppression of those unpopular engines of arbitrary power. In 1766, he was prevailed upon to accept the privy seal in the administration; and with it an earldom; but he resigned the office Nov. 1768, and ever after refused to be connected with the government. His health indeed declined, and a hereditary gout helped to undermine his constitution, without, however, diminishing the energetic powers of his mind. When the subject of the American war engaged the attention of the public, lord Chatham burst forth from his retirement, and, in his place in the house of lords, vindicated the honors of his country, and deprecated severe measures against the discontented colonists. On one of these occasions, after the duke of Richmond had replied to his powerful and convincing arguments in favor of conciliation, the venerable peer rose up to answer the speech of his opponent, but his debilitated constitution sunk under the attempt, and he fell in a fit into the arms of those who were near him. This extraordinary event which exhibited a favorite statesman breathing his last, whilst he uttered the most animated sentiments for the honor, the glory, and the independence of his country, happened 8th April, 1778, and he died on the ensuing 11th May. All ranks and all parties now united to pay due respect to the memory of the departed patriot; the unpopularity which for a while had obscured his career, because he had accepted a pension and a peerage, had now disappeared in his unshaken character of the statesman, and the sagacious defender of the liberties of his country. A public funeral and a monument in Westminster abbey, at the expence of the nation were immediately voted by parliament, as a testimony, as the inscription records, to the virtues and abilities of a man, during whose administration divine providence had exalted Great Britain, to a height of prosperity and glory unknown to any former age. As a statesman, says one of his biographers, lord Chatham was born with all the graces of the orator, and possessed every requisite to bespeak respect and even awe. A manly figure and penetrating look fixed attention and commanded reverence, and the keen lighting of his eye spoke the high spirit of his soul, even before the lips had begun utterance. The most fluent and ready orators have shrunk back appalled from his all-powerful eloquence. He had not indeed the correctness of language so striking in the great Roman orator, but he had the verba ardentia, the bold glowing words, which darted with such irresistible efficacy, that Walpole, surrounded with power and the unshaken support of a decided majority, never heard his voice in the house of commons without being alarmed and thunderstruck. Lord Chatham had by his wife, daughter of Richard Grenville, five children, John the inheritor of his titles, William the subject of the next article, Charles who died young, Hester who married lord Stanhope, and is since dead, and Harriot who married Mr. Elliot, and is also dead. His lady died in 1803, at Burton Pynfent in Somersetshire, an estate which was left to him in 1766, in consequence of the exertion of his great talents in the service of his country, by sir William Pynfent, who in thus showing his admiration for the character of the great statesman disinherited his own relations. Some letters from lord Chatham to his relation, the first lord Camelford, when resident at Cambridge, were published in 1804, by lord Grenville. The life of lord Chatham has been published in 3 vols. 8vo.

PITT, William, a celebrated statesman, second son of the preceding, was born at Hayes, 28th May, 1759. From his earliest years he was instructed by his father, who foresaw the future greatness of his son, and taught him to argue with logical precision, and to speak with elegance, correctness, and force. He was afterwards under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, and at the proper age he was admitted member of Pembroke hall, Cambridge, where he had for his tutors Dr. Turner, since dean of Norwich, and Dr. Pretymann, bishop of Lincoln. Under the guidance of these able men, he rapidly matured his knowledge of classical literature, and of mathematics, and he left the university with the degree of M. A. and a high character for application, for abilities, and for correctness and propriety of deportment. He next entered as student at Lincoln's inn, and was called to the bar, and afterwards went once or twice on the western circuit, where he was occasionally employed as junior counsel. A higher situation, however, awaited him. At the general election, he was proposed as member for Cambridge university, but few seconded his pretensions, and the next year he obtained a seat for Appleby, on the interest of sir J. Lowther. In the house he enlisted on the side of opposition against lord North and the American war; and his first speech in support of Mr. Burke's bill, displayed that commanding eloquence which many of the members had before so warmly applauded in his illustrious father. The first motion which he offered to parliament was for the more equal representation of the people in parliament; and though it was lost by a small majority, it rendered him a popular and a leading member in the Commons. On the death of lord Rockingham, he accepted, at the age of 22, the office of chancellor of the exchequer; and under the administration of which he formed a part, the American war was concluded. Though he ably defended the conduct of his colleagues, the terms of the peace were regarded by the majority of the nation as unpopular, and the ministry was dissolved. Restored to privacy, Mr. Pitt passed some months on the continent; and after visiting Italy, and several of the German courts, he returned to England, and on the dismissal of the coalition administration of Mr. Fox and lord North, he was selected for the arduous office of first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer, 18th Dec. 1783. Thus seated at the head of affairs, he bent the great powers of his mind to the framing of a bill for the regulation of India affairs, which might be more palatable to the nation, and less objectionable than that of Mr. Fox. His attempts, however, were at first unavailing, as his predecessors, though dismissed from office, still retained their influence in the Commons; and in consequence of this struggle between the house and the king's prerogative, an appeal was made to the sense of the nation in a new parliament. The people warmly seconded the measures of the youthful premier, and the new parliament not only approved of his India bill, but adopted his financial system for the reduction of the national debt by a sinking fund, and cemented the commercial treaty which, under his auspices, had been concluded with France, on a basis advantageous to the interests and the prosperity of England. During the unfortunate illness with which the king was afflicted in 1788, Mr. Pitt was supported by the unanimous concurrence of the nation in boldly resisting the right of the prince of Wales to assume the reins of government, which Mr. Fox, with more warmth than constitutional knowledge, had hastily asserted. Hitherto popular, and successful as a peace minister, Mr. Pitt had now to contend with a new and formidable hydra in the French revolution. The murder of the French king, and the ambitious views of the rulers of France, were productive of disputes with England, and war was declared in 1793. During the continuance of hostilities for eight years, in situations where all precedents were unavailing, and all the political principles of former times disregarded, the premier conducted the affairs of the nation with that vigor and manly energy which future historians will celebrate to his honor and glory. Amidst the political cares of the continent, his mighty mind planned in 1800, the union with Ireland, which, though at first opposed upon national and constitutional grounds, was completed under his auspices, and promises to add strength, solidity, and effect to the power and prosperity of the sister islands. He soon after retired from the head of affairs, in consequence of disputes with respect to the catholic emancipation; but more probably to make room for an administration which might, with more propriety, and greater probability of success, negotiate a peace with France. The insidious peace of Amiens, effected under the administration of Mr. Addington, met with the approbation of Mr. Pitt, as the most advantageous which the situation of the continent, and the gigantic power of France could allow, and in 1804 he was again replaced at the head of affairs. Difficulties, however, surrounded him on all sides; many of his old colleagues had joined the ranks ranks of opposition, and not a few condemned the method by which he had regained his ascendancy in the king's councils; and it may be asserted that all the complicated machine of government was to be directed, in all its minute parts, by him alone. Unappalled by the dangers which threatened his country, and actively awake to resist all the attacks of parliamentary opposition, he formed that powerful confederacy with Russia and Austria, which, had it been better conducted by the generals of the belligerent powers, might have checked, if not totally crushed the colossal influence of France. In the mean time, while public affairs assumed the most threatening aspect, a hereditary gout weakened the delicate constitution of the minister, and the seeds of the illness under which he labored, in 1802, and which had never been completely eradicated, produced the most alarming debility in the nervous system. Excessive anxiety, application to business, and besides, a constant privation of rest, thus contributed to the general breaking up of his constitution, and the intelligence of the fatal disasters at Austerlitz, and the failure of his favorite plan for the deliverance of Europe from French tyranny, hastened his end. He expired at his house at Putney, Surrey, on the 23d Jan. 1806, and the last words which quivered on the dying lips of this most extraordinary and patriotic man, were, Oh, my country! By a vote of the commons, in which it is painful to observe the names of several of his former friends among the 89 who opposed the manly and dignified motion of Mr. Lascelles, his remains were buried in Westminster abbey, by the side of his father, at the public expence, and with becoming funeral pomp; and the heart of every lover of virtue and patriotism must assent to the truth of the emphatical words which the herald pronounced after the corpse had descended to the tomb; non sibi sed patriæ vixit. By the same vote of the commons, the debts of the departed premier were discharged by the public, and it is not a small proof of his great disinterestedness and undeviating integrity, that, during a long administration of above 20 years, he not only did not accumulate riches, but died insolvent. To appreciate the character of so mighty a mind is no easy task. His history is the history of civilized nations; as his counsels directed or influenced every measure which was carried into execution in every corner of the habitable globe. To him particularly belonged constancy and steadiness of purpose and principle, a pride of superiority, arising from the consciousness of great talents, and firm integrity; and when, therefore, he had fixed upon an end, he maintained his opinion against all obstacles. This firm adherence to principles which eventually might be erroneous, was indeed a foible; but it was the foible of a great genius, and of a lofty mind. His eloquence, if it did not possess the vehemence of Fox, nor the brilliant splendor of Burke, was always correct, powerful, and convincing; he had a perfect command of language, and in the arrangement of his matter, he was natural and luminous; without art, without affectation. Thus elevated above the rest of the world, in situation, in talents, and in character, it is not a matter of surprize, that he had not only political, but private detractors, and that at a period when obloquy is hurled against whatever is most dignified and sacred among mankind, his conduct was attributed to motives of pride, of ambition, and of tyranny. Envy, indeed, as one of his biographers observes, may revile, and self-interest may seek to blacken; but his fame, in spite of every effort to blast it, in spite of all the assaults of little and low minds, will flourish while this kingdom, or its language shall last. No state chicanery, no narrow system of vicious politics sunk him to the level of the guilty great. He was noble, elevated, magnanimous in his plans; his object was England, his ambition was fame; an ambition that would have raised his country above all the world, and himself along with her glory. The penetration of his mind was sagacious, was infinite, and his schemes of government and policy were formed to affect not only his country, not the present age only, but Europe and the world, and to transmit the fruits of his administration, the labors of his mighty genius, to the admiration, and to the blessings of distant posterity.

PITTACUS, a native of Mitylene, one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was at the head of the government of his country, and displayed great moderation. He died 579 B. C.

PIUS I. Succeeded Hyginus as pope 142, and suffered martyrdom 157. It is said, but not well supported, that he ordered the celebration of Easter to take place the Sunday after the 14th day of the March moon.

PIUS II. Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, Vid. AENEAS SYLVIUS.

PIUS III. Francis Thodeschini, son of a sister of Pius II. was made archbishop of Vienna, and a cardinal by his uncle. He succeeded Alexander VI. in the papal chair; but when his virtues promised a happy reign he was suddenly snatched away, 21 days after his election, 13th Oct. 1503.

PIUS IV. John Angelo, cardinal de Medicis, brother of the famous marquis de Marignan, and not of the Florence family, was born at Milan 1499. He was early distinguished by his merit, and employed by Clement VII. and his successors in several honorable embassies, and in 1549, he was created a cardinal by Julius III. He succeeded to the popedom on the death of Paul IV. 1559, and evinced his zeal for the church by his enmity against the Turks and against heretics. He re-established the council of Trent, and when it separated in 1563, he affirmed its decrees by a bull. A conspiracy formed against him by Benedict Accolti and others, in 1565, was discovered, and the conspirators punished. He died 9th Dec. 1565, aged 66.

PIUS V. Michael Ghisleri, was born at Bosco in Tortona, 17th Jan. 1504, and embraced the Dominican order. He was made archbishop of Sutri by Paul IV. and afterwards appointed inquisitor general in the Milanese and in Lombardy, where his proceedings were often marked by cruelty and oppression. He was elected pope after Pius IV. 1566; but though in this new dignity he attempted to reform the morals of Rome and of his church, and to correct abuses, his measures frequently degenerated into severity, and rendered him unpopular among his subjects. His publication of the bull called In Cena Domini, by which he attempted to enforce the power and superior jurisdiction of the papal see in temporal affairs, raised him many enemies. He joined his forces to those of the Spaniards and Venetians against the Turks, and under his auspices the famous battle of Lepanto was fought 1571, in which the infidels were so dreadfully defeated. He died of the stone 30th April, 1572, aged 68, and he was regarded as so formidable that the Sultan Selim noticed his death by three days of public rejoicings. Some of his letters have been published.

PIUS VI. John Angelo Braschi, was born at Cesena 27th Dec. 1717. He was patronized by Benedict XIV. who made him treasurer of the apostolical chamber, and he was raised to the rank of cardinal by Ganganelli, whom he succeeded on the papal throne 1775. His reign was one of the longest, and likewise one of the most unfortunate in the Roman history, and some assert, that in his pontificate was fully verified the Latin adage :

Semper sub Sextis perdita Roma fuit.

His government was marked by popular and useful measures; he repressed abuses, punished the peculation of his officers, and labored successfully in completing the noble museum of the Vatican, begun by his predecessor, by the collection of vases, medals, statues and monuments, which were dispersed through the ecclesiastical states. Of this valuable treasure a magnificent account with engravings has appeared in 6 vols. fol. From the arts Pius turned his attention to commerce, the port of Ancona was repaired and embellished, and the Pontine marshes were drained of their pestilential waters. This labor which had engaged the attention of the ancient Romans, and had been attempted by Augustus and some of his successors, and by several popes, was regarded as an object of great public utility. To convert to purposes of agriculture and commerce, the vast marshes which extend from the Apennines to the sea, and from Astura to Terracina and the Neapolitan frontiers, and to remove those noxious vapors which render the neighbouring lands unhealthy and dangerous to the inhabitants, was reserved in some degree for the perseverance of Pius. By yearly visiting the spot he gave vigor and encouragement to the work; canals were constructed to drain the superabundant marshes, the Appian way was repaired, or rather a new road was built 40 miles in length, overshadowed with rows of poplars, and houses were erected for the convenience of travellers. At Rome Pius adorned the city with a new church and some hospitals, and in the provinces his magnificence was equally displayed. In his character he was mild, and in his conduct hospitable, and Joseph II. of Germany, Paul of Russia, and other princes were witnesses of his kindness and of his virtues. In ecclesiastical affairs, though he was successful against the innovations of Leopold in Tuscany in 1775, he found himself unable to stop the reforming hand of the German emperor. The suppression of monasteries, and the rejection of the papal superiority in Germany alarmed the Roman see, and Pius repaired in person to Vienna; but though treated with deference and respect, the innovations of the imperial reformer could not be checked. Pius had fresh troubles to meet in Italy, and the court of Naples disputed his right of nomination to the sees of Naples and Potenza. The payment of a tribute on the accession of the Neapolitan monarch to the throne, at last settled the dispute; but new quarrels arose with the Venetians and the court of Modena, when the French revolution began to engage the attention of Europe, and in its rapid vortex to drown all inferior considerations. Pius naturally disapproved of the conduct of the French reformers, who levelled their impious hands against all ecclesiastical establishments, and he embraced the cause of the allies. He received with kindness the banished priests, and this particularly drew upon him the vengeance of the French rulers. Bonaparte was directed to attack the Roman states, and after taking Urbino, Bologna, Ancona, &c. he checked his conquests, and offered peace to the sovereign pontiff, on condition of his paying a large sum of money, and of sending to Paris the choicest pieces in painting and sculpture preserved at Rome. A reconciliation thus tyrannically effected proved not of long duration. Basseville the new French ambassador behaved with such haughtiness, that the indignant Romans assassinated him 1793; and though the pope was incapable of preventing this horrid deed, yet his enemies easily persuaded themselves that he was privy to it. The subsequent death of Duphot, who in the midst of Rome, while he attempted to restore order and tranquillity was stabbed fatally, called on the French government for severe measures. Rome was therefore taken by the orders of Bonaparte, and the captive pope dragged a prisoner from his palace, and conveyed amidst the insults of the French soldiery, first to Sienna, and afterwards across the Alps into France. At Briancon his presence converted the tumults and the ferocity of his oppressors into admiration and reverence, and at a moment when he expected to be murdered by them, he saw the enraged multitude suddenly moved with compassion and fall down at his feet. From Briancon he passed on to Gap, Grenoble, Voiron, and to Valence, where he was permitted to rest. Here his sufferings were completed, after an illness of 11 days from fatigue and old age he died 29th Aug. 1798, aged 82. His remains were buried at Valence by order of Bonaparte; but afterwards they were removed to Rome in 1802, and entombed with great funeral pomp. This prelate so well known by his misfortunes, was possessed of many virtues, and the humility, patience, and meekness with which he endured the indignities of his barbarous persecutors entitled him to universal veneration.

PIVATI, John Francis, a Venetian lawyer, known for his laborious compilation of a general dictionary of arts and sciences, which appeared at Venice in 10 vols. fol. 1746.

PIX, Mary, daughter of Mr. Griffith a clergyman, was born at Nettlebed, Oxfordshire, and married Mr. Pix. She wrote 10 plays, which possess little merit, and she died about 1720.

PIZARRO, Francis, the conqueror of Peru, was the illegitimate son of a gentleman by a woman of low condition, and born at Truxillo. Though thus obscurely born and obliged to keep hogs for his support, he possessed an undaunted courage, and embarked for America with other adventurers. In 1524, fired with the love of glory he united with Almagro and Lucque to go in quest of new undiscovered countries. After incredible hardships and unceasing perseverance he was enabled to penetrate into Peru, 1531, where he seized perfidiously the monarch Atahualpa, and afterwards cruelly and inhumanly put him to death. The possession of an opulent kingdom, and the servile submission of the inhabitants, did not inspire the Spaniards with the love of ease and tranquillity, but produced quarrels, and Almagro and Pizarro met in arms 1538, to decide their superiority. Almagro was defeated and put to death; but the son and the friends of the fallen chief united against their oppressor, and Pizarro was assassinated in his palace after making an obstinate resistance, 26th June, 1541. This bold adventurer who knew not even how to read, was fully formed for command. He laid the foundations of the city of Lima, and might deserve the name of a hero, were not perfidy and cruelty indelible stains on his character.

PIZZI, Joachim, a native of Rome, educated among the jesuits, and made, in 1759, director of the academy of Arcades. He possessed genius as a poet, and vigor and correctness as a writer. His works are the Vision of Eden, a poem in four cantos — the Triumph of Poetry, a poem — Discourse on Tragic and Comic Poetry — Dissertation on an Antique Cameo, &c. He died 1790, aged 74.

PLACCIUS, Vincent, an able philologer, born at Hamburgh 1642. He studied at Helmstadt and Leipzig, and after travelling over France and Italy, he was made professor of eloquence and morals in his native city, where he died 1699, much respected and beloved. He published Theatrum Anonymorum, et Pseudonymorum, 2 vols. fol. — Liber de Juris Consulto Perito, 8vo. — de Arte Excerpendi, &c. 8vo. — Carmina Juvenilia, 8vo.

PLACE, Francis, a Yorkshire gentleman, eminent as a painter and engraver. As he worked only for his amusement his pieces are scarce, but possess merit. His etchings and his mezzotinto prints were in great estimation, especially those of archbishop Stern, and of Henry Gyles a glass painter in his neighbourhood. He died 1728.

PLACENTINUS, Peter, a German Dominican, author of "Pugna Porcorum," a poem of 360 verses, in which every word begins with a P. Antwerp 1530. He wrote also a Latin History of the bishops of Tongres and Liege, and died at Maastricht 1548.

PLACETTE, John de la, a protestant minister, born at Pontac in Bearn 1639. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Denmark, and then to Holland, and settled at the Hague, and lastly at Utrecht, where he died 1718. He wrote Moral Essays, 6 vols. 12mo. — treatise on Pride, 8vo. — on Conscience, translated into English by Basil Kennett — on Good Works — on Restitution — Christian Reflections, &c. and a treatise against Bayle on the Origin of Evil, and the Trinity.

PLANTIN, Christopher, an eminent printer, born near Tours. He settled at Antwerp, and though not a man of learning, he published the most correct and elegant editions of various authors. He acquired riches as well as fame by his profession, and was extremely liberal and humane. He died 1589, aged 65. His chief work is said to be a Polyglott bible.

PLANODES, Maximus, a monk of Constantinople in the 4th century. He was in the train of the imperial ambassador to Venice, and on his return was imprisoned in consequence of his strong partiality for the Latin church. He wrote a curious, but improbable life of Æsop, and also a Greek Anthologia.

PLATINA, Bartholomew Sacchi, a learned Italian, born at Piadena near Cremona 1421. He abandoned the military life for the church, and going to Rome, by the friendship and protection of cardinal Bessarion, he obtained some preferment, and was appointed apostolical abbreviator. He was deprived of this office, which was abolished by the succeeding pope Paul II. but when he respectfully complained of the treatment, as he had purchased the place, he was indignantly rejected by the sovereign pontiff, and even imprisoned and put to the rack. The next pope Sixtus IV. made amends for his sufferings, and appointed him to be librarian to the Vatican. He died of the plague 1481. He wrote the Lives of the Popes, printed first Venice, 1479, folio — History of Mantua — the Life of Nerio Capponi, and some other works all in Latin, and collected in fol. 1572.

PLATO, a celebrated philosopher of Athens. He was the pupil of Socrates, after whose death he travelled into various countries, and then settled at Athens, where his lectures were attended by numerous and respectable auditors. After a life devoted to virtue and philosophy, he died at Athens, 348 B. C. aged 81. His writings are very valuable, as not only his language is very beautiful and correct, but his philosophy sublime, so that some writers have imagined he drew many of his opinions concerning the supreme being, from the writings of Moses, while he resided among the Egyptian priests.

PLAUTUS, Marcus Accius, a Roman comic poet of great celebrity. Only 19 of his plays are extant, which abound in humor and interest, though often expressed in coarse language. He died about 184 B. C.

PLAYFORD, John, a stationer and seller of music books, &c. in Fleet street, London, was distinguished as a writer. He published an introduction to the skill of music, 1655, several times reprinted, and by other books he contributed much to the improvement of the printing of music. He also edited the psalms and hymns in metre, with their appropriate tunes, 8vo. airs and songs for the bass-viol, &c. He died 1693, aged 80, and was honored with an elegy by Tate the poet laureate.

PLEMPIUS, Vopiscus Fortunatus, a native of Amsterdam, who took his medical degrees at Bologna, and practised in Holland. He was made professor of medicine at Louvain, where he died 12th Dec. 1671, aged 70. He was author of Ophthalmographia, or de Oculi Fabricâ, 4to. — de Togatorum Valetudine tuendâ — de Affectibus Capillorum et Unguium Naturâ — Tractatus de Peste — Antymus Coningius Peruvianus Pulveris Defensor repulsi a Melippo Protymo, a refutation of the utility of the bark, which was introduced by Coningius, the assumed name of the Jesuit Fabri, and thus attacked by Plempius under the appellation of Protymus.

PLESSIS RICHELIEU, Vid. RICHELIEU.

PLINY, Gaius Secundus, the Elder, was a celebrated philosopher, born at Verona. He perished during an eruption of Vesuvius, while he approached too near to make observations on the awful phenomenon, A. D. 79. Of his works, which were numerous, only his Natural History remains, which is a valuable compilation of facts and observations, by the hand of a judicious master.

PLINY, Cacilius Secundus, the Younger, was the nephew of the preceding. He studied under Quintilian, and enjoyed the friendship of Trajan, who made him consul. He was for some time governor of Bithynia, where he checked the persecution excited against the christians. He died A. D. 113, universally respected. His letters, &c. are fine specimens of correct writing.

PLOT, Robert, an English philosopher and antiquary, born at Sutton Barn, Kent, 1641, and educated at Wye school in that county. In 1658, he entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, where he took his master's degree, and afterwards removed to University college, where he took the degree of LL. D. 1671. He was elected member of the Royal society, and appointed one of its secretaries, and as such published the Philosophical Transactions from No. 143, to 166, inclusive. In 1683, he was nominated by Ashmole first keeper to his newly erected museum, and made also professor of chemistry, and in 1688, historiographer to the king. He was made in 1695, by the duke of Norfolk, Mowbray herald extraordinary. He died of the stone 30th April, 1696, at Borden, leaving two sons. Dr. Plot whose chief delight was the advancement of natural history and antiquities, published the Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire, both in fol. as essays towards a Natural History of England — de Origine Fontium, &c. — an Account of Eldon Hole — several valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. He left behind him several MSS. for the Histories of Kent, Middlesex, and London, which he intended to publish.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher, born at Nicopolis in Egypt. He settled at Rome, and died in Campania 270, aged 66. His works were collected by his pupil Porphyry.

FLOWDEN, Edmund, an eminent lawyer, born in Shropshire 1517. He was educated at Cambridge, but afterwards removed to Oxford, where he took his degrees in physic, and practised as a physician. He soon after abandoned physic for the law, entered at the Middle Temple, and was made a serjeant. As he was a Roman catholic his preferments ceased on the accession of Elizabeth. He died 1584. His "Reports" are held in great esteem, and show great learning, judgment, and sagacity.

PLUCHE, Antony, a French writer, born at Rheims 1668. He distinguished himself by his application, and at the recommendation of Rollin, was made tutor to the son of the intendant of Rouen, after which he went to Paris, and gave lectures on history and geography. He was presented in 1749, to the abbey of Valence St. Maur, and died of an apoplexy 1761. His works are Spectacle de la Nature, 7 vols. 12mo. an excellent work, twice translated into English, and also into most European languages — Histoire du Ciel,

2 vols. 12mo. containing a Mythological History of the Heavens, also translated into English — la Mécanique des Langues, 12mo. — Harmonie des Pleines et de l'Evangile, 12mo.

PLUKENET, Leonard, a well known English botanist, born 1642, and educated as is conjectured at Cambridge. He took his degrees in physic, but as he was without a patron he had to struggle with numerous difficulties, till in his old age he was appointed by the queen superintendant of Hampton-court garden, and honored with the title of Royal professor of botany. His great work is his "Phytographia," to the completion of which he devoted much of his time and of his money. He had correspondents for his botanical researches all over the world; but though he assisted Ray with liberal contributions, he suffered much from Sloane and Petiver, and censured their labors with some asperity. He died about 1705. His Phytographia appeared in four parts 1691-1696, containing 328 plates, 4to. He published besides Almagestum Botanicum, 4to. 1696, containing 6000 species — Almagesti Botanici Mantissa, 4to. 1700, with 25 new plates — Amalthæum Botanicum, 1705, 4to. &c. His Herbarium contained 8000 plants, and is now in the British museum. His works were reprinted 1769, 4 vols. and in 1779, by Dr. Giseke of Hamburg with a Linnean index.

PLUMIER, Charles, a famous French botanist, born at Marseilles 1646. He was of the order of Minims, and studied mathematics at Toulouse under Maignan, but afterwards applied himself to botany and natural history. His reputation was now such that he was employed by Lewis XIV. to go to the West Indies in search of curious and medicinal plants. He performed three voyages for this laborious and useful object, and explored not only St. Domingo, but the neighbouring islands, and part of the continent. His zeal was honorably rewarded by a pension from the king, and the appointment of royal botanist. While, at the request of M. Fagon, the king's physician, he meditated a fourth voyage in the cause of natural history, he was attacked by a pleurisy, as he waited for the ship near Cadiz, and died there, 1706. His works are valuable, Nova Plantarum Americanarum Genera, 4to. — Description of the Plants of America, folio — Treatise on American Ferns, fol. — the Art of Turning, fol. with plates — Dissertations on Cochineal, in the Journal des Sçavans. Besides these he left 1400 drawings, which might make 10 volumes more.

PLUQUET, Francis Andrew, a native of Bayeux, who exchanged his canonry for the professorship of history in the university of Paris. He was an able lecturer and a diligent and elegant writer, and died of an apoplexy 1790, aged 74. He wrote an Examination of Fatalism, 3 vols. 12mo. — a Dictionary of Heresies, 2 vols. 8vo. — the Classical Books of the Chinese, 7 vols. 12mo. — treatise on Luxury, 2 vols. 12mo. — a treatise on Sociability, 2 vols. in which he establishes the natural propensity of man to kindness and religion, against the opinions of Hobbes.

PLUTARCH, a celebrated philosopher and historian of Chersonæa in Bœotia. He travelled over various countries to improve himself, and was honorably received by the emperor Trajan, who raised him to the office of consul. He died in his native town at an advanced age A. D. 140. The best known and most valuable of his many works, is the Lives of Illustrious Men, a composition of great merit and singular interest.

PLUVINEL, Antony, grand equerry and chamberlain to Henry IV. of France, and his ambassador to Holland, was born in Dauphiny, and died at Paris, 1620. He was the first who opened a riding school in France. He wrote "l'Art de monter à Cheval," the Art of Riding, with plates, folio.

Pococke, Edward, a celebrated orientalist, born at Oxford, Nov. 8th, 1604. He was educated at Thame school, and at 14 entered at Magdalen hall, Oxford, from which, two years after, he removed to a scholarship at Corpus, and afterwards became a fellow of the college. He soon distinguished himself by his great knowledge of classical and oriental literature, and by the friendship of G. Vossius, and other learned men; and by the interest of Selden, he obtained, when in orders, the place of chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo. He reached Aleppo in 1630, and devoted himself with unusual assiduity to the further acquisition of the oriental languages. He was in 1631 employed by Laud to make a collection of such valuable and curious MSS. and of such coins as might enrich an university library; and in 1636 he was informed by that liberal patron that he was nominated by him to fill his newly founded Arabic professorship in Oxford. He returned in consequence to England, but afterwards he went to Constantinople, in company with Greaves, who was going to explore the antiquities of Egypt. He was invited by Laud in 1640 to return, and in his way through Paris, he became acquainted with Grotius, to whom he communicated his intention of translating his book, de Veritate Christi. Religionis, into Arabic, which the pious author heartily approved. When he reached England, he found his learned patron in the Tower, and his death, and the consequent confusion of the nation, tended little to ensure him tranquillity in the prosecution of his studies. In 1643 he was presented by his college to the rectory of Childrey, Berkshire, where he retired to perform his ecclesiastical duties; but he was deprived of his professorship by the republican plunderers. His great merit, however, pleaded in his favor, he was in 1647 restored to his salary, and the next year nominated by the king, then a prisoner, professor of Hebrew and canon of Christ-church, an appointment approved by the parliament, but rescinded when he refused to subscribe to the engagement. Though deprived of his canonry, he yet read lectures, and in 1652 assisted in preparing the edition of the Polyglott bible. The restoration reinstated him in all his offices, and he soon after took his degree of D. D. but he was neglected among those who had by their services contributed most to the advancement of religion and learning in the kingdom. He died at Oxford, 10th Sept. 1691, aged 87, and was buried in the cathedral, where a monument records his merits. As a scholar and orientalist his abilities were most eminently displayed. His sole ambition was the advancement of oriental literature, to which he devoted himself with the most assiduous care. His works are Specimen Historiæ Arabum, 1648, much commended by Prideaux, Ockley, Selden, Reland, and others — Porta Mosi, or six prefatory Discourses of Moses Maimonides — Eutychius' Annals — Abul Feraji Historia Dynastiarum, 4to. — Commentaries on Micah, Malachi, Hosea, and Joel, folio — St. Peter's second Epistle, the second and third of John, and that of Jude, translated into Syriac — Letters with several learned men, published by Twells, 2 vols. folio, 1740. Dr. Pococke was father of nine children. His eldest son Edward, rector of Minal, Wilts, published under his father's direction, an Arabic work, called Philosophus Autodidactus, five Epistola Jaafar Ebn Tophail, &c. translated afterwards by Simon Ockley.

Pococke, Richard, a learned divine, related distantly to the celebrated orientalist. He was born 1704, at Southampton, where his father was master of the free school, and he was educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1733. He travelled into the East in 1737, and returned in 1742, and in 1744 was made precentor of Waterford. He accompanied as chaplain lord Chesterfield to Ireland, and was appointed by him archdeacon of Dublin, and under another viceroy, the duke of Devonshire, he was made bishop of Ossory, 1756. In 1765 he was translated to Elphin and Meath, and died the September of that same year, of a fit of apoplexy during his visitation. He published a most valuable and interesting account of his travels, under the title of "Observations on Egypt, Palestine, the Holy Land, Syria, Mesopotamia, Cyprus," &c. 3 vols. folio. He enriched also the British museum by the gift of various volumes of MSS. from 4811—4827.

POERSON, Charles Francis, a native of Paris, eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He was made director of the French academy of painting at Rome, and died 1725, aged 72. His father, who was a native of Lorraine, was also a good painter, and died 1660.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, John Francis, a learned and illustrious character, born of a respectable family at Terranuova in Florence, 1380. He studied at Florence, where he learnt Latin under John of Ravenna, and Greek under Emanuel Chrysoloras, and applied also to the Hebrew, though some commentators assert that that language was not cultivated in Italy before the fifteenth century. He was for some time at Rome, where he held the place of writer of the apostolic letters for 10 years, and afterwards became secretary to the pope. In 1414 he attended the council of Constance, and directed all his attention to the recovery of classical authors from the wrecks of time; and to his indefatigable researches posterity is indebted for the preservation of Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Ammian. Marcellinus, Lucretius, Tertullian, and other authors. He next extended his researches to England, and from London passed into Germany and Hungary, and on his return to Rome, married a lady of great beauty, and young, though he himself himself was 54. After continuing apostolic secretary under seven popes, during 40 years, he was prevailed upon in 1453, to become secretary to the republic of Florence, and died in the neighbourhood, at an elegant villa, which he had built for his summer retreat, 1459, aged 79, leaving a widow and six children, five of whom were boys, distinguished afterwards for their abilities. The works of Poggio were a Latin History of Florence from 1350 to 1455, 4to. — Epistles — de Varietate Fortunæ — Funeral Orations — Facetiæ, or Witticisms, certainly unworthy of the author — a translation of Diodorus Siculus — of Xenophon's Cyropædia, &c. To Poggio literature is much indebted. He not only cultivated letters himself, but promoted their advancement. Erasmus has censured his private character, which certainly was not always free from blame; but Machiavel and others speak in the highest praise of his learning, and the disinterestedness of his conduct; and his unavailing interference in favor of the unfortunate Jerome of Prague at Constance, must be recorded with every mark of approbation. His son James, translated his Florentine history into Italian, and also Xenophon's Cyrus; and after maintaining a character worthy of his father, was put to death, as concerned in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, in 1478.

POILLY, Francis, a French engraver, born at Abbeville, 1622. He studied under Duret, and at Rome, and was made engraver to the French king, 1664. After enjoying great reputation as an excellent engraver, and a fair character, he died at Paris, 1693. His brother Nicolas, who died three years after him, possessed also merit as an engraver.

POINSINET, Anthony Alexander Henry, a dramatic writer, born at Fontainebleau. His pieces were acted, but have little to recommend them. He was fond of travelling, and unfortunately lost his life in the Guadalquivir, where he was drowned during an excursion in Spain, 1769, aged 34.

POIRET, Peter, a mystic enthusiast, born at Metz, 1646, and educated at Basil. He became minister at Heidelberg and Anwell, and by reading the works of madame Bourignon, and other mystical writers, he became an infatuated enthusiast. He afterwards retired to Holland, and died at Reinsberg, May, 1719. He wrote the Divine Œconomy, 7 vols. 8vo. translated into English — Cogitationes Rationales de Deo, Animâ & Malo — Solid Principles of Christian Religion — Peace of good Souls, 12mo. — Theology of the Heart, 2 vols. 12mo. — de Eruditione Triplici, 2 vols. 4to. — Life of Madame Bourignon.

POIRIER, Germain, a native of Paris, who was of the order of the Benedictines of St. Maur, which he quitted in 1769. He was engaged as a coadjutor in the art of verifying dates; and he continued with Precieux the 11th volume of the historians of Gaul and France, begun by Bouquet. He was afterwards member of the national institute, and died at the beginning of 1803, aged 80.

POIS, Anthony le, physician to Charles III. duke of Lorraine, was well skilled in the knowledge of antiquities. He wrote a valuable Discourse on Medals and Ancient Engravings, 4to. and died in his native town, Nancy, 1578.

POIS, Nicolas le, brother to the preceding, was eminent as a physician. His son Charles, was also a physician in the household of the duke Henry II. and the father and the son, assuming in Latin the name of Pifontes, published some medical tracts, which were considered as so valuable, that Boerhaave republished them at Leyden, 1736, in 2 vols. 4to.

POISLE, John, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, who acquired riches by means of bribery and corruption, which procured his disgrace, 1582. His son James, who died 1623, was author of some poetry.

POISSON, Nicolas Joseph, a priest of the oratory, admired for his eloquence, and made superior of the abbey of Vendome. He died at Lyons, 5th May 1710, very old. He was the friend of Descartes, and was eminent as a philosopher. He wrote Delectus Auctorum Ecclesiæ Universalis, seu Gemma Conciliorum, 2 vols. folio — Remarks on Descartes' Discourses on Method, Mechanics, and Music — a treatise on Benefices — Account of his Travels in Italy — treatise on the Rights and Ceremonies of the Church, &c.

POISSON, Raymond, son of a mathematician at Paris, was patronized, after the early death of his father, by the duke of Crequi; but he quitted the profession of a courtier for the stage. He was afterwards noticed by Lewis XIV. and died at Paris, 1690, respected as one of the first comedians of the French stage. He wrote the Baron de la Crasse — the Good Soldier, comedies of one act — Lubin — the Fool of Quality, &c. published together at Paris, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1743.

POISSON, Paul, son of the preceding, was eminent also as a comedian. He died at St. Germain-en-Laie, 1735, aged 77. His son Philip was likewise a comedian of celebrity, who died at Paris, 1743, aged 60. He was author of six comedies, published in 2 vols. 12mo.

POISSONNIER, Peter Isaac, a French physician, born at Dijon, 5th July, 1720. He was one of the first who read chemical lectures at Paris; and he acquired such reputation as a medical man, that he was sent by the court, at the request of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, who wished for the advice of an eminent physician. On his return he was admitted into the academy of sciences, made first physician to the army, &c. and obtained a pension of 12,000 livres. The revolution not only stripped him of his independence, but sent him with all his family into confinement; but he was restored to liberty after the fall of Robespierre, and died 1797, aged 79. He wrote treatises on the Means of rendering Sea Water potable — on the Fevers of St. Domingo — on the Diseases of Seamen, 2 vols. 8vo. — Abridgment of Anatomy, 2 vols. 12mo. — Course of Surgery, volume 5th and 6th, &c.

POITIERS, Diana de, duchess of Valentinois, was born 31st March, 1500. When her father, the count of St. Vallier, was condemned to lose his head for favoring favoring the escape of the constable Bourbon, Diana obtained his pardon by throwing herself at the feet of Francis I. and, according to some, by yielding her person to the wishes of the monarch. After the death of her husband de Breze, grand sénéchal of Normandy, she was seen and admired by Henry II. and though aged 40, she so captivated the heart of the young monarch, who was only 18, that till his death in 1559, she remained sole mistress not only of his affections, but of the kingdom. She died in retirement, 26th April 1566, aged 66. To great personal charms, she united unusual powers of mind, and commanding dignity of manners.

POIVRE, N. a native of Lyons, who embraced the ecclesiastical order, and went as missionary to China, where he travelled with the sagacity of a philosopher and a naturalist. On his return to Europe, the ship in which he was embarked, was attacked by Barnett, the English admiral, and during the fight he lost his right arm, which was shot off by a cannon ball, in consequence of which he renounced the ecclesiastical state. He was afterwards employed by the French East India company in 1743, to open an intercourse with Cochin-China, and in 1766 he was sent by the duke de Choiseul to the isles of France and Bourbon, with full powers to improve their commerce and agriculture. He there introduced the cultivation of various trees, especially the bread-fruit tree, the muscadine grape, the clove, &c. He returned to France, and died at Lyons, 6th Jan. 1786. He is author of the Voyage of a Philosopher, 12mo. — on the Dying of Silks — on the History and Manners of China — Orations, &c.

POLAN, Amand, a native of Oppaw in Silesia, professor of theology at Basil, where he died 17th July 1610, aged 49. He wrote Commentaries on Ezekiel and Daniel — Dissertations, &c. and was distinguished as an able and learned protestant.

POLE, Reginald, cardinal and archbishop of Canterbury, was of royal descent as being the son of lord Montague, the cousin of Henry VII. by Margaret the daughter of George duke of Clarence, the brother of Edward IV. He was born at Stoverton castle, Worcestershire, 1500, and after receiving instruction from the Carthusians, he entered, at the age of 12, at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he had Linacre and Latimer for his tutors. He took his first degree at 15, and when admitted into orders he was made prebendary of Salisbury; and soon after dean of Exeter. Thus liberally patronized by the favor of his relation Henry VIII. he was, with a splendid allowance, permitted to go to Italy to finish his education, and in the universities of Padua, Venice, and Rome, he acquired distinction by the extent of his learning, his engaging manners, and exemplary piety. He returned in 1525 to England, and was received with great kindness by Henry; but the agitation of the divorce from Catherine soon after disturbed the harmony which subsisted between him and the court. Henry wished to add to the favorable opinion of foreign universities the assent of his respectable kinsman. Pole, however, refused to approve what his conscience condemned, and after withdrawing from the presence of the king, who at one time was so enraged that he seized his poinard to stab him, he obtained permission to travel. In Italy the English ecclesiastic found retirement and tranquillity in the bosom of his friends, and in his intercourse with learned societies; but Henry incensed against the pope, not only divorced his queen to marry Ann Boleyn, but determined to shake off the Roman yoke, and relying on the affection of his subjects, declared himself supreme head of the church. To reconcile this to the feelings of the people, a book was written in its favor by Sampson, bishop of Chichester, and sent over to Italy for the approbation of Pole. Without immediately answering the king's request, Pole expressed soon after his sentiments in a little book called Pro Unitate Ecclesiasticâ, which, in maintaining the papal supremacy, highly offended Henry, and procured not only the withdrawing of all his pensions and his ecclesiastical revenues, but the passing of a bill of attainder against him. Stripped of his honors in England, Pole found protection and favor at Rome; he was created a cardinal, and sent as legate to France, and Flanders, where, however, the intrigues of Henry were so powerful, and his influence so great, that he returned to Rome for safety. He next went as legate to the council of Trent, and maintained by his eloquence, as well as by his pen, the cause of the papal see. On the death of Paul III. 1549, Pole was twice elected by the cardinals to succeed to St. Peter's chair, but he rejected the proffered honor, and soon after retired to a monastery in Verona, where he continued till the death of Edward VI. On the accession of Mary, Pole was selected as the fittest legate to reconcile England to the holy see; and after he was informed that the bill of attainder which condemned him and set a price on his head was repealed, he returned to his native country. He appeared before the parliament, and easily prevailed upon them to be reconciled to the ceremonies of Rome, after the example of their queen; and after he had granted them absolution, he made his public entry into London, with all the solemnity of Italian pomp. But though invested with great authority as the legate of the pope, and the favorite of the queen, Pole did not assent at first to those violent measures which bigotry and persecution wished to follow. Mild by nature, and humane in his disposition, he preferred the arms of persuasion to the violence of authority; but his opposition was at last overpowered, and by the influence of the queen, some severe measures were adopted against the protestants, which reflect disgrace, not so much upon the heart as upon the accommodating conduct of the legate. His forbearance, indeed, had been such that he was accused to the pope as a heretic, and for a while his legatine powers were withdrawn from him; but the respectability of his character, and the good opinion of the queen, prevailed at Rome, and restored him to his office. On the death of Gardiner whose violent measures he reprobated, he was confirmed by the pope in the see of Canterbury, to which he had before, on the expulsion of Cranmer, been elected; and to his other dignities was added the honor of being chancellor cellor to both universities. He was attacked by a quartan ague which proved fatal, Nov. 18th 1558, 16 hours after the death of his royal mistress, whose demise is said to have hastened his own. From Lambeth he was removed to Canterbury, where he was buried. If his attachment to the see of Rome had not been so bigoted and violent, Pole might have shone a very perfect character, as in learning, piety, eloquence, humility, and all the amiable virtues of private and of public life, no man was superior to him. Besides the tract already mentioned, he wrote two defences of it; one addressed to Henry, and the other to Edward VI. and several other pieces.

POLEMBERG, Cornelius, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Utrecht 1586. He went to Rome where he studied with great success the manner and beauties of Raphael, and surpassed his contemporaries in the delicacy of his touches, and the elegance of his figures. His landscapes were also much esteemed. He was invited to England by Charles I. and painted here some valuable pieces; but he returned, during the civil troubles, to his native country, and died at Utrecht 1660, in great affluence and reputation.

POLEMON, a Greek philosopher, the disciple of Xenocrates. By the representation of his master, whose school he once entered in a state of intoxication, he was persuaded to reform his conduct, and he became a most temperate man, and a very intelligent instructor. He died B. C. 270.

POLENI, John Marquis, a native of Padua, eminent as a professor of astronomy and mathematics. He was in 1739 admitted into the academy of sciences at Paris, after obtaining three prizes from that respectable body, and he was also honored with a seat in the London Royal society, the Berlin and other learned societies. His knowledge of hydraulics was such, that he was consulted by several states, and was appointed surveyor of the water works of the Venetian territories. He was also an able architect and his opinion was solicited by pope Benedict XIV. about St. Peter's church at Rome. He was the friend and correspondent of all the great men of Europe, of Newton, Leibnitz, Cassini, the Bernouillis, &c. He was also well skilled in antiquarian knowledge, and published a supplement to the collections of Grævius and Gronovius, 5 vols. fol. 1737, Venice. He died at Padua 1761, aged 78.

POLI, Martin, a native of Lucca, who studied and professed chemistry at Rome. It is said that he discovered some powerful agent of destructive effect in military affairs, which he communicated to Lewis XIV. The monarch commended his ingenuity, and rewarded him liberally with a pension, and the title of engineer; but insisted that the secret should die with him, observing that the methods of destroying life, and increasing human miseries are already sufficiently numerous. This able man who had been admitted associate in the academy of sciences, and was invited by the French king to settle at Paris, died there of a violent fever soon after his arrival, 29th July, 1714, aged 52. He published Il Triomfo degli Acidi, an Apology for Acids, &c. 1706.

POLIDORO, Da Caravaggio, a painter so called from the village of Caravaggio near Milan, where he was born 1495. He was originally a day laborer to carry the stones and mortar for the masons in the buildings of the Vatican; but while he supplied materials for the fresco, his genius incited him to observe with accuracy, and to copy with success the figures described upon it. The first exertions of his pencil were so remarkably spirited, that Raphael, astonished at his powers, encouraged him and employed him among the other artists in the decorations of the Vatican; and not only that noble building, but many other edifices were ornamented by the labors of his genius. When Rome was besieged by the Spaniards, he fled to Naples, and afterwards to Messina, where he was murdered, by his servant who had observed the great sums of money which he had drawn from the bank, with the intention of returning to Italy. He died 1543, aged 48. The murderer was discovered, and torn to pieces between four horses.

POLIER, Charles de, a native of Lausanne, educated at Gottingen. He was lieutenant in a Swiss regiment in France, but soon left the profession of arms for literature, and became tutor to lord Tyrone's children. He died at his patron's seat near Waterford, 1782, aged 29. He made some ingenious communications to the Manchester society, of which he was a member, and memoirs of him by Dr. Percival have appeared in their transactions.

POLIGNAC, Melchior de, a French cardinal, born of a noble family 1662. He studied at Paris, and was well versed in the philosophy of Aristotle, and afterwards embraced the doctrines of Descartes, both of which he ably defended. He accompanied cardinal de Bouillon to Rome, and was afterwards sent by Lewis XIV. as ambassador extraordinary to procure the succession to the crown of Poland in favor of the prince de Conti, upon John Sobieski's death. His ill success on this business produced his disgrace at court; but he was afterwards restored to favor, and sent to Rome, and in 1709 employed as one of the plenipotentiaries at the conferences at Gertruydenburg; and five years after he assisted at the settling the peace of Utrecht. Clement XI. raised him to the dignity of cardinal, and he resided at Rome under Lewis XV. as minister of France. In 1726 he was raised to the see of Auch, and 1732 made commander of the order of the Holy Ghost. He died at Paris 1741, aged 81. He was member of the French academies, and evinced his abilities by his Latin poem called Anti-Lucretius, seu de Deo & Naturâ, in nine books, inculcating doctrines exactly contrary to those of Lucretius.

POLINIÈRE, Peter, a native of Couloune near Vire, who studied philosophy at the Harcourt college, Paris, where he took his degree of doctor in medicine. He was so well versed in philosophy, mathematics, and chemistry, that he was the first who read lectures on those abstruse sciences at Paris, where he had the king frequently among his auditors. He died suddenly at his house at Couloune, 9th Feb. 1734, aged 63. He was a man of great learning, but little acquainted with the world, and more fond of his books and of retirement than of public life. He wrote Elements of Mathematics — treatise on Experimental Philosophy, 2 vols. 12mo. 1741.

POLITI, Alexander, professor of rhetoric philosophy and divinity at Genoa, was born at Florence 1679. In 1733 he became professor of eloquence and Greek at Pisa, and died there July 23, 1752, of an apoplexy. He is known for his edition of Eustathius's Commentary on Homer, with a Latin translation and notes, 5 vols. fol. — the Roman Martyrology, corrected in fol. — Orations in the Academy of Pisa, &c.

POLITIANO, Angelo, an ingenious Italian, born July 1454, at Monte Pulciano in Tuscany. His real name was Baffo, or according to others Ambrogini. He learnt Greek under Andronicus of Thessalonica, and studied philosophy under Ficinus, and Argyropylus. He was noticed by the Medicean family, and was for some time preceptor to Lorenzo's children, and afterwards professor of Greek and Latin at Florence. He was the intimate friend of the learned men of the times, and especially of Picus of Mirandula. He died 1494 and some have attributed his death to his great grief for the misfortunes of the Medicean family, who had been cruelly expelled from their country. Politiano was a man of great erudition, vast application, and a most sound judgment. As a poet his lines on the tournament of Julian de Medicis are much admired. He wrote besides the History of the Pazzi conspiracy — Miscellanea — some other poems, and a Latin translation of Herodian, so elegant and so spirited that it is doubted which is the more valuable, the original or the version — a treatise on Anger, &c. His works altogether were printed in 1550, 3 vols. 8vo. and 1553 folio. Basil. Though admired for his learning, wit, and vivacity by Erasmus, and others, Paul Jovius has described him as a malevolent satirist, who viewed the literary labors of others with mean jealousy, and with ferocious virulence resisted every criticism upon his own productions.

POLLIO, Caius Asinius, a Roman of great celebrity under Augustus. He was the friend of Mæcenas, of Virgil, and of Horace, and himself a man of learning. He died A. D. 4, aged 80.

POLLUX, Julius, a native of Naucrates in Egypt in the reign of Commodus, author of Onomasticon, or Greek Vocabulary of great merit.

POLYENUS, a Macedonian, author of Stratagems in War, in the age of Antoninus and Verus, to whom the work is inscribed.

POLYBIUS, a Greek historian, of Megalopolis. He was the friend of the great Philopœmen, and distinguished himself as a soldier against the Romans in the Macedonian war. After the ruin of Macedonia, Polybius became the friend of the Romans and of Scipio, and wrote a valuable and interesting Universal History, of which only part remains. He died B. C. 121.

POLYCARP, St. a bishop of Smyrna, who suffered martyrdom 166, aged 95. An epistle from him to the Philippians is preserved.

POLYCLETUS, a sculptor of Sicyon, of great celebrity. He was regarded as the first artist, and Phidias as the second, in Greece. He flourished B. C. 232.

POLYDORE VIRGIL, a native of Urbino, who came to England in the suite of Corneto the papal legate. He so pleased Henry VIII. by his manners and his learning that he detained him in England by giving him the archdeaconry of Wells, and prevailed upon him to employ his talents in an history of the country. He afterwards left England in consequence of the tyrannical conduct of Wolsey, who had imprisoned him for one year for revenge, because his patron Corneto had solicited the see of York, and he retired to Italy, where he died 1555. His works are the History of England to the end of the seventh Henry's reign, dedicated to Henry VIII. a work written in elegant Latin, but not very accurate as an history, edited at Basil 1534, fol. — de Inventoribus Rerum, 12mo. — treatise on Prodigies, fol. — Corrections on Gildas — Collection of Proverbs.

POLYGNOTUS, a Greek painter of Rhodes. His painting of the battle of Marathon was very celebrated.

POMBAL, Sebastian Joseph Carvalho, marquis of, a famous Portuguese minister, born at Soure near Coimbra, 1699. He studied at Coimbra, and afterwards embraced a military life, which he quitted for retirement and an union with Donna Almada, a rich and noble Spanish lady, who died 1739. He was in 1745 sent ambassador to Vienna, where he married the countess of Daun, related to the marshal of that name, and by means of this lady who became a great favorite with the queen of Portugal, he rose to eminence in the state. On the succession of Joseph to the throne, 1750, Pombal was appointed secretary for foreign affairs, and he displayed his abilities by the wisdom of his administration, and the excellent regulations which he introduced for the promotion of the agriculture, the finances, and the marine of the kingdom. A haughtiness in his conduct, however, displeased some of the nobles, and a conspiracy was secretly formed against him and the king; but the discovery of it brought disgrace and death on the accomplices, and the jesuits, who were concerned in the plot, were expelled from the kingdom. In the dreadful earthquake which destroyed Lisbon 1755, Pombal showed great benevolence, and the most liberal patriotism, and by his means the city rose from her ruins, with new splendor and increased magnificence. On Joseph's death 1777, Pombal fell into disgrace and was banished to one of his estates, where he died May 1782, aged 85. Though accused of avarice and pride, he possessed undoubtedly great talents. His memoirs appeared at Paris, 1783, in 4 vols. 12mo.

POMET, Peter, a wholesale druggist at Paris, superintendent of the materia medica, in the king's gardens, of which he drew up an account. He acquired opulence, and also literary reputation by his works, especially his General History of Drugs, 1694, folio, republished by his son 1735, 2 vols 4to. He died 1699, aged 41.

POMEY, Francis, a jesuit of Lyons, known by his Pantheum Mysticum, translated into English by Andrew Tooke, as his own performance. He wrote besides a French and Latin Dictionary, 4to. — Flos Latinitatis — Libitina, or on the Funerals of the Ancients — Novus Rhetoricæ Candidatus, and died at Lyons, 1673, aged 55.

POMFRET, John, an English poet, born about 1667, at Luton, Bedfordshire, where his father was rector. He was educated at Cambridge, and when in orders, obtained the living of Maldon, in Bedfordshire. In 1703 he came to London, for institution to a larger living, but found bishop Compton strongly prejudiced against him, for four lines in his poem called Choice, in which it was falsely said, that he preferred a mistress to a wife, and before the prelate's scruples could be removed, the unfortunate candidate for his favor, caught the small pox, and died of it, aged 35. In his "Cruelty and Lust," he has introduced the character and conduct of Kirk, with great effect and pathos. No poem, says Johnson, has been oftener perused, than his Choice. He pleases many, and he who pleases must have merit. A volume of his poems appeared 1699, and two other pieces were published after his death by Philaethes.

POMPADOUR, Jane Antoinette Poisson, marchioness of, the mistress of Lewis XV.; was daughter of a financier, and married D'Etiole, nephew of Normand Tournem. The licentious monarch first saw her while he was hunting in the forest of Senar, and from that time he made her his favorite, and raised her, in 1745, to the rank of a marchioness. She enjoyed great influence at court, till her death, 1764, at the age of 44. The liberal manner with which she patronized the arts and literature, has in some degree blunted the shafts of criticism against the infamy of her life. Her memoirs have been published, 2 vols. 8vo. and also her letters, 3 vols. in which she is represented as having great influence in the politics of France, and especially in the war of 1756.

POMPEY, Cneius, the Great, a celebrated Roman, who after bearing the highest honors of the state, and distinguishing himself in war, formed the first triumvirate with J. Cæsar and Crassus. An union ill cemented, was quickly broken, and war was declared between him and Cæsar. The battle of Pharsalia proved fatal to the cause of Pompey and of Rome, and the great fugitive flying from his enemy, was basely murdered in Egypt by order of king Ptolemy, whom he had formerly established on the throne, B. C. 49.

POMPIGNAN, John James le Franc, marquis of, a French writer, born at Montauban, 1709. He was educated for the magistracy; but his genius led him to the cultivation of the muses, and his tragedy of Dido raised him to the rank of an able poet, little inferior to Racine. He became a member of the French academy in 1760, and he had the courage to pronounce, at his admission, a discourse in favor of christianity, by proving that the man of religion and virtue is the only true philosopher, an oration which drew upon him the ridicule and satire of the profligate philosophers of the times; of Voltaire, Helvetius, and their infidel associates. This illiberal treatment drove him from Paris to his estate, where he spent the rest of his days in the labor of true philosophy and active religion, and died there, of an apoplexy, 1784, highly and deservedly respected. His works, consisting of dramatic pieces — moral discourses — sacred odes — an Imitation of the Georgics — Voyage de Languedoc — Eulogium on the duke of Burgundy, &c. were published in 6 vols. 8vo.

POMPIGNAN, John George le Franc de, a learned French prelate, brother to the preceding, born at Montauban, 22d Feb. 1715. He was, at the age of 29, made bishop of Puy, and afterwards translated to the see of Vienne. At the revolution he was deputy from Dauphiné to the constituent assembly, and became one of the ministry. The pope wrote to him, and called upon him to exert his authority and influence to prevent all the meditated innovations in the church. He died at Paris, 29th Dec. 1790. He was author of 16 different works, the best known of which are Critical Essay on the Present State of the Republic of Letters — on the Secular Authority in Matters of Religion — Religion avenged on Incredulity by Incredulity itself — Scepticism convicted by the Prophecies — Letters from a Bishop, 2 vols. — Pastoral Letters — Defence of the Clergy of France in Religion, &c.

POMPONATIUS, Peter, an Italian philosopher, born at Mantua, 1462. He was of a dwarfish stature, but possessed great genius, and taught philosophy with uncommon success at Padua and Bologna. His book "De Immortalitate Animæ," in 1516, occasioned a violent controversy, but while he maintained the immortality of the soul as a matter of faith, and not by the support of philosophical reasoning; he was, though patronized by Bembo, universally branded with the name of an atheist. His work, therefore, was condemned and publicly burnt. His philosophical works were printed at Venice, folio, 1525. He was three times married, and had only one daughter. He died 1525.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, Julius, an eminent scholar, whose real name was Julio Sanseverino, born at Amendolara, in Calabria, 1425. He was well acquainted with Latin, though totally ignorant of Greek, but rather inclined to heathenism, since he is said to have dedicated altars to Romulus, and to have refused to read the bible, for fear of acquiring a bad and corrupted taste. He was accused of conspiring against pope Paul II. and in consequence fled to Venice, but returned to Rome after that pontiff's death. It is said that before his death he became a sincere and penitent christian. He died 1495. He wrote Abridgment of the Lives of the Cæsars, fol. — de Romanæ Urbis Vetusitate, 4to. — De Mahumedis Exortu, fol. — De Sacerdotiis, Legibus, &c. 4to. — De Arte Grammaticâ — Vita Statii & Patris ejus — Editions of Sallust, Pliny, and Cicero — Commentaries on Virgil, Quintilian, Columella, though some consider these, from their Greek quotations, with which he was unacquainted, as the work of some other person.

PONA, John Baptist, author of Diatrise de Rebus Philosophicis, Venice, 1590 — Latin poems — Il Tirreno, a pastoral, &c.; was a native of Verona, who who died there, very young, 1588. His brother John was an eminent botanist at Verona, and wrote Plantæ quæ in Baldo Monte reperiuntur, 4to. reprinted in De l'Ecluse's Historia Rariorum Stirpium, — Del Vero Balsamo degli Antichi, 4to. Venice, 1623.

PONA, Francis, a physician of Verona, who died there, 1652, aged 58. He is author of Medicina Animæ, 4to. — Lucerna di Eureka Misofcolo, 4to. — Saturnalia, 8vo. — L'Ormondo, a romance, 4to. — Messalina, a romance — Galeria delle Donne Celebri, 12mo. — L'Adamo, a poem — tragedies and comedies — Della Contraria Forza di due Bellicocchi, 4to.

PONS, John Francis de, a French ecclesiastic, of an illustrious family, born at Marly. He studied at Paris, and obtained a canonry at Chaumont, which he resigned to settle at Paris, to indulge his literary pursuits. He ably defended La Mothe against Mad. Dacier. He was a learned man, deformed in his person, but of the best character. He died at Chaumont, 1732, aged 49. He was author of a System of Education — Four Dissertations on Languages, &c. printed together, 12mo. 1738.

PONT, Lewis du, a jesuit of Valladolid, whose meditations, written in Spanish, have been twice translated into French. He died 1624, aged 70.

PONT DE VESLE, Antony de Ferriol, count de, a comic writer, who loved retirement, but was drawn into public life by his uncle cardinal de Tencin. He was made governor of Pont de Vesse, and intendant general of marine, and died at Paris, 3d Sept. 1774, aged 77. He was author of the Complaisant, a comedy — the Coxcomb Punished, a comedy — Sleep Walker, a farce — songs, and many other fugitive pieces. His uncle Ferriol, ambassador at Constantinople, published 100 engravings in folio, 1715, explanatory of the dress and manners of the Eastern nations, &c.

PONTANUS, John Jovian, a learned Italian, born at Cerreto, 1426. He was preceptor, and afterwards secretary to Alphonso, king of Arragon, whom by his influence he reconciled to his father Ferdinand. These services ought to have been rewarded, but Pontanus, finding himself neglected, inveighed in his Dialogue on Ingratitude, against the conduct of the prince, who nobly disregarded the satirical attack. He died 1503, aged 77. He wrote "the History of the wars of Ferdinand I. and John, of Anjou," 4 vols. 8vo. Basil, 1556. His other works, which are miscellaneous, and contain some licentious and indelicate poetry, appeared at Venice, 3 vols. 4to. His epitaph on himself has been imitated by Dr. Forster.

PONTANUS, or DUPONT, Peter, a grammarian of Bruges. Though he lost his sight at the age of three, he acquired great reputation as a teacher of belles lettres at Paris. He died at the end of the 16th century. He is author of a Treatise on Rhetoric, and on the art of making verses.

PONTANUS, James, a jesuit of Brugg, in Bohemia, who taught belles lettres in Germany with great reputation, and died at Augsburg, 1626, aged 84. He wrote Institutiones Poeticæ, 8vo. — Commentaries on Ovid's Tristia & Epist. de Ponto — on Virgil — translations from Greek authors, and other works in prose and verse.

PONTANUS, John Isaac, an author, born in Denmark, of Dutch parents. He became historiographer to the king of Denmark, and died at Harderwyck, where he had for some time taught medicine and mathematics, 1640, aged 69. He was author of Historia Urbis & Rerum Amstelodam. fol. — Itinerarium Galliarum Narbonens. 12mo. — Rerum Danicarum Historiæ cum Chorographicâ Regni Urbiumque Descriptione, fol. a valuable work — Disceptiones Chorographicæ de Rhæni Divortii & Ostiis, et Accolis Populis adversus P. Cluverum, 8vo. — Observationes in Tractatum de Globis Cælesti & Terr. 8vo. — Discussiones Historicæ, 8vo. against Selden's Treatise on the Sea — Historia Geldricæ, fol. translated afterwards into Flemish — Origines Francicæ, 4to. a learned book — Historia Ulrica, fol. — the Life of Frederic II. of Denmark, &c.

PONTAS, John, a learned French ecclesiastic, who died at Paris, 27th April, 1728, aged 90. He was author of Scriptura Sacra ubique sibi constans — Dictionnaire des cas de Conscience, 3 vols. fol. and other spiritual works.

PONTCHASTEAU, Sebastian Joseph du Cambout, baron de, a French author, nearly related to Richelieu. He was born in 1634, and after travelling over Italy and Germany, he bid adieu to the world, and passed several years of his life, engaged as the gardener of the Port Royal congregation. He afterwards retired to Rome, and then to Orval, and died at Paris, 27th June, 1699, aged 57. His acts of charity and devotion were very numerous and singular. He was author of Treatises on the Cultivation of Fruit Trees, 12mo. — on the Moral Practice of the Jesuits — Letter to Perefice, &c.

PONTEDERA, Julian, a native of Pisa, professor of botany at Padua, and superintendent of the botanic garden there. He was member of the learned societies of Paris, and died 1757, aged 69, universally respected for his extensive knowledge of botany. He wrote Compendium Tabularum Botanicarum in quo Plantæ 272, in Italiâ nuper detectæ recensentur, Patavii, 1718, 4to. — de Florum Naturâ, 4to. — Antiquitat. Latin. Græc. Enarrationes, &c.

PONTHIEU, Adelaide, a French lady, whose adventures during the crusades under St. Louis, have furnished a subject to Vignancourt for a romance, and to La Place for a tragedy, and to St. Marc for an opera.

PONTOPPIDAN, Eric, bishop of Bergen in Norway, was author of a valuable History of the Reformation in Denmark, folio, and another of Norway, translated into English. He died about 1750. His uncle of the same name, was a native of the island of Funen, and became bishop of Drontheim, where he died 1678, aged 62. He wrote a Danish grammar, much esteemed, and other learned works.

PONTORMO, James, a painter, who was born at Florence, and died there 1556, aged 63. His early pieces pieces displayed genius, and were admired by Raphael, and Michael Angelo; but he afterwards abandoned the vigor and chaste style of his genius by imitating the cold taste of the German school. His last pieces are not so highly valued as the first.

POOL, Rachel Van, a native of Amsterdam, eminent as a painter of flowers, fruits, &c. She died 1750, aged 86. Her husband, Jurian Pool, was also an eminent artist in portraits, who died five years before her, aged 79.

POOLE, Matthew, an eminent nonconformist, born at York, 1624. He was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and when ordained according to the tenets of the presbyterians, he was made minister of St. Michael le Quern in London, from which he was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity. Among his other works he wrote with great zeal against the papists, and according to Titus Oates' deposition in 1679, he was on the list of those who were to be cut off. In consequence of this meditated violence, he retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam, Oct. 1679. He possessed great learning, and was indefatigable in his studious pursuits. Besides English Annotations on the Bible, completed after his death, in 2 vols. folio, and other things, he compiled that useful work, "Synopsis Criticorum Biblicorum," or Elucidations of Scripture by various hands, 5 vols. folio, 1669.

POPE, for Thomas, a native of Deddington, Oxfordshire, educated at Eton, after which he studied the law. In 1536 he was appointed treasurer of the court of augmentations, and afterwards visitor of religious houses, and in 1540 he was knighted, and made master of the jewel office in the Tower. He has rendered himself celebrated as the munificent founder of Trinity college, Oxford, in 1554. He died in London four years after, aged 46, and his remains with those of his wife were interred in the chapel of his college. He was a man of high respectability, and the friend of the learned and the great. He was ordered by Henry VIII. to communicate to his friend for Thomas More the mournful intelligence of his approaching execution.

POPE, Alexander, an illustrious English poet, born 8th June 1688, in the Strand, where his father was a hatter. He learned writing by imitating printed books, and at eight years of age he was placed under the care of a priest named Taverner, under whom he learned the rudiments of Latin and Greek. He next was sent to a popish school near Winchester, and then removed to a seminary near Hyde-park corner. At the age of 12 he went to live with his parents at Binfield in Windsor forest, and first discovered his taste for poetry by reading Ogilby's Virgil and Sandys' Ovid; but the writings of Spenser, Waller, and Dryden, now became his favorite employment. He early began to try his strength in poetry, and it is said that at the age of 10 he converted some of the stories of Homer into a play, which his school-fellows acted with the assistance of his master's gardener, who undertook the part of Ajax. His first regular composition was his Ode on Solitude; but his pastorals, begun in 1704, introduced him soon as a promising bard to the wits of the age, especially Wycherley and Walfsh, who applauded the labors of the youth, and strongly recommended to him to study correctness. In 1704 he also wrote his first part of Windsor Forest, which was completed not till six years after, and inscribed to lord Lansdown. The Essay on Criticism appeared in 1708, and in this most incomparable performance, though not yet 20 years old, he evinced all the taste, the genius, and judgment of the most mature reflection, and the most consummate knowledge of human nature. The fame of the essay was soon surpassed by the Rape of the Lock, which was published in 1712. The poet chose for his subject the sportive conduct of lord Petre in cutting off a lock of Mrs. Fermor's hair; and he had the happiness, by the elegant and delicate effusions of his muse, and the creative powers of his imagination, to effect a reconciliation between the offended parties. The Temple of Fame next engaged the public attention, and in 1713 he published Proposals for a translation of Homer's Iliad by subscription. This was generously supported by the public, and the poet received from his subscribers 6000l. besides 1200l. which the bookseller Lintot gave him for the copy. Thus raised to independence by the efforts of his genius, Pope purchased a house at Twickenham, where he removed with his father and mother, 1715. In 1717 he published a collection of his poems; but in his edition of Shakespeare, which appeared in 1721, he proved to the world that he had consulted his private emolument more than his fame. The success with which the Iliad had been received, encouraged him to attempt the Odyssey with the assistance of Broome and Fenton, whose labors he rewarded with 500l. and he received the same honorable subscription as before, but only 600l. from the bookseller. In 1725 he joined Swift and Arbuthnot in writing some miscellanies, and in 1727 he published his Dunciad, with notes by Swift, under the name of Scriblerus. This singular poem owed its origin to the severe and illiberal remarks to which the poet had been exposed from the inferior scriblers of the day, and after long exhibiting patience, he revenged the attack by the keenest of satires. As a composition, the Dunciad is a work of great merit; and Cibber himself, the hero of the piece, bears the most manly testimony to the talents of his persecutor, by declaring that nothing was ever more perfect and finished in its kind than this poem. The principles, however, of the poet must be condemned; if it was justice to retort abuse on those who had offended him, it was the most illiberal and profligate conduct to hang up to immortal ignominy the characters of men of genius, talents, and respectability, who instead of censuring him had been loud in his praise. Lord Bolingbroke in 1729 entreated him to turn his thoughts to moral subjects, and this produced his Essay on Man, a work of acknowledged merit, containing a system of ethics in the Horatian way. In his ethic epistles, it is supposed that he reflected, in the character of Timon, on the duke of Chandos; and this propensity was unfortunately indulged in his satires, which he continued till 1739, and in which he censures in the severest language, persons of the highest rank and birth. A collection of his letters appeared in 1737, and the following year a translation of his Essay on Man, was published in France by Refnel, and at the same time a severe animadversion on it by Cronfatz, a German professor, who declared it nothing but a system of materialism. This publication was answered by Warburton, and appeared as a commentary on the republication of the poem in 1740. In 1742, the poet gave to the world a fourth book of his Dunciad, and prepared a more perfect and comprehensive edition of his works; but death stopped his hand. His constitutional attack of the head-ach was now increased by a dropsy in the breast, which baffled all relief, and he expired 30th May 1744, aged 56. He made, by his will, Miss Blount heiress to his property during her life, and he bequeathed the property of all his works to his friend Warburton, who accordingly in 1751, published a complete edition of the whole, in 9 vols. 8vo. A very interesting Essay on his writings and genius appeared in 1756, and in 1782, by Dr. Warton, and it was again reprinted with a new edition of his works by the learned author in 1797. Though a catholic in religion, it is generally supposed that Pope was little more than a deist, as his Essay on Man fully justifies; yet in the latter part of his life, he attended the service of the English church. In his person he was little and somewhat crooked; but the powers of the mind compensated for all the defects of the body. He was capricious in his friendships; and though he was courted by men of rank and fashion, by lords Harcourt, Bolingbroke, and others, distinguished for opulence, as well as celebrity and wit, yet he never forgot the homage which should be paid to the man of poetical eminence, and of acknowledged literary fame. His manners, as lord Orrery has observed, were delicate, easy, and engaging; he treated his friends with a politeness that charmed, and a generosity that was much to his honor. Every guest was made happy within his doors; pleasure dwelt under his roof, and elegance presided at his table.

PORPHAM, sir John, an eminent English lawyer, born at Huntworth, Somersetshire, 1531. He was of Balliol college, Oxford, and afterwards went to the Middle Temple, and rose to high honors in the law. He was solicitor and attorney-general, and in 1592 was made chief justice of the King's Bench. He was considered as a severe judge against robbers; but his strictness proved of service to the kingdom, and reduced the number of depredators. He died 1607, aged 76, and was buried at Wellington. He published Reports and Cases in Elizabeth's Reign, folio — Resolutions and Judgments, &c. 4to.

PORDAGE, John, an English enthusiast, during the civil wars. He was for some time vicar of St. Laurence's, Reading, but deprived by the Berkshire commissioners on an accusation of magic. He afterwards practised medicine, and acquired celebrity as an astrologer, well versed in the abstruse science of alchymy. He was author of Manifest Innocence, in answer to Fowler's Dæmonium Meridianum, and of some other mystical treatises of little merit. He died about 1670.

PORDENONE, John Anthony Licinio, a painter, born in the village of Pordenone, near Udino, 1484. He studied attentively the works of Giorgione, and by his abilities deserved to be called the rival of the great Titian. He was for some time at Genoa, under the patronage of Doria, and then went to Venice, and to Ferrara, where he died 1540, it is said by the effect of poison, administered by some painters jealous of his fame. He was knighted for his services by Charles V. His nephew, called the younger Pordenone, born at Venice, studied under him, and became also eminent. He died at Augsburg, 1570.

POREE, Charles, a French jesuit, born near Caen in Normandy, 1675. He acquired reputation as professor of belles lettres, rhetoric, and theology at Caen, and afterwards in the college of Louis the Great at Paris. He died 1741, at Paris. He wrote comedies and tragedies in Latin — Orations, 3 vols. — poems, &c. — His brother Charles Gabriel, was of the society of the oratory, and canon of Bayeux cathedral, and died at his cure of Louvigny, near Caen, 1770, aged 85. He was author of la Mandarinade, or Histoire du Mandarinat de l'Abbé de St. Martin, 3 vols. 12mo. — Letters on Burying in Churches, &c.

PORPHYRY, a platonick philosopher of Tyre, who wrote a violent book against the scriptures, which was publicly burnt by order of Theodosius the Great. He wrote besides various treatises, and died at the end of Dioclesian's reign. — There was a poet of that name in the reign of Constantine.

PORSENNA, king of Etruria, supported the cause of the exiled Tarquin against the Romans, and laid siege to Rome. His measures proved unsuccessful against the valor of Rome.

PORTA, Joseph, a native of Castel Nuovo, known as a painter. He took the name of his master Salviati, and acquired celebrity by his pieces in oil and in fresco. He wrote also some mathematical treatises, which, it is said, he afterwards destroyed. He died at Venice, 1585, aged 50.

PORTA, John Baptist, a Neapolitan, eminent for his learning, and his knowledge of mathematics, medicine, and natural history. As he admitted a society of learned friends into his house, he was accused of magical incantations, and exposed to the censures of the court of Rome. He died 1515, aged 70. He invented the Camera Obscura, improved afterwards by Grævesande, and formed the plan of an Encyclopedia. He wrote a Latin treatise on Natural Magic, 8vo. — another on Physiognomy, mixed with Astrology, &c. — de Occultis Literarum Notis — Physiognomica, seu Methodus cognoscendi ex Inspectione vires Abditas cujusque Rei, folio — de Distillationibus, 4to. &c.

PORTA, Simon, or PORTIUS, a Neapolitan, the disciple of Pomponatius. He distinguished himself by his learning, and became professor of philosophy at Pisa, and then retired to Naples, where he died, 1554, aged 57. He is author of treatises de Mente Humana — de Voluptate & Dolor — de Coloribus Oculorum, 4to. — de Rerum Naturalium Principiis Libri Duo — Opus Physiologicum, 4to. — de Conflagratione Agri Puteolani, 4to.

PORTE, Joseph de la, a native of Befort, who died at Paris, Dec. 1779, aged 61. He was for some time among the jesuits, but quitted their society for a literary residence at Paris. He published the Antiquary, a comedy of no great merit, and afterwards was engaged in a periodical work, called Observations on Modern Literature, which ended in the ninth volume. Afterwards he assisted Freron in the 40 first volumes of the Literary Year, and then published separately the Literary Observer. He next was engaged in the publication of the School of Literature, 2 vols. 12mo. — Dramatic Anecdotes, 3 vols. 8vo. — Literary History of French Ladies, 5 vols. 8vo. — the French Traveller, 24 vols. 12mo. — Pensées de Maffillon, &c.

PORTE, Peter de la, a domestic, in the service of Ann of Austria, and of Lewis XIV. He was concerned in the intrigues of the French court, and fell under the displeasure of cardinal Mazarin, who sent him to the bastille. He died at Paris, 13th Sept. 1680, aged 77. His memoirs were published at Geneva, 1756, in 12mo.

PORTER, Francis, a native of Meath in Ireland, who was educated in France, and was admitted into the order of the Recollets, and was afterwards divinity professor in the convent of Ildorus at Rome, where James II. gave him the title of his historiographer. He published Securis Evangelica ad Hæresis Radices posita — Palinodia Religionis prætense Reformatæ — Compendium Annalium Ecclesiasticorum regni Hiberniæ, 4to. — Systema Decretorum Dogmatic. ab initio nascentis Eccles. per summ. Pontific. Concil. Generalia & Particul. huc usque editorum 1698. He died at Rome, 7th April, 1702.

PORTES, Philip des, a French poet, born at Chartres 1546. He greatly improved the French language, and was liberally rewarded for his poetical works. Henry III. bestowed on him 10,000 crowns, Charles IX. gave him 800 crowns of gold for a poem, and admiral de Joyeuse conferred on him an abbey for a sonnet. Though in high favor with the court, and promoted to various benefices, he yet refused a bishopric. He was an eminent friend to learned men. He obtained latterly the friendship of Henry IV. and died 1606. He wrote a translation of the Psalms — Imitations of Ariosto — Christian poems — the Amours of Hippolytus and Diana — Sonnets — Elegies, &c.

PORTUS, Francis, a native of Candia, educated at the court of Hercules II. of Ferrara, after whose death he retired to Geneva. He taught at Ferrara, and afterwards at Geneva the Greek language, and at Geneva embraced the protestant tenets. He died 1581, aged 70. He wrote Additions to Constantine's Greek Lexicon, folio — Commentaries on Pindar, Thucydides, Longinus, Xenophon, and other Greek authors — His son Æmilius was also an able Grecian, and published Dictionarium Ionicum & Doricum, Græco-Latinum, 2 vols. 8vo. — a translation of Suidas, and other learned works. He was professor of Greek at Lausanne and Heidelberg.

PORUS, king of India, is celebrated in history for the bold resistance which he opposed to the invasion of Alexander the Great, and the noble answer he made when asked how he wished to be treated.

POSIDIPPUS, a Greek poet, B. C. 280. His dramatic pieces have perished.

POSIDONIUS, an astronomer of Alexandria, who called the circumference of the earth 30,000 furlongs. — A stoic philosopher of Rhodes, B. C. 30.

POSSEVIN, Antony, a jesuit, born at Mantua, 1533. He distinguished himself as a preacher, and was employed by pope Gregory XIII. in embassies to Poland, Sweden, Germany, and other courts. He died at Ferrara, 26th Feb. 1611, aged 78. He wrote Bibliotheca Selecta de Ratione Studiorum, 2 vols. folio — a Latin Description of Muscovy, folio — Miles Christianus — Apparatus Acer, 2 vols. folio — Confutatio Ministrorum Transilvaniæ & Fr. Davidis de Trinitate, &c. — He had a nephew of his name, physician at Mantua, who wrote Gonzagaram Mantuæ & Montis Serrati Ducum Historia, 1628, 4to.

POST, Francis, an eminent painter, born at Haarlem, where he also died 1680. He was in 1647 in the West Indies, and employed his pencil most successfully in delineating the beauties and the scenery of that quarter of the globe.

POSTEL, William, a French visionary, born at Dolerie in Normandy, 1510. At the age of eight he lost both his parents by the plague, and had now to struggle with poverty, and a supercilious world. By persevering assiduity, however, he not only gained his livelihood, but improved his mind by study, and going to Paris, he became the assistant and the companion of some students in the college of St. Barbe. His merits at last became known to Francis I. who sent him to the East to collect curious MSS. At his return, he was rewarded with the place of professor royal of mathematics and languages, with a good salary; but his strong attachment to the chancellor Poyet proved fatal to his happiness, and by the influence of the queen of Navarre, he was deprived of his literary honors, and banished from France. Now a fugitive, he wandered from Vienna to Rome, where he became a jesuit, and afterwards retired to Venice, where he was imprisoned. When liberated, he again came to Paris, and then to Vienna, where he obtained a professorship; but afterwards he made his peace with his French persecutors, and was restored to his chair for a while, till another fit of madness and eccentricity drove him away to die a penitent fanatic in a monastery, where he expired, 6th Sept. 1581, aged 71. Though wild and extravagant in his conduct, he was a man of deep erudition, and of extensive information, so that his lectures were attended by the most numerous and respectable audiences. His opinions were at times as extravagant as his conduct. It was not only at Rome that he exposed himself to persecution, for asserting that general councils were superior to the pope, but at Venice he formed a ridiculous attachment to Joan, an old maid, in whom he pretended that the redemption of women, hitherto imperfect, was now accomplished. His works are 26 in number, on curious and strange subjects, the best known of which are, Clavis Abconditorum à Constitutione Mundi, 12mo. 1547 — History of the Gauls — Description tion of the Holy Land — de Phœnicum Literis — de Originibus Gentium — Alcorani & Evangelii Concordia, 8vo. — de Linguae Hebraicæ Excellentia — De Ultimo Judicio, &c. — de Tribus Impostoribus, &c. attributed by some to him.

POSTHUMUS, Mar. Cass. Latienus, a Roman general made emperor after Valerian's death, 261. His valor and virtues, promised happiness to Rome, when he was murdered with his son by his rebellious soldiers 267.

POSTLETHWAYTE, Malachi, the learned author of the English Commercial Dictionary, 2 vols. fol. a work of great merit and utility, was a London merchant, and died 1767.

POTAMON, a philosopher of Alexandria in the age of Augustus, was chief of the Eclectic sect.

POTAMON, an orator of Lesbos, whose panegyric on Tiberius was much admired, though too full of flattery.

POTE, Joseph, an English bookseller and printer settled at Eton, where he died 1787. He published an interesting History of Windsor castle, and of its antiquities, and of St. George's college and Chapel, 4to.

POTEMKIN, Gregory Alexander, a Russian prince descended from a Polish family and born at Smolensko in 1736. He was an ensign in the horse-guards when his person first attracted the notice of Catherine, and he rapidly rose to the envied situation of favorite, and of war minister. He suggested to his imperial mistress the necessity of seizing upon the Crimea, and by his advice the foundations of Cherson were laid in 1778 on the banks of the Nieper, and a new city suddenly arose, important for its maritime situation, and well protected by a population of above 40,000 inhabitants. In the enjoyment of the favors of the empress, Potemkin fought for new distinctions, and to obtain the ribband of St. George, which was bestowed only on victorious generals, he persuaded his mistress to declare war against the Turks 1787, and he took the field in person at the head of 150,000 men. In the midst of the winter he laid siege to Oczackow, which he took by assault and delivered up to the plunder of his licentious troops, who sacrificed to their fury upwards of 25,000 men. Thus victorious he was received by Catherine with unusual pomp; the most splendid presents were lavished upon him, and he was better enabled to indulge that fondness for luxury and debauched intemperance which covered his table with the choicest dainties, and the rarest fruits at the most extravagant expence. He attended afterwards the congress of Yassi, which was to cement a reconciliation between the Russians and the Turks; but his intemperance here brought on indisposition, and as he wished to remove to the more salubrious air of Nicolaëff his distemper grew so violent that he alighted from his carriage by the way and expired suddenly under a tree, 14th Oct. 1791, aged 55. His remains were conveyed to Cherson, and buried by order of the empress under a magnificent mausoleum. Potemkin in his character was violent, haughty, and tyrannical; not only the courtiers of Catherine felt the overbearing power of this guilty favorite, but even foreign ambassadors were treated with studied disdain and ceremorious superiority. His intemperance at table has been mentioned as so extraordinary, that it is said he generally devoured a whole goose, or a ham for his breakfast with a copious draught of wine, and feasted the rest of the day with equal voracity. It is reported that not satisfied with the pompous title of chief of the Cossacks, he aspired to the dignity of duke of Courland, and to the throne of Poland, and in the midst of his elevation there were not some wanting who expected that at the head of the Russian armies he would declare himself independent, or presume to dethrone his benefactors.

POTENGER, John, son of the master of Winchester school, was born at Winchester, July 21st, 1647. He was of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he took his bachelor's degree, and then entered at the Temple, and was called to the bar. He married the daughter of sir John Ernle, chancellor of the exchequer, and died comptroller of the pipe office. He died Dec. 18th, 1733, and was buried in the parish of Highworth, Wilts. He wrote a Pastoral Reflection on Death, a poem — the Life of Agricola, from Tacitus — poems, epistles, discourses, &c.

POTER, Paul, a native of Enckuyfen, in Holland; eminent as a painter. His landscapes, farms, cattle, &c. are much admired, and it is said that he was superior to all other artists, in throwing, with effect, the rays of the meridian sun upon the various rural objects of his pieces. He died at Amsterdam, 1654, aged 29.

POTT, Percival, a very able surgeon, born in Thread-needle street, London, Dec. 1713. Though he might have obtained preferment in the church, by means of his patron, bishop Wilcox, he chose the profession of a surgeon, and under the judicious directions of Mr. Nourse, soon distinguished himself. In 1745 he was elected surgeon of Bartholomew hospital, and by sound judgment, attention, and experience, he was enabled to introduce a mild and rational mode of practice in the treatment of his patients. In 1764 he was made fellow of the Royal society, and the next year he attracted the public attention by his lectures, and then removed from Watling street to Lincoln's Inn, and in 1777, to Hanover square. After a long life, devoted to the service of mankind, universally respected and admired, he died, Dec. 1788, in consequence of a cold which he caught in visiting a country patient. This worthy man advanced the science of surgery, not only by the result of long experience, but by the invention of several surgical instruments, and by the publication of some valuable treatises. The chief of his works are, a Treatise on the Hernia — on the Wounds of the Head — Observations on the Fistula Lacrymalis — Remarks on the Hydrocele — on the Cataract, &c. all of which have been collected and published 1790, in 3 vols. 8vo. by his son-in-law Mr. Earle.

POTT, John Henry, a learned German chemist, author of a treatise De Sulphuribus Metallorum, 1738, 4to. — Observationes circa Sal, 1741, 2 vols. 4to. and other works, in high reputation.

POTTER, Christopher, an English divine, born in Westmoreland, 1591. He was educated at Queen's college, college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and became fellow, and also succeeded his uncle, Dr. Barnaby Potter, 1626, as provost. He published a sermon, preached at his uncle's consecration as bishop of Carlisle, 1628, and he himself was made dean of Worcester, 1635, and in 1640, vice-chancellor of Oxford. He signalized himself by his loyalty during the civil wars, and sent his plate to the king, saying that he wished rather to drink like Diogenes in the palm of his hand, than that his majesty should want. In Jan. 1646 he was nominated to the deanery of Durham; but he died in his college the following March, and before he was installed. He was a learned and exemplary character. He wrote besides some tracts on predestination against the Calvinists.

POTTER, Paul, or POTER, a Dutch painter, Vid. POTER.

POTTER, John, primate of England, was born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1674. He was educated at University college, Oxford, and at the age of 19, began to distinguish himself as an able Grecian, and acute critic, by his publication of Variantes Lectiones ad Plutarchi Librum de audiendis, &c. He was in 1694, chosen fellow of Lincoln college, where he became an eminent and popular tutor. He was in 1704, made chaplain to archbishop Tenison, and went in consequence to reside at Lambeth. In 1708 he was appointed canon of Christ-church, and regius divinity professor, and in 1715, was raised to the see of Oxford. In 1737 he succeeded Wake, at Canterbury, and after supporting this high office with becoming dignity, died 1747. In his private character it is said, that he was haughty, and to prove this, it is mentioned that he disinherited his son for marrying below his rank. He published Antiquities of Greece, 2 vols. 8vo. which have passed through several editions — an Edition of Lycophron, folio, much valued — Discourse on Church Government — Edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, &c. His theological works, charges, &c. were edited, 3 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1753.

POTTER, Francis, an English divine born in Wiltshire and educated at Oxford. He succeeded his father as minister of Kilminster 1637, and was admitted member of the Royal society in consequence of his presenting a curious hydraulic machine to that learned body. He was equally eminent as a painter; but his Explication of the Number 666, in the Apocalypse, 4to. Oxford, 1642, does not reflect much on his sense or genius as a commentator. He died blind, 1678.

POTTER, Robert, an English divine, known in classical literature for an excellent and spirited translation of the plays of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. He was of Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he proceeded M. A. 1768, and he afterwards obtained the living of Lowestoff, in Suffolk, and a prebend in Norwich cathedral. Besides his translations, he vindicated the character of Gray, the poet, against Johnson's censures. This respectable man died 1804.

POUCHARD, Julian, a native of Lower Normandy, who was engaged in the direction of the Journal des Sçavans, and was also professor of Greek in the royal college at Paris. He wrote a Discourse on the Antiquity of the Egyptians — another on the Liberalities of the Romans, &c. and died 1705, aged 49.

POUGET, Francis Amé, a French divine, born at Montpellier, 1666. He was priest of the oratory, doctor of the Sorbonne, regent of an ecclesiastical school at Montpellier, vicar of St. Roche, Paris, and died at the convent of St. Magloire, 1723. He was an able theologian, and is said to have proved his powers by the penitence and conversion of La Fontaine. He wrote a "Catechism of Montpellier, or a Body of Divinity," 5 vols. 12mo. afterwards translated into Latin, in 2 vols. fol. — Christian Instructions on the Duties of the Knights of Malta, 12mo. &c.

POULLE, Lewis, preacher to the king, and abbot of Nogent, died at Avignon, his native place, 8th Nov. 1781, aged 79. Besides eloquence, which he possessed in the highest degree, he was also eminently known as a poet, and he obtained the poetical prize at Toulouse in 1732 and 1733. His sermons were very popular, and it is remarkable, that he never committed them to paper, but retained them in his memory, and at last, after the lapse of 40 years, he was with difficulty prevailed upon by his friends, to favor the public with discourses, which had charmed and consoled the most numerous audiences. They appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. 1778.

POUPART, Francis, a native of Mans, who studied anatomy and philosophy at Paris, and took his degree of M. D. at Rheims. He wrote a Dissertation on the Leech, in the Journal des Sçavans — a Memoir on Hermaphrodite Insects — History of the Formica-Leo, and Formica-Pulex, besides other valuable tracts, inserted in the memoirs of the academy of sciences, of which he was a member. Though in narrow circumstances, he maintained his character of gaiety, good humor, and modesty. He died Oct. 1709, aged 48.

POURBUS, Peter and Francis, father and son, two eminent Flemish painters. The father was born at Gonde, and died at Antwerp, 1583. The son was born at Bruges, and died at Paris, 1622. The landscapes and animals of the father were much admired; but the son was superior in his portraits and historical pieces.

POURCHOT, Edme, a native of Pouilly, near Auxerre, who became professor of philosophy in the college of the Grassins, and then of that of Mazarin, at Paris. He was a man of great information, and intimate with Racine, Despreaux, Mabillon, Montfaucon, and the other learned men of his time. He wrote Institutiones Philosophicæ, edited a fourth time in 4to. 1744, and 5 vols. 12mo. and also other works, and died at Paris, 22d June, 1734, aged 83.

POURFOUR, Francis, a physician, who died at Paris, his native place, 1741, aged 67. He is author of three letters on a New System of the Brain, 4to. — Dissertation on the New Method of operating for the Cataract, 12mo. — on the Diseases of the Eyes, 4to. in three letters, &c. He was also a most skilful herb-alift,

alist, and after his death, which happened at Paris, 18th June, 1741, in his 77th year, there was found among his papers a valuable MS. herbal, of 30 folio vols. of which the plants had been carefully prepared by himself.

POUSSIN, Nicolas, an eminent French painter, born at Andely, in Normandy, 1594. He studied at Paris, and in his 30th year, passed to Rome; but scarce able to maintain himself by his pencil, till his genius burst through the clouds of prejudice, and established his character, as a great and sublime artist. He devoted much of his time to the contemplation of the sculptured heroes of ancient Rome, and her various relics of antiquity; and thence arose that exactness in the manners and customs, the times and places, which he every where mingles with elegance of form, correctness and variety of proportions, and interesting air, and boldness of feature. His fame was so great, that Lewis XIII. sent him an invitation which he could not refuse; but though he was flattered, and lodged in the Thuilleries, he sighed for the classic retreats of his favorite Rome, and at last returned there, and died there, of a paralytic stroke, 1665. His chief works in France, were the Lord's Supper — the Labors of Hercules, for the Louvre, which he did not complete, in consequence of the satirical remarks made by Vouet and his pupils, upon him.

POUSSIN, Gaspard, a painter. His real name was Dughet, but he assumed that of Poussin, when that celebrated artist married his sister. His landscapes are much admired, and as he studied with unusual attention, the various views of nature, it is to his highest credit, that he has been enabled to convey his observations into his pieces. His land storms have particular expression; but his figures are said to want dignity. He is mentioned by Mafon, as uniting in his pieces, the style of his brother-in-law, and of Claude Lorraine. He died 1675, though some place his death in 1663, at the age of about 63.

POWELL, David, a learned Welchman, born in Denbighshire, 1552. He was educated at Oxford, and on the foundation of Jesus college there, he became D. D. in 1583. He was vicar of Ruabon, Denbighshire, and had some other preferment in the church of St. Asaph. He died 1590, and was buried in his own church. He published Caradoc's History of Cambria, with annotations, 4to. 1584 — Annotationes in Itinerarium Cambriae per Sylv. Geraldum, 1585 — Annotationes in Cambriae Descript. per Gerald. — De Britannica Historia recte Intelligenda — Pont. Virunni Historia Britannica.

POWELL, William Samuel, an able divine, born at Colchester, 27th Sept. 1717. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, 1740, and master, 1765, after promoting its interests as an active tutor. He was also archdeacon of Colchester, and rector of Fresh-water, in the Isle of Wight, and died Jan. 10th, 1775. He published a well-known sermon on subscribing to the 39 articles, and other excellent discourses.

POWELL, George, an actor, considered for some time as the successful rival of Betterton, till his irregularities, and his propensity to drinking ruined him in the public opinion. Colley Cibber compares him to Wilks. He died 1714. He wrote Alphonso, a tragedy, and other dramatic pieces. His great character was Alexander.

POWELL, Foster, a famous pedestrian, who frequently walked from London to York in a short period of time, with great ease. Though high wagers depended upon his exertions, and though he betted much upon himself, yet he died poor, in 1793, aged 59. He was then an under clerk in an attorney's office.

POWNALL, Thomas, an English writer, born in Lincolnshire. He went early to America, and obtained the government of New Jersey, and afterwards that of Massachusetts, which he exchanged in 1760 for that of South Carolina. During the American war he returned to England, and was made comptroller general of the expenditure &c. of the army in Germany, and was also elected member of the commons in three parliaments. He afterwards retired from public business for the pursuit of literary labors, and died at Bath much respected 1795, aged 73. He was a man of great information and well skilled in antiquities, and contributed much to the memoirs of the Antiquarian society, of which he was a member. He wrote Memoirs on Drainage and Navigation — Letter to Adam Smith on his Wealth of Nations — treatise on Antiquities — Memorials to the sovereigns of Europe — Memorial to the Sovereigns of America — the Right, Interest, &c. of Government concerning East India Affairs — Topographical Description of Part of North America — Description of Antiquities in the Provincia Romana of Gaul — Intellectual Physics — Essay on the Nature of Being — treatise on Old Age, &c.

POYET, William, a native of Angers, who was patronized by Louisa the mother of Francis I. and became at last chancellor of France 1538. He for a while maintained his power by flattery, but the displeasure of the queen of Navarre and of the dukes d'Etampes, the king's mistress hastened his disgrace, and he was in 1545, deprived of all his honors by a decree of the parliament of Paris, and confined in the tower of Bourges. He died 1548, aged 74.

POYNINGS, fr Edward, a gentleman of Kent, who recommended himself to the favor of Henry VII. by whom he was sent to Ireland. In this new government he displayed great courage, firmness, and wisdom, the rebellions of lord Desmond and Kildare were overpowered, a parliament was called, and salutary laws were enacted. In the next reign Poyning was made a privy counsellor, and appointed governor of Tournay in Flanders.

POZZO, Andrew, a native of Trent, eminent as a painter and architect. Some of his pictures adorned the church of St. Ignatius at Rome. He wrote 2 vols. on perspective, with little judgment. He died 1709, aged 67.

POZZO, Modesta, Vid. FONTE MODERATA.

PRADON, Nicolas, a French poet who affected to be the rival of Racine. Through prejudice and party his Hippolytus and Phædra, for a time balanced the merits merits and the popularity of that great poet, but his presumption and ignorance have been severely censured by Boileau. He was born at Rouen, and died at Paris 1698. His works were printed 1744, in 2 vols. 12mo.

PRATT, Charles, earl of Camden, third son of sir John Pratt, chief justice of the king's bench, was born 1713. From Eton and from King's college, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, he entered at the Inner Temple, and studied assiduously the law. His merits, however, remained buried in obscurity, till called forth by the protection of Henley and of Mr. Pitt, and when the former was made chancellor in 1757, he obtained the office of attorney general for his friend. In 1762, he was raised to the dignity of chief justice of the common pleas, and it was in this office that he gained such deserved popularity, when after a patient hearing of arguments on both sides he pronounced the detention of Mr. Wilkes illegal, against the opinion and the wishes of government. This impartial conduct procured for him the thanks and the freedom of the city of London in a gold box; his picture was placed in Guildhall as an honorable testimony of his virtues, and various cities in the kingdom re-echoed the sentiments of the capital. In 1765, he was raised to the peerage, and in 1766, advanced to the seals; but his opinion on the Middlesex election was so opposite to the views of the ministry that he was stripped of his honors, though he had the satisfaction to see some of his colleagues proud to share his disgrace. In the American war he reprobated the violent measures pursued by lord North, and in the case of the libel laws he wished to give greater power to the deliberation of jurymen. In 1782, he was appointed president of the council, and though the next year he resigned for a little time, he continued in the honorable office till his death. This venerable character died 18th April, 1794.

PRAXAGORAS, a Greek historian of Athens. He wrote an History of Athens — of Constantine — and of Alexander, about 345 A. D.

PRAXEAS, author of a heresy in the second century, maintained that there is but one person in the trinity, the same which suffered on the cross.

PRAXITELES, a Grecian sculptor, B. C. 364. His statues of Venus and of Phryne were much admired.

PREMONTVAL, Peter le Guay de, member of the academy of sciences at Berlin, was born at Charenton 1716. He wrote Monogamia, or a Tract on Single Marriage, 3 vols. 8vo. — Preservative against the Corruption of French Language in Germany, 8vo. — the Mind of Fontenelle, 12mo. — Thoughts on Liberty — Memoirs on the Berlin Academy. He inclined to the doctrines of Socinus and Epicurus, and of fortuitous creation. He died at Berlin 1767.

PRESTON, Thomas, fellow of King's college, Cambridge, was doctor of civil law, and master of Trinity hall in Elizabeth's reign. When the queen visited the university 1564, he played with such success in the Latin tragedy of Dido, that her majesty settled a pension of 20l. on him. He wrote some dramatic pieces.

PRESTON, John, master of Emanuel college, Cambridge, was an able writer in favor of the puritans. He died 1628.

PRESTRE LE, Vid. VAUBAN.

PRETI, Jerome, a native of Tuscany, distinguished as a poet. He died at Barcelona 1626. His elegant poems were published 1666, in 12mo.

PREVILLE, Peter Lewis Dubus de, an eminent French actor. He was intended by his parents for the ecclesiastical profession; but for some childish misconduct he left his father's house, and after working for a little time with some masons he joined himself to a company of strolling players. From Lyons, where he first gained popularity, he came to Paris, and in his exhibition before the Royal family he so much pleased the king, Lewis XV. that he was made one of the comedians of the court. He withdrew from the stage in 1785, but again re-appeared in 1792, in support of his profession which had suffered by the revolution. He afterwards retired to the house of his daughter at Beauvais, where he died blind in 1800. As an actor he possessed great powers, he could adopt the manners and expressions of every age and profession, and after exciting the loudest laughter, he has been known to rouse the deepest compassion and to draw tears from his auditors.

PREVOT D'EXILES, Antony Francis, a French writer, born at Hesdin in the province of Artois 1697. He was educated among the jesuits, but relinquished their society for the army, and afterwards retired among the Benedictines of St. Maur. The love of pleasure and of the world, however, prevailed upon him again to violate his vows and fly from the monastery. He went to Holland where he formed a connection with a woman of some merit and beauty, and with her visited England 1733, and the following year returned to France. Under the patronage of Conti he promised himself a peaceful old age; but a fatal accident terminated his days. On the 23d Nov. 1763, he was found in an apoplectic fit in the forest of Chantilly, and a surgeon supposing him dead, opened his body. The beginning of the operation restored the fallen man to his senses, but too late, as the vital parts had been lacerated. He is known as the author of translations of Clarissa Harlowe, and of sir Charles Grandison into French, besides which he wrote Memoirs of a Man of Quality, in 6 vols. a romance of some merit — History of Cleveland, natural son of Cromwell, 6 vols. — Pro and Con a periodical journal, continued in 20 vols. in which he censured with too much freedom the works of his cotemporaries — the Dean of Coleraine, a novel — a General History of Voyages — History of Margaret of Anjou, 2 vols 12mo. and other works.

PRICE, or PRICE, John, an Englishman who resided in Paris, but returned to England in 1646, which he left in consequence of the civil wars. He afterwards settled at Florence where he became a Roman catholic, and was made keeper of the medals to the grand duke, and Greek professor. He died at Rome 1676, aged 76. He wrote notes on the Psalms — on St. Matthew — on the Acts — on Apuleius, 1650, &c. in which he evinced extensive erudition and great taste.

PRICE, sir John, a gentleman of Brecknockshire, who was employed in surveying the monasteries which were doomed to dissolution at the reformation. He was well skilled in antiquities, and wrote a defence of British history in an answer to Polydore Virgil, published by his son Richard 1573. He died about 1553.

PRICE, Richard, an eminent dissenting minister and able political writer, born about 1723, in Glamorgan-shire. He was educated for the ministry among the dissenters, and began early to preach at Newington, Middlesex, and afterwards removed to Hackney. In 1764, he was elected fellow of the Royal society, and some years after obtained the degree of D. D. from a Scotch university. In 1772, he commenced author by his appeal to the public on the national debt, and in 1776, during the party disputes which attended the beginning of the American war, he published his famous observations on the nature of civil government. This work which did not pass without censure from various writers, acquired great popularity, and procured for its author the thanks of the common council of London that year. As preacher at the meeting house in the Old Jewry, he delivered a discourse in 1789, which was afterwards made public. In this sermon "on the Love of Our Country," he enlarged on the French revolution with party prejudices, and with democratic zeal, and asserted the right of the people to cashier their governors for misconduct; but whatever may be the opinions of politicians on popular subjects, it must reflect disgrace on the man who, assuming the character of christian minister, rejoices at the misfortunes of fallen greatness and triumphs on the ruins of a throne. These allusions to the fate of the French monarch were read and commented upon by Mr. Burke with the noble indignation of offended virtue; but the pamphlets which have appeared in consequence of this controversy though numerous, deserve now little the notice of the world, only so far as they recommend the cultivation of benevolence and charity among men, and loyal attachment to that government which protects equally the person and the property of all its subjects. Dr. Price died 19th March, 1791. As a political writer he carried his ideas of equality and liberty much farther than the vices and passions of men will with safety allow. As a calculator on political questions he was eminently distinguished. His works are four dissertations on providence and prayer, on the evidences of a future state, on the importance of christianity — a Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals, 8vo. — Observations on Reverfional Payments, Annuities, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. — Discussion of the Doctrines of Materialism and Necessity, in a Correspondence with Dr. Priestley, 8vo. — Essay on the Population of England and Wales, 8vo. — a volume of sermons on various occasional subjects. Mrs. Chapone has described him in her miscellanies, as a very amiable man in private life.

PRICHARD, Rees, a native of Llanymodyfri, in Carmarthenshire, educated at St. John's college, Oxford. He wrote some poetical pieces, which are still read with fond partiality by the Welsh, and died 1644, vicar of his native village, rector of Llamedy, chancellor of St. David's, and prebendary of Brecon.

PRIDEAUX, John, an English prelate, born at Stowford, Devonshire, 1578. His parents were very poor, and when disappointed as candidate for the clerkship of Ugborough church, near Harford, he travelled on foot to Oxford, and from the mean occupation of a helper in the kitchen of Exeter college, he rose to be one of its most respectable fellows, and in 1612, was elected the rector of the society. In 1615 he was made regius professor of divinity, and canon of Christ-church, and afterwards served the office of vice chancellor, and in 1641, was raised to the see of Worcester. The troubles of the state exposed him to great persecution for his loyalty, so that he died poor, of a fever, at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. H. Sutton, at Bredon, Worcestershire, 1650. He wrote various works in Latin, besides orations, lectures, and Falsculus Controversiar. Theologicarum.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, an eminent divine, born at Padstow, Cornwall, 3d May, 1648. He was educated under Busby, at Westminster, and entered at Christ-church, Oxford, 1668; and in 1676, when he took his master's degree, he published his Marmora Oxoniensia, &c. in folio, a work of some merit, which explained more fully than Selden's account, the Arundelian marbles. This publication recommended him to the patronage of Finch, lord Nottingham, the chancellor, who gave him the living of St. Clement's in Oxford, and afterwards added a prebend in the church of Norwich, in 1681. He refused, in 1691, the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, of which he afterwards repented; but in 1702 he was promoted to the deanery of Norwich. He was unfortunately afflicted with the stone, for which he was cut in 1712; but so unskillfully was the operation performed that he was afterwards obliged to void his urine through the orifice by which the stone had been extracted. This disagreeable accident disabled him from appearing in the pulpit; but his hours were devoted to the public service, and he then wrote his connections of the Old and New Testament, 2 vols. fol. and 4 vols. 8vo. a work of great merit and utility, which has been translated into various languages, and often edited. This worthy character, amiable in private life, and respectable as an intelligent and learned author, died 11th Nov. 1724. He wrote besides, the Right of Tithes — Directions for Church-wardens — some pamphlets — sermons, and a life of Mahomet, of which three editions were sold in one year, as part of a larger work on the History of the Saracen Empire, a design which he abandoned.

PRIE, N. de Bertelot, marchioness de, an intriguing female, who on her return from Turin, where her husband the marquis de Prie was ambassador from France, became the favorite of Bourbon the prime minister. After dispensing for some time the favors of the court in the most capricious manner, she was exiled to a country seat by the cardinal de Fleury; and the disgrace had such effect upon her mind that she soon after died of a broken heart 1727, aged 29.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, an English philosopher and dissenting divine, born at Fieldhead, Yorkshire, 1733. He was educated at Daventry under Dr. Ashworth, for the ministry among the dissenters, and at the proper age he took care of a congregation at Needham market, market, Suffolk, and afterwards at Nantwich, Cheshire. He became in 1761, professor of belles lettres in the Warrington academy, and after seven years' residence there he removed to Leeds, and two years after accepted the office of librarian and philosophical companion to the earl of Shelburne. In this retreat the philosopher devoted himself laboriously to metaphysical and theological studies, and published various works, and when at last he separated from his noble patron he retired with an annual pension of 150*l.* to settle at Birmingham as pastor to an unitarian congregation in 1780. While here usefully employed in advancing the cause of philosophy, and too often engaged in theological disputes, he became the victim of popular fury, and the conduct of some of his neighbours in celebrating the anniversary of the French revolution in 1791, with more intemperance than became Englishmen and loyal subjects, excited a dreadful riot. Not only the meeting houses were destroyed on this melancholy occasion; but among others Dr. Priestley's house, library, manuscripts and philosophical apparatus, were totally consumed, and though he recovered a compensation by suing the county, he quitted this scene of prejudice and unpopularity. After residing some time at London and Hackney, where he preached to the congregation over which his friend Price once presided, he determined to quit his native country, and seek a more peaceful retreat in America, where some of his family were already settled. He left England in 1794, and fixed his residence at Northumberland in Pennsylvania, where he died in 1804. His writings were very numerous, and he long attracted the public notice not only by discoveries in philosophy, but by the boldness of his theological opinions. Had he confined his studies merely to philosophical pursuits his name would have descended to posterity with greater lustre; but he who attempts innovations in government and religion, for singularity, and to excite popular prejudices, must be little entitled to the applauses of the world. His chief publications are, an Examination of Dr. Reid's Work on the Human Mind, Dr. Beattie's on Truth, and Dr. Osborne's on Common Sense, 1775 — Disquisition on Matter and Spirit, in which he denied the soul's immateriality, 1777 — Experiments and Observations on various Kinds of Air, 2 vols. 8vo. and other learned and valuable communications to the philosophical transactions — Letters to Bishop Newcome on the Duration of Christ's Ministry — History of the Corruptions of Christianity, 2 vols. 8vo. a work of singular character, which brought on a controversy with Dr. Horsley, and also excited the animadversion of the monthly reviewers and other writers — History of Early Opinions concerning the Person of Christ, &c. He also published charts of History and Biography — History of Electricity — History and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colors — Lectures on the Theory and History of Language, and on the principles of oratory and criticism, &c. He at one time adopted the doctrine of philosophical necessity, in which Dr. Price ably opposed him; and in America he defended his Socinian principles with great warmth in a controversy with Dr. Linn of Philadelphia. His discoveries and improvements in the knowledge of chemistry were very great and important; but he lived to see the general explosion of the doctrine of phlogiston, which he had so zealously established, and so pertinaciously defended. From his extensive information as a philosopher he had correspondents in every part of the world, and was member not only of the London society, but of other learned bodies in the two continents.

PRIEUR, Philip, a native of Normandy, professor of belles lettres in Paris university, and author of Dissertatio de Literis Canonicis, 8vo. &c. He also edited Cyprian, Arnobius, Minutius Felix, &c. fol. and died 1680.

PRIMATICCIO, Francesco, a noble Bolognese, known as a painter and architect. He was patronized by Francis I. king of France, and as commissary general of the Royal buildings, he improved the taste of the nation in the arts. He died at Paris much respected 1570, aged 80.

PRIMEROSE, Gilbert, a Scotch divine, minister of the French church in London, chaplain to James I. and canon of Windfor. He was made D. D. at Oxford by royal mandamus, and died 1642. He is author of Jacob's Vow in opposition to the vows of monks and friars, in French, 4 vols. 4to. — the Trumpet of Sion in 18 sermons, and other theological works. His son James was a physician, who for some time practised at Paris, and afterwards settled in Yorkshire. He wrote several treatises de Mulierum Morbis, 4to. — de Circulatione Sanguinis — Enchiridion Medico-Practicum — Ars Pharmaceutica — de Vulgi Erroribus in Medicina, 8vo. translated into French by Rostagny, and into English by Dr. Wittie, 1651, 8vo. — Academia Montpelienfis Descripta, &c.

PRINCE DE BEAUMONT, Mad. le, a French lady, born at Rouen. She was long engaged in education in England, and by her various popular publications rendered instruction pleasing and delightful to her youthful readers. Her pieces are le Magasin des Enfants — des Adolescentes — l'Education complete — and other works, all of which are highly interesting, and promote the cause of morality and virtue. She died 1780.

PRINCE, John, a native of Axminster, Devon, educated at Brazen Nose, Oxford. He became curate of Bideford, and afterwards obtained St. Martin's, Exeter, the vicarage of Totness, and then Berry Pomeroy, where he died 1720. He is author of the Worthies of Devon, fol. a work of merit, now scarce — Humble Defence of the Exeter bill, &c. — Letters to a Young Divine — sermons and tracts, &c.

PRINGLE, sir John, an eminent physician, born in Roxburghshire 10th April, 1707. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards completed his education under Boerhaave at Leyden, where he took his medical degrees. He was in 1742, appointed physician to the army in Flanders, and he attended the forces of the duke of Cumberland to the battle of Culloden, after which he settled in London, and was made physician to the queen in 1761. His practice was great, and his reputation such that he was created a baronet in 1766, and elected president of the Royal society, from 1772 to 1778, and physician to the king. This respectable man died in London, 18th Jan. 1782. He is author of Observations on the Diseases of the Army, 8vo. — Memoirs on Septic and Anti-septic Substances, 8vo. for which he received the gold medal of the Royal society — Observations on the Treatment of Fevers in Hospitals and Prisons — Anniversary Discourses before the Royal society.

PRIOLO, Benjamin, author of a good Latin History of France, from the death of Lewis XIII. 1643, to 1664, was born of a noble family at Venice, 1602. After studying at Orthez, Montauban, and at Leyden, under Heinsius and Vossius, he visited Paris, and afterwards Padua, and at last became the friend and the associate of the duke de Rohan. After his patron's death, 1638, he retired to Geneva, and afterwards was engaged in various negotiations in favor of the French court. He died of an apoplexy at Lyons, 1667, as he was going on a secret embassy to Venice. The best edition of his history is that of Leipzig, 1686, 8vo.

PRIOR, Matthew, an English poet of celebrity. He was born 21st July, 1664, in London, where his father was a joiner. After his father's death, his uncle, a vintner near Charing-croft, took care of him, and sent him to Westminster school, with the intention of bringing him up to his business; but while he pursued occasionally his studies, he was fortunately called to settle a dispute on a passage in Horace, by some company in his uncle's house, and lord Dorset was so pleased with his abilities and ingenuity, that he liberally patronized him. He was therefore sent to St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he soon became fellow; and the application which he bestowed to learning, advanced him still more in the good opinion of his patron and of his friends. In 1686 he joined his friend Mr. Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, in ridiculing the Hind and Panther of Dryden, in the story of the country and city mouse, and at the revolution, when his poetical merits became publicly known, he was introduced by lord Dorset to king William, and employed about the court. In 1690 he was secretary to the plenipotentiaries at the Hague, and the king, sensible of his merits, kept him about his person as gentleman of his bedchamber. He was afterwards secretary of the negotiations at Ryfwick in 1697, and also principal secretary of state in Ireland, and the next year he went as secretary to the embassy in France. In 1700 he was one of the lords commissioners of trade and plantations, and obtaining a seat in parliament for East Grinstead, he voted for the impeachment of the lords who had advised the partition treaty. Though he celebrated the illustrious deeds of the English at the battle of Blenheim, yet he was an advocate for peace, and in 1711 he was sent by queen Anne to France as ambassador plenipotentiary. He continued in that character even after the accession of George I. but he was accused by the parliament, and committed to close custody; yet, though exempted from the act of grace passed in 1707, he was liberated from confinement, and no charge laid against him. He retired from public life to his seat, Down-hall, Essex, engaged solely in literary pursuits. He was employed for some time on a history of his own time, but he was suddenly carried off by a fever, Sept. 18, 1721, in his 58th year, at Wimple, the seat of lord Oxford. He was buried in Westminster abbey, and a monument, for which he laid apart 500l. was erected over him, with an elegant inscription by Freind, the master of Westminster school. The History of his own Time appeared after his death; but though said to be published from his papers, was evidently a spurious composition. The poems of Prior are chiefly on light subjects, but written with elegance, ease, and spirit. His Solomon on the Vanity of the World, was inscribed to his early patron lord Dorset. His works have appeared in various editions. He continued to his death fellow of St. John's college, and when censured by his friends for keeping so small an income, when he was the favorite of the court, he replied, that what he had besides was precarious, but that his fellowship would always be bread and cheese to him. When shown with great pomp and parade the apartments and curiosities of Versailles, in which the victories of Lewis XIV. were described, and asked whether king William's victories were so represented in his palaces, he nobly answered, "no, the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen every where but in his own house."

PRISCIANUS, a famous grammarian of Cæsarea, A. D. 525.

PRISCILLIAN, a Spaniard who became the chief of a sect in the fourth century. He was beheaded 384. He favored the errors of the Gnostics and the Manichees.

PRITZ OR PRITIUS, John George, a protestant divine born at Leipzig 1662. He was professor of divinity at Gripfwalde, and died much beloved, as one of the ministers of Frankfort, 24th Aug. 1732. He published an Introduction to the New Testament, 8vo. — de Immortalitate Hominis — an edition of Macarius' works — Milton's Letters — an edition of the Greek Testament, &c.

PROBUS, M. Aurel. Valer. a general made emperor of Rome at the death of Tacitus 276. He was successful against the Goths and other barbarians; but at last was murdered by his own soldiers, 282. He was a prince of great worth, and deservedly beloved by his subjects.

PROCACCINI, Camillo, a painter of Bologna. In his last supper preserved in Genoa cathedral, the figures are represented larger than life, and with the most striking effect. He died 1626, aged 80. His brother Julius, who also died in 1626, was an artist of great genius and superior celebrity. This family produced several men of eminence in painting.

PROCLUS, a platonic philosopher of Lycia, who attacked the Christian religion with great acrimony. He died about 485.

PROCLUS, St. the disciple of Chrysostom, and patriarch of Constantinople, died 447, author of some theological works.

PROCOPIUS, a Cilician, the relation of Julian. After the death of the next emperor Jovian, he retired among the barbarians, but afterwards returned to Constantinople during the absence of Valens and proclaimed himself himself emperor 365. He was defeated and beheaded the next year.

PROCOPIUS, a Greek historian patronized by Belisarius and by Justinian. He was author of an History of the Wars of the Goths, Persians and Gauls, &c.

PROCOPIUS, a Greek sophist of Gaza, A. D. 560. author of Commentaries on the books of Kings, the Chronicles, Isaiah, &c.

PRODICUS, a sophist of Cos, about 396 B. C. He taught at Athens, where Socrates, Euripides, &c. attended his lectures.

PRONAPIDES, a Greek poet, said to have been the master of the great Homer, and to have taught his countrymen to write from the left to the right.

PROPERTIUS, Sextus Aurelius, a Roman poet of merit, contemporary with Tibullus, Ovid, and Mæcenas. He died about 19 B. C.

PROSPER, St. a Christian writer of the fifth century, the disciple of Augustine. Though dissipated in the beginning of life, he reformed his manners, and became an able advocate of the faith, and died about 463.

PROTAGORAS, a Greek philosopher of Abdera. He was banished from Athens for supporting atheism. He died in Sicily about 400 B. C.

PROTOGENES, a painter of Rhodes, spared and patronized by Demetrius at the siege of the place about 300 B. C.

PROVENZALE, Marcello, an Italian, eminent as a painter in mosaics. His pieces were much admired. He died 1639, aged 64.

PRUDENTIUS, Aur. Clement, a native of Saragossa in Spain. He was distinguished as an advocate, a soldier, a magistrate, and a poet. His Latin poems were edited by Elzevir with Heinsius' notes, 1667.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, at whose court Annibal took refuge. When he seemed inclined to betray the illustrious fugitive, Annibal destroyed himself. Prusias was put to death by his subjects B. C. 149.

PRYNNE, William, an English lawyer, distinguished during the civil wars. He was born at Swanwick, Somersetshire, 1600, and educated at Bath grammar school, and Oriel college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's inn, 1620. His Histriomastix, or Discourse on Stage Plays, in 1632, was noticed by the court, as it was supposed to throw reflections on the queen, and the author was condemned by the star chamber to be pilloried, to pay a fine of 5000l. and to lose his ears. This severity did not check his pen; he wrote other books which satirically reflected on the conduct of Laud, and for this offence he was in 1637, again brought before the star chamber, and condemned to be pilloried, fined 5000l. to lose the remainder of his ears, to have S. L. schismatical leweller, branded on both his cheeks, and to be imprisoned for life. He was, pursuant to the sentence, confined in Mount Orgueil castle in Jersey; but in 1640 he was set at liberty by the Commons, and he returned to London in triumph. He was member for Newport in Cornwall, in the long parliament, and was one of the visitors at Oxford in 1647. He was a violent enemy to Laud, and was the chief manager of his trial; but he attacked with equal violence the independents, and did not spare their leader Cromwell, by whom he was imprisoned in Dunster castle, Somersetshire. He was restored to his seat in parliament when the recall of Charles II. took place, and sat afterwards for Bath. At the restoration he was made keeper of the records in the Tower, with a salary of 500l. per annum, and died at Lincoln's inn, 24th Oct. 1669. He wrote a great number of books, chiefly on politics and religion, the best known of which are, his History of Laud, folio — the Lives of John — Henry III. — and Edward I. — Records, 3 vols. folio, &c.

PRZIPCOWIUS, Samuel, a Socinian writer, expelled, 1658, from Poland with his partizans on account of his opinions. He retired to Prussia, and died there 1670, aged 80. His works, which are all on theological subjects, appeared in 1 vol. folio, 1692.

PSALMANAZAR, George, an extraordinary character, whose real name and birth place are unknown, though he is supposed to be a native of France. With an excellent education, obtained in some of the colleges of the jesuits, he began at an early age to impose upon the world, first in the habit of a pilgrim, and afterwards in the character of a native of Formosa. He travelled from Germany to Liege, pretending to be a Japanese converted to christianity; but afterwards he professed himself to be a heathen, and by the assiduity and zeal of the chaplain of brigadier Lauder's regiment, stationed at Sluys, he was admitted into the pale of the Christian church, and baptized. The conversion of so able and so extraordinary a man, procured an easy introduction to Compton, the bishop of London, and Psalmanazar was taken into his house, and patronized as a deserving character. He was prevailed on to translate the church catechism into the Formosan language, and he also composed a grammar of that language; and though there were some who suspected the imposition, yet he was generally considered by the learned as a man of superior abilities, and a great prodigy. He afterwards published his History of Formosa, which quickly passed through two editions; and that greater confidence might be placed in his narrations, he accustomed himself to feed on raw flesh, roots, and herbs. Some absurdities, however, were discovered in his history, and at last, after living some years on the credulity of the public, he confessed himself an impostor, and declared his sorrow for the impropriety of his conduct. Though thus disgraced and abandoned by his former patrons, yet he found sufficient means to subsist by his pen; he undertook a share in the Universal History, and displayed in the execution great abilities. He lived many years after in an exemplary manner, and died 1763, fully sensible, and sorry for the vile imposition which he had practised.

PSAMMETIUS, a king of Egypt after Amasis, B. C. 525. He was defeated by Cambyfes, and put to death six months after.

PSAMMETICUS, a king of Egypt, who shared the sovereignty sovereign power with 11 other princes. When exiled by his royal associates, he returned, and with the assistance of the Greeks defeated them, and made himself sole monarch. He died 616 B. C.

PSSELLUS, Michael Constantinus, a Greek writer, who flourished about 1105, and was tutor to Michael, son of the emperor Constantine Dumas. He was a good scholar, and wrote comments on 24 of Menander's plays extant in his time. He wrote besides, de quatuor Mathematicis Scientiis, 1556, 8vo. — de Lapidum Virtutibus, 8vo. — de Operatione Dæmonum, 8vo. — de Victus Ratione, 8vo. — Synopsis Legum, Verbis Græcis edita.

PTOLEMY LAGUS, or SOTER, was the son of Arsinoë, the mistress of Philip of Macedon, and he became one of the generals and favorites of Alexander the Great. On the hero's death he obtained Egypt as his share of the spoils, and founded there a kingdom, and made Alexandria his capital. He patronized learning and the arts, and died B. C. 285.

PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS, son of the preceding, was like his father a zealous patron of learned men, and of commerce among his subject. He died B. C. 246.

PTOLEMY EVERGETES, son and successor of Philadelphus, was a mild and benevolent prince. He conquered Syria and Cilicia, and died B. C. 221.

PTOLEMY PHILOPATER, son of Evergetes, was cruel in his behaviour to the Jews, whom afterwards he favored. He died B. C. 204.

PTOLEMY EPIPHANES, succeeded his father Philopater, and was poisoned by his successor Philometor, 180 B. C.

PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR, the murderer of the preceding, was slain in a battle against Alexander Bala of Syria, B. C. 146.

PTOLEMY PHYSCON, succeeded Philometor his brother, and proved tyrannical towards his subjects. He died 116 B. C.

PTOLEMY LATHYRUS, succeeded his father Physcon, but was banished to Cyprus by his mother, who placed his brother Alexander on the throne. He regained his power after his brother's death, and died B. C. 81.

PTOLEMY AULETES, illegitimate son and successor of Lathyrus, maintained his power by an alliance with the Romans. He died B. C. 51.

PTOLEMY DIONYSIUS, son of Auletes, married his sister Cleopatra, and became the murderer of his benefactor Pompey. He was drowned in the Nile, B. C. 46.

PTOLEMY, Claudius, a mathematician, born at Pelusium, 138. His geography, in which he places the earth in the centre of the universe, is a valuable work.

PUBLIUS SYRUS, a Syrian slave, who was set at liberty by his master, and distinguished himself at Rome as a poet, 44 B. C. His moral sentences are excellent.

PUCCI, Francis, a noble Florentine, who left the popish tenets for the protestant, but afterwards returned at Prague to his ancient principles. He travelled through Poland, and with new inconsistency again embraced the protestant faith, for which he was seized at Strasburg, and hurried to Rome, and burnt as a heretic. 1600. In a book inscribed to pope Clement VIII. 1592, he supported the opinion that Christ by his death had made sufficient atonement for the sins of mankind.

PUFFENDORF, Samuel de, a famous civilian and historian, born 1631, at Flet, near Chemnitz, in Upper Saxony, where his father was minister. He studied at Grim and Leipzig, and Jena, and by his great application qualified himself to become an active and distinguished counsellor in some German court. He was advised by his brother to seek for preferment and honor out of his country, and in consequence he accepted the place of tutor to the son of M. Coyet, a noble Swede, who was ambassador at the court of Denmark. War between the two countries, however, obscured his pleasing prospects; he was seized with all the retinue of the Swedish ambassador, and imprisoned, and during the tedious hours of his confinement for eight long months, he digested in his mind observations on what he had read in Grotius' book, de Jure Belli & Pacis, and Hobbes' work, and afterwards published it at the Hague, 1660, by the title of Elementorum Jurisprudentiæ Universalis Libri duo, and this gave rise to his excellent treatise de Jure Naturæ & Gentium. His literary reputation now procured him the appointment of professor of the law of nature and of nations at Heidelberg, on the presentation of the elector palatine, and in 1670 he was honorably invited by Charles XI. of Sweden, to be professor in the newly founded university of Lund. His fame continued to increase as a writer, and as a professor, and he was nominated historiographer and counsellor to the king, and raised to the dignity of a Swedish baron. He was afterwards in 1688 invited to Berlin in the most liberal manner, with the distinction of historiographer and counsellor, by the elector of Brandenburg, to write the life of the elector William the Great, and he died there 1694, of a mortification in one of his toes, in consequence of cutting the nail. This most enlightened philosopher wrote various works, the most known of which are History of Sweden from 1628 to 1654 — History of Charles Gustavus, 2 vols. folio — History of the elector William, 2 vols. folio — An Historical and Political Description of the Papal State — Introduction to the History of the principal European States, 8vo. — treatise on the Law of Nature and Nations, 2 vols 4to. — Opuscula Juvenilia, &c.

PUGATSCHOFF, Temelka, a Cossack, who, after serving against the Prussians and the Turks, deserted from the army, and after spending some time among some Polish hermits, appeared in Russia, and laid claim to the crown as the real Peter III. He met at first some success, and might have seized Moscow; but at last the cruelties which he exercised upon the inhabitants of the places where he passed, revolted even his own followers against him, and he was delivered up to the officers of Catherine. He was conveyed in an iron cage to Moscow, where he was beheaded, 21st Jan. 1775, and in his last moments he showed as much weakness as he had displayed played vigor and intrepidity at the head of his desperate adherents.

PUGET, Peter, a French painter born at Marfeilles 1623. His talents were equally eminent as a sculptor, and an architect, and his Milo of Crotona, and Perseus and Andromeda, in the park at Versailles are pleasing proofs of the power of his chisel. Several of his paintings are preserved at Aix, Toulon, Marfeilles and in the south of France. He died 1694.

PULCHERIA, St. daughter of Arcadius, ascended the throne with her brother Theodosius the younger, and at his death in 450, she married Marcianus. She was a great patroness of learned men, and in her conduct very devout and exemplary. She assembled the council of Chalcedon, 451, and died three years after.

PULCI, Lewis, an Italian poet of merit, born of a noble family at Florence, Dec. 3d 1431. He was the friend of Lorenzo de Medici. His chief works is Morgante Maggiore, an epic romance, which though compared by some to the compositions of Tasso and Ariosto, has been rightly considered by others as a vulgar and profane work, which unites the most solemn and serious subjects with the burlesque and comic. He wrote besides a poem on a tournament at Florence, 1468 called Giostra di Lorenzo de Medici, and some sonnets. He died about 1487. His brothers Luke and Bernard were also known as the successful votaries of the muses.

PULIGO, or PUGLIO, Dominico, a native of Florence, distinguished as a portrait painter. He died 1527, aged 52.

PULMANNUS, Theodore, properly POELMAN, a Dutch commentator, born at Cranenburgh in the duchy of Cleves, 1510. From a fuller he became a scholar, and an able critic, and at the press of Plantin superintended the publication of some valuable editions of Virgil, Lucan, Horace, Juvenal, Terence, Aufonius, and other authors. He died at Salamanca about 1580.

PULTENEY, William, earl of Bath, was born of an ancient and opulent family, 1682. He was early elected into the House of Commons, and was an able and eloquent opposer of the ministry in queen Anne's reign. At the accession of George I. he was made secretary at war; but after some years of co-operation with sir Robert Walpole, he disagreed with him, and warmly opposed his measures for advancing the interests of Hanover at the expence of England. Difference of opinion produced altercation, and altercation hatred, so that Walpole's measures were opposed with personal virulence, and the king at last struck off the name of Pulteney from the list of privy counsellors, and put him out of the commission for the peace. These violent steps increased the opposition, and the popularity of Pulteney, and his sarcasms and his attacks were pointed with the most powerful effect against the minister, who often declared that he dreaded his tongue more than another man's sword. At last opposition prevailed, Walpole was disgraced in 1741, and Pulteney rose in his seat, and was restored to the privy council, and made earl of Bath; but when he got into place, he lost his popularity, and afterwards despised that good public opinion which he could not procure. He died 8th June, 1764, and without issue. He was concerned in the "Craftsman," and wrote some political pamphlets.

PULTENEY, Richard, a native of Loughborough, Leicestershire, who after practising as an apothecary at Leicester, took his medical degrees at Edinburgh 1764. He was patronized by his relation the earl of Bath, and settled at Blandford, Dorsetshire, where he acquired great reputation in his profession. He was fellow of the Royal society, and other learned bodies, and died 1801, aged 71. He is author of a General View of the Life and Writings of Linnæus, 1781 — Historical and Biographical Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England, 2 vols. 8vo. and he made besides valuable communications to the History of Leicestershire by Mr. Nichols, and to that of Dorsetshire by Hutchins, newly edited by Gough; but he particularly contributed to the pages of the Gentleman's magazine, which he enriched by various dissertations and papers on antiquities, and especially on history, a science to which he was very partial, and which he had studied with great skill and attention. An Account of his Life has been published by Dr. Maton in 4to.

PUNTORMO, Giacomo, an Italian painter, the pupil of Leonard de Vinci, and Andrea del Sarto. His pieces, which are much admired, are generally on sacred subjects. He died 1558, aged 61.

PURBACH, George, a learned German, born at Purbach. He was eminent as a divine and philosopher, and particularly applied himself to astronomy, in which science he made several observations, and for the improvement of which he invented some instruments, and calculated useful tables. He translated Ptolemy's Almagest, and died at Vienna, 1462, aged 39.

PURCELL, Henry, a celebrated musical composer, born in 1658. His abilities were early displayed, so that at the age of 18 he was appointed organist of Westminster, and in 1682 he was made one of the organists of the chapel royal. He soon distinguished himself by the publication of some sonatas, and anthems, and divided equally his services between the church and the theatre. Dryden, some of whose poetry he set to music, has highly complimented his powers, and from the superior style of his church music, he deserved the greatest encomiums. He died of a consumptive disorder, 21st Nov. 1695, leaving a wife and children not amply provided for. He was buried in Westminster abbey, and his early death was seriously lamented. His works were published by subscription, under the title of Orpheus Britannicus, 1698, and dedicated to his patroness lady Howard. His brother Daniel, a famous punster, was organist of Magdalen college, Oxford, and of St. Andrew's, Holborn.

PURCHAS, Samuel, an able divine, born at Thaxstead, Essex, 1577, and educated at Cambridge. He obtained in 1604 the vicarage of Eastwood, Essex, which he entrusted to the care of his brother to prosecute with greater facility his studies in London. He obtained afterwards the living of St. Martin's Ludgate, gate, London, and was also chaplain to archbishop Abbot. He died about 1628. His great work was "his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World, and the Religions observed in all ages, &c." 5 vols. fol. These are a valuable compilation.

PURVER, Antony, an extraordinary character, born at Up-Hurst, Hants, 1702. His parents were quakers; but though he was taught only to read and write, he applied himself with such assiduity that he was well versed in the most difficult parts of arithmetic, and had such a retentive memory, that, when young, in 12 hours he could repeat 12 of the longest and most difficult chapters in the bible. He was apprenticed to a shoe-maker, but still turned his thoughts to learning, and acquired such a knowledge of the learned languages, that he began to translate the bible from the original text. To maintain himself he kept school at his native village, and at Trenchay, Gloucestershire where he married, and afterwards settled at Andover, where he completed, in 1764, his translation of the Old and New Testament, a most laborious work, the fruit of 30 years' application. It appeared in 2 vols. folio. by the generosity of his friend Dr. Fothergill, who gave him 1000l. towards his expences, and though it is occasionally deficient in judgment and taste, it yet possesses great and pleasing simplicity, as being very literal. As a preacher among the quakers, Purver was highly respected. He died at Andover, 1777, and was buried there in the ground of the quakers' meeting.

PUTEANUS, Erycius, properly VANDEPUTTE, an eminent scholar born at Venlo, Guelderland, 1574. He studied at Dort, Cologne, Louvain, and afterwards at Padua, and in 1601, was chosen professor of eloquence at Milan. His reputation as a teacher was so great that the king of Spain appointed him his historiographer, and the Romans enrolled him in the number of their patricians. In 1601 he was appointed to succeed his master, the celebrated Justus Lipsius, in the professor's chair at Louvain, and was further honored with the title of governor of the castle there. He died at Louvain 1646. He wrote several works on literary and political subjects, the best known of which is his Statera Belli & Pacis, the balance of peace and war, 1633, during a negociation between the Spanish monarch and the United Provinces. His works form 5 vols. fol.

PUTSCHUS, Elias, an eminent grammarian born at Antwerp, 1580. He published Sallust with notes and fragments, besides a collection of 33 old grammarians, and died at Stade 1606.

PUY, Peter de, a learned Frenchman, author of some valuable political works, on the salique law, and other antiquarian subjects. He was born at Paris, and died 1652, aged 69, universally lamented. Voltaire as well as De Thou speaks highly of his abilities.

PUY SEGUR, James de Chastenot, lord of, a celebrated general, born of a noble family at Armagnac, 1600. He served his country 43 years, and though present at 120 sieges, and 30 battles in which he behaved with activity and courage, he was never wounded. He died at his castle of Bernouille, near Guise, 1682. His memoirs, extending from 1617 to 1658, have appeared in 2 vols. 12mo. and are written with boldness and truth. His son James was marshal of France, and author of a work on the Military Art, in folio, and 2 vols. 4to, 1748. He died 1743, aged 88.

PYLE, Thomas, M. A. an eminent divine, born at Stodey near Holt, Norfolk, 1674. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, and then became minister of King's Lynn, where he distinguished himself as a good preacher, and as an exemplary man. He engaged warmly in the Bangorian controversy, and for his services he was made prebendary of Salisbury, by Dr. Hoadly, and two of his sons also were presented to prebends in the church of Winchester. His paraphrase on the Acts, and all the epistles is an excellent work, often reprinted. He published besides 3 vols. of sermons. This excellent character died at Lynn, 1757.

PYM, John, a celebrated republican, member of parliament for Tavistock. He distinguished himself by his virulence against the unfortunate Charles, and acquired such power and influence among his partizans, that he was called king Pym. He died 1643 of an imposthume in his bowels.

PYNAKER, Adam, a landscape painter born at Pynaker, near Delft in Holland, 1621. He improved himself at Rome, and acquired great celebrity by the excellence and correctness of his pieces, especially his cabinet pictures. He died 1673.

PYRRHO, a Greek philosopher, founder of the sect of Sceptics, who doubted of every thing. He died about 300 B. C.

PYRRHUS, a king of Epirus, celebrated in history as the friend and ally of the Tarentines in their war against the Romans. He afterwards made war against Sicily and against Sparta, and was killed at Argos by a tile thrown down upon his head by a woman. B. C. 272.

PYTHAGORAS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. After visiting Egypt and other places to improve his knowledge, and cultivate his mind, he settled at Crotona in Italy, where he established a famous school. He also reformed the effeminate manners of the Crotonians, and rendered infinite service to mankind, by the wisdom, prudence, and virtues, with which he inspired his numerous pupils. He was well acquainted with the true system of the universe as he placed the sun in the center. He was the author of the absurd doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and forbade the eating of animal flesh. He died about 490 B. C.

PYTHEAS, a Greek philosopher, in the age of Aristotle. His discoveries about the different length of the days in various climates, appeared astonishing to the philosophers of his age.

PYTHEUS, a rhetorician of Athens, known as the rival of the great Demosthenes.

Q.

QUA

QUE

QUADRATUS, St. a disciple of the apostles, and the learned author of an apology for the Christians, a valuable work which he himself presented to the emperor Adrian. Some suppose him to be the angel or bishop of Philadelphia mentioned in the apocalypse, and it is asserted that he was made bishop of Athens about 126. Only fragments of his apology remain.

QUADRIO, Francis Xavier, a jesuit born 2d Dec. 1695, in the Valteline. He was of a melancholy turn of mind, and retired to Zurich, where, with the consent of the pope, he became a secular priest. He died at Milan, 21st Nov. 1756. He is author of a treatise on Italian poetry, under the name of Joseph Mary Andrucci — History of Poetry, 2 vols. — Historical Dissertations on Rhætia and the Valteline, 3 vols. 4to. 1755.

QUAINI, Lewis, a native of Bologna known as a painter. He assisted his master Cignari in some of his most celebrated works and died 1717, aged 74.

QUARLES, Francis, an English poet born at Steward's in the parish of Rumford, Essex, 1592. He was educated at Christ college, Cambridge, and then entered at Lincoln's inn, and was afterwards cup-bearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I. electress Palatine, and queen of Bohemia. He was next secretary to archbishop Usher in Ireland, and was a great sufferer in the Irish rebellion. He did not meet that friendly reception in England which his loyalty deserved, and it is said that the loss of his valuable MSS. preyed deeply upon his mind, and hastened his death, which happened 1644. He was eminent as a poet, and in no case, says Langbaine, offended in his writings against the high duties he owed to God, to his neighbour and to himself. He wrote some theatrical pieces, but the best known of his works are his Emblems, Meditations, and Hieroglyphics. Some have imagined that Pope was much indebted to his writings. He was father of 18 children by his first wife, and one of his sons, John, became known as a poet, and particularly as an active royalist in the king's army. He died of the plague in London, 1665, aged 41.

QUATROMANI, Sertorio, a native of Cosenza in Naples. He obtained admission into the Vatican by means of his friend Paul Manutius, and in this valuable library he devoted himself with indefatigable diligence to the study of Greek literature. His great abilities recommended him to the notice of the duke of Nocera, in whose service he was for some time employed. He, after his patron's death, went into the family of the prince of Stigliano, but soon left him, and died 1606, aged 65. He was in his temper capricious and haughty, easily offended at trifles, and censorious on the faults of others. He, however, possessed learning and information, and his translation of the Æneid into Italian verse is held in estimation. His other works have been collected in 1714, in 8vo. containing Latin and Italian verses, letters, &c.

QUELLIN, Erasmus, a painter of Antwerp, the disciple and successful imitator of Rubens. He died 1678, aged 71. His son John Erasmus was also distinguished as a good artist, and some of his pieces adorn the churches of Antwerp. He died at Antwerp, 1715, aged 85.

QUENSTEDT, John Andrew, a Lutheran divine, author of a Latin account of learned men from Adam to 1600, 4to. — Sculptura Veterum, 8vo. his best work — a System of Divinity according to the Confession of Augsburg, 4 vols. folio, and some other works. He was born at Quedlimburg, and died 22d May, 1688, aged 71.

QUENTAL, Bartholomeu du, a native of the Azores, distinguished for his piety and learning. He became confessor to the king of Portugal, and refused a bishopric, that he might with greater ardor devote himself to preaching, and to the more laborious works of charity. He died 20th Dec. 1698, aged 72. Clement XI. gave him the appellation of the Venerable. He wrote Meditations, &c. — Sermons in Portuguese, &c.

QUERENGHI, Antony, an Italian poet, born at Padua, 1546. He was in the service of the popes, and was secretary to the sacred college. He died at Rome, 1st Sept. 1633. His Latin poems, and some Italian poetry, were published at Rome, 1616 and 1629.

QUERLON, Anne Gabriel Meusnier de, an eminent scholar, born at Nantes, 15th April, 1702. For 22 years he published a periodical paper for Britany, and other prints, and had also some share in the Journal Encyclopedique. He died April, 1780, universally regretted. His chief works are Les Impostures Innocentes, a little entertaining novel — Collection Historique — Marfy's Latin Poem on Painting, translated into French — Editions of Lucretius, with notes — also of Phædrus, and of Anacreon.

QUERNO, Camillo, an Italian poet, born at Monopolis, in Naples. He carried his poem, called Alexiada, containing 20,000 lines, to Leo X. who honored him with his friendship, and made him his buffoon, 1514. After the taking of Rome, he retired to Naples, and died in the hospital there, about 1528.

QUESNAY, Francis, an eminent French physician, born at Ecquevilli, 1694. Though the son of an obscure laborer, he rose to reputation in his profession, and became first physician to the king of France, member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and of the London Royal society. He had an early taste for agriculture, and was a leading man in the society of Economists. He died Dec. 1774. His works are Observations on Bleeding, 12mo. — Essay on Animal Economy, 3 vols. 12mo. — the Art of Healing by Bleeding — Treatise on Continued Fevers, 2 vols. 12mo. — on Gangrene, 12mo. — on Suppuration — Physiocratie, &c. besides an elegant poem, called the Farm House.

QUESNE, Abraham, marquis du, a native of Normandy, who entered into the naval service of France, under his father, and soon distinguished himself. He was in 1637, at the attack of the Isles of St. Margaret, and the next year he greatly contributed to the defeat of the Spanish fleet at Cattari. He afterwards signalized his valor before Tarragona, Barcelona, and before Cadiz, and in 1644 he went into the service of Sweden, and was particularly instrumental in the defeat of the Danish fleet. He was recalled home in 1647, and intrusted with a squadron in the Mediterranean, and he next obliged Bourdeaux, which had revolted, to surrender, and afterwards, in 1676, in three engagements, defeated the combined fleets of Holland and Spain, under Ruyter, near Sicily. It was on this memorable occasion that the following verses were written, alluding to the defeat, and the death of the great Ruyter, who perished in the second engagement:

Terrui in oceano jam solo nomine classes,

Ter nunc in Siculo territus ipse rui.

Si vera inversum quondam dedit omina nomen,

Nunc Rui-ter nomen verius omen habet.

He next carried the terror of his arms against Algiers and Genoa, and every where commanded respect and submission. This gallant officer was deservedly ennobled by the French king. He died at Paris, 2d Feb. 1688, aged 78, leaving four sons.

QUESNEL, Pasquier, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and priest of the oratory, born at Paris, 1634. In 1675 he published at Paris, the works of St. Leo, 2 vols. 4to. and as his notes defended the ancient Gallican church, against the opinions of the Roman pontiffs; the work was condemned at Rome, and the author, in 1685, retired, through fear of persecution, to Brussels. He published in 1687, his Moral Reflections on the New Testament; but though he seemed strongly to favor the Janfenists, the work was well received, and became very popular, on account of the meekness and philanthropy of his sentiments; but the work, though thus publicly countenanced, and even commended by pope Clement XI., was soon after attacked by the jesuits, and condemned, for reasons of state, even by the pope himself, who issued against it his famous bull, called Unigenitus. By the influence of the jesuits, Quesnel was seized and imprisoned; but, by means of a Spanish gentleman, who secretly espoused his cause, he escaped, and reached Amsterdam, where he died 1719. He was author of various works, but chiefly on polemical subjects. The author of the History of the Jesuits, was also a Quesnel, Peter, and he died at the Hague, 1774.

QUESNOY, Francis, a native of Brussels, eminent as a sculptor. His works, chiefly bas-reliefs in bronze, ivory, marble, or wax, possess great elegance, beauty, and character. They generally represent children, bacchanals, &c. and are much sought after. He died at Leghorn, 1644, aged 42. His brother Jerome, who died at Ghent, 1654, was also an eminent sculptor.

QUEVEDO DE VILLEGAS, Francisco de, a Spanish author, born at Madrid, 1570. He possessed great powers of writing in verse as well as prose, and on subjects of wit, of morality, and of science, showed himself correct, judicious, and enlightened. His works were published by Gonzales de Salas, under the title of Parnasso Epagnol, in 3 vols. 4to. His "Visions," a prose work, have been indifferently translated into English, from a French version, and some others of his works have also appeared in an English dress. His satire was so keen, and so imprudently used, that he rendered count d'Olivares, the prime minister, his enemy, and in consequence of this, was imprisoned, till the fall of the royal favorite. He died 1645, or, according to some, 1647.

QUIEN DE LA NEUFVILLE, James le, a French author, born at Paris, 1647. He was successively an officer in the French guards, an advocate at the bar, and lastly a literary character. His General History of Portugal, 2 vols. 4to. procured his admission into the academy of Inscriptions, at Paris. He afterwards published a Treatise on the Use of Posts among the Ancients and Moderns, 12mo. 1734, which was so well received that it gained him the office of director of the posts of French Flanders. In 1713 he went with the French ambassador to Portugal, and was received with great kindness by the court, and rewarded with a pension. Out of gratitude to the monarch, he determined to continue his History of Portugal, which had concluded in 1531, at the death of Emanuel I.; but excessive application brought on disease. He died at Lisbon, 20th May, 1728, aged 81, leaving two sons.

QUIEN, Michael de, a French Dominican, born at Bologne, 1661. He was an able scholar, and well versed in oriental literature. He published Panoplia contra Schisma Græcorum, 4to. — Nullity of the English Ordinations, against Courayer — Oriens Christianus in quatuor Patriarchatus digestus in quo exhibentur Ecclesie, Patriarchæ, cæterique Præsides Orientis, 3 vols. fol. — Defence of the Hebrew Text against Perron, besides an edition of John Damascenus, 2 vols. fol. He died at Paris, 1733.

QUILLET, Claudius, a French writer, born at Chignon, in Touraine, 1602. He studied physic, and practised for some years; but his views were changed by his interference with the affair of the nuns of Loudun, Quin, who were said to be possessed of the devil. He ridiculed the measures which were pursued there by the secret intrigues of Richelieu; and in consequence of this he fled to Rome, for fear of persecution. He became, at Rome, acquainted with d'Etrées, the French ambassador, who made him his secretary; and there he wrote his famous poem called "Callipædia," on the Art of having fine Children, in which he reflected with satirical severity, on cardinal Mazarine. The cardinal, instead of persecuting the author, made him his friend, and gave him an abbey, and Quillet, in gratitude, when he published the second edition of his poem, erased the offensive parts, and dedicated it to his noble patron. This well-known poem is divided into four books, and is written in elegant poetry, and contains many very beautiful passages. The work, however, though defended by Bayle and de la Monnoye, as containing only the language of a man who wrote like a physician, has been deservedly censured by Baillet, as abounding in description both indelicate and licentious. The Callipædia has been translated into English by Rowe. He wrote besides two other short Latin poems. He died 1661, aged 59, and left his papers, with 500 crowns, to Menage for the printing of his Henriade, a Latin poem, in honor of Henry IV.

QUIN, James, a celebrated actor, born in King-street, Covent Garden, 24th Feb. 1693, and descended from a respectable family in Ireland. He was intended for the bar; but in consequence of the lawsuits which took place after his father's death, he had little left to depend upon; and therefore turned his thoughts to the stage. After performing inferior parts on the Dublin theatre, he came to London, and engaged himself with the managers of Drury-lane, and two years after, 1717, he removed to Rich's theatre, Lincoln's Inn Fields. The following year he had an unpleasant dispute with Bowen, a fellow actor, at a tavern, and in consequence they fought, and Bowen died some time after, of his wounds. In this unfortunate dispute, for which Quin was tried, and found guilty of man-slaughter, it does not appear that his conduct was very blameable, as Bowen was the aggressor; and therefore, he suffered little diminution of the public favor. In 1732, Quin, who was now become a popular performer, removed, with the Lincoln's Inn Fields' company, to Covent-garden, which was opened on the 7th Dec. for their reception; but two years after, he quitted it for Drury-lane. In this theatre he continued a favorite actor till 1742, when he returned again to his old friend Rich, at Covent-garden. At this time he had to struggle against the rising fame of young Garrick, of whom he said sarcastically, that he was a new religion, and that, as Whitfield, he was followed for a time, but that people would all come to church again. In this, however, he was disappointed; Garrick, contrary to his expectations, rose to high and deserved reputation; but the two rival heroes, who now divided the applauses of the town, were prevailed upon to act together in the Fair Penitent. Their appearance on the stage together, was received with loud and reiterated plaudits, and each performed with admirable success, and fully supported his former claims to superior eminence. In 1751 Quin retired from the stage to Bath, though, in a few instances, he afterwards appeared in the character of Falstaff, for the benefit of his theatrical friends; and the 19th March, 1753, was the last time of his acting, when, in compliment to his abilities, the price of admission to the pit and boxes, was raised to five shillings. This respectable actor died at Bath, of a fever, 21st Jan. 1766, aged 73. His greatest characters were Cato, Othello, Richard III. &c. He was, in consequence of his merit, patronized by Frederic, prince of Wales, and he had the honor to teach his children a correct mode of pronunciation and delivery. When he was informed of the graceful and dignified manner in which the present king pronounced his first speech, at the meeting of parliament, the veteran performer exclaimed with eager exultation, "It was I who taught the boy." In his character, Quin was a man of strong sense; his wit was pointed, often coarse, and in his temper he was occasionally violent, but not devoid of the noblest feelings of human nature. When Thomson, the author of the Seasons, was arrested, Quin who knew him only by character, nobly stepped forth, and liberated the poet from the spunging-house, by paying the debt and the costs. He was, at times, intemperate in the use of the bottle, and some pleasant stories are related of his character, as an epicure.

QUINAULT, Philip, a celebrated French poet, born at Paris, 1635. His first theatrical piece, called "Les Sœurs Rivaies," a comedy, appeared before the public when he was only 18, and his future years were, with equal diligence and good success, devoted to the muses. His marriage with a rich widow, set him above dependence, and he afterwards became auditor of accounts. Though satirized by Boileau, he was commended by his contemporaries; and Voltaire has observed of him, that artless and inimitable strokes of nature frequently appear with interesting charms in his writings. His works consist of 16 dramatic pieces, which have all appeared on the stage, besides operas, which were set to music by the famous Lully. His works were published at Paris, with his life prefixed, in 5 vols. 12mo. 1778. He was member of the French academy, and of that of inscriptions, and died at Paris, 1688.

QUINCY, John, author of a Dictionary of Physics, 8vo. — an Universal Dispensatory, 8vo. — Chemical Pharmacopœia, 4to. besides a Translation of Sanctorius' Aphorisms, and other valuable works; was a physician of high reputation, who practised with success in London, and died there, 1723.

QUINTILIAN, Marcus Fabius, a Roman orator and critic of great celebrity. He was intimate with Pliny, and patronized by the emperors, and he established a school of rhetoric at Rome, where he died about 60 A. D. His Institutiones Oratoricæ are well known, edited by Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Leyden, 1724.

QUINTINIE, John de la, a famous French gardener, born at Poitiers, 1676. He studied philosophy and the law, and was admitted an advocate at Paris. After practising with great reputation, he devoted himself totally to agricultural pursuits, and enlarged his knowledge of that pleasing science by travelling into Italy, and by visiting England. He received liberal offers from Charles II. to settle in England; but he preferred the service of his king, and was appointed director-general of the fruit and kitchen-gardens of Lewis XIV. He died at Paris, after 1700, universally regretted. He published, in 2 vols. 4to. "Directions for the Management of Fruit and Kitchen Gardens," which have been adopted throughout Europe.

QUIRINI, Angelo Maria, a Venetian cardinal, born 1680, or, according to others, 1684. He was admitted among the Benedictines at Florence, and after storing his mind, with astonishing application, he began, in 1710, to travel over Germany, Holland, England, and France; and every where received distinguishing marks of respect and esteem. Thus noticed and honored by the friendship of Bafnage, Gronovius, Kuster, Bentley, Newton, Burnet, Cave, Potter, Fenelon, Montfaucon, and other learned characters, he returned to Italy, and was raised to the dignity of cardinal, and of archbishop, by Benedict XIII. This amiable man, equally respected by protestants and catholics, for his liberality and benevolence, as well as for his learning, died in the beginning of Jan. 1755. of an apoplexy. His works are numerous and respectable, the best known of which are Primordia Corcyrae, ex Antiquissimis Monumentis Illustrata, 4to. — Veterum Brixiae Episcoporum Vitae — Specimen Variæ Literaturæ quæ in Brixia, ejusque Ditione, Typographiæ in Cunabula florebat, 4to. — Enchiridion Græcorum — Gesta et Epistolæ Franc. Barbari — De Mosaicæ Historiæ præstantiâ, &c. His valuable library was presented to the pope to adorn the Vatican.

QUIROS, Fernand de, a Spanish navigator, who, under the patronage of Philip III. discovered the Society Islands, and other places in the great Pacific Ocean, in 1605.

QUISTORP, John, a Lutheran divine, author of Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles — Articuli Formulæ Concordiæ Illustrati — Manuductio ad Studium Theologicum. He was the friend of the great Grotius, and attended him during his last illness. He died at Rostock, his native place, 1646, aged 62.

R.

RAB

RABAN-MAUR, Magnentius, a native of Fulda, of noble birth. He studied at Fulda, and afterwards at Tours, under Alcuinus, and on his return home he was elected abbot of Fulda. He was made archbishop of Mayence, in 847, and afterwards engaged in a controversy with Gotescalc, whose doctrines he condemned, and whose person he delivered up to Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims. He died at Winfel, 856, aged 68. His works, which are numerous, and on theological subjects, were published at Cologne, 1627, in 6 vols. folio.

RABAUD ST. ETIENNE, John Paul, a protestant minister, born at Nîmes, from which place he was sent as deputy to the constituent assembly. He possessed eloquence and address; but though deluded by the factious spirit of the times, he resumed his moderation in the convention, and spoke with boldness against the punishment of Lewis XVI. These sentiments marked him for death under the sanguinary Robespierre, and though he escaped to Bourdeaux, he was, two months after, seized and brought to Paris, where, the day after, he was guillotined, 28th July, 1793, aged 50. He was a man of learning and information, and published a Letter on the Life and Writings of Gebelin, 8vo. — Letters on the Primitive History of Greece, 8vo. — Considerations on the Interest of the Tiers Etat. — Pieces on the Revolution, &c.

RAB

RABEL, John, a native of Fleuri, eminent among French portrait painters. He died 1603.

RABELAIS, Francis, a celebrated wit, born 1483, at Chinon, in Touraine, where his father was an apothecary. He was admitted among the Franciscans at Poitiers; but he excited the envy of the fraternity, on account of the application with which he studied literature, and especially Greek, then regarded as a barbarous language. An intrigue exposed him to fresh insults, and he escaped, at last, from persecution, and was permitted by pope Clement VII. to renounce the order of Franciscans, and to enter into the society of the Benedictines, whom also he soon after left. He next settled at Montpellier, and took his degrees in medicine, and became a popular professor. When du Prat, the chancellor, abolished the privileges of Montpellier university, that learned body deputed their professor to go to Paris, and his eloquence and arguments proved so powerful, that the decree was reversed, and Rabelais' successful interference was ever after commemorated by investing, in the robe which he wore, all future candidates for academical honors. He quitted Montpellier in 1532, for Lyons; but in 1534, followed du Bellay, bishop of Paris, to Rome, as his physician, and six months after, returned to France, and obtained from the Roman pontiff, the privilege, though now a layman, of holding ecclesiastical benefices.

In

In consequence of this he obtained the abbey of St. Maur, near Paris, and died 1553. His chief work is the "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel," a satirical romance against priests, popes, fools, and knaves, which, though praised by some as a magazine of wit, learning, and science, may be considered as a bold, unintelligible rhapsody, wild and irregular, and disgraced by profane allusions, coarse raillery, obscene and vulgar jests. He wrote besides, some medical works, and other tracts, the whole of which have been published in 5 vols. 8vo. 1715, and in 1741, 3 vols. 4to. The works have appeared in an English dress twice, by Motteux, 1708, and latterly by Ozell, 5 vols. 12mo. Rabelais was universally acknowledged as a man who possessed great brilliancy of wit, and smartness of repartee.

RABIRIUS, a Latin poet, who celebrated the victory of Augustus over Antony's forces at Actium. There was an architect of that name in Domitian's reign.

RABUTIN, Vid. BUSSY.

RACAN, Honorat de Bueil, marquis of, a French poet, born at Roche Racan, in Touraine, 1589. He wrote pastorals, sacred odes, letters, and memoirs of his friend Malherbe, of whom he learnt the art of poetry, and though not a first-rate poet, deserved to be highly commended by Boileau and by Menage. He was one of the first members of the French academy, and died 1670. His works were edited 1660, 8vo. and 1720, 2 vols. 12mo.

RACCHETTI, Bernard, an Italian painter. His views of perspective and architecture were highly finished. He died 1702, aged 63.

RACINE, John, an illustrious French poet, born at Ferté-Milon, 1639. He was educated at Port Royal, where his abilities began to unfold themselves by the most rapid progress in the attainment of the Greek and Latin, and by an excessive fondness for the sublime compositions of Euripides and Sophocles. He afterwards went to Paris, and was one of those who employed their muse in celebrating the king's marriage; and so successful and popular was his Nymphé de la Seine, on this occasion, that the courtiers were full of his praises, and the monarch settled on him a pension for the rest of his life. Thus distinguished, he began to turn his thoughts to higher subjects, and in 1666, he produced his Alexandra. About this time he was engaged in a controversy with Nicole, of the Port Royal, who had inveighed against romance and dramatic writers, and denominated them poisoners not of bodies, but of souls, and in consequence of this attack, produced two spirited pamphlets. In 1668 he produced his "Plaideurs," a comedy, and Andromache, a tragedy; and in 1670 appeared Britannicus, Berenice in 1671, Bajazet in 1672, Mithridates in 1673, Iphigenia in 1675, and Phœdra in 1677. These were represented with increased applause; but such is the envy which generally attends greatness and superior merit, that a cabal was raised against the poet, and Pradon a writer of little capacity was prevailed upon to produce a Phœdra to oppose the noble composition of Racine. This treatment hurt the feelings of the poet, and with a
